Rivers, THE FOUR. In ancient art our Lord is frequently represented, either in person or under the figure of a lamb, standing upon a hillock from whence issue four streams of water. These are supposed by many to signify the four rivers of Eden, which went forth to water the earth (Gen. ii, 10); others (Cyprian, Ep. 73, § 10, ad Jubian.; Bede, Expos. in Gen. ii.; Theodoret, In Psalm. xlv.; Ambrose, De Paradiso, c. 3) discern in them the four gospels, flowing from the source of eternal life to spread throughout the world the riches and the life-giving powers of the doctrine of Christ. Ambrose, again (ibid.), is of opinion that the four rivers are emblems of the four cardinal virtues. The first four oecumenical councils, so often by early writers placed on a par with the gospels themselves, are sometimes compared to the four rivers of Paradise. Jesse, bishop of Amiens in the 8th century, in writing to his clergy, thus illustrates the veneration due to these august assemblies (Longueval, Hist. de l'Egl. Gallicane, v, 144). In several sarcophagi of ancient Gaul we find two stags quenching their thirst at these streams; these are supposed to represent Christians partaking of the gospels and the eucharist of the "well of water springing up into everlasting life." See Cross. The two stags are occasionally found in mosaics; in that of the ancient Vatican, for example (Ciampini, De Sacr. Edif. tab. xiii).

Rives, BASILE, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Mazamet in 1815. In 1844 he was called as pastor to Pont-de-Learn, Tarn, and died in 1876. He published, Le Christianisme Orthodoxe et le Christianisme Libéral:—Le Chrétien, le Vrai Chrétien:—Le Dogme de l'Eglise:—Opinion d'un Pasteur de Compagne sur la Crise du Protestantisme Français:—Le Grande Foi de Toutes les Orthodoxies, etc. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Robbins, CHANDLER, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Lynn, Mass., Feb. 14, 1810. He graduated from Harvard College in 1829, and from the Cambridge Divinity School in 1833. He was ordained Dec. 4 of that year pastor of the Second Church, Boston, as the successor of Ralph Waldo Emerson. This was his only pastorate, and continued for forty-one years. He died at Weston, Mass., Sept. 11, 1882. Among his published writings are A History of the Second Church in Boston, with Ignes of Increase and Cotton Mather, and several sermons. He edited the works of Henry Ware, Jr. (4 vols.), compiled The Social Hymn-book, and a Hymn-book for Christian Worship. See Boston Advertiser, Sept. 12, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Robert (1), a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of Ross in 1122, but was not consecrated until 1128. He died in 1159. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 8.

Robert (2), a Scotch prelate, was an Englishman, and was brought, with five others, into Scotland by Alexander I, to instruct the people and to be good examples to them in the observance of the monastic rules prescribed by St. Augustine. He was made prior of Scone in 1115, and in 1122 became bishop of St. Andrews. He was consecrated in 1126 or 1127. He died in this see in 1159. This prelate founded the priory of Lochleven, to be annexed to his new foundation. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 8.

Robert (3), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the see of Ross in 1214. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 185.

Robert (4), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Brechin in 1456. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 163.

Robert (5), a Scotch prelate, was bishop at Dunkeld in 1484, and was witness to a charter of appraisement by king James III of the lands of Bordland of Ketnea, from James, earl of Buchan, to Robert, lord Lisle, May 19, 1485. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 91.

Robert (6), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the Isles in 1492, and received a charter from John, lord of the Isles, of the Church of Kilberry, which was united to the bishopric of a mensal Church. He was in this see in 1492. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 305.

Robert, Carl Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Cassel, March 21, 1740. He studied at Marburg and Göttingen, and was ordained in 1762. In 1764 he was second preacher and professor at Marburg, in 1768 doctor of theology, and in 1771 member of consistory. In 1778 Robert resigned his theological position and commenced his career in the faculty of law. In 1779 he took the degree of doctor of law, in 1797 he was called to Cassel, and died April 3, 1803. He published, De Nomine novō Θεοῦ non Regium Christi Munus, etc. (Marburg, 1768):—Encyclopædia et Methodi Theologici Brevis Ordinatio (1769):—Ethicæ Christianæ Compendium (1770):—Causa Belli a Israelitis Adversus Canaanos, etc. (1778). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Robert, Champart, archbishop of Canterbury, was by birth a Norman. He was abbot of Jumièges, a monastery on the Seine. He had formerly been a monk, and was made bishop of London in 1044. In 1051 he was translated to the see of Canterbury. In 1052 he was deposed, and retired to his monastery at Jumièges, where he died. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 494 sq.

Robert, Joseph T., LL.D., a Baptist minister and educator, was born at Robertville, S. C., Nov. 28, 1807. He was baptized in October, 1822, and graduated from Brown University in 1828 with the highest honors of his class. During 1829 and 1830 he was a resident graduate and medical student at Yale College, and in 1831 took his degree at the South Carolina Medical College. In 1832 he was licensed to preach by the Robertville Church, pursued his theological studies at the Furman (S. C.) Seminary, and was ordained pastor of the Robertville Church in 1834, where he remained until 1839, when he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Church at Covington, Ky. In 1841 he took charge of the Church at Lebanon, Ga. About 1848 he went to the First Church at Savannah, Ga.; in 1850 he became pastor of the Church at Portsmouth, O.; in 1858 professor of mathematics and natural sciences in Burlington University, Ia.; in 1864 professor of languages in the Iowa State University, and in 1869 president of Burlington University. He returned to Georgia in October, 1870, and in July, 1871, became principal of the Augusta Institute. Subsequently this institution, established for the education of colored ministers, was removed to Atlanta, and in 1879 was incorporated with the Atlanta Baptist Seminary, under the presidency of Dr. Robert. He died March 5, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 992. (J. C. S.)

Robinson, STUART, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Strabane, Ireland, Nov. 26, 1816. He received his preparatory education under Rev. James M. Brown, D.D., in Berkeley County, Va., and Rev. William H. Foote, D.D., at Romney; graduated from Amherst College, Mass., in 1836; went thence to Union Theological Seminary in Virginia, and spent one year, then taught from 1837 to 1839; from 1839 to 1841 studied at Princeton Seminary; was licensed by Greenbrier Presbytery, Va., April 10, 1841; and was ordained by the same presbytery, Oct. 8, 1842, at Lewisburg (now in West Virginia), pastor of the Church at Kanawha Saline, from which he was released May 8, 1847; was installed pastor of the Church at Frankfort, Ky., by the Presbytery of West Lexington, June 18 following, and labored there until Sept. 2, 1852; removed to Baltimore, Md., and supplied the Fayette Street Church in 1852 and 1853; then organized the Central Presbyterian Church in the same city, and was installed its pastor May 10 of the latter year, and released Oct. 27, 1856; was professor of pastoral theology and Church government in Danville Theological Seminary, Ky., in 1856 and 1857, pastor of the Second Church of Louisville from 1858 to 1881, at which time he was released on account of the failure of his health. He died in Louisville, Oct. 5, 1881. Dr. Robinson was a man of rare learning, and one of the finest expository preachers in the country. He wrote much and published much, but his principal productions are the two volumes, The Church of God, and Discourses on Redemption. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 42.

Rochat, AUGUSTE LOUIS PHILIPPE, a Protestant theologian of Switzerland, was born July 17, 1789, at Crassier, Vaud. In 1812 he was ordained, and acted as preacher at different places. In 1825 he founded an independent Church at Rolles, in which he labored till his death, March 7, 1847. Rochat wrote, Méditations (1832):—La Nature, la Constitution et le But de l'Eglise du Christ (1837):—Méditations sur Diverses Portions de la Parole de Dieu (1838):—Œuvres Posthumes (1848). Rockwell, JOEL EDSON, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Salisbury, Vt., May 4, 1816. In 1837 he graduated from Amherst College, and in 1841 from Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. The same year he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Valatie; in 1847 of the Hanover Street Church, Wilmington, Del.; in 1861 of the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. After laboring constantly for eighteen years, he spent five months in Europe for the benefit of his health. During the war of the rebellion he served as a member of the Christian Commission. In 1878 he became pastor of the Edgewater Presbyterian Church, on Staten Island, where he remained until his death, July 29, 1882. Besides fulfilling the duties of an active pastor during all these years, he was a prolific writer, and contributed to a number of religious periodicals. See (N. Y.) Observer, Aug. 3, 1882; Evangelist, same date. (W. P. S.)

Rockwood, ELISHA, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Chesterfield, N. H., May 9, 1778. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1802; taught an academy in Plymouth, Mass., two years; was tutor in Dartmouth College; while there studied theology, and in 1806 was approbated by the Londonderry Presbytery. After preaching as an occasional supply in several places in Vermont and Massachusetts, he was ordained in Westboro', Oct. 28, 1808; was dismissed March 11, 1835; and finally was pastor in Swaney, N. H., from Nov. 16, 1836, until his death, June 19, 1838. See Hist. of Mendon Association, p. 164. (J. C. S.)

Rödiger, MORITZ, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Sangerhausen, April 29, 1804, and died at Halle, Oct. 13, 1837, doctor of philosophy. He is the author of Synopsis Evangeliorum Pericopis Parallelis (2d ed. Halle, 1839). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 245. (B. P.)

Roe, CHARLES HILL, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Kings County, Ireland, Jan. 6, 1800, his father being a clergyman of the Established Church. Having become a Baptist, he entered, in 1822, Horton College, Eng., and on the completion of his studies became pastor of the Church in Middleton, Lancashire, not confining his labors to his own church, but preaching extensively in all the neighboring region. He acted as secretary of the Home Mission Society from 1834 to 1842, and then became pastor of the Church in Birmingham, where his labors were greatly blessed. He came to the United States in 1851, accepted a call to Belvidere, Ill., and during a part of the time of the civil war was chaplain of a regiment. He visited England in behalf of the freedmen, and raised funds for educational purposes among them. After a two years' pastorate at Waukegan, Wis., and two years' service for the University of Chicago, he died at Belvidere, June 20, 1872. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1008. (J. C. S.)

Roger (1), a Scotch prelate, was lord high chancellor in Scotland in 1178, and was made bishop of the see of St. Andrews in 1188. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 13.

Roger (2), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Ross in 1340, and is witness to a grant which Duncan, earl of Fife, made to Robert Lauder about that period. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 188.

Rogers, Ebeneser Platt, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in New York city, Dec. 18, 1817. He graduated from Yale College in 1837, studied at Princeton Theological Seminary nearly one year, then, because of weakness of the eyes, two years in private with Rev. L. H. Atwater, D.D., at Fairfield, Conn., was licensed by the South Association of Litchfield County, June 30, 1840, and ordained by the Hampden Association at Chicopee Falls, Mass., Nov. 4 following. His successive fields of labor were, Chicopee Falls, 1840-43; Northampton, 1843-46; Augusta, Ga., 1847-54; Philadelphia, Pa., 1854-56; Albany, N. Y., 1856-62; New York city, 1862-81. Part of these labors were in the Congregational Church, part in the Presbyterian, and part in the Reformed Dutch Church. He died at Montclair, N. J., Oct. 22, 1881. He published several volumes on religious subjects, besides many sermons. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 38.

Rogers, Ferdinand, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York state in 1816. He was ordained to the ministry in 1837, and took charge of his first parish at Brownsville, where he remained till 1846, when he accepted a rectorship in Greene, and continued there till his death, Jan. 17, 1876. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1876, p. 623.

Rogers, Richard, an English Puritan minister, was born about 1560, and entered the ministry in 1575. He preached through the eastern counties of England forty-three years, suffering molestation from the officers, but acquiring considerable prominence among the dissenting divines. He died at Weathersfield, Essex, April 21, 1618. His publications include Seren Treatises (Lond. 1605, fol. and several other editions), a kind of theological manual, much used by the early divines of New England:—Certain Sermons (1612):—Commentary on the Whole Booke of Judges (1615). Mr. Chester, in his John Rogers (1861), p. 238-244, disputes Calamy's oft-repeated assertion that this divine was a descendant of the martyr. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Rogerus, a Scotch prelate, was witness to a charter dated March 4, 1328, at Ross. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 187.

Rognon, Louis, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Lyons, Feb. 4, 1826. Having completed his studies, he was successively pastor at Vals (1850), Montpellier (1852), and Paris (1861). He died April 15, 1869, leaving Mélanges Philosophiques, Religieux et Littéraires, and Sermons (Paris, 1870). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Rohrbacher, René François, a Roman Catholic theologian of France, was born at Langatte in 1789. For some time professor of theology in the clerical seminary at Nancy, he went in 1849 to Paris, and died in 1856. Rohrbacher is the author of, Histoire Universelle de l'Eglise Catholique (Nancy, 1842-49, 29 vols.; 2d ed. Paris, 1849-53), afterwards translated into German:—Catechisme du Sens Commun (2d ed. 1858):—La Religion Médiée (2d ed. 1852, 2 vols.):—Des Rapports Naturels entre les deux Puissances (Besançon, 1838, 2 vols.):—De la Grâce et de la Nature (ed.).—Motifs qui ont Ramené à l'Eglise Catholique un Grand Nombre de Protestants et d'Autres Religioneux (Paris, 1841, 2 vols.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Rohrer, Franz, one of the best historical scholars of Switzerland, was born at Stanz in 1832, and studied theology at the universities of Freiburg and Tübingen. He was ordained in 1856, and was for some time pastor of Kerna. His chief attention, however, was given to historical research, which his subsequent position as librarian at St. Gall enabled him to prosecute with greater freedom. After the death of Dr. Lütolf he became president of the Historical Society of the Five Cantons and editor of the Geschichtsfreund. He was also one of the most active members of the Swiss Geschichtsforschende Gesellschaft, and undertook its continuation of the great historical work left incomplete by Kopp, and afterwards by Lütolf, the Geschichte der eidgenössischen Bünde, of which a new volume lately appeared, under his care, bringing down the history to the peace of Austria with Lucerne and the Forest Cantons (1330-36). After serving as rector of the gymnasium at Altdorf, he was made a canon of the Stiftskirche at Luzerne in 1873, where he died in September, 1882. He described himself to the last as a theologian of the "Richtung der Lacordaire." (B. P.)

Röhrich, Timotheus Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Alt-Eckendorf in 1802. He studied at Strasburg and Göttingen, and performed the ministerial functions at Fürdenheim, in Alsace. In 1837 he was called as pastor to Strasburg, and died in 1860. Röhrich published, Geschichte der Reformation in Elsass und besonders in Strassburg (1830-32, 3 vols.):—Matthias Zell (1850):—Mittheilungen aus der Geschichte der evangelischen Kirche des Elsass (1855, 3 vols.):—besides, he contributed largely to the Zeitschrift für historische Theologie and the Strassburger theologische Beiträge. See Reuss, in Denkschrift der theologischen Gesellschaft zu Strassburg (Jena, 1861); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Rohtlieb, Johannes, a Lutheran theologian of Sweden, was born in Germany in 1806. Educated at German universities, he was in 1833 made assistant pastor of the German Church of St. Gertrude, at Stockholm, and in 1839, on the death of the pastor, succeeded to his office, by appointment of the king. In 1853 Rohtlieb became the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Sweden, which he served until his death. In 1875 he retired from the pastoral charge of his congregation, and died April 11, 1881, a doctor of theology. (B. P.)

Rokeby, William, an Irish prelate, was a native of Rokeby, in Yorkshire, and a doctor of the canon law. He was a brother to Sir Richard Rokeby, lord treasurer of Ireland. He received his early education at Rotherham and finished at Oxford, when he was presented by the monks of Lewes, in 1487, to the rectory of Sandal, near Doncaster. At the close of the 15th century he was nominated to the vicarage of Halifax, in Yorkshire; in 1498 was constituted lord chancellor of Ireland, and afterwards advanced to the see of Meath, in 1507. On Feb. 5, 1511, he was translated by pope Julius II to the see of Dublin, the temporalities of which were accorded to him in June following. In 1514 this prelate confirmed the establishment of a college of clerks, founded at Maynooth by Gerald, earl of Kildare, which was subsequently remodelled. In 1520 he was despatched by the lord deputy and council to Waterford for the purpose of pacifying such discords and debates as existed between the earl of Desmond and sir Piers Butler. Archbishop Rokeby died Nov. 29, 1521. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 178.

Roll, Reinhard Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Unna, Hesse, Nov. 2, 1683, and studied at Rostock. In 1710 he was rector at his native place, in 1712 at Dortmund, in 1730 professor at Giessen, and died Oct. 2, 1768, doctor of theology. He published, De Nummo Confessionali et Oblatorio (Rostock, 1707):—Bibliotheca Nobilium Theologorum Historico-Theologica Selecta (1708):—De Sectarum Philosophicarum Scripturibus Græcia Potioribus (1709-10):—De Objecto Pauli Ixix (1714):—De Paulo Apostolo Polyhistor (1715):—Jobus Scepticismi immerito Accusatus (1719):—Lineamenta Theologie Naturalis sive Philosophicæ (1723):—De Fide Centurionis Cyrenensis ad Matth. viii. 1 sq. (1730). (See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (where ninety titles of Roll's works are given). (B. P.)

Rollock, Peter, a Scotch prelate, was made titular bishop of Dunkeld by king James VI. He was one of the lords of session, and accompanied the king to England in 1603. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 97.

Rood, Heman, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Jericho, Vt., Jan. 29, 1795. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1819, was preceptor at Montpelier Academy for two years, and in 1822 tutor at Middlebury College. In 1825 he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary; the next year, July 12, became pastor at Gilmanton, N. H.; in April, 1830, at New Milford, Conn.; in September, 1835, professor of sacred literature at the Gilmanton Theological Seminary, and occupied that position until November, 1843. The next ten years he was employed in teaching at Haverhill. From 1853 to 1858 he was acting-pastor at Quechee, in Hartford, Vt., and from 1858 to 1864 served in the same relation at Hartland. From 1864 to 1878 he resided without charge at Hanover, N. H., and thereafter at Westfield, N. Y., until his death, June 8, 1882. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 31.

Roolwer, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Ross about the year 900, and is buried at St. Mangholds, in the Isle of Man. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 296.

Rosecrans, Sylvester Horton, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Homer, O., Feb. 5, 1827. He entered Kenyon College, but on joining the Roman Catholic Church went to St. John's College, Fordham, N. Y., where he graduated with high honors in 1846. He studied five years in the College of the Propaganda at Rome, and was ordained priest in 1852. Returning to the United States, he became an assistant at the cathedral of Cincinnati, a position which he held for seven years, and was at the same time professor of theology at Mt. St. Mary's Seminary and one of the editors of the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph. In 1859 archbishop Purcell established a college in connection with the seminary for the education of Catholics, and Dr.

Rosecrans was appointed president, which position he filled until the college was closed, March 25, 1862. He was made auxiliary bishop of Cincinnati in 1868, and when Columbus was erected into a diocese he was appointed its first bishop, the duties of which office he faithfully discharged until his sudden death, Oct. 21, 1878. See (N.Y.) Catholic Annual, 1879, p. 91.

Rosenbaum, JOHANN JOSEPH, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1797. In 1825 he was professor of dogmatics in the clerical seminary at Treves, in 1842 pastor at Andernach, in 1862 member of the chapter at Treves, and died April 13, 1867, doctor of theology. He was one of the founders of the Zeitschrift für Theologie und Philosophie, published at Bonn, and printed in defence of Hermes and his philosophical system, Ueber Glauben (Treves, 1833). (B. P.)

Rosenkranz, JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born April 23, 1805, at Magdeburg. He studied at different universities, and commenced his academical career at Halle in 1828. In 1831 he was appointed professor, and was called to Königsberg in 1833, where he died, June 14, 1879. In his philosophical system he was a follower of Hegel, and published, Der Zweifel am Glauben, Kritik der Schriften: De Tribus Impostoribus (Halle, 1830);—Die Naturreligion (Iserlohn, 1831);—Encyclopädie der theologischen Wissenschaften (Halle, 6th ed., 2d ed. 1845);—Kritik der Schleiermacher'schen Glaubenslehre (Königsberg, 1836);—Ueber Schelling und Hegel (1843);—Kritik der Principien der Strauss'schen Glaubenslehre (Leipzig, 1845);—Neue Studien (1875-77, 3 vols.). Rosmini (Serbati), ANTONIO, an Italian ecclesiastic and philosopher, was born at Roveredo, in the Tyrol, March 24, 1797. He studied at Padua, became a priest at the age of twenty-four, and in 1827 published his first treatise on philosophy, to which he had devoted himself from his early youth. About the same time he formed the acquaintance of Manzoni, and the next year founded a new religious order, the "Istituto del Preti della Carità" (Brethren of Charity), visiting Rome in 1830 to obtain the sanction of the pope. In 1834 he returned to Roveredo as archdeacon, and in 1836 became abbot there, and founded a similar female order (Sisters of Providence). Meanwhile he continued his philosophical studies and publications, in consequence of the liberality of which he failed to secure the confirmation of his cardinalship (given him in 1848 by Pius IX), and some of his books were even put on the Index Expurgatorius. He died at Stresa, July 1, 1855. His writings fill thirty-five volumes. His Life has been written by Lockhart (1856) and Garelli (1861). For a notice of his life and philosophy see the Fortnightly Review, November, 1881, and July, 1882.

Ross, ARTHUR, a Scotch prelate, was minister of Dirse, in the shire of Aberdeen, and was educated at the University of St. Andrews. In 1665 he was pastor at Glasgow, where he continued until 1675. He was then promoted to the see of Argyre, whence he was transferred to that of Glasgow in 1679, and to that of Galloway the same year. But he was retranslated to the see of Glasgow Oct. 15, the same year, and thence advanced to the see of St. Andrews, Oct. 31, 1684, where he continued until the revolution in 1688, when he was deprived. He died June 13, 1704. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 43, 269, 282, 291.

Rossian Manuscript (Codex Rossianensis) is an uncial manuscript designated by the Greek letter Z, and is so called from Rossano, in Calabria, where it was found. In the spring of 1879 two German scholars, Dr. Oscar von Gebhardt, of Göttingen, and Dr. Adolf Harnack, of Gießen, made a joint expedition into Italy in search of old manuscripts. In his Hippolyti quæ Feruntur Omnia, p. 216, Lagarde called attention to a notice from the 16th century, according to which manuscripts of Cyril of Jerusalem, Dionysius Alexandrinus, and of Hippolytus are said to be in the monastery of Santa Maria de lo Patire, near Rossano. This notice induced the two German scholars to search for these writings, of which, however, they could hear nothing, the monastery having long since perished. But they were informed that there was a very old Biblical book in the archiepiscopal palace. They begged to be allowed to look at this. Ushered into the presence of the archbishop, monsignor Pietro Cilento, they beheld, to their astonishment and delight, a quarto volume of the gospels, written in silver, on purple parchment, in old Greek uncial letters, unaccented, the words unseparated, and at the beginning a number of admirably drawn and colored miniatures and historical pictures. It consists of one hundred and eighty-eight leaves of parchment of two columns of twenty lines each. More than half of the original manuscript seems to have perished. What survives contains the whole of Matthew and Mark as far as the middle of the fourteenth verse of the last chapter. The discoverers assign it to the 6th century; the text attaches itself closely to the chief representatives of the amended text of A, Δ, Π, over against the most ancient codices S and B; but where one of these (Δ for example) accords with the older text, Z also usually follows it, and shows a remarkable agreement with the scattered purple codex of the gospels N. Independent of the new Greek text (a specimen of which is given by Schaaf in A Companion to the Greek Testament, N. Y. 1883, p. 132), the pictures in the manuscript are believed to be of great value for the early history of painting. While Latin manuscripts with pictures are relatively numerous, only a very few Greek manuscripts prior to the 7th century are thus adorned. Chief among them is the Vienna purple manuscript of Genesis. The newly discovered pictures give a very favorable impression of the art of the 6th century. They are described as being wonderful in distinctness of outline and freshness of coloring. The manuscript is the property of the chapter of the cathedral church of Rossano. See Gebhardt and Harnack, Evangeliorum Codex Græcus Purpureus Rossianensis, etc. (Leipzig, 1880); Schürer, in the Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1880, No. 19. (B. P.)

Roth, ABRAHAM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1633 at Herwigsdorf, Silesia, studied at Leipsic, and died at Sorau, April 26, 1699, court-preacher and superintendent. He wrote, De Cæra Auroræ ad Psa. xxii.;—De Cultu Dei Rejectio Matt. xi. 9;—De Nicolaitis, Apocal. ii. 15;—De Essentia;—De Melocholatria Judæorum;—De Judæorum Ligamentis Precatoriis. See Grosser, Lausitzer Merkwürdigkeiten; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Rothe, JOHANN ANDREAS, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 12, 1688, at Lissa, Silesia, and studied at Leipsic. Count Zinzendorf selected him to fill the office of pastor at Berthelsdorf, the duties of which Roth discharged to the admiration of all who knew him. He died July 6, 1758. Rothe is the author of several hymns, the best known of which is his Ich habe nun den Grund gefunden (Engl. transl. "I now have found, for hope of heaven," in Mülls, Hymn Germanica,

No. 82). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 240 sq. (B. P.)

Roumania comprises 4,598,219 inhabitants belonging to the Greek Church, 115,420 to the Church of Rome, 8803 to the Armenian Church, 7790 to the Evangelical Church, 401,051 Jews, 25,033 Mohammedans, and 16,058 who call themselves Lipovanians. The Greek Church is the State Church, organized on strictly hierarchical principles. At the head of the clergy is the archbishop or metropolitan and primate of Roumania, at Bucharest, and the archbishop of Moldavia, at Jassy. The lower clergy are educated at seminaries, and supported by the congregation, whereas the higher clergy, from the archbishops to the protopopes, are paid by the state. What is demanded from the lower clergy is the ability of reading the prescribed formularies and performing the ceremonies. The Roman Catholic Church has two bishops, one at Bucharest and another at Jassy. The Evangelical congregations, with the exception of that at Bucharest, are in connection with the State Church of Prussia, and receive their preachers from the Prussian consistory. These congregations have, however, their own government, but are required to send a very careful report through their ministers to the Prussian ecclesiastical authority. At present there exist eight Evangelical congregations — at Jassy, Bucharest, Galatz, Braila, Pitesti, Craiova, Turnu-Severin, and Atmadacha (Dobrukscha). Each congregation has its own parochial school, with male and female teachers. The latter are from the Kaiserswert house of deaconesses. See Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Rous (Rouse, or Rowse), FRANCIS, a fanatical supporter of the English commonwealth, was born at Heanton, Cornwall, in 1579, and educated at Broadgate Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford. He afterwards studied law, and was a member of Parliament under Charles I. He was one of the few laymen appointed by the Commons to sit in the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and became provost of Eton in 1643. He died in 1659. His writings were printed in London in 1657, and include a utopian scheme of government modelled after the Jewish, and a metrical version of the Palma. See Rose, Bing. Diet. s. v.

Roussel, NAPOLÉON, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Sauve in 1805. He studied at Geneva, was in 1831 pastor at Saint Étienne, but at the instance of the consistory he had to resign in 1835 because his sermons "bore the stamp of Methodism." In vain did the majority of the Church protest against the intolerance of the consistory. Roussel resigned, and founded an independent chapel. In 1835 he was pastor at Marseilles, in 1838 he went to Paris, where he started a journal called l'Espérance, the organ of the orthodox party. He was the means of founding churches at Angoulême, Villefavard, Limoges, Balledant, etc. In 1863 Roussel went to Lyons, but resigned his pastorate in 1867. He then retired to Geneva, and died June 8, 1878. Besides his Comment il ne faut pas Prêcher, he published a great many brochures and tracts. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Rowden, PHILIP, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in England in 1828, and in early life came to New York city. Not long after he was converted, and joined the Church in Newark, N. J. Having subsequently entered the ministry, his pastorates were successively in Newark, Bronson, Mich., and in Chili, Ind. His ministry was attended with powerful revivals. "He was a man of studious habits and deep research." He died in Rochester, Ind., April 4, 1875. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1012. (J. C. S.)

Rowlandson, MICHAEL, D.D., an English divine, was born about 1759, and educated at Queen's College Oxford. At the time of his death, July 8, 1824, he was vicar of Warminster. He was a man whose exemplary life and unceasing fidelity in the work of the ministry won for him the esteem and love of all who knew him. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, Aug. 1824, p. 503.

Rowley, GEORGE, D.D., an English educator and divine, was born in 1782, and educated at University College, Oxford, of which he became successively fellow, tutor, and public examiner. In 1821 he was elected to the mastership of his college, and in 1832 was appointed to the vice-chancellorship of the University of Oxford, which he held till his death, Oct. 5, 1836. In his official duties he was noted for his punctuality and decision; and in private life he was distinguished for kindness of disposition and unselfishness of character. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, Nov. 1836, p. 700.

Roxburgh, HUGO DE, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Tullibody, and clerk to Nicolaus, the chancellor of Scotland. He was afterwards archdeacon of St. Andrews. In 1189 he was made chancellor of Glasgow, and in 1199 bishop, but sat only one year. He died in 1200. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 236.

Rückert, Friedrich, an Orientalist, and one of the greatest German poets of the 19th century, was born at Schweinfurt, May 16, 1789. He studied at Jena, commenced his academical career in 1811, was professor of Oriental languages at Erlangen in 1826, and in 1841 at Berlin. He retired in 1846 to his country seat at Neuss, and died Jan. 31, 1866. He published, Hebräische Propheten übersetzt und erläutert (Leipzig, 1831): — Leben Jesu, Evangelien-Harmonie in gebundener Rede (Stuttgart, 1839): — Heroden der Grosse (1844). Some of his religious poems have been translated into English, as Dein König kommt in niederen Hüllen (in Schaff, Christ in Song, p. 33: "He comes, no royal vesture wearing"): — Er ist in Bethlehem geboren (ibid. p. 93: "In Bethlehem, the Lord of glory"): — Das Paradies muss schöner sein (ibid. p. 657: "Oh Paradise must fairer be"): — Um Mitternacht bin ich erwacht (Winkworth, Christian Singers of Germany, p. 337: "At dead of night Sleep took her flight"). (B. P.)

Rückert, Leopold Immanuel, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1797 at Grosshennersdorf, near Herrnhut, Upper Lusatia. He studied theology and philosophy at Leipzig, was for some time deacon at his native place, and published, in 1821, De Ratione Tractandæ Theologiæ Dogmaticæ. In 1825 he was appointed teacher at the Gymnasium of Zittau, and while there published, Kommentar über den Brief Pauli an die Römer (Leipzig, 1831; 2d ed. 1839): — Kommentar über den Brief Pauli an die Galater (1833): — An die Epheser (1834): — An die Korinther (1836-37). Rückert was made doctor of theology in 1836 by the theological faculty of Copenhagen, and in 1844 he was called to Jena, where he wrote, Theologie (Leipzig, 1851, 2 vols.): — Das Abendmahl. Sein Wesen und seine Geschichte in der alten Kirche (1856): — Hüchlein von der Kirche (1857): — Der Rationalismus (1859). Rückert died April 9, 1871. Rudder, WILLIAM, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in British Guiana; graduated from Trinity College and from the General Theological Seminary; was ordained deacon by bishop Brownell in 1851; officiated successively in St. Paul's Church, Flatbush, L. I.; Calvary Church, New York, as an assistant minister; St. Paul's Church, Albany, as rector; and in St. Stephen's, Philadelphia, Pa., as assistant. On the death of the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, rector of St. Stephen's, in 1865, Dr. Rudder assumed the rectorship, and remained in this pastorate until his death, Jan. 29, 1880, aged fifty-seven years. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881, p. 174.

Rüdel, CARL ERNST GOTTLIEB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1769. He commenced his pastoral career at Leipzig in 1801, and died there in 1842, doctor of theology. He published, Predigten (1816):—Festpredigten und Amtreden (1828—32, 2 vols.):—Abendmahl- und Confirmationsreden (1827—36, 6 vols.), etc. See Winer, *Handbuch der theol. Rüdiger, Franz Joseph, a Roman Catholic prelate of Austria, was born April 6, 1811, at Partheuen. In 1853 he was made bishop of Linz, and died Nov. 24, 1884. Rüdiger was one of those prelates who opposed all measures of the Austrian government which tended towards depriving the Church of any of her prerogatives. Rüdiger only knew one government, the supremacy of the Church. When the dogma of the Immaculate Conception was proclaimed, he celebrated that event by building a splendid cathedral at Linz, and erecting monasteries throughout his diocese. (B. P.)

Rule (Heb. kar, קר, a line for measuring, as elsewhere rendered) is mentioned (Isa. xlv, 13) among the tools of the carpenter (חרש צצים), hewer of wood, the associated implements being the "line" (Heb. séred, סֵרֶד, probably a graver), the "plane" (Heb. muklau'áh, מִקְלָאוֹהַּ, probably a chisel), and the "compass" (Heb. mechugáh, מֵחֻגָּה, probably compasses). See HANDICRAFT.

Rullmann, GEORG WILHELM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 16, 1757, and studied at Rinteln and Göttingen. In 1778 he was appointed con-rector at Rinteln, in 1782 professor of theology, in 1788 doctor of theology, and died June 16, 1804. He wrote, De Insigni Psychologia in Theologia Revelata Usu (Rinteln, 1779):—Verbrauch eines Lehrbuchs der römischen Alterthümer (1782; 2d ed. 1787):—De Apostolis Primariis Religionis Christianæ Doctoribus (1788):—Tabula Harmoniam IV Evangeliorum Exhibens (1790):—De Prophetis Novi Testamenti (eod.):—Die heiligen Schriften des Neuen Bundes übersetzt und mit Anmerkungen versehen (1790—91, 3 vols.):—Observationes Rulman, MENSWIN, one of the "Friends of God," of the 14th century, was born at Strasburg in 1307. He was a wealthy merchant and banker, when, in 1347, he gave up business, joined the Friends of God, and led a life of severe asceticism, under the guidance of Tauler. In 1366 Rulman acquired the island of Der grüne Wört, in the Ill, near Strasburg, and retired thither. He died July 18, 1382. Rulman's writings are, Das Rannerbüchlein (edited by Jundt, Les Amis de Dieu, Paris, 1879):—Dus Buch von den neun Felsen (ed. by Schmidt, Leipzig, 1859), and an old Dutch version of the same, Dut Boeck van den Onspronck, by G. Russell, William, a Scotch prelate, was a native of the Isle of Man and abbot of Rushen. He was consecrated bishop of the Isles in 1248, and held a synod at St. Michael's in 1350, in which five additional canons were made. He died April 4, 1374. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 303.

Russell, Andrew, D.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at Winchburgh, Linlithgowshire, Nov. 1, 1807. He was educated in letters at the University of Edinburgh, and in theology at the Glasgow Theological Academy. He was ordained pastor at Haddington in 1833, where he labored some eight years; next at Princes Street Chapel, Dundee, four years. The state of his health at this time requiring a change of climate, he removed to Stirling, where he enjoyed a long and successful pastorate. From Stirling he went to Bradford, Yorkshire, in 1859, and for some years took pastoral charge of the Chapel at Lister Hills. During the last twelve and a half years of his life he was pastor of the Church at Holme Lane, Bradford. He died June 19, 1881, having filled with great honor several denominational offices. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 329.

Russell, Charles William, D.D., a Roman Catholic divine, was born at Killough, County Down, Ireland, May 14, 1812. He was educated at Drogheda, at Downpatrick, and at Maynooth College; was elected to the Dunboyne Establishment in 1832, for ten years discharged his duties as professor at Maynooth, and in 1845, when the chair of ecclesiastical history was established, he was appointed thereto. He held this position until the death of Dr. Renahan in 1857, when he became president of the college, which office he filled until his death, on Feb. 26, 1880. Dr. Russell was a regular contributor to the Dublin Review and Edinburgh Review. He published translations of the Tales of Canon von Schmid and Leibnitz's System of Theology. His Life of Cardinal Mezzofanti (1858) had its origin in an article on that wonderful linguist in the Edinburgh Review of 1855, and included notices of the most celebrated linguists of all countries. It was translated into Italian and published at Bologna in 1859. A second edition appeared in 1868. In 1869 Dr. Russell was appointed a member of the royal commission on historical manuscripts, and from 1872 he edited, in conjunction with Mr. Prendergast, several volumes of the Calendars of State Papers relating to Ireland, beginning with the reign of James I. Dr. Russell contributed also to the eighth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, North British Review, the English Cyclopædia, the Academy, and several other publications. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1881, p. 106.

Russell, David, D.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born in Glasgow, Oct. 10, 1779. He studied literature and the classics privately, and theology at the Edinburgh Theological Academy. In August, 1805, he was sent to Aberdeen, where he supplied the pulpit five months. He then removed to Montrose for nine months, but returned to Aberdeen, where he was ordained pastor in 1807. He went to Dundee in 1809, and became pastor of the Church then assembling in Sailor's Hall. In this charge he continued thirty-nine years, with great honor to all concerned. He died Sept. 23, 1848. Dr. Russell published, among other works, Letters, chiefly Practical and Consolatory:—On the Old and New Covenants:—The Way of Salvation:—Hints to Inquirers:—Infant Salvation, etc. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 237.

Russell, John, LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cavendish, Vt., July 1, 1793. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1812, was converted just before entering upon his senior year, and soon after his graduation went to Georgia, where he taught school for a time. From 1819 to 1826 he was tutor in a private family in Missouri, and subsequently taught in St. Louis, Vandalia, Alton Seminary, and later in life was principal of Spring Hill Academy, in East Feliciana, La. On Feb. 9, 1833, he was licensed to preach by the Bluffdale Church, Ill. He died Jan. 21, 1868. Dr. Russell wrote, as an advocate of temperance, Venomous Worm; or, Worm of the Still. To counteract Universalism he preached a number of discourses, which were afterwards published under the title of The Serpent Uncoiled. He was an accomplished linguist and an able scholar. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1863, p. 13. (J. C. S.)

Russell, Patrick, D.D., an Irish prelate, was promoted to the see of Dublin Aug. 2, 1683. In July, 1685, he held a provincial council at Dublin, in which it was ordained that any priest, celebrating a marriage without license from the ordinary, or the parish priest of the place, should be excommunicated, etc. The council further confirmed the decrees of those held in 1614 by Dr. Eugene Matthews and in 1640 by Dr. Fleming. In 1686 Dr. Russell assisted at a session of the Roman Catholic clergy, held in Dublin. He also presided at a diocesan synod, held there, June 10, 1686, in which it was decreed, in reference to the parochial clergymen having cure of souls, that each should have a schoolmaster in his parish to instruct the little children in "Christian doctrine and good courses." In 1688 he presided at a synod held in Dublin. On the downfall of the Stuart dynasty he fled to Paris. He returned to his native country and died at the close of the year 1692. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 446.

Rutledge, Francis Huger, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a native of South Carolina, and a son of chancellor Hugh Rutledge, graduated from Yale College in 1820, and was for some time rector of St. John's Parish, Tallahassee, Fla. He was consecrated bishop of Florida, Oct. 15, 1851, in St. Paul's Church, Augusta, Ga., and died at Tallahassee, Nov. 6, 1866, aged sixty-eight years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Jan. 1867, p. 646.

Rütz, Franz Georg Christoph, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Ratzeburg, Oct. 22, 1733. He studied at Rostock. In 1762 he was preacher of the Lutheran Church at Amsterdam, in 1764 was called to Breda, and in 1775 accepted a call to the Hague. Rutz died Dec. 31, 1802, leaving, Non Placet Nobis Orthodoxus sine Pietate, nec Pietus sine Orthodoxus (Amsterdam, 1777):—Exegetische und kritische Briefe (1779):—Kleine Bydragen tot de deïstische Letterkunde (Hague, 1782):—Apologie van het Leeraarsramp (1784), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v. (B. P.)

Ryan, George Frederick, D.D., a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Abergavenny, Monmouthshire, in 1790. He joined the Church at the age of fourteen, began village preaching in his sixteenth year, entered Rotherham College in 1814, and commenced his pastoral life at Brillington. After four years' labor in that place he removed to Stockport, where he ministered ten years, and then went to Dogley Lane Chapel, near Huddersfield. In 1836 he again returned to Brillington. He died at Dore, Aug. 19, 1865. His principal publication was entitled The Dialogist. He also, at various times, published sermons and pamphlets. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 283.

Ryan, Henry, founder of the "Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church" (so called), or Ryanites, was born of Irish parentage in Connecticut, April 22, 1775. Educated a Roman Catholic, while teaching school he heard the eccentric Methodist preacher, Lorenzo Dow, was converted, united with the Methodists, and was disowned by his parents. He taught school for six years after his conversion, preaching regularly, however, and introducing Methodism into a part of Warren County, N. Y. In 1800 he was received into the New York Conference. His circuits in the United States were Vergennes (large part of Vermont) and Plattsburg, N. Y. In 1805 Asbury sent him and William Case to reinforce the Methodist force in Canada. Firm to obstinacy, of indomitable perseverance and iron will, he had a courage that never quailed. In labors and sacrifices he was abundant. During the war of 1812 the oversight of the societies in Canada devolved upon him, and from 1815 to 1825 he continued to itinerate as a presiding elder, now on the Upper Canada District, then on the Lower Canada District. In 1827 he withdrew from the connection, in consequence of a difference of opinion on Church government. Shortly afterwards some of those who had espoused Ryan's cause organized the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church, making lay delegation its distinguishing feature. With this body Ryan united, and with it he continued to be identified during the brief remainder of his earthly existence. He died in September, 1832. See Dr. T. Webster, in the National Repository, Sept. 1830; Stevens, Hist. of the Meth. Epis- copal Church (see Index, vol. iv); Playter, Hist. of Methodism in Canada (Toronto, 1832), p. 84, 234, 297-99.

Ryder, John, D.D., an Irish prelate, was created bishop of Killaloe in 1741; transferred to the see of Down and Connor in 1743; and to the archbishopric of Tuam in 1752. He died at Nice, Italy, Feb. 4, 1775, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1775, p. 206.

Ryerson, Edgerton, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Canadian Methodist minister, was born in the Province of Ontario, Canada, in 1806. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1823. He received an early classical education preparatory to the study of law, but entered the itinerant work, preaching his first sermon on Easter Sunday, 1825. In 1829 he became the first editor of the Christian Guardian; in 1842 was appointed the first president of Victoria College; and in 1845 was made superintendent of education for the Province of Upper Canada, an office he held for thirty years. On the union of the Wesleyan Methodists, the New Connection, and the Eastern British Conference, he was elected first president of the Methodist Church in Canada. He visited Europe and the United States a number of times in the interests of Methodism and education, and was twice a representative to the British Conference and to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States. He died at Toronto, Feb. 19, 1882. Among his writings, aside from editorial work, may be mentioned his Manual of Agricultural Chemistry:—Compulsory Education:—The Clergy Reserve Question, etc.

Ryland, John, D.D., a learned English Baptist minister, was born at Warwick, Jan. 29, 1753. His father was a fine scholar and able minister, and taught his son Greek and Hebrew and Scripture history. He was baptized at fourteen, and began to preach in 1778, in and around Northampton, as his father's assistant; then as co-pastor, aiding his father in his academy, in which young men were trained for the ministry. In 1786 he was sole pastor at Northampton. In co-operation with Carey, Fuller, Sutcliffe, and others, he originated the Baptist Missionary Society, Oct. 2, 1792. He became president of the Baptist College, Bristol, and pastor of the Broadmead Chapel in that city in 1794. In 1815 he became secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society. He died May 25, 1825. Dr. Ryland wrote, Memoirs of Robert Hall, of Drusby:—A Candid Statement of the Reasons which Induce the Baptists to Differ from their Christian Brethren:—some Sermons:—and nearly a hundred Hymns, which appeared in magazines, signed "J. R. jun." These have been published in a neat volume by Daniel Sedgwick.

Sabai Version of the Scriptures. Sabai is spoken in several islands in Torres Strait, between Australia and Papua. The gospel of Mark was printed at Sydney in 1833 under the care of the Auxiliary of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The translation was made by a teacher, Elia, who had been fifteen years engaged on the work, and revised by the Rev. S. Macfarlane, of Murray Island. The gospel of Matthew has since then been added. (B. P.)

Sabba, Abraham Ibn-, a Jewish writer of the 16th century, who was banished with thousands of Jews from Lisbon in 1499, is the author of a very extensive commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled The Bundle of Myrrh צֶרֶר חֲמִיר, in which he largely avails himself of the zohar and other early cabalistic works. The commentary was first published at Constantinople in 1514; then at Venice in 1523, 1546, 1566, and at Cracow in 1595. Pellican has translated this commentary into Latin, and the MS. of this version is in the Zurich library. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. a. v.; Ginsburg, Kabbalah, p. 123; Lindo, History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal, p. 266; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Saddler, Isaac P., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Oct. 5, 1807. He was converted in 1839, licensed to preach in 1840, entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1853, was superannuated in 1872, and assigned to the East Ohio Conference at its organization in 1876. He died suddenly, March 2, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 329.

Safed is an important, but comparatively modern town of Palestine, eight miles north-west of the sea of Galilee, famous especially as a mediæval seat of Jewish learning. The following account of it is taken from Murray's Hand-book for Syria (p. 418). Further details may be found in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 199, 248).

"Safed lies on an isolated peak, which crowns the southern brow of the mountain range. A deep glen sweeps round its northern and western sides, and a shallower one, after skirting the eastern side, falls into the former a few miles to the south. Beyond these, on the north-east, north, and west, are high hills, but on the south the view is open. The old castle crowns the peak; the Jewish quarter of the town clings to the western side, considerably below the summit, the rows of houses arranged like stairs. There are, besides, two Moslem quarters—one occupying the ridge to the south, and the other nestling in the valley to the east. The population may be estimated at about four thousand, of whom one third are Jews and a very few families Christians.

"The only attraction of Safed is the splendid view it commands. This is best seen from the summit of the castle. The latter is surrounded by a deep, dry ditch, within which was a wall. All is now a mass of ruins. Only a shattered fragment of one of the great round towers has survived the earthquake of 1837. Before that catastrophe it was not in the best repair, still, it afforded accommodation to the governor and his train; but then, in a few minutes, it was utterly ruined, and many of its inmates buried beneath the fallen towers.

"Safed is first mentioned in the Vulgate version of the book of Tobit (rather as Safat in the Jerusalem Talmud; perhaps also the Sepa of Josephus (War, ii, 26)). Tradition has made it the site of Bethulia of the book of Judith, but without evidence. The castle seems to have been founded by the crusaders to guard their territory against the invasions of the Saracens. It was garrisoned by the Knights Templars. Its defences, both natural and artificial, were so strong that Saladin besieged it for five weeks before he was able to capture it. After lying in ruins for many years it was rebuilt by Benedict, bishop of Marseilles, in the year 1240. But it only remained twenty years in the hands of the Christians, for, being hard pressed by Sultan Bibars, the garrison capitulated and were murdered to a man, the chief being flayed alive by the barbarous Mohammedans. From that period till the past century it continued to be one of the bulwarks of Palestine.

"We know not when the Jews first settled in Safed, or at what period they raised the town to the rank of a 'holy city.' There were no Jews in the place in the middle of the 12th century, when Benjamin of Tudela visited the country; and it was not, in fact, until four centuries later that the schools of Safed became celebrated. Then a printing-press was set up, synagogues were built, and the rabbis of Safed were acknowledged to be among the chief ornaments of Hebrew literature. The 16th century was their golden age. In the 17th both learning and funds began to decline, and the earthquake of 1837 gave a death-blow to the Jewish cause. Printing-press, synagogues, schools, houses, and people were all involved in one common ruin."

Safford, JEFFERSON PRICK, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Zanesville, O., Sept. 22, 1823. He graduated from the University of Ohio, at Athens, in 1843; taught at Dry Creek Academy, Covington, Ky., and at Indianapolis Academy, Ind., for two years each; was professor of mathematics at Covington, in 1847 and 1848; next entered Princeton Seminary, N. J., where he graduated in 1852; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 5, 1851; taught mathematics at Richmond Academy, Richmond, Va., three years, supplying also, part of the time, the Church at Bethlehem, and was ordained by the Presbytery of West Lexington, at Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 9, 1855. His fields of labor were the Church at Frankfort, from 1855 to 1857; pastor of First Church, Piqua, O., from 1857 to 1862; First Church, New Albany, Ind., from 1862 to 1867, and district secretary of the Board of Missions for Ohio and Indiana from 1867 to 1870. He served as stated supply to Brownsville (O.) Church from 1870 to 1876, at the same time supplying also Fairmount Church from 1870 to 1877, Rosville Church from 1871 to 1873, acting as president of Zanesville University in 1871 and 1872, supplying Uniontown (O.) Church from 1871 to 1873, Hanover Church in 1873 and 1874, Kirkersville Church from 1874 to 1879, and Clayville and West Carlisle churches until his death, which occurred at Zanesville, July 10, 1881. Dr. Safford was also the accurate and efficient stated clerk of the Presbytery of Zanesville from 1873, and of the synod of Columbus from 1876. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 48.

Sahm, PETER, D.D., a Lutheran minister, graduated from Gettysburg Theological Seminary in 1831, and entered the ministry in 1832, the period of his service comprising forty-four years. He preached in both German and English, as occasion required. A considerable time he was pastor at Green Castle. At the time of his death he was serving the Church at New Berlin, Pa. He died at Laurelton, March 14, 1876, aged sixty-six years. Saker, ALFRED, a missionary to the "Dark Continent," was born in England, July 21, 1814. At the age of twenty-nine he was accepted by the Baptist Missionary Society for the mission on the west coast of Africa. In 1845 Saker settled at King Aqua's Town, the seat of a large tribe, on the left bank of the Cameroons River, and about twenty miles from its mouth. With great difficulty he mastered the Dualla language, spoken by the people among whom he lived. Early in November, 1849, he baptized the first convert, and in the afternoon of the day a church was formed, consisting of the missionary and his wife, the native helpers, and the Dualla convert. Mr. Saker translated the Bible into the Dualla language, and died at Victoria, March 13, 1880, having spent thirty-four years in Africa. (B. P.)

Salat, JACOB, a Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born Aug. 24, 1766. In 1801 he was professor of ethics and pastoral theology at Munich, in 1807 professor of moral philosophy at Landsbut, and died in 1851. He published, Die Religionsphilosophie dargestellt (Landsbut, 1811):—Grundlinien der Religionsphilosophie (Sulzbach, 1819):—Grundlinien der Moralphilosophie (Munich, 1827):—Versuche über Supranaturalismus und Mysticismus (Sulzbach, 1823):—Sokrates, oder über den neuesten Gegensatz zwischen Christenthum und Philosophie (1820):—Ist der Priestercölibat ein Ideal? (Stuttgart, 1833):—Die literarische Stellung der Protestanten zu den Katholiken (1831):—Aufschluss über den Ultrakatholicismus (1833):—Schelling und Hegel (Heidelberg, 1842). Salim. Lieut. Conder (Tent Work, i, 92) advocates the position of this place at Salim, four miles east of Nablûs, urging the abundance of water there, and the presence of a village, Ainûn (Ænon), seven and a half miles to the north-east; and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 192) likewise accepts this situation for similar reasons, adding that "it is close to one of the old main lines of road from Jerusalem to Galilee." "The head-springs are found in an open valley surrounded by desolate and shapeless hills. The water gushes out over a stony bed, and flows rapidly down in a fine stream surrounded by bushes of oleander. The supply is perennial, and a continual succession of little springs occurs along the bed of the valley, so that the current becomes the principal western affluent of Jordan south of the Vale of Jezreel. The valley is open in most parts of its course, and we find the two requisites for the scene of baptism of a multitude—an open space and abundance of water" (Conder). Salim itself is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 230) as "a small village, resembling the rest, but evidently ancient, having rock-cut tombs, cisterns, and a tank. Olive-trees surround it; on the north are two springs, three quarters of a mile from the village."

Salkinson, ISAAC E., a missionary among the Jews, and an excellent Hebrew scholar, who died June 15, 1883, at Presburg, in the employ of the British Society for Jewish Missions, is the author of a Hebrew translation of Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation (Altona, 1858). Besides translating into Hebrew Milton's Paradise Lost, Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, he published The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Romans, translated from the original Greek (Edinburgh, 1855). At the time of his death he had finished a Hebrew translation of the New Test., which was edited by Dr. Ch. D. Ginsburg of England, and published at the expense of the English Trinitarian Bible Society at the imperial press of K. Fromme, in Vienna. The translation has been made in "classical Hebrew idiom," but "in seeking for elegance of language, exegetical and historical correctness, which are always closely connected with correctness of language, has been lost." See Theologische Literaturblatt (Leipsic, 1885, Nos. 45, 46, 47). (B. P.)

Sall, ANDREW, D.D., an English divine, was born near Cashel, Ireland, about 1612, and after having studied for some time at St. Omer's, was transferred to Valladolid, in Spain, that he might become conversant with the rules and institutions of the Jesuits. Having acquired distinction as a theologian, he was appointed successively reader of divinity at Pampeluna, professor at Tudela and Valencia, rector of the Irish College, and lecturer of controversial divinity at the University of Salamanca. It was at this time that many of the influential Roman Catholics in Ireland expressed their willingness to adhere to king Charles II, and renounce the interference of all foreign power, even though the pope should excommunicate them. Under these circumstances it was deemed expedient by the Romish court to send Jesuits to Ireland, and among them was Sall. Some years later, however, a change took place in his religious views, and he joined the Church of England, in connection with which he labored with exemplary diligence till his death, April 6, 1682. His works are, Recantation, and a Sermon on Matt. xxii, 15-18, in Confutation of the Errors of the Church of Rome (Lond. 1674, 8vo). — The Catholic and Apostolic Faith Maintained in the Church of England (Oxford, 1676, 8vo). — Votum pro Pace Christiana (1678, 4to). — Ethica seu Moralis Philosophia (1680, 8vo). Salle, JOHN BAPTIST DE LA, founder of the order of Christian Brothers, was born at Rheims, France, April 30, 1651. At the age of seventeen he was made canon of the Cathedral of his native city, and after studying some time at the Sulpician Seminary in Paris, he took the degree of doctor of divinity, and was ordained priest in 1678. He died in Rouen, April 9, 1719. The order which he established is devoted to teaching, especially among the poorer classes. He introduced the mutual-simultaneous method of instruction, and also composed a treatise on school government. The order was approved by Benedict XIII, and has thousands of schools, and first-class colleges at Passy, near Paris, at Marseilles, Manhattanville, N. Y., St. Louis, Baltimore, etc. Baptist de la Salle was declared venerable by Gregory XVI, May 8, 1840, and beatified by Pius IX in 1873. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1873, p. 88.

Salthen, DANIEL LORENZ, a Lutheran theologian, was born March 16, 1701, at Markin, near Upsala, and died at Königsberg, Jan. 29, 1750, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, De Articulis Smakalddis (Königsberg, 1729). — Introductio in Omnes Libros Sacros (1736). — De Auctore Libri Sapientie (1739). See *Fürst, Bibl. Salvation Army, THE. This new religious organization is, in some of its agencies and operations, suggestive of the reformation under Luther, and of the religious awakening under the Wesleys. Each of these great movements was so startling in its character that it commanded wide-spread attention, and excited opposition and envy on every hand. Their enemies declared that the work would soon come to naught, and that such inflammable material would soon burn itself out. But these disparaging predictions have not been fulfilled with regard to the former two efforts, nor are they likely to be realized in the case of the Salvation Army. Not designed for any merely human aggrandizement, not antagonistic to any other religious organization, it began with a burning desire in the heart of one Christian minister to "rescue the perishing" in London. It was the privilege of the writer to hear William Booth, the general and founder of the Salvation Army, preach the gospel in a prison when he was only twenty years old, and to be an intimate personal acquaintance of his from that time to the present.

I. Origin of the Movement.—1. William Booth was born in the town of Nottingham in the year 1829. His parents belonged to the Church of England, but at the age of fourteen he began to attend the services of the Wesleyan Methodists, then and now a large and influential body in the town. Their services had in them more life and energy than he found in the Established Church, and having experienced a change of heart in these exercises, his affections were naturally centred where he had derived so much good; hence, though young in years, he began to attend mission and open-air services and cottage-meetings among the poor in the neglected parts of the town. He soon became an exhorter, and related at the meetings his own happy experience, persuading others to seek salvation. During the daytime he was employed at the miscellaneous store of a pawnbroker, and there he became practically acquainted with the wants, privations, and sufferings of the poor. His natural quickness of observation and his retentive memory were used by him to advantage. In the evenings and on Sundays, while a mere youth, he began to preach short, earnest sermons, in the open air, in all weathers, inviting sinners to Christ. In 1846, when only seventeen, he was accepted as a local preacher, became zealous and useful, and his labors were much owned of God. He was then a mere stripling, tall, with long, flowing black hair, a piercing eye, and a tongue of fire. Before he was twenty he was urged to enter the Methodist ministry, but in addition to his want of theological training, the doctors told him that one year of the earnest ministerial work, to which he was occasionally called, would probably exhaust the little strength he had; and as he was not physically strong, he waited for a time to see if his health improved. In the meanwhile he was wholly engaged, partly in London and partly in Lincolnshire, as an evangelist, a work in which he took special delight.

At the age of twenty-four he was accepted as a minister on trial in the Methodist New Connection, and placed for a time under the care of the Rev. William Cooke, D.D., for theological training. Shortly afterwards, in 1854, their society at Guernsey invited him to raise their cause, then in a low condition, and at the same time improve his own health in their mild and genial atmosphere. At the first Sunday service he held there thirty persons were converted, and within a month three hundred were added to the church membership. He had to return to London, but the news of his success quickly spread through the Connection, and he soon afterwards had invitations to ten circuits, to hold special services for a week or two in each. The conference that year sent him out as an evangelist, the results of which may be judged by the returns from a few places: at Hanley, Staffordshire, 400 conversions; at Newcastle, in one week, 290; at Sheffield, in four weeks, over 400; at Chester, several hundred. Fifteen of these converts are known to have become ordained ministers of the gospel.

2. Jealousy among a few senior preachers, who could not command such success, obliged him to settle down in a circuit, and he spent three years (1857-59) at Gateshead-on-Tyne, where, by his labors, the membership was trebled. He was next sent to Newcastle, with the same result, having in the meantime married Catharine Mumford, daughter of Mr. J. Mumford, a good London Methodist; and his young wife worked earnestly and lovingly with him. Her piety, zeal, discretion, and ability entitle her to take rank with the late Mrs. Phoebe Palmer, of New York, as one of the specially called and gifted of God to do a great work for him in the world and in the church. Seeing how God was working by Mr. Booth among a class of people seldom reached by the ordinary minister, and feeling the burden of souls pressing upon him, he made a most earnest appeal to the Liverpool Conference of 1861 to again appoint him as an evangelist; and his appeal, worthy of Dr. Coke or George Whitefield, was supported for a while by an equally earnest appeal made by Mrs. Booth from the gallery of the chapel. Some of the older preachers were shocked by a woman addressing the conference, and she was silenced. The conference made a great mistake in not accepting Mr. Booth's services as an evangelist: had they done so, their membership might have been doubled in ten years; instead of which, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, their membership is less to-day than it was then, and does not number thirty thousand after the lapse of nearly ninety years. Mr. Booth resigned his connection with the body, and resolved to await the openings of Providence; without employment, home, or income, he and his devoted wife looked alone to God for guidance, and it soon came.

Visiting Cornwall, he found many earnest Methodists in hearty sympathy with the yearnings of his heart. Mrs. Booth now fully shared his labors, herself preaching and holding revival services both on the Sabbath and on week days. In this way they spent two years as missionaries, in various localities, for three or four weeks each. Fishermen and tin miners came to their services by thousands, whole neighborhoods were stirred all round, the claims of religion became paramount, and men by scores left their work to seek divine mercy. The knowledge of these gracious outpourings of the Holy Spirit spread throughout the country. One chapel was kept open from daylight in the morning till midnight for a whole week. The result of such manifestations awakened general interest in the work, and invitations for the services of Mr. and Mrs. Booth reached them from all parts of England and Wales. These occupied them both for two years more, and in June, 1865, they came to London.

Providentially they were directed to the East End, a locality where, within the limits of half a mile, eighteen thousand persons, men and women, were counted entering drinking-saloons on one Sunday. There, on a heap of refuse, Mr. Booth commenced the work which has developed into the great Christian army known the world over. A small pocket Bible and hymn-book were his only weapons. In 1888 Mrs. Booth, in writing of herself and Mr. Booth in 1865, remarks: "He left a happy and prosperous ministerial career, gave up all that is commonly regarded as valuable in life, came out without any human encouragement or guarantees, and devoted himself to labor among the neglected masses, with no thought beyond that of a local work in the east of London. We surrendered home, income, every friend we had in the world, save my parents [whom they nourished in old age], with four little children under five years old, to trust only in God. During the ten years following, we were groping our way out of the conventionalism in which we had been trained, and often reluctantly following the pillar of cloud by which God was leading us. We tried committees, conferences, and all sorts of governments, showing how far we were wrong till the grand military idea was revealed to us."

Not much consideration was required to convince Mr. Booth that in East London there was labor for a man's life, however earnest and long-lived he might be; and having his sympathies strongly drawn towards the dense mass of godless people in the streets day and night, he gave up invitations to labor in the provinces to devote himself fully to the teeming population of Whitechapel and its surroundings. In ten or fifteen minutes he would gather a congregation of a thousand people, to whom he preached daily the plain gospel in the old-fashioned manner. He was a Methodist to the backbone, and in all his addresses he taught and enforced the necessity of repentance, faith, and holiness. God wonderfully owned the word preached; its effects had been witnessed in Cornwall and other parts, and it was soon found that conversions followed the preaching in London. As there was no place in which to gather the people, Mr. John Eason, an old Methodist, lent Mr. Booth a preaching tent which he had long used on London Fields. Crowds gathered there, many were saved, and these soon began to be useful in their own localities, each one asking himself, after he had found Jesus,

"What shall I do to make it known What Thou for all mankind hast done?"

Mr. Booth prepared a cheap hymn-book, which was sold freely at all the meetings, and thousands were bought and read by the new converts. These, one after another, began to speak of the blessings they had received, and their testimony deepened and intensified the general interest in the services; so that the companions of these poor men, now made rich by faith, began to think there was something in the preaching which had completely changed very bad persons, and made them lovers of home, of God, and of their fellow-creatures. The storms of autumn scattered the tent in which they found shelter, but the work went on in the open air. As winter approached, shelter was required, and one of the lowest of the many drinking-saloons, a very den of infamy, was secured, and converted into a mission hall and book-store, for the sale of hymns, tracts, and such literature as would be suitable to young converts brought up in utter ignorance of religion. Next a large dancing-saloon was taken and used in the same way. Both these places were soon filled by eager listeners, services being held on the ground-floor and the first-floor simultaneously, the stairs and passages crowded at nearly every service by the neglected poor, who saw in these agencies and ministrations the means of rescuing themselves from sin, misery, and poverty. Believing in the advantages of labor, and in the truth of Mr. Wesley's adage, "All at work and always at work," Mr. Booth found employment for many of the converts in extending the mission, and it was soon manifest that they were gradually rising in the moral and social scale. Converts increased, people by thousands attended the exercises, and in less than a year Mr. Booth hired a large theatre for services on Sunday, which proved attractive to the outcast. Crowds gathered there, young and old, most of whom had lived like heathen, with no knowledge of God or regard for his laws. Drunkards became sober, swearers began to pray, those who had lived by stealing stole no more, scores of old and forgotten debts were paid, multitudes of women were rescued from ruin, and appeals now came to Mr. Booth to open new missions at Bethnal Green, Limehouse, Poplar, Canning Town, Croydon, Norwood, and other places; in these localities the applicants were directed to procure a room, and speakers were sent to hold services. It is amusing to survey, at this time, the variety of spots used for the new efforts, many of which the writer personally visited at the time—a club-room, a cellar, a shed, a railway arch, behind a pigeon-shop, an old factory, a schoolroom, a cottage—so eager were the poor people to get the gospel preached to them. They had not been accustomed to churches or chapels; they knew little about the Bible, and parsons they thought their greatest enemies. They belonged to the refuse of mankind—navvies, sailors, gypsies, infidels, scoffers, drunkards, thieves, dog-fanciers, pigeon-keepers; men, women, and children, the roughest, wildest, most ignorant and degraded met together, and on them the full power of the gospel was manifested in their conversion and after-life. Persons from all these classes stood forth and openly declared what the grace of God had done for them, then appealing to their old companions in sin as to the truth of their testimony.

While Mr. Booth was thus evangelizing the masses, his wife was engaged in holding meetings in many of the largest halls and most aristocratic centres in the kingdom. At Hastings, Margate, Brighton, and many other places, crowds of the middle and upper classes attended her services, and numbers, whose interest and sympathy were enlisted, became friends and helpers in the establishment of missions for the working classes on the plans already described. The motto of Mrs. Booth's life seemed to be, "I must be about my Father's business." While thus occupied in public work, her family was not neglected; for she tells us that every hour which was not spent in public work was sacredly devoted to her children, who were mainly educated at home, and trained on the principles laid down in a book entitled The Training of Children, recently written by her husband. How completely this task was accomplished is manifest from the fact that all their children were converted early in life, and all who are old enough are doing useful and important labor in the Salvation Army. The work spread faster than Mr. Booth's family could keep pace with it, and their converts carried the holy fire with them into their homes; and thus began fresh missions at Old Ford, Stoke Newington, Shoreditch, Tottenham, Mill Wall, and other parts in and around London, progress being reported monthly in a new periodical which bore the title of Christian Mission Magazine.

3. In 1870 a great impulse was given to the movement, when Mr. Booth purchased a pile of rough, strong buildings in Whitechapel, London, which had been used as "a people's market," but having been a commercial failure, was now obtained at a reasonable cost, and fitted up as a hall to hold two thousand people, with numerous separate rooms, soon occupied as offices, class-rooms, a book-room, and a kitchen. All these were put to active use, and there the new converts found a hearty welcome at the daily services, always fresh and cheery; and in that building many have been saved from every kind of misery, and even from self-destruction, as despair seized upon them. The daily services were well attended, and on Sunday three or four services were regularly held, at which both Mr. and Mrs. Booth labored continuously and earnestly. At length his health gave way, and a long rest was needed; but God raised up ready helpers, much prayer was offered up, and, on his recovery, a fresh campaign was started, in 1873, large additions being made to the membership, and officers sent into new localities to rescue the perishing. In 1874 a new mission was opened at Hammersmith, and others were begun in towns far away from London, operating with the same results as those in the metropolis. In the provinces some remarkable conversions took place of persons who had been notorious sinners, and they soon became as noted in spreading the news of salvation.

These converts were chiefly uneducated people, but were easily led by those who had been helpful to them, and it became necessary to issue suggestions for their guidance. The following five points were accordingly distributed: 1. To hold meetings out of doors, and to march singing through the streets in harmony with law and order; 2. To visit public-houses, gin-palaces, prisons, private houses, and to pray with any who can be got at; 3. To hold meetings in theatres, music-halls, saloons, and other common resorts of those who prefer pleasure to God, and services in any place where hearers can be gathered, especially such as would not enter ordinary places of worship; 4. To use the most popular song-tunes, and the language of every-day life, to convey a knowledge of God to every one in novel and striking forms; 5. To make every convert a witness for Christ, both in public and private. The White-chapel headquarters soon became a centre of great influence, which reached far beyond London, and the deaths of two of the officers there proved to be a blessing to many, as they verified the truth of the well-known words of the Rev. Charles Wesley, "God buries his workmen, but carries on his work." In six months nine valiant officers came forth to supply the places of those who had died. Quietly, but like a deep and mighty river, the work was spreading through the provinces, and a new departure became necessary, with more efficient organization.

4. After mature consideration, in the spring of 1878, the entire mission was remodelled as a military organization, with the title "The Salvation Army," and the writer was present, by invitation of Mr. Booth, at the first meeting held under the new designation, when the originator was called "General Booth." The reason given by him for the change was that his adherents were really an army of salvation. "The name," said he, "is preferable, because the only reason for which the organization exists being war against sin, common-sense requires that it shall be framed after that pattern which mankind, in all ages, has found to be the most effective, and the only one possible for an army." The novelty of the new designation at once attracted the notice of the press, some to approve, others to oppose; but the object was gained. The mission at once rose from comparative obscurity and weakness to one of strength, and in a few months thirty new stations were opened, most of which have had prosperity. By the end of a year the new openings were increased to eighty, and the number of officers (evangelists) increased from thirty to one hundred and twenty-seven. Thus the leisure-loving Christians saw a spectacle which takes its rank among the marvels of the age, an army "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." When the army was formed, in 1878, it numbered 29 corps and 31 officers, or evangelists; in 1882 they had increased to 331 corps and 760 officers; in 1885, 1001 corps and 2560 officers, with a total registered membership in June, 1885, of 90,000 in Great Britain and Ireland.

II. Organization, Characteristics, etc.—1. As the plan adopted in London is the one in use in all the places where the army has a field of operation, it will be best described by the words of General Booth himself, who says, "Our organization makes every soldier in some degree an officer, charged with the responsibility of so many of his townfolk, and expected to carry on the war against the locality where he resides. Every corps is mapped to a portion of the country, and every village is placed under the care of a sergeant until a corps be established in it under commissioned officers. England is divided into thirteen districts, each under the command of a major, whose duty it is to direct and inspect the operations of every corps therein; he has to see to the extension of the war, and the calling out of new officers, and to the removal of others unfit for their position. Each corps is under the command of a captain, assisted by one or two lieutenants, who are entirely employed in and supported by the army, their duty being to conduct services out-doors and in-doors, to visit those enlisted, and to plan and work for the salvation of the whole population around. Captains and lieutenants are removed about every six months, to avoid settling into old ruts, and to prevent their forming too strong attachments to either persons or places. We have tens of thousands of soldiers who are ready at a word to leave all and go out to rescue the souls of others, and who glory in submitting to the leadership of either men or women placed over them, for Christ's sake. Experience has taught us that real soldiers care little who leads or how they march, so that there is victory. We have never enjoyed such unbroken peace and harmony as we have had since it was thoroughly understood that the corps is under its captain, the division under its major, and the whole army under its general, with no hope of successful agitation against superior authority. It is a great object with us to avoid using our system of government so as to limit spiritual liberty, or hamper any officer with awkward restrictions, who is seeking the accomplishment of his great mission." In 1883 the army had 509 centres of operation in England, 85 in Scotland, 17 in Ireland, and, at the last account, one each in France, Switzerland, Sweden, United States, Canada, India, South Africa, South Australia, Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, and New Zealand—a remarkable development as the result of five years' work.

2. Shortly before the army was organized, it was found that property, valued at many thousand pounds, was owned by Mr. Booth's mission, and in order to leave no doubt of its security for the objects for which it had been acquired or built, a deed was drawn up, and enrolled in chancery, Aug. 7, 1875, which declares that the property belongs, first, to William Booth, second, to his son, William Bramwell Booth, and at the death of both these persons the whole is to be vested in trustees for the use of the army so long as it may exist; and the solicitors to the army hold in their possession the deeds, and a complete schedule of all property standing in the name of William Booth, which is increasing rapidly every year.

The finances of the army are derived from various sources. From the first, all who attended the services were taught the duty and privilege of giving in support of the work, and the majority of the corps have long been self-supporting. In 1884 the members of the army contributed among themselves more than $500,000 to carry on the work, and this in addition to subscriptions and donations from the general public, and the sales of their various newspapers and publications. The total revenue for 1884 was $1,350,000, made up as follows: Central, or office funds, $373,325; local funds, $675,000; foreign funds, $315,000. Persons of all religious denominations contribute to this result, and the accounts are under the supervision and yearly audit of regular chartered accountants in London. The net profits on the sale of books, newspapers, medals, and other insignia were, in 1883, $25,000, and in 1884 over $40,000. Out of these results the salaries of the officers were paid, including also general Booth and his family. During the time (about twelve years) previous to the formation of the army, and for several years afterwards, a benevolent Christian gentleman, member of parliament for Nottingham (Mr. Booth's birthplace), afterwards for Bristol, generously provided for the wants of Mr. Booth and his family, and this was continued until the book profits were sufficient for the purpose, without trenching on the general funds. These profits are Mr. Booth's legitimate creation, and as general editor he might claim them, but, instead, he maintains the official staff from that source of revenue.

3. Having to organize mostly by means of uneducated persons, the work has been slow and up-hill. The officers are drawn from the ranks; those who prove the best soldiers are recommended by their captains to headquarters, inspected and reported on by the major, and if then able to answer (to the satisfaction of the general himself) a lengthy series of questions, they are placed in the training-barracks at Clapton. There, a few weeks of East-end London work test their qualities and qualifications severely; meanwhile they are trained in conducting every branch of the service, carefully drilled, and taught the simplest way of conveying the truths of the Bible to the people. Some have to be taught the elements of knowledge, reading, writing, and arithmetic; but the training is not so much scholastic as spiritual, the great necessity pressed upon every one being that of holiness of heart and life. Those who prove unfit for officers are sent back to the ranks: the care in selecting cadets is such that this necessity does not often arise. Few persons are received as officers who do not give up homes or positions more comfortable, from a worldly point of view, than the one they come to, so that self-seeking persons are seldom found in the army. The training lasts from six to twelve weeks; then the cadet is sent as a lieutenant to some captain in the field. Neither captain nor lieutenant has often many shillings in pocket when commencing the work in a new place, whether city or village. Constant dependence on God for the supply of all needs is a lesson often learned amidst hard surroundings. So rapid and complete is success generally that their lot is not often one of much privation. For a few years mob-violence was their chief hardship, but as the army becomes better known and understood by the authorities, and their non-resistant disposition discovered by all classes, the officers are able to give their whole strength to the service. Each officer is expected to conduct from twenty to twenty-five meetings weekly, extending over thirty to thirty-five hours; to spend eighteen hours in visiting from house to house, and to spare no possible effort in seeking the good of souls. The amount of salary to be drawn by a single man-captain is twenty-one shillings weekly, by a woman-captain fifteen shillings, and by a married captain twenty-seven shillings, with one shilling per week per child, so that drones are seldom found in the Salvation Army. A negligent or unsuccessful officer, after sufficient trial, is usually left without an appointment. The frequent removals check all selfish sentiment, and thus the officers, by experience, become examples of self-sacrifice for the salvation of the world.

The uniform worn by the army consists of a plain simple dark-blue dress, trimmed with a neat red braid, and marked with the letter S on the collar: the S on the general's garments is marked in gold. It is found to be useful, attracts attention, gives opportunity for conversation, gathers people at the open-air demonstrations, excites respect in the rougher class of the people, indicates a person's position in the army, and is a safeguard against the fashions of the age. The military form of government, affirms Mr. Booth, in his Book of Instructions, contradicts no form of government laid down or practised in the New Test., and is in perfect harmony with the only system described in the Old Test., and cannot therefore be said to be unscriptural.

4. The doctrines taught in the army are Arminian, such as Mr. Booth learned to love and preach when he was a Methodist minister. In describing this matter, he says, "We have not a particle of sympathy with those who desire to let down or adapt the gospel of Christ to the fancy of the 19th century. The gospel which tells a man that he is thoroughly bad, and under the power of the devil; which drags out the hidden things of iniquity to the light of the judgment throne; which denounces sin without mercy, and warns men of eternal wrath to come unless they repent and believe in the only Saviour; the gospel of a crucified Saviour, who shed real blood to save men from real guilt, real danger, a real hell, and who lives again to give a real pardon to the really penitent—a real deliverance from the guilt, power, pollution, and fact of sin to all who really give up to him a whole heart, and trust him with a perfect faith—such is the gospel of the Salvation Army. We heartily believe the three creeds of the Church, we believe every word of the commination service, and we denounce the wrath of God against sinners as those who believe that all these things are true. We teach men to expect salvation from the guilt of sin the moment they turn from sin to God, and trust him to receive and pardon them. We teach that God is able and willing perfectly to purge the heart from all its evil tendencies and desires, the moment the soul trusts him for it all; we urge the people not to rest until God has thus cleansed the thoughts of their hearts by his Holy Spirit; and we assure them that God will preserve them blameless, and cause them everywhere to triumph, so long as they fully trust and obey him. We teach that sin is sin, whoever commits it, and that there cannot be sin without the divine displeasure; that there is a real, constant, and perfect deliverance from sin provided by Jesus Christ, which all men are responsible either for accepting or rejecting. We teach that all saved men and women ought to lay down their lives for the salvation of others, if required; that being followers of Christ means sacrificing all our own interests, enjoyments, and possessions to save a rebel world, and that whosoever does not so bear the cross has no right to expect the crown."

5. Printing has been a great factor in the progress and success of the army. From the commencement of the mission in East London Mr. Booth had strong faith in the power of the press. A cheap and good hymn-book was one of his first requisites, and his first collection, sold at one penny, was often enlarged and added to, until it has become one of the best penny hymn-books in use, and hundreds of thousands have been sold of it. He then began a penny monthly magazine, called The East London Evangelist, which was followed by another, with the title Christian Mission Magazine. Both these were too slow in their operation to satisfy the general of an army. During a few weeks of enforced confinement to his room through an injured foot, Mr. Booth conceived the idea of a weekly newspaper, of four large pages, to sell at one cent; in three days his plans were completed, and within a month appeared No. 1 of The War-cry, a startling title for timid people, but it exactly met the wants of the army, and in a few days 7000 of that issue were sold, and of No. 2 fully 20,000 were wanted. In a few months it had a weekly circulation of 100,000, then it became necessary to issue it twice in the week, and it was filled with stirring news of the doings of the army everywhere, illustrated by engravings which strongly appealed to the emotional sensibilities, every column in each issue being filled with intelligence, short, sharp, and fresh. The sales soon ran up to 250,000, and in each issue was printed an account of the number of copies of the paper sold by each corps throughout the country, as a spur to ambition. The War-cry is now a valuable property to Mr. Booth, and since January, 1886, it has been enlarged, and issued once a week, at one penny. There are now twenty different papers with that title, four English and sixteen foreign, issued in as many localities, to report the work of the army in those places, and all after the English original. For the children in the army another paper is issued, called The Little Soldier, in which are reported the sayings and doings of the juvenile members of the army. People outside the army have frequently complained of articles which have appeared in both papers, but the reply of the officials is, that the soldiers in the army are satisfied, and they are the chief patrons of both papers. Every soldier is expected to take part in selling these papers weekly, and they are sold as freely on Sunday as on any other day, as are also other publications of theirs. Quite a number of books are issued now from the book-room, for which a large publishing-house has been opened in London. One of these is entitled The Salvation Soldier's Guide, which contains a Bible chapter for every morning and evening throughout the year, to help the unlearned to a daily increased knowledge of God's word. The army has now a considerable catalogue of its own publications. About twenty tons' weight of printed books is sent out every week from the publishing-house.

6. It has been found that strong prejudice exists among the poor against churches and chapels; to avoid arousing those prejudices in the minds of the outcast class and the ignorant, the terms "Salvation Army," and "barracks," and "stores," and "headquarters" have been adopted as less objectionable than such names as Printing Works and General Warehouse of the Salvation Army, 96 Southwark Street, London.

"Christ Church" or "Jesus College." The carrying of colors, using bands of music, processions, and other sensational methods are justified because other methods have failed to influence the masses. Striking hand-bills are used as the only means likely to influence drunkards, gamblers, thieves, and neglecters of salvation generally. The terms "Blood and Fire," used on the banners and in their literature, refer to the blood of the Atonement by which men are saved, and fire means the Holy Spirit, who sanctifies, energizes, and comforts all true soldiers of God.

All new converts are taught and encouraged to speak immediately after their conversion, just to tell what the Lord has done for them; it commits them to a life of usefulness in his service before all their old companions, kindred, and friends. God blesses them in so doing, it makes them happy and useful, and has been the means of saving scores from becoming backsliders, by returning to their old ways.

The employment of women to speak and preach has been objected to by some, but it is justified by various passages in the New Test. Beyond these, the fact that they have the gift to preach—and this both Mrs. and Miss Booth have in a very high degree—and preach most effectively, is evidence that the gift should be exercised. Philip the Evangelist had four daughters who were preachers. For ten years and more Mrs. and Miss Booth, and scores of other females in the army, have preached continually to all classes of people, without any evil consequences following; on the contrary, hundreds of people, rich and poor, have been saved under their ministrations. The army does not recruit its ranks by drawing members from any churches, it openly avows its objection to accept members belonging to any existing Church; but churches of most denominations have voluntarily contributed to its funds, especially the Church of England and the Methodists, who best understand its operations and designs. Many of the army converts go to join other churches, and it is known that more than four hundred persons, converted and trained in its ranks, were, in 1885, employed by different religious organizations as ministers, evangelists, missionaries, colporteurs, Bible women, and in other like agencies. Great care is taken of the health of the soldiers in the army, and when unable to attend to the duties of their station they are sent to a House of Rest, which was many years the home of general Booth and his family, and there they remain till recovered strength justifies their return to duty.

III. Statistics.—The success of the army, especially in Great Britain and the colonies, has commanded the attention and consideration of persons in all classes of society. On June 30, 1882, queen Victoria intimated her personal disposition towards the army in a letter to Mrs. Booth, from which the following is an extract: "Madam, I am commanded by the queen to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th inst., and to assure you that her majesty learns with much satisfaction that you have, with other members of your society, been successful in your efforts in winning many thousands to the ways of temperance, virtue, and religion." About the same time the bishops in convocation spoke most favorably of the army, and they unanimously passed a resolution "for a committee of their lordships to inquire into the workings of the army, to see what advice they could give to their presbyters in dealing with them." The archbishop of York and the bishop of Bedford, among others, have gathered large companies of the army and administered the Lord's Supper to them in their churches.*

The great Congress Hall in London is the school for the army. There about one hundred and fifty soldiers are constantly under training in various departments; some have to learn the mere elements of knowledge, and the elements of theology are not forgotten. To many of the cadets the interior of a church or chapel was a place of mystery before their conversion. The army is now so thoroughly before the public, and has met with almost universal endorsement in the minds of unprejudiced persons, that it has become a most important factor in raising fallen and degraded humanity in nearly all lands. As described by general Booth himself, "The end and design of the Salvation Army is to spread throughout the entire world, and to last as long as God has enemies to be fought with and overcome!"

Sandby, George, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born about 1717, and was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1740, and afterwards was master of Magdalen College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. in 1760. He was collated to the rectorship of Denton, Norfolk, in 1750, and to the chancellorship of Norwich in 1768. He died at Denton, April 29, 1807. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1807, p. 571.

Sanden, Bernhard von (1), a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 4, 1636, at Lusterburg. He studied at different universities, was in 1664 preacher at Königsberg, in 1674 professor, and in 1675 doctor of theology. In 1690 Sanden was made general superintendent, and died April 19, 1703. He published, Theologia Symbolica Lutherana:—Dissertatio ad Gen. xlii, de Prophetia Promissio:—De Verbis Dei ad Petrum Matt. xvi, 19:—Pentast. Illustrium Quaestionum Theologicarum. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Sanden, Bernhard von (2), son of the preceding, was born at Königsberg, May 4, 1666. He studied at different universities, was in 1695 professor of theology at the university of his native place, in 1709 first court-preacher, and died Jan. 22, 1721, doctor of theology. He wrote, De Cice in Republica Hebræorum:—De Modis Obtinendi Ciceritatem Hebræorum:—De Proselytismo:—In Matt. xvi, 19:—In Joh. xxi, 15:—In Luc. xxi, 31, 38:—In Isau. lxiv, 6:—De Duobus Illicis Festo Expunctionis Deo Oblatis:—An Concilium Tridentinum sit Ecumenicum:—De Prophetis et Prophetiis Veteris Testamenti:—De Conjugio Petri et Pauli Apostolorum:—De Apparitione Spiritus Sancti in Specie Columbae:—De Sinu Abrahami:—De Salute Gentium Infidelium, etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. Sanford, Miles, D.D., a Baptist minister, a native of Connecticut, was for a time a Methodist, then became a Baptist, and was pastor of the First Baptist Church in Chicago, Ill.; subsequently an editor in Detroit, Mich., from which place he removed to East Boston, Mass., then to Gloucester, and at length to North Adams, whence he went as chaplain of a Western Massachusetts regiment to active service in the late war. Next he was for a short period financial secretary of the American Bible Union, and then became pastor of the First Church in Salem, N. J., where he remained about two years. He died at Salem, Oct. 31, 1874. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1028. (J. C. S.)

Sanford, Peter P., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lodi, N. J., Feb. 28, 1781. He was religiously inclined from childhood, converted at the age of eighteen, and in 1807 entered the Philadelphia Conference. In 1810 he was transferred to the New York Conference, and in it continued laborious till his death, Jan. 14, 1857. Dr. Sanford was a thorough divine, an able scholar, and an eminent, honest, and devout man. From 1816 to 1852 he was elected a delegate to every general conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 321; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, a. v.

Sanger, Ralph, D.D., a Unitarian minister, son of Rev. Zedekiah Sanger, D.D., was born in Duxbury, Mass., June 22, 1786. He graduated from Harvard College in 1808; then, after spending three years in the study of theology under his father, he was appointed tutor at Cambridge; was ordained pastor of the Church at Dover, Mass., Sept. 16, 1812, and continued there until his death, May 6, 1860. Sanguirese Version of the Scriptures. This language is used in the Sangir Islands, the inhabitants of which, numbering about 80,000 souls, 10,000 of whom have been baptized, have but recently been blessed with a translation of the New Test. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1879 we learn that the Rev. Mr. Kelling, who has been laboring twenty years on the island of Tagulandang, where he has formed a church, has completed the New Test., and is giving it a final revision. This translation was published at London, in the Siamo dialect, in 1882, the Rev. E. W. King, of Tilbury, having read the proofs. Encouraged by the good reception which the New Test. had received at the hands of the natives, the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society agreed, in 1884, to print an edition of the Psalms, the translation having also been made by the Rev. Mr. Kelling. (B. P.)

Sanke, Christopher, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 12, 1700, at Guben, Lower Lusatia. He studied at Leipzig, and died there, May 4, 1752. He wrote, Diss. Philol. de Anathemate Pauli Votico Roman. ix, 8 (Leipzig, 1729):—Vollständige Anweisung zu den Accenten der Hebräer (1740):—De Differeñtia Inter Vocationem ac Tentationem circa Munus Ecclesiasticum (1749). Saphir. The probable representative of this place is thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 418):

"Three mud villages of the name es-Sudfir exist close together. It is probably the Zeophir in the territory of Ascalon, given as property to the bishop of Bethlehem, A.D. 1100 (William of Tyre). The most ancient of the eltes would appear to be Suafir esh-Shemaliyeh (the most northerly of the three), where there are ruined cisterns of rubble masonry. There are small gardens and wells at each village."

Saphir, Jacob, a Jewish traveller, was born in 1830, and died at Jerusalem, June 23, 1885. He visited Egypt, Arabia, India, and Australia; the results of his researches he published in ספר סיני (1868, 1874, 2 vols.). This work is of great historical and ethnographical value. For the Hebrew codex which Saphir brought from Arabia and sold to the public library at Paris in 1868, see SHAFIRA MANUSCRIPT. (B. P.)

Sarchi, Philip, a Jewish writer, who died at Paris in 1830, is the author of, Grammaire Hebraïque Raisonnée et Comparée (Paris, 1828):—An Essay on Hebrew Poetry, Ancient and Modern (Lond. 1824). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. a. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 116. (B. P.)

Sarid. Lieut. Conder suggests (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 49) that the original name may have been Sudid (שׁ for ט), as in the Sept., and in that case the place may be represented by the modern Tell Skudūd, three and a half miles south-west of Nazareth, consisting of "a good-sized artificial mound, with fine springs beneath on the south" (ibid. p. 70).

Sartorius, Christoph Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 22, 1701. He studied at Tübingen, was vicar at Ludwigsburg in 1727, in 1730 at Stuttgart, in 1733 preacher and professor at Bebenhausen. In 1747 he went again to Ludwigsburg, was called to Tübingen in 1755, and took the degree of doctor of theology in 1766. He died Dec. 2, 1785. Sartorius published, Meditationes ad Ps. liii de Salute ex Zion (Tübingen, 1735):—Positiones Generatiores de Libro Genesios (1756):—De Metas Filii Dei Generatione Aeterna ex Ps. ii, 7 Adserta (1758):—De Sacramentis in Genere (1760):—De Baptismo (1761):—De Sacra Cena (eod.):—De Lege Ceremoniali (1762):—Vindiciae Cantici Canticorum (1765):—Diss. Eregetica Super Ps. xix (1766):—Theologumena Symbolica (1769-71):—De Utilitate Vet. Test. etc. (1772):—Diss. ad Dictum Christi Matt. v, 1-19 (1773). Satisfactional View of the Atonement. The vicarious sufferings of Jesus Christ upon the cross are often represented by theologians as mainly intended to appease the divine wrath by offering a satisfaction for human guilt. That this, however, is incorrect is evident, not only from the character of God himself, who is no Shylock demanding his "pound of flesh," and is infinitely anxious to be reconciled to the sinner, but it is clear likewise from the fact that no adequate quid pro quo was either attempted or achieved in this regard. The virtue and obedience and holiness of Jesus did not in the slightest degree lessen, palliate, or modify the crimes, the sins, and the transgressions of man, nor are they ever represented as any apology or excuse for these. To accept the merit of the pure as a counterpoise of the dereliction of the impure is no reasonable equivalent, much less to condone the fault of the offending by the suffering of the innocent. Such a satisfaction is opposed to the plain teaching of the parable of the prodigal son, in which no reparation, but merely a penitent return, is attempted or spoken of on the part of the wanderer. Nor does this conflict with Paul's doctrine of the release from the claims of the law (Rom. v, 11), for he everywhere represents this from a Judaic or human point of view, and especially insists that these obligations are cancelled for the past and fulfilled for the future simply by a subjective conformity to the will of God (Rom. x, 4, xiii, 10). It is, in fact, the sinner himself who is ultimately and practically called upon to be satisfied with this arrangement, and upon his acceptance of the substitute the whole efficacy of the scheme is finally made to depend. God needs no such inducement, but man does, and this not so much outside parties as the offending individual himself. It is the sinner's conscience that demands a satisfaction, and this he can find only in Christ. See VICARIOUS SUFFERING.

Saubert, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, Feb. 1, 1638. In 1660 he was professor of Oriental languages, in 1665 professor of theology at Helmstädt, in 1673 professor and pastor at Altdorf, and he died April 29, 1688, doctor of theology. He wrote, Varia Lectiones Text. Græci Evangelii Matth. (Helmstädt, 1672):—De Templo Hierosolymis (1665):—Die heil. Schrift Allen Text. (pt. i, eod.):—De Sacrificiis Veterum Collectanea (ed. Crenius, Leyden, 1699):—De Studiis Hebraicæ Linguae Multiplici Utilitate et Necessitate (Helmstädt, 1661, 1678). See Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 28, 103, 139, 169, 515; Fürst, *Bibl. Saul, John, D.D., an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Dromore, County Down, in July, 1795. He was brought up in the Established Church, converted in his youth, and joined the Methodists to exercise his gift for preaching. He entered the ministry of the Irish Conference in 1826, and for forty-two years employed his talents to the glory of God and the good of man. He was some years treasurer of the Children's Fund, became a supernumerary in 1868, and removed to England. He was for fifty years a diligent student of the Bible in the original languages. He was a happy, pious, and useful minister, and died near Manchester, Oct. 11, 1878. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 43.

Sauli, Alessandro, an Italian Barnabite, was born at Milan in 1585. He studied at Pavia and Milan with such success that he knew the "Summa" of Aquinas almost by heart. In 1567 Sauli was made superior of his order, in 1570 bishop of Aleria, in 1591 bishop of Pavia, after having refused the archbishopric of Genoa. He died in 1592. Benedict XIV beatified him in 1741. Saunders, Ephraim DOD, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Mendham, N. J., Sept. 30, 1809. After graduating at Yale College in 1831, he remained in New Haven for several months for the purpose of theological study. In the autumn of 1832 he went to Virginia, where he spent a year in teaching and study. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of East Hanover, in session at Nottoway, Oct. 18, 1833. After four years of pastoral work, during which time he collected money to build two churches, he opened a school for boys in Cumberland County, which he removed to Goochland County. In 1848 he became principal of the Classical Institute at Petersburg, Va., and held this position for four years. In 1848 he visited Europe, and on his return established a Church in Pottsville, Pa. In 1851 he removed to West Philadelphia, and founded a school for boys, which was afterwards chartered as a college. During the late war a military department was established, the pupils being styled the "Courtland Saunders Cadets," in honor of the founder's only child, who was killed in battle, in September, 1862. Dr. Saunders was made chairman of the Bounty Fund Commission of Philadelphia. In 1871 he offered to give his real estate in West Philadelphia to the Presbyterian Alliance for the purpose of founding a hospital. He also obtained subscriptions to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars towards the endowment of the hospital. He died in West Philadelphia, Sept. 18, 1872. Sayres, Gilbert H., D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a native of New Jersey, died at Jamaica, L. I. (where he had formerly been for many years rector), April 27, 1867, aged eighty years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. July, 1867, p. 335.

Scambler, Edward, D.D., an English Protestant Dissenter and bishop, was born in 1512, and educated at the University of Cambridge. In the reign of queen Mary he was pastor of the first Protestant congregation in London, but went abroad during the Marian persecution, returned in the early days of Elizabeth's reign, and was chaplain to archbishop Parker, consecrated bishop of Peterborough in 1560, translated to Norwich in 1584. He conducted himself with wisdom and moderation, was a learned man, but zealous against the papists. He encouraged religious meetings among the clergy, but the queen suppressed them because Puritans were admitted. He died May 7, 1597, and was interred in Norwich Cathedral. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 4.

Scepticism, Recent Phases of. Scepticism is primarily nothing more than an inquiring state of mind, with provisional suspension of positive conclusions. It soon comes to mean denial, or repudiation of what transcends human observation and inference therefrom, in matters necessarily of faith. See SCEPTICISM in vol. ix. It is in the latter signification that it will now be noticed, and only in its chief recent forms.

Every age has its own philosophical tendencies, recurring under modified fashions, with the change of antecedents and surroundings. Thus, old scepticism reappears with altered face, moving always in a vicious circle. Every philosophy is the imperfect expression of the faintly perceived and feebly understood manifestations of the universe, and of their supposed significance. Each has its own scheme for the interpretation of the mysteries with which "we are girt about," either recognising or excluding the supernatural. Scepticism, therefore, varies with the ages, in degree, in method, and in form. In no period of history has unbelief in revealed or natural religion, which is unbelief in all the foundations of knowledge, assumed so many varying forms and shadows of form as in the present day. Much, very much, of recent thought and speculation is corroded by the burrowing virus of this diseased and morbid tendency. It is difficult to employ familiar phrases and current modes of argument without being involved and entangled, unawares, in some of the ramifications of the pervading infection. All men are creatures of their age and of the intellectual atmosphere encompassing them. The mind is moulded, and its developments and products are shaped or colored, by the influences which it habitually endures. Hence it becomes a difficult task, but urgent in proportion to its difficulty, to examine the modes of aberration, and to detect the fallacies in widely accepted systems of error. Of course it would be impracticable, within any moderate limits, to distinguish the manifold varieties of recent scepticism, to trace the melting hues by which they blend almost insensibly into each other, and to discriminate the multitudinous variations and degrees of diseased perception in the diversities of philosophical sects. No more can be safely or profitably attempted than to note the most accepted types of sceptical speculation in this declining century. All might be included under the single head of RATIONALISM (q. v.), but this term has a more restricted meaning in theological terminology. All proceed from the negation or exclusion of everything in the intelligible universe beyond the grasp of the observing and reasoning faculties.

The species of scepticism which will be estimated here are those which assail, extrude, or undermine religious truth—which reject knowledge or authority, superior to such as may be compressed into the narrow domain of scientific or demonstrative processes. Of these there appear to be six leading classes, the appreciation of which will afford guidance for the criticism of the intermediate or affiliated varieties of incredulity. They are, 1. Materialism; 2. Naturalism; 3. Agnosticism; 4. Phenomenalism; 5. Pessimism; 6. Nihilism, which last approximates to Neo-Buddhism. These several schemes have been exhibited in more or less developed proportions since human inquiry gained strength and audacity to propose a systematic answer to the torturing questions, Whence come man and the universe? How are they sustained? What are their meaning, their purpose, and their destiny? What are their relations to the source of their being, of their maintenance, and of their order? The manner in which these enigmas have been answered has continually suffered change with the extension of human knowledge and the consciousness of previous failure. The latest transmutations now attract our regard. Of the six classes, into which the chief recent theories of a sceptical character have been divided, two have been sufficiently considered in the articles specially devoted to them. These are, Materialism and Pessimism (q. v. severally). They require no further notice than may be incident to their relations to other theories.

Before proceeding to the examination of the remaining forms, it may be judicious to indicate the fundamental delusion which underlies and vitiates all schemes of scepticism, using the designation in the restricted sense of unbelief in the supernatural. All knowledge of things included within the observation of physical perception is obviously and necessarily limited by the range of the several senses. The calorific, the actinic, and the chemical rays of light are invisible; yet they are probably more important and more operative in the economy of nature than the color-rays, with their endless service and infinite variety of beauty. There are sounds too loud for the human ear to distinguish, too slight for human hearing; notes that are discord to some races and musical to others; odors too faint or evanescent for man's olfactories to detect; tastes too delicate or too oppressive for the tongue of man to discriminate; things too distant or too small for human discernment. Assuredly there are stars beyond the reach of the telescope, organisms too minute for microscopic vision. These facts are recognised by observation and reflection, aided by artificial contrivances. They prove that the senses cannot attain to the apprehension of a vast variety of unquestionable facts. Intellectual comprehension is limited by its constitution, in like manner, in regard to things intelligible. This is in consonance with the physical or material creation. The conclusion is the same in the one case as in the other. It is only transferred from the senses to the mind, and adapted to a new sphere. It is identical, also, with the irrefragable axiom or postulate that the finite can neither intellectually grasp nor logically deny what lies beyond its comprehension. But it may and must recognise it, or else renounce all validity of thought. Every form of dogmatic scepticism starts out, therefore, with a fatal and utterly irrational assumption.

On any scheme of philosophy the office of the human race on earth is to improve its habitation, its conditions, and itself, through the instrumentalities acquired by the enlargement of its knowledge and the expansion of its capacities. The fulfilment of this destiny or the achievement of this result would be impossible, and, indeed, inconceivable, if the limits of the unknown did not always spread around, and if humanity were not always led on and guided by an imperfect apprehension, a confident intuition, a persistent assurance of further enlargement of its acquisitions. It is the very law of its existence, of the possible sustenance of its increasing numbers, that, as Roger Bacon said, the recognition of the unknown and still unknowable advances more rapidly than the increase of the known. "Quæ scit, pauca sunt et vilia respectu eorum quæ non intelligit sed credit, et longe pauciora respectu eorum quæ ignorat." This is only an illustration of the law which renders fallacious all knowledge dwarfed to the compass of the reasoning faculties of man.

There is another line of procedure—a purely logical argument—which arrives at the same result. Every conclusion must rest on accepted premises. These premises, whether as previous conclusions, or as interpretations of facts, which are also conclusions, must, in their turn, depend upon more remote premises. Ultimately a point must be reached beyond which it is impossible for analysis to go. Yet the first principles repose on surer conviction than any inferences that may be deduced from them. The sphere beyond the utmost range of systematic ratiocination is not the darkness of the unapprehensible, but the realm of the partially unknown, yet inevitably believed. Throughout, the invisible, the incomprehensible, the unattainable, must be received as existent and operative, or all knowledge and all fact must rest upon nothing but pure imagination. This is only the development of the profound and sagacious observation of Aristotle, that whoever demands a reason for ultimate principles takes away all possibility of reasoning. The necessary inference from these truths, which are only diverse aspects of the same truth, is that the whole order of existence, physical and intellectual—the whole procedure of valid reasoning on any subject—requires the constant admission of influences, causes, powers, purposes, and governance beyond the possible limits of formal and systematized knowledge, beyond the grasp of finite intelligence. Hence, any scheme of philosophy which pretends to include all being, and all appreciation of being, within the brief tentacles of human apprehension, is not merely incomplete and fallacious, but absurd.

With this preliminary exposition of the fundamental conditions of thought, the artful sophistry involved in all forms of dogmatic scepticism, and cunningly disguised or ignored in the recent phases of philosophical unbelief, becomes manifest. The countless forms of scepticism lie between the antagonistic extremes of materialism and idealism. These extremes are not necessarily sceptical, but in their development they tend to sceptical issues. Milton and Berkeley were fervent in their religious convictions. Of course, as materialism and idealism are the opposing poles of speculation, every scheme for the exposition of being and its interpretation must approximate more closely to the one or to the other. All may be included in the two. But such absorption of divergent currents of thought tends only to confusion. It will explain, however, the impossibility of separating discordant systems by sharp lines of discrimination. They are variously compounded, and coalesce with each other in various modes and in varying proportions. The failure, then, to maintain sharp distinctions will be due to the nature of the subject divided, not to the error of the division.

I. Naturalism.—Materialism, as has been remarked, has already been amply discussed. Naturalism is an extensive species of it, which requires special notice. There is, indeed, one subdivision of naturalism which is the purest idealism, when all nature, concrete and operative, is resolved into the divinity, and this again is dissolved into nature. This occurs in Spinozism, and in all varieties of pantheism. In its current philosophical acceptance, however, naturalism signifies the interpretation of the facts, functions, and developments of existence by the forces and changes of physical realities. It sees nothing beyond. It denies higher causation. It imprisons itself within the domain of the sensible, and affirms that this is the sole and adequate exposition of all things. The voluntary captive, in his self-constructed dungeon, affirms that there is neither sun nor sunlight without. The unreasonableness of the conclusions and of the philosophy erected upon them is shown by the preliminary considerations which have been presented.

It should be remarked that, in these fashions of scepticism, the supposed conclusion is always the starting-point of the doctrine. That which is to be proved is assumed. The philosophy is invented and manipulated for the support of the thesis. Great acuteness and ingenuity, greater self-delusion, and the confidence of wilful ignorance, are shown in the elaborate artifices of the frail but often imposing structure. Every fact of nature, if analyzed—every part of such fact, if further analyzed, and if the analysis be conducted to its utmost limit—inevitably leads “from nature up to nature’s God.” The same thing is true of every intellectual or emotional experience, which gives facts of another order.

Unquestionably the spontaneous revelation of the supernatural through the forms of the natural does not rest upon the same kind of evidence, or generate the same species of conviction as are characteristic of scientific conclusions. But they come clothed with a firmer and more impressive certainty. This is no novel doctrine, for it is a reply to antiquated error. Thomas Aquinas said, “The dubitation which occurs in regard to articles of faith arises from no uncertainty of the thing, but from the weakness of the human mind. Nevertheless, a minimum of knowledge of the highest things is more to be desired than the most certain knowledge of things little in comparison.” Such testimony may be rejected with scorn, as the utterance of a schoolman, a metaphysician, and a theologian. But the Angelic Doctor makes his avowal on the authority of Aristotle, who should be safe from the petty censure of current science. His remark is (De Part. Animal. i, 5), “If it be but little of these things that we apprehend, that little, on account of the preciousness of such knowledge, is more acceptable than all within our grasp.” Old error should not, on account of its attempted rehabilitation, object to cogent refutation because it, too, is ancient.

II. Evolutionism is the most prominent and the most controlling type of naturalism in our age, the credit and the parentage of which are usually assigned to Darwin, though its most elaborate and systematic development is to be sought in the unfinished and interminable treatises of Spencer. The foundations and the main walls of the building are distinctively Darwin’s. To him is due the patient, persistent industry by which the materials have been quarried, chiselled into shape, and adapted to their places in the bewildering edifice. But the plan and the purpose of the philosophy may be found in the notes to the prosaic poems and in the prose romances of his grandfather. Nor is the elder Darwin to be considered as the original inventor of the system. Many critics have shown that the whole essence of the speculation and its line of argument were the teachings of Lucretius. The Roman poet proved, in his own case, his maxim, “Ex nihilo nihil fit,” and borrowed his dogmas, but not their radiant setting, from Epicurus. In this recurrence to the resuscitated phantasms of long-buried delusion, Darwinism corresponds with all current schemes of sceptical speculation. They return with the revolving cycle. But never before, not even under the Roman republic or the empire, did Epicureanism display so bold a front or arrogate so absolute dominion as Darwinism has presented and received. It claims to be accepted by all scientific and intelligent minds. It has been extensively admitted into nearly all departments of knowledge. These have been remoulded in consonance with it. Now it looks forward to an early sovereignty over the whole realm of thought and action. The eminent naturalist maintained, during his life, that his doctrine was not inconsistent with the Christian faith. His letter to a German student, published after his death, revealed his suppressed conviction that it was so, and that it had proved so in his own case. His declaration may, nevertheless, be so interpreted as to be true. There is no inevitable inconsistency between the creed of Christendom and the hypothesis of a progressive development. Everything depends upon the exposition and the application of the cardinal dogma. To human apprehension there is a more marvellous exhibition of creative intelligence and power in so ordering the world from the beginning, that every force and every creature in the universe should, like the fruit-tree, have “its seed within itself,” and exert its characteristic peculiarities in the perpetuation and progressive modification of all developments through endless generations. In this there is a more wondrous exhibition of intelligence and power than in the supposition of constant divine action in maintaining, regulating, combining, and modifying all the successive agencies and results of existence. The immanent operation of divine energy, which Thomas Aquinas considers the most cogent demonstration of the being of God, is imperative in the one case as in the other. The former explanation will not, indeed, satisfy the requirements of either true religious belief or genuine religious appetency; but it is the more difficult of conception. It is not, however, under either aspect that evolution has been promulgated, applauded, and accepted.

One reason of the wide diffusion of evolutionism has, unquestionably, been the plausibility of the doctrine, and the ambiguity of the term. Evolution is true—“sub modo et terminis suis”—as the statement of a fact. Evolutionism is erroneous as a theory. That things change is a commonplace, that organic beings grow is another, that the chicken comes from the egg is undisputed; that plants and animals, including man, will, under suitable circumstances, be modified, improving or retrograding, has never been controverted. But that these mutations can take place only within wider or narrower limits—still, within restricted limits—has never been disproved. It is the baldest assumption and the wildest reverie, to presume that the possible changes are illimitable and uncontrolled, and that one genus can be transmuted into another, even in the imaginary aeons of time. This is worse hallucination than alchemy. Evolution is an unfortunate and misleading term. It is wholly arbitrary to employ it as the designation of a philosophical system. Evolution cannot appropriately signify a force, a process, a mode, or a determining rule. It is merely descriptive of a phenomenon—unexplained. Smoke is evolved out of a gun-barrel. Something more than smoke is required to reveal the force, the nature, and the action of the gunpowder. This criticism may appear trivial, but it indicates the frailty and delusiveness of the theory of evolutionism. Certain modes succeed each other, and are noted. This affords no evidence of the fact or character of any philosophical relation between the forms. Nor is there much more to be ascertained from the cabalistic symbols of the school—the differentiation of the homogeneous, and the integration of the heterogeneous. These phrases have meanings, but what their precise meaning may be depends upon the presumptions of the interpreter. Of themselves they are as obscure as “Greek invocations to call fools into a circle.”

Abandoning, however, this skirmishing about the outposts, evolutionism, as a heresy, is sufficiently distinct and well understood. It signifies the progressive growth of all existence by successive stages, and through the influence of the surroundings, from primitive and unintelligent germs. There is a recent exposition, elaborated with great skill and acumen, which builds up society in its actual and prospective excellence, from protoplasm; and protoplasm from the diffused, undistinguished, and undistinguishable antecedents of cosmical dust. Where did the dust come from? The elephant may stand on the tortoise, but on what does the tortoise stand?

Into the details and assumptions of evolutionism it is impossible to enter here. A hasty notice of a few salient characteristics is all that should be attempted, notwithstanding the hazard of such brevity. It may be said, however, that there is not a single principle relied upon by the evolutionists that is proved, or that admits of proof, in the latitude required for the theory; that the ingenious multiplication of assimilated details is not argument, and does not authorize the inductions drawn; that the accuracy and propriety of the details is questionable, and has been questioned; and that “the survival of the fittest” is contrary to all known fact, except through such casuistry and quibbling, such limitation and explanation, as constrain the evidence to fit the hypothesis. Throughout the theory there is a latent and unperceived “petitio principii,” which conducts, by long, bewildering channels, the original assumption to the conclusion into which it is converted. It is scarcely necessary to repeat the preliminary proposition—that the world of observation reveals and necessitates, at all times, the admission of a higher force, guidance, and wisdom; initiating, sustaining, and directing all that is or can be observed.

The aim of evolutionism is to exclude from the theory of being and of truth everything transcending the manifestations of physical existence. Of course, the virtual effect on the spirit of speculation is the same, whether the supernatural is denied or rigidly ignored. The practical outcome of epicureanism, which relegated the gods to uninterrupted repose, was identical with that of the most absolute atheism. There is a logical and a metaphysical distinction, but little diversity of consequences. Hence Darwinism and evolutionism are on the same plane with positive unbelief, and merge into, even when they are not embodied in, the general procedure of agnosticism. See EVOLUTION.

III. Agnosticism is the current designation of the most prevailing type of sceptical philosophy. It rejects all outside of the material and phenomenal. It deems it unnecessary to deny the divine, which it banishes. Indeed, Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer, and other hierophants of the fashionable delusion, have admitted the reality of what they exclude from consideration and from rational inquiry. They do not deny divinity; they do not reject creative energy as a possibility. They are content to say that they know nothing, and can know nothing, about it, and that no one does or can know anything on the subject. They, therefore, refuse to admit it into their contemplation, or to accord it any rational authority over the thoughts and conduct of men. They pass it by with the flippant sneer, “Nihil ad nos.” Agnosticism is simply shameless profession of ignorance—know-nothingism in all that is essential to philosophy. It is the substitution of human science, or nescience, for human knowledge. It may, accordingly, be extended to all forms of negation, or rejection of what lies beyond the domain of matter, or of physical science. But can physical science, or human reason, in its finite systematizations, fill the whole globe of human thought, feeling, and conduct? of human aspiration and of human duty?

As has already been pointed out, science, observation, experience, reasoning, imperatively require the constant recognition and support of what the agnostics reject as being unknowable. What they repudiate, but what, nevertheless, remains indispensable, is unknowable, in the sense of being irreducible to the forms and precision of scientific knowledge. But there is much knowledge of the highest practical value which is unreduced to such demonstrable form, much which is incapable of being reduced to that form. Scientific knowledge would be vain, a mere phantasm in the clouds, a castle in the air, if it had nothing but propositions reached by induction or deduction to rest upon. In the brilliant developments of modern science the necessary philosophic basis of science is forgotten, and in the pretensions of scientific system-builders it is ignored. The sun shines calmly on, if invisible to the blind, or denied by them. True wisdom is distrustful of itself. It eschews pretension, and avoids the confidence which would restrict the world to the limits of human comprehension. What cannot be scientifically arranged, co-ordinated, and syllogistically or inductively proved, is not absolutely unknown. Were it so, a child could possess no knowledge, and could never learn. In things transcending “the beggarly elements of man,” we are and must “be as little children.” Here humility is the condition and means of knowledge. The assurance thus gained is accepted in a different form from scientific conclusions; but it is confirmed by a more potent authority, and exercises a more constant and controlling influence over human life. The peaks of the Himalayas are not less lofty or less firmly rooted because they are inaccessible to the foot of man. It is their elevation that renders them inaccessible. Their snow-clad summits, disguised by their white robe, shine in a clearer, purer, more translucent atmosphere than the low hills on which men dwell, which may be measured and traversed amid fogs and exhalations. The extension of precise knowledge widens, or should widen, the vision of an infinitely larger knowledge, which is unprecise. It is equally foolish and unphilosophical to deny the reality of all that cannot be impounded in our own petty preserves. To exclude such knowledge from consideration is the same, in effect, as to deny it, and is even more irrational. But this is what is done by the recent school of agnosticism, which refuses to acknowledge everything which science does not include or hope to embrace.

The attempt of Buckle to affirm, and of Arnold, his Dutch compeers, and many other schemers, in France, Germany, and England, to construct, a system of unspiritual morality, or of immoral morals, is only the adaptation of current agnosticism to ethical doctrine. As in the physical, as in the intellectual, so in the ethical sphere, the characteristic defect is that the building demands a firm foundation, but is deprived of anything to rest upon. Historical and ethical agnosticism are more pernicious than evolutionism. It is possible to investigate physical phenomena apart from their origin or cause, but the essence of morals consists in the acceptance of right, as a rule, extraneously presented, and obligatory in obedience to an authority above and beyond those bound to obey, though they have the power of disobeying. These traditions transcend the reach of rationalistic science.

A more dogmatic, but not more satisfactory, attitude is assumed by that growing sect of physiological psychologists who discern in mind only an exudation from matter, and resolve thought into a cerebral process, stimulated or stimulating, through the telegraphic lines of the nervous cords. 'Thought is thus, according to Spencer, a complex series of nervous "shocks," like those of an electric battery. If the nature and action of the human intellect are degraded to the level of the electric fluid, or of the currents of sap in vegetative growth, there is neither room nor occupation for any agency higher than organic motions. But how did these motions originate? Whence were their capabilities primarily derived? In all the play of nervous excitation, direct or reflex, where is the intelligence that notes and employs the communications transmitted? In ordinary telegraphing, an operator at each end of the line, or at the completion of the circuit, is indispensable. The apparatus is useless without something diverse from the apparatus, to interpret the messages. The gray matter of the brain, however wonderful its constitution and action, cannot discharge this function. At best, it is only a central office. The mind must be something entirely different from its complicated network of agencies. The spider's web is not the spider. But mind, intangible in its essence and modes, is inconceivable and unmeaning, without a creative mind to form and to inform it, after a fashion far different from any physical changes. Physiology has rendered, and may continue to render, most important services in the interpretation of the physical accompaniments and instrumentalities of mental processes. But Maudsley, and Bain, and Spencer, and the other advocates of human automatism, cannot detect mind or thought under the scalpel, with the aid of any microscope. Their theories are wholly superficial. They deal only with the manifestations on the surface, produced by the underlying forces. They exclude the idea of forces, except as the sequence of changes, and as a substitute for cause. They would exclude the term if they could dispense with it. They fail, however, to see that its indispensability attests the reality of what they would expel. As these speculations confine their attention to the show of things, they might be embraced under the head of phenomenalism.

IV. Phenomenalism, however, in its technical signification, is sufficiently distinct to claim separate consideration. It assumes two very divergent positions. It may restrict itself to material semblances. This form has been noticed under Positivism (q. v.). It may make matter merely a mental conception. In this case transcendental idealism is the result. The universe is one incessant flux of modifications and convolutions of a single entity, which is all in all, in each, and in everything. This idealistic phenomenalism inevitably runs into pantheism. It has been examined in the article on SPINOZA (q. v.). Notwithstanding the bitter, enduring, and often ill-considered censure bestowed upon Spinozism, it is returning in the speculation of the age, with such alterations of garb as the fashions of the times require. It is a recoil from the innutritious diet proffered by the materialists and naturalists of current science. A noteworthy example of this violent reaction is furnished by the philosophy of Lotze, now rising into favor. Lotze endeavors to unite the results of science with those of transcendental metaphysics, combining, reconciling, and harmonizing them in a more comprehensive scheme. He sees in all things the continuous interaction and reciprocal determination of their mutual relations. These relations constitute all existence and all change—they bear to reality the same analogy that Boscovich's points of force bear to the gravitation and cohesion of matter. These shifting, reciprocally moulding relations constitute at once the circulation and the substance of all being. The universe is one and single; its whole life, and the life of all its parts, are contained in the constant throb and vital activity of these relations. The wheels move incessantly, because there is life in the wheels; but the vitality of each part is the appropriate play in that part of the common, undivided energy which is concentrated in the totality of all the parts combined into one whole. The universe is a web of one piece, weaving itself into changing patterns by interchange of relations through all the phantasmagoria of existence in time and in eternity. This is not Spinozism, but patient discrimination is needed to discriminate them. Lotze would regard his scheme as the negation of pantheism; and the last words of his metaphysics imply his recognition of God as a distinct essence. But the desire to distinguish is not always attended by the ability to do so. If Lotze's philosophy is conceived in opposition to pantheism, its tendency is towards it. The adoption, development, and application of his principles and conclusions could scarcely be prevented from reaching that goal. Pantheism destroys the conception of divine intelligence and government by identifying them with all the phenomena of being, as naturalism repudiates the conception altogether by substituting for the creative energy the blind and unintelligent forces exhibited by matter, and ascribed to matter as their origin.

To this brief notice of the vapory idealism of Lotze may be appended the commemoration of the equally impalpable metaphysics of sir William Hamilton and his acolytes. The inadequacy and baselessness of the Philosophy of the Conditioned have been indicated already. See HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM. The legitimate deduction from it was drawn by Dean Mansel (q. v.), in his Limits of Religious Thought, which may be considered as a prelude to Arnold's Religion without Faith, and Morality without Morals. The tendency of the metaphysical system of Hamilton is decidedly in the direction of pantheistic idealism, and antagonistic to the safe, but narrow, "common-sense" speculation of the Scotch school. If the admission of a constantly operating first cause must be excluded from the sphere of philosophy, because a first cause cannot be conceived; if the relativity of human knowledge is so interpreted as to render all knowledge a dream or a delusion; if nothing can be accepted as known, except what is precisely known, and known only so far as it is "conditioned," then all the powers, aspirations, and emotions of man are paralyzed, or rendered unsubstantial shadows. All things, so far as man is concerned, would be resolved into the spectral shapes cast on the clouds of the human mind. Even these phantasms must be cast by something, or evoked by something. This primary something is a cause, and a first cause, but its essence is beyond human grasp. There are, therefore, but two existences in the universe, conjoined to each other—the mirror of the mind, and the entity which starts the images from the reflecting surface. Obviously, this reduces the actual, the intelligible, and the active to a single essence, some of whose pulsations manifest themselves as the phantasms of the human mind. This, too, is pantheism.

The fatal defect of the Hamiltonian philosophy, and of its developments, is, apparently, not in the assertion of the relativity and conditionalism of human knowledge, but in the exclusion of all knowledge of the "unconditioned." Knowledge is a very elastic term: "conditioned" is a very ambiguous one. It may be doubted whether incomprehensible technicalities—"absolute," "unconditioned," "infinite," etc.—afford such definite ideas as permit strict reasoning, logical or philosophical, in regard to them. They are shifting phantoms of the mist. Controversies in regard to them are as effective as would be battles of children, fighting with iridescent soap-bubbles. Waiving the discussion of the question, which would be endless, and presumably inconclusive, it must be felt that many paralogisms in philosophy are due to the unperceived diversity of latitude in the meaning of the terms conjoined with. Knowledge is of various degrees, kinds, and characters. Some is scientific, some philosophical, some intuitive, some revealed in mode and form apt for human acceptance. If all knowledge be denied, or excluded, but that which is established by logical or scientific reasoning, the human mind must wander "in endless mazes lost." It will stagger helplessly along, led only by the marsh-fires of the night, through forest and bog; mistaking every ignis fatuus for eternal sunlight. Science should confine itself to scientific knowledge. The range is wide enough for any ambition. But science must beg its first principles. It must rest on postulates which have a metaphysical basis. Logic observes the processes and sequences of thought, but the mind is, in itself, beyond human observation. All that it receives or produces is derived from impulses within and impulses without, whose existence must be accepted without other testimony than themselves. Thus, in all the grades and species of knowledge, the fundamental and indispensable assurance which renders any knowledge possible is the immutable conviction and the unwavering reception of knowledge, outside of systems of philosophy and provinces of science. Reason demands this. Conscious experience confirms it. Common-sense proceeds at all times from its influence, without a thought of its requirement. The relativity of human knowledge, and its character as "conditional," should be admitted, but accompanied with the further admission that such knowledge is built upon the "absolute" and the "unconditioned."

Such limited idealism as has shown itself in late years may easily have been provoked by the insufficiency of scientific systems to furnish support or satisfaction to yearning and inquiring spirits. Perplexity, induced by the enigmas presented to the intellect, and despair of their solution, may have suggested another recent phase of scepticism, which differs widely from the forms commented upon. It is the least excusable of all forms, because it runs away from the battle-field, and seeks selfish relief in wilful misrepresentation and morose discontent. This scheme, if it is entitled to be called a scheme, is

V. Pessimism.—It might be supposed to be a natural resilience from the optimism of Leibnitz; but the schemes are separated by too wide an interval of time, and exhibit no links of actual connection. It rather grew out of the despair of the disappointed age which witnessed the dissipation of the dreams of the French revolution, and found utterance in the gloomy strains of Byron. Every age presents the results of the preceding philosophy, and moulds the philosophy of the age succeeding. That strange, poetic genius, Leopardi, sang the prelude of pessimism; Schopenhauer gave it form, expansion, and coherence; and Hartmann has endeavored to give it systematic exposition. Pessimism is not so much a negation of creative power and authority as a denigration of creative wisdom and benevolence. It maintains that the order of the universe is so constituted and regulated as to produce only wretchedness and increasing distress. In a period of brilliant industrial and intellectual achievement, but of augmenting disquietude, discontent, and misery, it presents a doctrine disparaging an order of things so often embittering life, and multiplying the myriads of the suffering, the sorrowing, and of those who find no rest. In one respect, pessimism is to be reprobated more severely than agnosticism. It does not merely hide the supernatural behind an impenetrable veil; it calumniate the creator and the creation. It degrades man, and unfits him for the discharge of the duties of humanity. Man's function on earth is not enjoyment; that may be an incident of his life, a result, or a recompense of his conduct. It is not to exult in the possession of pleasures and ease and vanities and gratifications. His office is, through constant trials, recurring sorrows, and "much tribulation," to strengthen and fit himself for the work set before him, and to do it—to make his contemporaries, and posterity, and the world, better and better provided, in consequence of his action—and to serve earnestly and loyally, as private or captain, in promoting the unseen purpose of Providence, and the destinies of humanity. What may be the fortunes or the fate of an individual is of passing moment. Countless bubbles burst every second on the ocean of life; but the movement of the ocean is uninterrupted. Each individual is but one in the army of laborers. When he falls, his place will be taken, usually by one better fitted for the growing task. There would be an impropriety in dwelling on this type of scepticism, as it has been already noticed in this work. See PESSIMISM.

It must suffice to add that the blackening of the unseen, and of its cause, the substitution of a malignant author, or order of creation, for the wise and the beneficent, are as distinctly sceptical procedures as any other mode of repudiating a transcendent authority. These remarks on pessimism have been introduced chiefly for the purpose of noticing an outgrowth, conscious or unconscious. This excrescence has not yet coagulated into a distinct theory, but has an immediate practical effect, and tends to diffuse itself, like a spreading ulcer, through intelligent classes of existing society. Its evangel was Malloch's inquiry: "Is life worth living?" The obvious reply is, "Certainly not, if life is 'propter vitam vivendi perdere causas.'"

VI. Nihilism is a convenient designation for the incipient doctrine. Its purpose is to escape from the perplexity of conflicting arguments and the bewilderment of insoluble problems: to make the best, for selfish comfort, of what is presumed to be inevitably bad, as well as uncertain; to seek tranquillity, as far as practicable, in the renunciation of all annoying duties, and of all unselfish aims.

"How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable Seem to me all the uses of this world!"

Nihilism, and the pessimism from which it descends, display analogies to the rehabilitated Buddhism, which has been recently compared to Christianity, and which is preached as a substitute for it in the midst of the chief centres of modern civilization. There is no folly or delusion, says Cicero, which has not been advocated by some of the schools of the philosophers. If such extravagant reveries meet with acceptance in a cultivated and thoughtful generation, it is a consolation to know that like errors have been welcomed and applauded before—and have been forgotten. They are dreams which vanish with the morning, and belong to "those fashions of the world which soon pass away."

If man be regarded—and the individual perhaps may properly be so regarded—as one ant in the busy ant-hill of humanity, the problem of life and of the universe in respect to him becomes as simple and clear as it is grand. What is needed for earthly necessities he learns by transmission, by observation, by experience, by the advance of science, and the growth of his faculties. Of all that is above him, and that is so strongly felt as to regulate his conduct and his understanding, he knows nothing, of his own knowledge, except imperfectly, for it is "wisdom unsearchable, and past finding out." Can he reject the knowledge, and the author of all his knowledge, because both remain incomprehensible? Whether affirming or denying, he is compelled to accept both. Shall he ant deny the existence of superior beings, which he can neither measure nor comprehend? Shall the clay ignore the hand of the potter? Shall man, walking in obscurity, and seeing only "as through a glass, darkly," reject or exclude all that he cannot fathom with his short plummet line? He has his office upon earth. What that office demands he knows, or may know, so far as is required for its discharge. He works for his family, that others may take his place when his time of labor is over. He works for his countrymen, and for his age; he scarcely knows why, or how. He knows imperfectly what has gone before, made him what he is, and elevated and facilitated his tasks. He thinks he knows the present, in which he lives. He knows nothing certainly of what may come after him. He "struts his hour upon the stage," unconsciously ministering to purposes of which he can hardly dream. When generations have succeeded generations, the retrospect may show a grand result flowing from the purblind activity of himself and his contemporaries. The prospect may reveal a still more glorious advancement to be accomplished. A new earth, if not a new heaven, will proceed from the successive swarms of mankind.

Can it be rationally questioned that there are controlling influences and purposes from the beginning, pressing forward to a determinate end? They necessitate the admission and the governance of a wisdom which man cannot conceive, of a beneficence which man cannot understand, of a plan which man cannot penetrate, and a guidance which man cannot, rationally or logically, ignore or deny.

Inferences.—It is a natural result of the self-confidence of men—an inevitable exorbitancy of that daring thought and speculation which are the handmaids of progress, that, in the hour of intellectual triumph and of material splendor, the bold leaders should undertake the erection, on earthly foundations, of "towers reaching to heaven." In their exultation, they are unmindful that these edifices must totter over, like other Babels, and note their existence by their ruins. The shattered monuments will furnish the quarries for humbler but securer dwellings. The churches and fortresses of mediæval Rome were mainly built with the broken capitals and architraves, columns, statues, and other carvings, of fallen palaces and pagan temples. The strong places of later progress are similarly constructed. We mount on ruins, and on the corpses of those that have preceded us. It would be weak fanaticism to disparage the services to human knowledge and performance rendered by the theories of scepticism which have been surveyed. It would be imbecile ingratitude to refuse admiration to the learning, ingenuity, and perseverance of the high priests of recent aberrations. Their devices may produce a dreary impression—but there is no reason for consternation or despondency. They have opened new paths through the haunted forest of life. They have made clearings for the daylight, and for cultivation. They have extended our journeyings, noted the dangerous routes, and proved by their failures the limits of human capacity in many directions. They have wrought for ends unseen by themselves. They have erected magnificent abodes for other occupants.

Literature.—The materials for the full appreciation of the recent phases of scepticism must necessarily be sought in the writings of the founders and leaders of the several sects and divisions of sects, and in the criticisms which those writings have provoked. The literature of the subject, accordingly, embraces the works of the prominent philosophers of the last and current generations who have propounded theories of sceptical design or tendency. It equally includes the multitudinous controversies which they have excited, embodied in volumes, pamphlets, and periodicals. The biographies of the authors, as illustrative of their doctrines, constitute a desirable appendage. This literature would form a goodly library, and is too extensive for specification. So vast and so various have been the several schemes, their expositions, their refutations, and their rejoinders, that, instead of multiplying the titles of the embattled hosts of books, it might be appropriate to employ the epitaph of Sir Christopher Wren, in St.

Paul's: "Circumspice." Some valuable and accessible treatises may, however, be designated, for the purpose of fuller, but still summary elucidation of the prevalent forms of philosophical incredulity. Such are, Temple, Bampton Lectures; Tulloch, Theism; Modern Theories in Philosophy and Religion; Flint, Anti-Theistic Theories; Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory. (G. F. H.)

Schaeffer, Charles Frederick, D.D., an eminent Lutheran divine, was born at Germantown, Pa., Sept. 3, 1807. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1827, and studied theology with his father and with his father's assistant, the Rev. Charles R. Demme. He was licensed by the Synod of Maryland and Virginia June 17, 1829, and spent some months assisting his brother in New York. His first charge was at Carlisle, Pa., and his ordination took place Oct. 12, 1831. He left Carlisle Dec. 1, 1834, to enter upon the pastorate at Hagerstown, Md., where he remained until 1840, when he received a call to become professor in the Theological Seminary at Columbus, O. His relation to the Ohio synod became unpleasant, and he removed to Lancaster, Nov. 21, 1843. He next removed to Red Hook, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Dec. 23, 1845, where he was much esteemed. In 1851 he became pastor of St. John's Church, Easton, Pa., where he had a prosperous ministry of four years. It was during this period that he translated Kurtz's Sacred History, and made a careful revision of the translation of Luther's Smaller Catechism. In June, 1855, he was unanimously chosen as German professor in Pennsylvania College and in the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg. The ministerium of Pennsylvania having decided to establish a theological seminary at Philadelphia, in July, 1864, called Dr. Schaeffer to become professor of dogmatic theology, his instruction to be given in German and English equally. In this field he labored until his death, Nov. 23, 1879. Besides the above-named works, he published several single sermons, translated Lange's Commentary on the Acts (1866), and contributed numerous articles to the Evangelical Review and the Bibliotheca Sacra. See a Memorial of his life, funeral addresses, etc., in German and English (Phila. 1880).

Schaeffer, David Frederick, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Carlisle, Pa., July 22, 1787. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1807, and, having finished his theological course, took charge of the evangelical Lutheran congregation at Frederick City, Md., in July, 1808. He was ordained at Philadelphia in 1812, and in 1829 was unanimously elected principal of the Frederick Academy. He died at Frederick City, May 5, 1837. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 123.

Schaeffer, Frederick Christian, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Germantown, Pa., Nov. 12, 1792. He pursued his classical and also his theological studies under his father, was licensed in 1812, and soon after accepted a call from the Harrisburg congregation. He preached two years in New York city. In 1830 he was appointed professor of the German language and literature at Columbia College, but died March 29, 1832. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, i, 145; Evangelical Review, viii, 200.

Schaeffer, Frederick David, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Nov. 15, 1760, and received his education at the gymnasium in Hanau. In 1774 he began a private course in theology. He was licensed in 1786 by the Synod of Pennsylvania, ordained Oct. 1, 1788, and took charge of the Lutheran Church at Carlisle, preaching at different places in other counties. In 1790 he assumed the pastoral charge of Germantown District, and in 1812 removed to Philadelphia, as pastor of St. Michael's and Zion's churches. In 1834, in consequence of declining health, he removed to Maryland, where he died, Jan. 27, 1836. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, i, 79; Evangelical Review, vi, 275.

Schaller, JACOB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Heiligenstein, near Strasburg, Feb. 25, 1604. He studied at different universities, was in 1633 professor of moral philosophy at Strasburg, in 1634 doctor of theology, and died June 24, 1676. Of his many writings we mention, De Testamentis Christianis:—De Pluritudine Noe ad Libros Philonis Judei:—De Vanitate Vanitatum ex Eccles. i, 2:—De Christo Offensionis Lapide:—De Regno Davidico ad 1 Sam. xxi, 1 sq., etc. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Schamelus, MARTIN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Meuselwitz, Altenburg, June 5, 1668. He studied at Leipsic and Halle, was in 1703 deacon, and in 1708 first pastor at Naumburg. He died in 1742. He is the author of, Naumburgisches glossirtes Gesangbuch nebst einer kurzgefassten Geschichte der Hymnopolorum (4th ed. Nuremberg, 1720):—Evangelischer Liedercommentarius, etc. (Leipsic, 1724; 2d ed. 1737):—Vindicia Cantionum Sanctae Ecclesiae Evangelicæ (1712-19, 3 parts). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 526 sq. (B. P.)

Schappeler, CHRISTOPH, a famous theologian and jurist of the reformation period, was born at St. Gall in 1472. In 1513 he was preacher at Memmingen, and in 1520 he joined the reformation by attacking the Church of Rome, not so much in the sense of Luther, but of Zwingli, who wished his countryman to come back to Switzerland. Schappeler, however, remained at Memmingen, where he commenced the work of reformation. He showed to his congregation that the Bible is the centre and source of the Christian belief and of all ecclesiastical institutions. He denounced the mass as of no avail and the priests as unfit persons, who pray without devotion and read mass for the sake of money. The papal power he denounced as a carnal right, and the commandments of the Church as the false papal commandment. Such language had its effect, and the majority of the citizens were brought over to Schappeler's side. The writings of the reformers were circulated and read, especially the New Test. In 1523 Schappeler spent a short time in his native country, where he preached against the abuses of the Church of Rome, and in November of the same year, after his return from Switzerland, he was joined by Christoph Gerung, another preacher of Memmingen, and both now worked together in the interests of reformation. In vain did the bishop ask the town-council to stop Schappeler. When, however, the bishop, on Feb. 27, 1524, pronounced the ban and excommunication over Schappeler, it had only the contrary effect. The citizens openly declared themselves for their preacher, and the council was powerless. In order to bring about a modus vivendi, the opponents of Schappeler had to appear at the council hall, on Jan. 2, 1525, for a public disputation. The confession of Schappeler, consisting of seven articles, was read. Five days the deputation lasted, which resulted in favor of the reformation, to introduce which the council now lent its hand. The ministers were allowed to marry, and the monks and nuns to leave the monasteries. Schappeler died at his native place, Aug. 25, 1551. Scharbau, HEINRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Lübeck, May 25, 1689. He studied at Jena, Wittenberg, and Leipsic, was in 1715 preacher at his native place, and died Feb. 2, 1759. He wrote, De Creophagia Ante Diluvium Licita (Jena, 1709):—De Fatis Studiis Moralibus apud Ebraeos (Leipsic, 1712):—Exercitatio Philol. de Serpente Aenei Significatione Mystica (Lübeck, 1713):—De Caipha ejusque Vaticinio ex Joh. xi, 49, 50, 51 (1715):—Judaismus Detectus (1722):—Parerga Philologica-theologica (1719-26, 5 parts):—Observationes Sacrae, etc. (1731-37, 3 parts):—

besides contributing to the Bibliotheca Lubecensis. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Schärer, JOHANN RUDOLF, a Swiss theologian, was born at Berne in 1756. In 1798 he was professor of Hebrew, in 1805 professor of Biblical study at the Berne Academy, and he died July 8, 1829, preacher at Bümplingen. He is the author of, Das Buch Hiob aus dem Grundtext metrisch übersetzt und erläutert (Berne, 1818, 2 parts):—Die Psalmen metrisch übersetzt mit kurzen Anmerkungen (1812):—Religiöses Erbauungsbuch für Gefangene (1817, 1820). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 206, 209; ii, 820; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Scharfenberg, JOHANN GOTTFRIED, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Leipsic, Oct. 16, 1748, and died there, March 18, 1786, doctor and professor of philosophy. He is the author of, Prolassio de Josephi et Versionis Alexandrini Consensus (Leipsic, 1780):—Fragmenta Versionum Graecarum Veteris Testamenti in Monte-Fulconio Collecta (part i, 1776; ii, 1781):—Loci Nonnulli Danielis, etc. (1774). Together with Vogel he edited Lud. Capelli Crítica Sacra (1778-86, 3 vols.). See Fürst, Bibl. Theol. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 51, 93, 222. (B. P.)

Scharff, JOHANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Kroppenstadt, near Halberstadt, June 18, 1595. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1627 professor of philosophy, in 1649 professor of theology, and died Jan. 6, 1660, doctor of theology. He wrote, De Messia et Jesu Salvatore Mundi:—Collegium Anticulinianum:—Collegium Theologicum Decem Disputationes de Principiis Fidei Articulis Continentes:—Angologia Sacra ex Matth. xviii, 10:—De Justificatione ex Rom. iii, 24, 25:—De Interni Confirmationis Fidelium ex 2 Cor. i, 21, 22:—De Divinitate Christi ex Veteri et Novo Testamento Asserta, etc. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Scharling, KARL EMIL, a Danish theologian, was born at Copenhagen in 1803, and died in 1877, doctor and professor of theology. In 1828 he published De Stedingen Commentatio, and in 1833 Heed er Hensigten, Betydningen og Resultaterne af Theologernes videnskabelige Undersøgelser om det Nye Testaments Skrifter. Upon publishing this treatise he was made professor. For a great many years he edited the Theologisk Tidsskrift (1837-55), and published, besides his writings already mentioned, De Paulo Apostolo ejusque Adversariis Commentatio (1836):—Epistola Pauli ad Corinthios Posterior Annotationibus in Unum Studiosorum Illustrata (1840):—Jacobi et Judae Epistolae Catholicae Commentarius Illustratus (1841):—and some other works which have been translated into German, Die neuesten Untersuchungen über die sogenannten Pastoralbriefe des Neuen Testaments (Jena, 1846):—Michael de Molinos (Gotha, 1855). Schartau, HENRIK, a Swedish theologian, was born Sept. 27, 1737, at Malmö. He studied at Lund, and at the age of twenty-three was ordained. In 1786 he was called to Lund, where he spent the remainder of his life. Schartau, who died Feb. 2, 1825, was a very eminent preacher and a faithful witness of Jesus. He lifted up his voice, calling to repentance all who were permeated by the leaven of unbelief, which characterized the age. After his death a number of homiletical and ascetical works were published. His followers are known as Schartauans. See Lindeblad, Schartau's Life and Teaching (Lund, 1837; Germ. transl. by A. Schaubach, KONRAD FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 9, 1827, at Meiningen. He studied at Göttingen and Jena, was in 1851 rector at his native place, in 1865 deacon, in 1870 first pastor, in 1882 member of the superior ecclesiastical council, and died Dec. 25, 1884. He published, Das Leben Philipp Melancthon's (2d ed. Meiningen, 1860): — Ausgewählte Psalmen im Anschluss an die Evangelien des Kirchenjahres ausgelegt (Halle, 1863): — Zur Charakteristik der deutschen Volksliteratur (a prize essay). Schauffler, WILLIAM GOTTLIEB, D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Stuttgart, the capital of Württemberg, Aug. 22, 1798. When he was six years old his father removed to Odessa, Russia, where he held the office of mayor over the German colony. The son early gave much attention to the study of French and Italian. He was converted at the age of twenty-two. With a view of preparing himself for a missionary, under the direction of Joseph Wolf, the Jewish missionary, he went to Constantinople and engaged in the study of the Latin, Turkish, and English languages. To perfect himself in the work of preparation he came to the United States, entered Andover Theological Seminary, and completed the full course in 1830. He was more or less familiar with a score of languages. In 1831 he was ordained, and, after spending five years in America, returned to Constantinople. One of the great works of Dr. Schauffler's life was the translation of the entire Bible into Osmanli Turkish, under the direction of the British and American Bible Societies. This work occupied eighteen years of unremitting labor. His labors for the conversion of the Jews were characterized by zeal and devotion. He translated the Old Test. into Spanish. He was obliged to leave Constantinople on account of the plague in 1836, and travelled in southern Russia preaching the gospel to German residents. He spent three years in Vienna superintending the printing of the Bible. In 1877, in consequence of the infirmities of age, he was obliged to lay aside his active work, and came to the United States to end his days. He died in New York, Jan. 26, 1883. The Tract Society published his Meditations on the Last Days of Christ. See N. Y. Observer, Feb. 1, 1883. (W. P. S.)

Schaw, ROBERT, a Scotch prelate, was elected abbot of Paisley, March 1, 1496, and was advanced to the see of Moray in 1524. He died in 1527. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 148.

Schäslar, CONSTANTIN VON, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born of Protestant parentage at Augsburg, in 1827. He studied jurisprudence, and was promoted as doctor of law at Erlangen in 1850. In the same year he joined the Church of Rome at Brussels, studied theology, and was made a priest in 1857 at Liege. In 1859 he was promoted at Munich as doctor of theology, was in 1863 lecturer at Freiburg, in 1866 archiepiscopal counsellor, went to Rome in 1873, and was made chaplain by Pius IX. In 1878 he joined the Jesuits, and died at Interlaken, Sept. 20, 1880. He published, Die Lehre von der Wirksamkeit der Sacramente (Munich, 1860): — Natur und Uebernatur (1865): — Gnade und Glaube (1867): — Das Dogma von der Menschwerdung Christi (1870): — Ueber päpstliche Unfehlbarkeit (eol.): — Der heilige Thomas von Aquin als Besieger des Liberalismus (1874). 2. JOHANN GEORG, Jr., was born at Memmingen, Dec. 4, 1733; studied at Göttingen and Tübingen, was in 1756 preacher at Buxach, near Memmingen, in 1762 at Memmingen, in 1793 superintendent there, and died Nov. 22, 1802. He wrote, Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Geschichte, etc. (1772–77, 4 parts): — Anleitung für Bibliothekare und Archivare (1788–1791, 2 vols.), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 190; vi, 224; Meusel, Lexikon verstorbener deutscher Schriftsteller, s. v.; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Schielwig, SAMUEL, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 8, 1643. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1678 professor of philosophy at Dantzic, in 1675 professor of theology, in 1685 doctor of theology. In 1693 Schelwig inaugurated a controversy with his colleague Constantine Schütze, whom he accused of having spoken in the pulpit in favor of pietism (q. v.) and Spener. The outcome of this controversy was a number of controversial writings published by both parties. In 1694 the town council interfered. But Schelwig would not stop. He now wrote against Spener, who replied. In 1701 Schelwig was joined by Chr. F. Bücher in his polemics against Spener, and he died Jan. 18, 1715. See Prætorius, Athena Gedanenses (Leipzig, 1713), where a complete list of Schelwig's writings is given; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Walch, Religionsstreitigkeiten der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche, i, 602 sq., 739 sq.; iv, 159; Schmid, Geschichte des Pietismus, p. 225 sq., 343; Schnaase, Geschichte der evangelischen Kirche Danzigs (Danzig, 1863); Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. Schem, ALEXANDER JACOB, a religious journalist and statistician, was born at Wiedenbrück, Germany, March 16, 1826. After a course of instruction at the gymnasium of Paderborn, he studied theology at Bonn (1843), and Tübingen (1845); became a Roman Catholic priest (1846), but embraced Protestantism, and edited a newspaper in Westphalia (1849). In 1851 he came to America, was professor of languages in Dickinson College (1854-60), and afterwards devoted himself to literary labors, especially in connection with several religious and political newspapers. He died at Hoboken, N. J., May 21, 1881, being at the time assistant superintendent of the public schools in New York city. He was a contributor to Appleton's Cyclopædia, M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, editor of the Deutsch-Amerikanische Conversations-Lexikon (1869-74), of a Latin-English Lexicon (in connection with Dr. Crooks), of a Cyclopædia of Education (in connection with Henry Kiddle), and author of several Year-books, besides other volumes.

Schenck, NOAH HUNT, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born near Trenton, N. J., June 30, 1825. He graduated from Princeton College in 1844, studied law, and practiced it for a year in Trenton and three years in Cincinnati, O.; but having decided to enter the ministry, studied theology at the Seminary in Gambier, where he graduated in 1853. His first parish was at Hillsboro'. In 1856-57 he preached at Gambier, and from 1857 to 1859 in Trinity Church, Chicago, Ill. While in that city he founded and edited The Western Churchman. In 1859 he accepted a call to Emanuel Church, at Baltimore, where he remained until he went to Brooklyn, in 1867, as rector of St. Ann's Church, where he continued until his death, Jan. 4, 1885. Dr. Schenck travelled several times in Europe, and was the author of several works, mostly letters of travel and sermons. At one time he edited The Protestant Churchman of New York, and he was talked of for bishop on several occasions. He was regarded as a preacher of great ability, and always was listened to by large congregations.

Schenkel, DANIEL, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 21, 1813, at Dägerlen, Canton Zürich. He studied at Basle and Göttingen, was in 1837 privat-docent at Basle, in 1841 chief pastor at Schaffhausen. In 1846 he began his great work, Das Wesen des Protestantismus (1846-51, 3 vols.; 2d ed. 1861), in which he took his stand upon the so-called "Vermittelungstheologie," the via media between the old evangelicalism and the new criticism. Upon the death of De Wette, Schenkel was called in 1849 to Basle as professor of theology. In 1851 he was called to Heidelberg. At first evangelical in spirit, in 1857 he sided with the liberal direction in the General Synod, and worked for the reconstruction of the Hessian Church upon the basis of the Congregational principle ("Gemeindeprinzip"). As editor of the Allgemeine kirchliche Zeitschrift, he used the press to support the Liberal direction in theology and ecclesiastical constitution. The beginning of his liberalism he showed in the Christliche Dogmatik vom Standpunkt des Gewissens (1858-59); but when he published in 1864 Das Charakterbild Jesu, one hundred and eighteen parochial clergymen in Baden issued a protest against the book. Schenkel replied in Die protestantische Freiheit in ihrem gegenwärtigen Kampfe mit der kirchlichen Reaktion (1865). From 1863 he had labored hard for the foundation of the German "Protestanten Verein." In 1863 he retired from the direction of the homiletical seminary, and in 1884 from academical activity, and died May 19, 1885. Besides the works already mentioned, he published, Die Grundlehren des Christenthums aus dem Bewusstsein des Glaubens dargestellt (1877);—Luther in Worms und Wittenberg (1870);—Christenthum und Kirche im Einklang mit der Kulturentwicklung (1867-72, 2 vols.);—Das Christusbild der Apostel und der nachapostolischen Zeit (1879);—in connection with eminent scholars he published Bibel-Lexikon (1867-72, 5 vols.);—and for Lange's Bibelwerk he wrote the commentaries on Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, and his volume passed into a second edition; but its place in the series was afterwards occupied by a commentary on the same epistles by Dr. Karl Braune (q. v.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Schenkl, MAURUS, a Benedictine of Germany, was born at Auerbach, Jan. 4, 1749. He published, Commentar zum Buch der Weisheit (Vienna, 1858):—Kirche und Bibel (1862). (B. P.)

Schmid, Karl Christian Erhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Heilsberg, Weimar, April 14, 1761, and died at Jena, April 10, 1812, doctor and professor of theology. He published, Philosophische Dogmatik im Grundriss (Jena, 1796):—Versuch einer Moralphilosophie (1790–98, 2 vols.; 4th ed. 1802–3):—De Theologia Biblica (1788):—Adiaphora philosophisch, theologisch und historisch untersucht (1809). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 284, 288, 292, 294, 486, 761; ii, 94. (B. P.)

Schmid, Leopold, a professor of philosophy, who died at Giessen, Dec. 20, 1869, was originally a Roman Catholic divine, and occupied the theological chair at Giessen from 1839 to 1849. In the latter year he was elected bishop by the Mayence chapter, but the papal see did not acknowledge the election. Schmid resigned his position as theological professor, accepted a position in the philosophical faculty, and in 1867 publicly left the Church of Rome, and published Ultramontan, etc. Of his writings we also mention, Erklärung der Genesis (Giessen, 1835):—Grundzüge der Einleitung in die Philosophie (1860). (B. P.)

Schmidt, Johann Ernst Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 6, 1772, at Busenborn, Hesse. Schmitt, Leonhard Clemens, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1810 at Höchstad-on-the-Aich. He received holy orders in 1834, was doctor of theology at Munich in 1835, and died at Bamberg, Dec. 14, 1869, professor of theology and vicar-general. He published, Grundriss einer Christologie des Alten Testaments (1841):—Praktische Erklärung des ersten Paulus (1843):—Die Construction des theol. Beweises (1836). (B. P.)

Schmölders, August, a German Orientalist, was born in 1809 at Bochold, Westphalia, and died at Breslau, Feb. 21, 1880, professor at the university. In 1869 he joined the Old Catholics. Schmölders published, Documenta Philologiae Arabum ex Codice Manuscripto (Bonn, 1836):—De Studiis Arabum Grammaticis (Breslau, 1862). (B. P.)

Schmucker, John George, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Michaelstadt, in the Duchy of Darmstadt, Germany, Aug. 18, 1771. He came to America in 1785, finished his course of study in Philadelphia in 1792, and was admitted as a member of the Synod of Pennsylvania, then at Reading. His first charge consisted of several congregations in York County. In 1809 he became pastor of the congregation at York, where he labored twenty-six years. He died Oct. 7, 1854. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, i, 95; Evangelical Review, vi, 412.

Schmucker, Samuel Simon, D.D., an eminent Lutheran minister, son of John George, was born at Hagerstown, Md., Feb. 28, 1799. His preparatory studies were pursued at York (Pa.) Academy. In 1814 he entered the University of Pennsylvania, where he remained until the close of the sophomore year, when he returned to York, and in August, 1816, took charge of the classical department of the York Academy, and held this position until November, 1817. Having studied theology for a time with his father, he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1820. That year he was licensed to preach; for several months assisted his father; then went to Virginia to take charge of congregations in Shenandoah County, which had been under the care of his uncle, Rev. Nicholas Schmucker. He was ordained Sept. 5, 1821, at Frederick, Md. The Shenandoah congregations which he served were, New Market, Solomon's, Reder's, and Armentrout's, and he remained in this charge until 1836. While here he set himself to work to translate, rearrange, and enlarge Storr and Platt's Biblical Theology. In 1822 he began to prepare students for the ministry. In March of the same year he submitted to a committee, appointed for the purpose, a plan which he had drawn up, entitled The Formula for the Government and Discipline of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Maryland and Virginia. It was adopted by the synod in 1822, and approved by the General Synod in 1823. Subsequently it was revised and enlarged in 1827, under his direction, by the Synod of West Pennsylvania; was printed in the English Hymn-book in 1829; became the ground-plan of the organization of the congregations within the General Synod, and it has endured until the present time. In 1827 he was directed to prepare the constitution for synods, which was adopted in 1829. When, in 1823, the Ministerium of Pennsylvania withdrew, and the existence of the General Synod was imperilled, he was very active in the measures taken to prolong its life. He edited the English

Catechism, and, in company with Rev. C. P. Krauth, prepared the English Hymn-book. The work to which he believed himself to be called was the preparation of candidates for the ministry. When the General Synod decided, in 1825, to establish a theological seminary, he was at once elected the first professor. The institution was opened Sept. 5, 1826, at Gettysburg, to which place he removed. For four years he was the sole professor. During his connection with the seminary over four hundred ministers went out from it. After nearly forty years of labor in this office he resigned it in 1864. He was largely instrumental in the establishment of Pennsylvania College, and was one of its trustees from its incorporation until the close of his life, July 26, 1873. In 1838 he published an appeal to the American churches, with a plan for Christian union, and was present, in 1846, when the Evangelical Alliance was organized. His Popular Theology passed through eight editions; his Psychology reached a third edition. He published forty-four works, most of which were synodical and occasional discourses. It is said that his attempts to produce liturgies were the most unsuccessful of his literary endeavors. As a preacher he was very careful in his preparation, and was always gladly heard. See Penn. College Year-book, 1882, p. 154; Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry (1878), p. 121; (Gettysburg) Evangelical Review, Jan. 1874.

Schneck, BENJAMIN S., D.D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born near Reading, Pa., March 14, 1806. He studied theology under Rev. Dr. F. S. Herman, was licensed in 1825, and ordained in 1826. His first charge consisted of seven congregations in Centre County, where he labored until 1833. In 1834 he became pastor in Gettysburg and vicinity, but, his health failing, he resigned in 1835. Shortly after he took charge of the Weekly Messenger, continuing as editor until 1844. He resumed the editorial management of the Messenger from 1847 to 1852. He was also editor of the Reformirte Kirchenzeitung from its beginning until 1864, as well as minister at different intervals to congregations in the vicinity of Chambersburg. In 1855 he took charge of St. John's Reformed Church at Chambersburg, of which he continued pastor until his death, April 19, 1874. In 1839 he was president of the synod which met at Philadelphia. For some time before his death he was professor of German in the Wilson Female College, near Chambersburg. He was a man of much general information; a genial, pleasing, and instructive writer. Schwarzenberg, FRIEDRICH JOHANN NEPOMUK, prince-archbishop of Prague, was born April 6, 1809. In 1836 prince Schwarzenberg was made archbishop of Salzburg, in 1842 cardinal-priest, in 1849 archbishop of Prague, and died at Vienna, March 27, 1885, cardinal-archbishop. At the Vatican council he made an address, May 18, 1870, against the dogma of papal infallibility, which caused a great sensation in all Europe. But the resistance of Schwarzenberg was soon broken; he did not sign the protest of the opposition party, and retired to a monastery to avoid being further pressed by his former adherents. In Rome the papal faction soon proclaimed "Laudabiliter se subiecit." And such was the case, for Schwarzenberg was one of the first who proclaimed the dogma of infallibility in his archdiocese. Otherwise he was one of the most peaceful and tolerant prelates in Austria. (B. P.)

Schwarzhuber, SIMPERTUS, a Benedictine, was born at Augsburg, Dec. 4, 1727, and died at Salzburg, April 30, 1795, doctor of theology. He published, System der christlichen Sittenlehre (Salzburg, 1793-94, 2 vols.):—Gedanken über die bedenklichsten Einwendungen gegen die Untrüglichkeit der Kirche, etc. (1794):—Praktisch-katholisches Religionshandbuch für nachdenkende Christen (1784-86, 4 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 816, 404; ii, 323; Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Schwarzl, KARL, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in Austria, Feb. 19, 1746, and died at Freiburg, March 4, 1809. He wrote, Elenchus Sanctorum Potrum Ordine Alphabeticum (Innsbruck, 1780):—Prælectiones Theologicæ Polemicæ (Vienna, 1781):—Die Psalmen David's, frei aus dem Hebräischen übersetzt (Augsburg, 1798):—Anleitung zu einer vollständigen Pastoraltheologie (1799, 8 vols.):—Uebersetzung und Auslegung des Neuen Testaments (Ulm, 1802-1806, 6 vols.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 842, 670; ii, 35, 70. (B. P.)

Sconce, a movable candlestick of brass, latten, or other metal, sometimes affixed to a wall, placed against a pillar, or let into the rail-moulding of a pew. Sconces were likewise arranged along the top both of the rood-screen and of the side-screens of choirs and lateral chapels, in which, on great festivals, such as Christmas and Candlemas, lighted tapers were placed.—Lee, Gloss. of Liturg. and Eccles. Terms.

Scott, John, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of St. Andrews, and soon after, in 1200, was made bishop of Dunkeld. He died in 1208. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 76.

Scott, Matthew, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of St. Andrews and chancellor of the kingdom. He was postulate bishop of the see of Aberdeen in 1228, and about the same time postulate bishop of the see of Dunkeld. He died before he had been consecrated to either see. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 79, 106.

Scott, George, D.D., a Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born at Clogher, County Tyrone, Ireland, July 26, 1805, of parents who came of the Covenanter stock, and was well educated. In 1822 he came to America, and, after a short engagement in mercantile pursuits, joined the church of Dr. Samuel B. Wylie, in Philadelphia, by whom he was encouraged to prepare for the ministry. By teaching school, and the most severe economy, he completed his studies privately, and after licensure travelled as an evangelist for some time, but at length was ordained pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian congregations at Little Beaver, Pa., and Austintown, O., April 19, 1831. He afterwards confined his care to the former, until his resignation, Oct. 1, 1880. He died Dec. 16, 1881. Dr. Scott was a most honored, faithful, and successful pastor. See (Pittsburgh) Presbyterian Banner, Aug. 9, 1882.

Scott, John Work, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in York County, Pa., Nov. 27, 1807. He attended the Lower West Nottingham Academy and Slate Ridge Academy, and graduated from Jefferson College in 1827. He then taught three years at Butler (Pa.), Churchville (Md.), and Chanceford (Pa.). In 1830 he entered the middle class at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained two years, at the same time teaching, as an assistant to Prof. Robert B. Pallon, at the Edgehill Seminary at Princeton. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, Oct. 3, 1832; preached as stated supply at Poland, O., during the winter following, and was also tutor at Jefferson College. In 1836 he became stated supply to the Church at Three Springs, also of the Free Church of Steubenville, O. After this he preached frequently, but had no stated place. Dr. Scott's chief work was as an educator. He was founder and principal of the Grove Academy, at Steubenville, and with this was connected from 1836 to 1847. He was principal of the Lindsley Institute, at Wheeling, Va., until 1853; president of Washington College, Pa., from 1853 to 1865; principal of Woodburn Female Seminary and of the Academy, at Morgantown, W. Va., until 1867; then vice-president of the State University at the same place, and for two years was acting-president. This he was obliged to resign in 1877, because of failing eyesight. His eyes being treated with success, he went, in 1879, to Biddle University, N. C., to fill a vacancy. He died July 25, 1879. Dr. Scott was a man of excellent mental powers, of great vigor of mind. As a teacher he was admirable and rarely surpassed. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1880, p. 18.

Scott, Levi, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Cantwell's Bridge (now Odessa), Del., Oct. 11, 1802. He was trained to labor, and began his thorough intellectual discipline after reaching manhood. He grew up in a Christian home, his father being an itinerant minister. Levi was converted in 1822, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1825. He served a number of the most important charges in his conference, and soon gained a high reputation as a clear, logical, incisive preacher. In 1840 he became principal of the grammar-school of Dickinson College, where he remained until 1843. The next two years he was pastor of Union Church, Philadelphia; and from 1845 to 1848 presiding elder of the South Philadelphia District. At the General Conference of 1848 he was made assistant book-agent at New York. In 1852 he was elected bishop, and from that time until the close of his active career was most earnest in labors for the Master. Shortly after his election to the episcopal office he visited our mission in Liberia, and for many years suffered from the effects of the climate. In 1880, after twenty-eight years as bishop, and fifty-five in the active ministry, he retired to his childhood's home, where he gradually declined until his death, July 13, 1882. "In his most vigorous days the hearer was first arrested by the searching expression of the preacher's eye; then by the condensed energy of his diction; then by the conciseness and clearness with which point after point of the argument was made out. No time was lost in amplification; the paragraphs of logic were sent home to the conscience with the force of shocks from an electric battery. A torrent of appeal, brief, but intense, followed, and the preacher's work was done." See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 801; Life and Times, by Dr. Mitchell (N. Y. 1884).

Scott, Thomas Fielding, D.D., a missionary bishop, was for many years a Presbyterian minister in Georgia, but was ordained deacon in 1843 in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His first parish was at Marietta, which was a new field, and where, within six years, a fine church property and a female institute were purchased. In 1851 he became rector of Trinity Church, Columbus, from which he was promoted to missionary bishop in 1853. His jurisdiction extended over Oregon and Washington territories. He died in New York city, July 14, 1867, aged sixty-two years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1867, p. 499.

Scott, Uriah, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Lincoln, England, in 1820. He was first employed as a minister in New Milford, Pa.; but in 1859 was chosen rector of Grace Church, Honesdale, where he remained until 1861. He then went to New York city, where he officiated occasionally, and in 1867 ministered to the Church of the Redemption. In 1870 he was chosen rector of that church, and died in the same city, Dec. 25, 1878. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 172.

Scoren, CHARLES ODINGSSELL, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Charleston, S. C., in 1774. He graduated from Brown University in 1795, and was licensed to preach in 1801. His ministerial labors were confined to Liberty and the immediate counties. In 1806 he was elected president of Mt. Enon College, where he remained and taught probably two years. His only publications are two sermons. In 1802 a painful disease began to develop itself in one of his eyes. He continued to prosecute his labors until 1821. The last six years of his life were years of intense and almost uninterrupted pain. He died in New York, July

2, 1830. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 4391.

Scrogie, WILLIAM, a Scotch prelate, was minister of Raphan, in Aberdeenshire, and was elected and consecrated bishop of Argyle in 1666, where he continued until his death in 1675. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 291.

Seaman, LAZARUS, D.D., an English Presbyterian clergyman, was born at Leicester, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1631. By diligence and hard study he attained great eminence in literature and in the learned languages. He went to London as chaplain to the earl of Northumberland, and was lecturer at St. Martin's, Ludgate. His ability secured for him the valuable living of Allhallows, Bread Street, given by archbishop Laud in 1642. The next year he was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. He was an able disputant, and defeated two Romish priests in a set controversy. In 1644 he was made master of Peterhouse, Cambridge. He had interviews with king Charles I before his impeachment. Cromwell appointed Dr. Seaman visitor to the University of Cambridge, and vice-chancellor thereof. After the Restoration he lost all his preferments, was ejected from Allhallows in 1662, and gathered a congregation of his former hearers, who formed a new and important church, which met in Silver Street, continued about a century, and had a fine body of ministers. He died in Warwick Court, Newgate Street, Sept. 9, 1696. For more than thirty years his skill as a casuist procured him great fame; as an interpreter of Scripture he was one of a thousand; he was also a model pastor. He published several sermons, and a translation into Turkish, in 1660, of John Ball's Catechism. He had a very choice and valuable library, the catalogue of which is preserved in the museum at the Baptist Academy, Bristol. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 6-12.

Sears, BARNAS, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Sandisfield, Mass., Nov. 19, 1802. In 1825 he graduated from Brown University, and four years later from Newton Theological Seminary. From 1827 to 1829 he was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Hartford, Conn. From 1830 to 1832 he was a professor in the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution (now Madison University), and from 1833 to 1836 he studied theology at the German universities. During this period he inaugurated the German Baptist Church by immersing Rev. J. G. Oncken and six others in the Elbe, at Hamburg. He was a professor in the Newton Theological Seminary from 1835 to 1847, acting part of the time as president of the institution. He succeeded Horace Mann as secretary and executive agent of the Massachusetts Board of Education in 1848, and served in that position until 1855, when he became president of Brown University. In March, 1867, Dr. Sears was selected as the general agent of the Peabody Educational Fund, and at once went to Virginia to live. In this position he did much towards promoting education in the South. When the fund was established not a single Southern state had a modern system of public schools, but within eight years no state was without such a system. He died at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., July 6, 1880. Dr. Sears succeeded professor James D. Knowles as editor of the Christian Review in 1838, and held the position for a number of years. He was also a contributor to the American Cyclopaedia, and the Bibliotheca Sacra. Among the works published by him were the following: Nöhdén's German Grammar with Additions (1842);—Classical Studies (1843);—The Ciceronian (1844);—Select Treatises of Luther (1846);—Life of Martin Luther (1850);—Roget's Thesaurus (1864). Dr. Sears also published many addresses, educational reports, and miscellaneous essays, including his discourse at the centennial celebration of Brown University in 1864.

Secacah. For this site Lieut. Conder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 839) the modern Sikkah, but he does not indicate the locality. It is thus referred to in the Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1881, p. 55: "In the Judæan desert; possibly the ruin Sikkah, east of Bethany (sheet xvii)." But no such name appears on the Map nor in the accompanying Memoirs.

Seceders is a term applied in Scotland to those bodies of Christians who have separated from the National Church on grounds not implying a disagreement with its constitution and standards, in which latter case they are termed Dissenters (q. v.).

Sechu. Lieut. Conder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 116) that this may be represented by Khurbet Suweikeh, three and a half miles north-west of er-Ram, consisting of "walls, foundations, and heaps of stones; pieces of tessellated pavement" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, iii, 126).

Sedulius, an Irish prelate, was called bishop of Dublin in 785 in the martyrologies of Marian Gorman, and those of Tullagh. He died Feb. 12, 785. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 24.

Segedin, STEPHEN KIS, D.D., a Hungarian divine and educator, was born at Segedin in 1505, and educated at the universities of Cracow and Wittenberg. In the latter place, where he spent three years, he had the privilege of attending on the instructions of Luther and Melancthon. He commenced his public career at Thasnyadin, where he instructed those who were studious of the best arts, and preached the gospel to the common people. This dual work he prosecuted to the end of his life, laboring successively at the following places: Gyula, Cegléd, Temesvár, Thurin, Bekeny, Tholna, Lascow (where he was ordained pastor by the imposition of hands in 1554), Calmantze, and Kevin. He died May 2, 1572. Dr. Segedin was eminent for piety, distinguished for eloquence, and held in high esteem by the Christian Church of his time for the earnestness and fidelity with which he enforced the doctrines of the Bible. See The (Lond.) Theological Magazine, Feb. 1802, p. 43.

Second, Louis, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born in 1810, and died at Geneva, June 18, 1885, professor of Hebrew and doctor of theology. Second is best known as the latest translator of the Bible into French, whose name will be remembered with that of Le Fevre, Olivetan, De Sacy, Martin, and Osterwald. The Old Testament in Second's version was first published at Geneva in 1874, then at Nancy in 1877, and lastly at Geneva in 1879. But the entire Bible was issued in 1880 from the Oxford University Press, printed with admirable care and skill. The translation is pronounced an exquisite one. (B. P.)

Séguir, LOUIS GASTON DE, a French prelate, was born at Paris in 1820. In 1856 he was made canon of the chapter of St. Denis, and died in 1881. Séguir was one of the most active and influential members of the clerical party, unjust towards the Protestants, and a promoter of ultramontane ideas. He published, La Piété et la Vie Intérieure (1863-64, 4 vols.);—Instructions Familiales et Lectures du Soir sur Toutes les Vérités de la Religion (1865, 2 vols.);—La Liberté (1869);—Le Dogme de l'Infaillibilité (1872);—Le Jeune Ouvrier Chrétien (1876), etc. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, & v. (B. P.)

Seldemann, JOHANN KARL, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Dresden, April 10, 1807. He studied at Leipsic, was for some time private tutor, and in 1834 preacher at Eschdorf, Saxony. In 1871 he retired from the ministry, and died at Dresden, Aug. 5, 1879, doctor of theology. He published, Thomas Münzer (Dresden, 1842);—Die leipziger Disputation im Jahre 1519 (1843);—Karl von Miltiz, eine chronologische Untersuchung (1844);—Erläuterungen zur Reformations- geschichte durch bisher unbekannte Urkunden (eod.);—Beiträge zur Reformationsgeschichte (1846);—Lutherbriefe (1859);—Anton Lauterbach's, Diaconi zu Wittenberg Tagebuch (1872);—Jacob Schenk (1875);—Luther's erste und älteste Vorlesungen über die Psalmen (1876). See Neues Archiv für sächsische Geschichte, 1880, p. 94 sq.; Zeitschrift des bergischen Geschichtsvereins, xvi, 257 sq. (Bonn, 1881); Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v. (B. P.)

Selwyn, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, missionary bishop of New Zealand, was born at Hampstead, England, in 1809, and received his earlier education at Eton. He studied at Cambridge, and in 1831 was appointed private tutor to Lord Powis, at Eton, while acting at the same time as a curate at Windsor. In 1841 Selwyn was appointed first bishop of the Anglican Church in New Zealand, and after having been consecrated in October, he sailed in December for his station. He landed at Sydney in April, 1842, and remained some time there to confer with the bishop. In the first year of his arrival Selwyn established a college for the training of candidates for the ministry, and five years after his landing in New Zealand he commenced to work among the isles of the South Sea. In 1854 bishop Selwyn came to England. Twelve years' experience had taught him that his diocese must be divided, and that Melanesia must have some one who could spend all his energies on its many islands and its diverse population. His time in England was not wasted. When he returned to New Zealand he was accompanied by bishop Patteson. For some years he shared and directed Patteson's work among the islands, and in the college at Auckland. Then the diocese was divided, and divided again. In 1866 there were six bishops under Selwyn's direction as primate, and among them Patteson was giving his whole attention to those islands among which he was afterwards to lay down his life. In 1867 Selwyn came again to England, and during his stay the diocese of Lichfield became vacant. It was offered more than once to him, and he refused. At length, on being strongly pressed by archbishop Longley, he yielded. His administration of this new and trying sphere, which comprised the so-called "Black Country," was very vigorous. Selwyn died April 11, 1878. His Life has been written by H. W. Tucker (Lond. 1879, 2 vols.). (B. P.)

Seminaries, Theological, IN THE UNITED STATES. Professional schools for the special training of ministers of the gospel are almost peculiar to America. Although most of the universities of Europe were originally instituted chiefly for ecclesiastical education, and clerical studies were for a long time mainly pursued in them, this was only an accident of the time, arising principally from the imperfect views of science then entertained, and the predominance of religious teachers in the world of letters. In some instances, such as the famous Sorbonne (q. v.) of France, the academical studies gradually supplanted the theological; while in but a few cases, such as those of Geneva in Switzerland, Montauban in France, and the Propaganda at Rome, is theology prominently or exclusively taught. To these must be added the training-schools of the English Dissenters, which are comparatively few and unimportant. As a very general rule, however, the various branches of theology in Europe are included as departments of the great universities, and are therefore taught, almost entirely by lectures, as parts of a scientific education.

In America, on the other hand, while nearly all the higher schools were originated and are sustained by various Christian bodies, yet the system of special preparation of candidates for the ministry is very generally carried on in distinct institutions, sometimes included in a so-called university, but nevertheless having each its separate faculty and particular course of study, which is intended and arranged so as to be supplementary to those of the academy and the college. This gives a definiteness and practical character to ministerial training scarcely attainable, or even attempted, by the looser method of European instruction. See MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

I. Growth and Character of American Schools of Theology.—The earliest of these institutions, exclusive of a Roman Catholic one founded in 1791, in Baltimore, Md., which still survives, and a private one established in 1804 by Dr. John M. Mason, in the city of New York, which lasted several years, is the Theological Seminary founded by the Congregationalists at Andover, Mass., in 1808, although a foundation was made somewhat earlier for a similar institution by the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, N. J., which did not go into operation for a long time. The next great theological seminary was that of the Presbyterians, founded at Princeton, N. J., in 1812, although the College of New Jersey, with which it is connected, was established in 1757. The divinity schools of Harvard and Yale are even more modern, while the universities themselves are much older. After the above dates numerous schools and departments of a strictly theological character sprang up in the more thickly settled states, and in more recent times they have rapidly multiplied throughout the Union. Thus, in the first decade of the present century (1800–1809) there were but two organized, in the second 2, in the third 14, in the fourth 9, in the fifth 8, in the sixth 19, in the seventh 38, in the eighth (1870–79) 30. The Report of the United States Commissioner of Education for 1883 (the latest return) gave the total of theological seminaries and departments as being 145, with an aggregate of 588 resident teachers and 5771 students.

"As to the methods pursued in the theological schools of the United States, it may be remarked that no uniformity, but a general similarity, prevails. In nearly all, primary attention is given to the study of Hebrew and New-Test. Greek, as the foundation of an enlightened Scriptural exegesis. In the departments of ecclesiastical history and systematic and practical theology, instruction is largely given by lectures, with references to text-books and collateral reading. In all the fully-organized seminaries the course of study extends through three years, and is planned in reference to the attainments of graduates of colleges, although partial-course students are admitted on specified conditions." Tuition is free, and arrangements are usually made which reduce the cost of board, etc., to a very low rate.

II. Statistics.—The accompanying table, compiled from the above-mentioned report, exhibits a summary account of all the theological institutions in the Union, arranged in the alphabetical order of the several states. For further details, see the annual catalogue of each, which is furnished gratuitously on application to the presiding officer.

Sen, KESHUB CHUNDER, one of the chief priests of the Brahma Somaj (q. v.), was born in India. The sect of which he was a leader was formed in 1830 by Rammohun Roy. In 1859 Keshub Chunder Sen gave a new impulse to the sect by his remarkable ability and enthusiasm. He effected the separation of those who were willing to abolish caste in their communion, as the Brahma Somaj of India. The more conservative remained in the Church at Calcutta, where the first building was opened for worship in 1869. Sen, in his published sermons and tracts, avows his belief in the unity of God, in immediate revelation, in the necessity of a new birth, in the immortality of the soul, and the importance and efficacy of prayer. His morality was pure, and he inculcated a reverence for the character of Jesus Christ, but repudiated the doctrines of his divinity, mediation, and atonement, as taught in the gospels. He believed that Christ was better than Mohammed or Confucius. Sen died in India, Jan. 8, 1884.

Seneca Version of the Scriptures. For this branch of the Iroquois the American Bible Society has provided the gospels, published in 1829, while the British and Foreign Bible Society published the gospels of Matthew and Mark. In general the Iroquois version (q. v.) is understood by the Senecas, Mohawks, and Oneidas. See Bible of Every Land, p. 458.

Seney, ROBERT, a veteran Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Queen Anne, Md., Oct. 12, 1799. He lost his father while yet an infant, was educated in New York city, graduated from Columbia College in 1815, studied law, was converted, licensed to exhort, travelled some time with Rev. Nathan Bangs, and in 1820 entered the New York Conference. That year he served Granville Circuit; in 1821, New Rochelle; in 1822, Wethersfield, Conn.; in 1823, Poughkeepsie; in 1824, Middlebury, Vt.; in 1825, Flushing; in 1826 and 1827, New York city; in 1828 and 1829, Newburgh; in 1830 and 1831, Sandy Hill and Glen's Falls; in 1832, White Plains and Greenburg; in 1833, White Plains; in 1834, New Haven; in 1835, Vesey Street and Mulberry Street, New York city; in 1836, Mulberry Street, alone; in 1837 and 1838, Third Street, Brooklyn; in 1839 and 1840, Newburgh; in 1841 and 1842, First Church, Poughkeepsie; in 1843 and 1844, Allen Street Church, New York city; in 1845, Mariner's Methodist Episcopal Chapel; in 1846 and 1847, Washington Street, Brooklyn; in 1848, Danbury, Conn.; in 1849, Carlton Avenue Church, Brooklyn; in 1850, Washington Street Church, as supernumerary; in 1851, South Brooklyn Home Mission, and in 1852 and 1853 supernumerary at Brooklyn, where he continued to reside until the close of his life, July 1, 1854. Mr. Seney was eminently devoted and successful, able and winning. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 687; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, 2 v.

Sennara, in Hindûism, is the sacred Brahminical cord, whose use is restricted to the three superior castes as a mark of distinction. It is composed of a definite number of threads of cotton taken from a particular plant. Its length is such as to allow of its being worn diagonally across the body, from the left shoulder to the right side. The stoutest cord is that worn by Brahmins, that of the Kshatriyas being thinner and that of the Vaisyas being very slender, so that the cord serves to distinguish between the castes. (Butler, Land of the Veda, says that the Brahmin's cord is made of cotton threads, the Kshatriya's of hemp, and the Vaisya's of wool.) Brahminical devotees or saints often wear a snake-skin instead of the cord.

Sepharvaim. Dr. William Hayes Ward, who has recently explored the region in question, and is well versed likewise in Assyriology, finds in the ancient inscriptions four cities or districts called Sippara, the Greek equivalent of this name. Of these the two principal ones, he thinks, were the "Sippara of the Sun," discovered by Mr. Rassam at Abu-Habba, and the original place, known as the "Sippara of Assenit," being the one where Sargon I was exposed in his infancy, the town of Xisuthrus, the one captured by Cyrus without fighting, and the seat of the famous Jewish school, which Dr. Ward believes he has found in the large tell or mound still bearing the mediæval name of Asur, south of the point of the effluence of the Sokkameh canal from the Euphrates. See Hebraica, Jan. 1886, p. 79 sq.

Sepphoris. The modern site Saffurich is copiously described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 279, 330 sq.). (See illustration on p. 841.)

Serapion. By way of supplement we add the following bearers of that name: (1), eighth bishop of Antioch, successor of Maximus, and opponent of the Montanists; mentioned by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. v, 19, 22; (2), a martyr by the name of Serapion is mentioned by Eusebius, iv, 41, said to have suffered martyrdom under Decius at Alexandria; (3), a third one by the same name is mentioned by Eusebius, iv, 44, as belonging to the lupai (q. v.); (4), another Serapion is mentioned by Cassian in Collat. x, 2. Serpilius, GEORG, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Oedenburg, Hungary, June 11, 1668. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1690 deacon at Wilsdrup, near Dresden, in 1695 pastor at Ratisbon, and died Nov. 23, 1728. He published, Vollständige Liederconcordanz (Pirna, 1696):—Descriptio Synagogæ Serpiliæ Incultæ (Ratisbon, 1723):—Personaliæ Mosis, Josuæ, Samuelis, Eraz, Nehemias, Mordechais et Estheri (Leipsic, 1708):—Personaliæ Jobi (1710):—Personaliæ Davidis (1713):—Salomo in Continuationem Scriptorum Bibliorum (1715):—Personaliæ Iesaiæ (1717), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, *Bibl. Servatius, Saint. According to Athanasius (Apol. ii, 767), a Gallican bishop, by the name of Servatius, was among those who attended the Council of Sardica in 347, and he may probably have been the same whom Sulpicius Severus sent to Rimini in 359 to defend the Athanasian orthodoxy against the Arians. Set (or Sutekh), an ass-headed deity, the national god of the Shemitic Hyksos, who, on their invasion of Egypt in the interval between the thirteenth and eighteenth dynasties, forced his sole worship upon the Egyptians. Set was already one of the cosmical dei-ties of the country, but after the expulsion of the Hyksos his worship was annulled, his statues defaced, and his name everywhere erased. He was represented as an ass-headed man, holding the usual crux ansata, or staff of life, and the cucufa, staff of divine power. The Egyptians were accustomed to regard Set as a personification of the evil principle. "The worship of this god passed through two historical phases. At one time he was held in honor, and accounted as one of the greater gods of Abydos. He appears to have had a position analogous to that of the Theban deity Mentu, in which he was the adversary of the serpent Apophis, the symbol of wickedness and darkness. Some time later on, in consequence of political changes, the worship of Set was abolished, and his statues were destroyed. It is difficult to state at what period Set was introduced into the Osirian myths as a personification of evil, and thus became identified with Typhon as the murderer of the great Egyptian god Osiris. The treatise (by Plutarch), De Iside et Osiride, makes Nephthys the companion of Set, and she is represented united with him in a group in the Museum of the Louvre, in the Hall of the Gods. The animal symbolical of Set was a carnivorous quadruped, at one time confounded with the ass-god of Josephus and Apion, having a long, curved snout and upright, square-topped ears, which characters are often exaggerated to distinguish him from the jackal of Anubis" (Pierret). After the second restoration of the old mythology, in the period of the nineteenth dynasty, Set was identified with the Hyksos Sutekh, who was properly an Asiatic deity, and whose worship was maintained even by Seti I and Rameses II. Both gods, however, were treated as impious, and their worship as heretical, and it is at the present time impossible to distinguish exactly between them, owing to the complete destruction by the Egyptians of all those parts of the monuments whereon their names occur.

Seyffarth, GUSTAV, a Lutheran theologian and archaeologist of Germany, was born at Ubigau, Saxony, July 13, 1796. He studied at Leipsic, and commenced his academical career there in 1823. In 1857 he came to America, was professor at the Lutheran Concordia College, in St. Louis, Mo., retired in 1871 to New York city, and died Nov. 17, 1885. He published, Ueber die ursprünglichen Laute der hebr. Buchstaben (Leipsic, 1824);—Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Literatur, Kunst, Mythologie und Geschichte der alten Egypter (1826-40);—Chronologia Sacra (1846);—Das tausend-jährige Reich im Lichte der Offenbarungen des Alten und Neuen Testaments (N. Sfondrati, CELESTINE, prince-abbot of St. Gall, and nephew of Gregory XIV, was born at Milan in 1644. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall, taught theology, philosophy, and canon law at various places, and was elected prince-abbot of St. Gall in 1689. In 1695 Innocent XII made Sfondrati a cardinal, but he died soon after his promotion, in the same year, at Rome. Sfondrati wrote, Regule Sacerdotium Romano Pontifici Assertum et Quatuor Propositionibus Explicatum (1684), which is a defence of the absolute supremacy of the pope over and against the pretensions of the Gallican Church. Five French bishops refuted this work:—Nodus Predestinationis . . . Dissolutus (Rome, 1696; Venice, 1698). This posthumous work was attacked by the Sorbonne, Bossuet, and others, who in vain tried to have the book put on the Index. See MORERI, Auctores Diarii Italici (Venice, 1732), vol. vi; Journal des Savants, 1698, 1708, and 1709; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Shaalbim. The probable representative of this place, Selbit, lies two miles north of Amwā. It is a deserted ruin, and "appears to be the Selebi of Jerome's Comment. on Ezek. xlviii, 22" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 52).

Shaaraim. The probable site is that of Khurbet Saireh, three and a half miles north-east of Beit Nettif, and one and a half west of Beit Atab. It consists of "foundations on a hill, with a spring below" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 124).

Shahazimah is conjectured by Lieut. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 339) to be the present Tell esh-Sheikh Kâsim, "a very large artificial mound near the Jordan" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 128), eight miles south of the Sea of Galilee; but there is no special ground for this identification.

Sharpe, SAMUEL, an Egyptologist and Hebrew scholar, was born in England in 1799. After starting in life as a banker, he soon retired from business, and devoted himself to the studies of Egyptology and Hebrew. The numerous volumes which came from his pen during his long and busy life—he died in August, 1881—were all concerned either with the monuments of ancient Egypt, or with Biblical researches. "A Unitarian and liberal," says the Academy, "he occupied himself in popularizing a mode of interpreting the Scriptures which, though it would now be considered at once conservative and narrow, seemed half a century ago startling, if not profane." His chief Egyptological works were the following: Early History of Egypt from the Old Testament, Herodotus, Manetho, and the Hieroglyphic Inscriptions (1836);—Egyptian Inscriptions from the British Museum and other Sources (first series, 1837; second series, 1855);—The Rudiments of a Vocabulary of the Egyptian Hieroglyphics (1837);—The History of Egypt under the Ptolemies (1838);—History of Egypt under the Romans (1842);—The History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till the Conquest of the Arabs, A.D. 640 (1846; 5th ed. 1870);—The Chronology and Geography of Ancient Egypt (1849);—Historical Sketch of the Egyptian Buildings and Sculpture (1854);—Alexandrian Chronology (1857);—Egyptian Hieroglyphics (1861);—Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum (1862);—The Decree of Canopus (1870);—The Rosetta Stone (1871). His most important publications on Biblical matters were, Historic Notes on the Books of the Old and New Testaments (1854; 3d ed. 1858);—Critical Notes on the Authorized English Version of the Old Testament (1856; 2d ed. 1867);—The Chronology of the Bible (1868);—Texts from the Holy Bible Explained by the Help of the Ancient Monuments (ed.);—History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1869; 2d ed. 1872);—On the Journeys and Epistles of the Apostle Paul (1876);—A Short Hebrew Grammar without Points (1877);—The Book of Isaiah arranged Chronologically in a Revised Translation, and Accompanied with Historical Notes (ed.). Mr. Sharpe's two lines of study met in his work on Egyptian Mythology and Egyptian Christianity, with their Influence on the Opinions of Modern Christendom (1863). In 1875 he brought out a volume on Hebrew Inscriptions from the Valleys between Egypt and Mount Sinai, and shortly after his death was published his Βαρναβᾶ Επιστολή, The Epistle of Barnabas from the Sinaitic Manuscript of the Bible, with an English translation (1881), in which he seeks to fix its date to the year of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. (B. P.)

Sharnhen. The probable representative of this place, Tell esh-Sheriah, lies ten miles north-west of Khurbet Bir es-Seba, and is thus described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey (iii, 339): "A large mound on the north bank of the valley. Broken pottery and a few small unhewn stones are found on the top. In the valley is a well-cut trough of basalt."

Shaw, WILLIAM, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass.; ordained pastor of the Church in Marshfield in April, 1769; and died June 1, 1816. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 573.

Shechesb. The archaeological remains of the modern Nirbūs are copiously described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey (ii, 203 sq.).

Sheldon, George, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Northampton, Mass., Oct. 12, 1813. He graduated from Williams College in 1835, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1838. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church near Charleston, S. C., from 1840 to 1843, and was afterwards chosen district secretary of the American Bible Society for New Jersey and Delaware, which office he filled for thirty years. It may be said his life was spent in organizing means for the dissemination of the Holy Scriptures, and in the discharge of his duties he displayed great energy, wisdom, and executive ability. He was much esteemed by the citizens of Princeton, where he resided twenty years. He died there, June 16, 1881. See N. Y. Observer, June 23, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Sheldon, Luther, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Rupert, Vt., Feb. 18, 1786. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1808, and was ordained at Easton, Mass., in 1810, which pastorate he retained until his resignation in 1855. He preached six thousand written sermons, and declined eight calls to larger salaries. He died at Easton, Sept. 16, 1866. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 304.

Shelton, George A., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, rector of St. James's Church, Newtown, L. I.; died Dec. 27, 1863, aged sixty-three years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1864, p. 150.

Shelton, William, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Fairfield, Conn., in September, 1798, his father being the Rev. Philo Shelton, the first Episcopal clergyman ordained in America. William graduated from the General Theological Seminary of New York in 1823, was ordained deacon the same year, and presbyter in 1826; ministered at Plattsburgh and Red Hook, N. Y., and in his native town, until 1829, when he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Buffalo. In 1879 he was made pastor emeritus, and so continued until his death, at the old Fairfield parsonage, Oct. 11, 1883. See (N. Y.) Church Almanac, 1884, p. 103.

Shema. The Sameh between Tell Milh and Beersheba, proposed for this place, is an error for Sameh (i. e. Hazor-Shual); and Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 18) that Shema (i. e. Sheba) is represented by Tell es-Seba, about two miles east of Bir es-Seba. See BEERSHEBA.

Shepard, George, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1802. He graduated from Amherst College in 1824, from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827, and was ordained Feb. 5, 1828, pastor at Hallowell, Me. He became professor of sacred rhetoric in the Theological Seminary at Bangor in 1836, and died there, March 23, 1868. See Tristram's Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 76.

Shepard, Thomas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Norton, Mass., May 7, 1792. After studying at Taunton Academy, he graduated from Brown University in 1813, and in 1816 from Andover Theological Seminary. The two succeeding years he was a home missionary in Georgia. In 1818 and 1819 he was agent for the Connecticut Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb. He was ordained pastor at Ashfield, Mass., June 16, 1819, and remained until May 8, 1833. From 1833 to 1835 Dr. Shepard was agent of the American Bible Society. From April 30, 1835, until his death he was pastor at Bristol, R. I., although he had resigned active service in 1865. In 1846 he was elected a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He died Oct. 5, 1879. Among his publications were various sermons and thirty New Year's Annals. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 27.

Shepley, David, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Solon, Me., in May, 1804. His father dying when David was quite young, he went to Norridgewock, where he resided for a time in the family of Rev. Jonah Peet, and became a Christian. He pursued his preparatory studies at Saco, graduated from Bowdoin College in 1825, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1826. He was ordained as pastor of the First Church at Yarmouth, Me., in February, 1829, and resigned in April, 1849. He was next pastor at Winslow from September, 1851, until June, 1862; subsequently of the Central Church at Falmouth for a short time, and then provisional secretary of the Maine Missionary Society. His health failing, he removed to Providence, R. I., in 1871, where he remained until his death, Dec. 1, 1881. See Providence Journal, Dec. 3, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Sherman, Joseph, LL.D., a Congregational minister and educator, was born at Edgecomb, Me., March 3, 1800. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1826, was principal for six years of the Academy at North Yarmouth, studied two years at Andover, and in 1834 went to Columbia, Tenn., as professor of ancient languages in Jackson College. For fifteen years he was connected with the college, during three of which he was its president. He died in June, 1849. See Hist. of Bowdoin College, p. 355. (J. C. S.)

Sherwood, Adiel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Fort Edward, N. Y., Oct. 3, 1791. He studied three years at Middlebury College, graduated from Union College in 1817, studied one year in the Andover Theological Seminary, and then went to Georgia for his health, where he took high rank as a preacher. He was ordained pastor at Bethlehem, near Lexington, in 1820. While at Eatonton, whither he went in 1827, having charge of an academy, as well as preaching, a most remarkable revival began in his church, and for two years it spread through the state. He may be said to have been the originator of what is now Mercer University. In 1827 and 1838 he was a professor in Columbian College, Washington, D. C., and from 1839 to 1841 professor of sacred literature in Mercer University, Ga. For several years he was president of Shurtleff College, Alton, Ill. In 1848 and 1849 he was president of the Masonic College, Lexington, Mo., and from 1849 to 1857 pastor of the Church at Cape Girardeau. Returning to Georgia, he was president of Marshall College for a few years. The closing years of his life were spent in Missouri, his death occurring at St. Louis, Aug. 18, 1879. Among the numerous productions of his pen may be mentioned his Gazetteer of Georgia, Christian and Jewish Churches, and his Notes on the New Testament. In his personal appearance Dr. Sherwood was tall and commanding, with noble and dignified features. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1054. (J. C. S.)

Sherwood, Reuben, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died at Hyde Park, N. Y., May 11, 1856, aged sixty-six years. He was one of the oldest clergymen of his denomination in Dutchess County, and for the last twenty-two years of his life had been rector of St. James's Church at Hyde Park. He was formerly, for a long time, in charge of the Church at Norwalk, Conn., and was the founder of the parishes at Saugerties and Esopus, N. Y. See Amer. Quar. Church Rec. 1856, p. 301.

Shicron is thought by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 84) to be the modern Zernika, which lies two and a half miles north-east of Yebnah (Jabneh), and is "a large mud village, with cactus hedges around it, and wells in the gardens" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, ii, 414). Lieut. Conder suggests (Quar. Statement of "Pal. Explor. Fund," Oct. 1876, p. 170, note) that it may be the Khurbet Sukereir, a small ruined khan, near the river of the same name, four and a half miles south-west of Yebnah, and exhibiting traces of a cistern, a reservoir, a viaduct, and a canal (Memoirs, ii, 425).

Shihon. For this place both Tristram (Bible Places, p. 277) and Conder (Tent Work, ii, 389) accept Ayūn esh-Shuīn, two miles north-west of Debūrieh, which consists merely of "two springs, built up with masonry, about thirty yards apart; good perennial supply of water; no stream" (Memoirs of Ordnance Survey, i, 377). On the other hand, esh-Shejerah, four and a half miles north by east of Debūrieh, contains the ruins of an ancient building later used as a mosque (ibid. p. 414).

Shihor-libnath. Both Tristram (Bible Places, p. 289) and Conder (Tent Work, ii, 389) identify this stream with the Wady esh-Shagūr, which comes down the mountains east of Acre, and by its junction with Wady Shulb forms the Wady el-Halẓān, that runs into the Nahr Numim, or Belus. This, however, is at least fourteen miles north-east of Carmel, and more than twenty from the south-west extremity of Asher.

Shiloh. The archaeological remains at Seilūn are minutely described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 367 sq.). The following particulars from Conder's Tent Work (i, 81 sq.) are of interest:

"We approached Shiloh from the south, by a mountain-road of evident antiquity, from the little plain. The ruins of a modern village here occupy a sort of tell or mound. On the east and north the site is shut in by bare and lofty hills of gray limestone, dotted over with a few fig-trees; on the south the plateau looks down on the plain just crossed. A deep valley runs behind the town on the north, and in its sides are many rock-cut sepulchres; following its course westward, we again reached the main road, thus avoiding a steep pass, and turning northwards found the village of Lebonah perched on the hillside to the west of the road and north of Shiloh, as described in the Bible.

"Shiloh was for about four hundred years the chosen abode of the tabernacle and ark. It is a question of no little interest whether this was the first spot selected after the conquest of the hills by Joshua. That Shiloh became the gathering-place after the conquest of Shechem there is abundant proof (Josh. xxii, 12), and it may be inferred that the Tabernacle was placed there early; but, on the other hand, we find 'Sanctuary of the Lord' (or Holy Place of Jehovah) mentioned, by the oak near Shechem (Josh. xxiv, 26), and we may perhaps gather that, though not recognised by the doctors of the Mishna, there was a time when the Tabernacle stood, as is believed by the Samaritans, near Shechem. The date which they give for its transference to Shiloh, in the time of Eli, whom they consider to have been the first schismatical leader of the children of Judah, does not, however, accord with the Biblical account, and the story no doubt originated in consequence of religious hatred.

"The site being so certainly known, it becomes of interest to speculate as to the exact position of the Tabernacle. Below the top of the hill, on the north of the ruins, there is a sort of irregular quadrangle, sloping rather to the west, and perched above terraces made for agricultural purposes. The rock has here been rudely hewn in two parallel scarps for over four hundred feet, with a court between, seventy-seven feet wide, and sunk five feet below the outer surface. Thus there would be sufficient room for the court of the Tabernacle in this area, and it is worthy of notice that the measurement north and south agrees very closely with the width of the court (fifty cubits), which was also measured north and south. From the Mishna we learn that the lower part of the Tabernacle erected at Shiloh was of stone, with a tent above.

"There are, however, two other places which demand attention as possible sites, one being perhaps a synagogue, the other a little building called the 'Mosque of the Servants of God.'

"The building which I have called a synagogue is situated on a slope south of the ruins of Shiloh. It is thirty-seven feet square, and built of good masonry. The door is on the north, and is surmounted by a flat lintel, on which is a design in bold relief, representing vases and wreaths. Inside there are pillars with capitals, seemingly Byzantine. A sloping scarp has been built against the wall on three sides, and a little mosque sacred to El-Arbain — 'the Forty' Companions of the Prophet — is built on to the east wall. There is a pointed arch on the west wall. Thus we have at least three periods — that of the old synagogue, represented by the lintel, which is similar to the lintels of Galilean synagogues, that of a later Christian erection, and finally the Moslem mosque, built, probably, where the apex of the chapel would have been placed.

"The Jamia el-Yeteim, or 'Mosque of the Servants of God,' is situated at the southern foot of the tell. It is shaded by a large oak-tree, and is of good masonry, like that of the last; there was nothing very remarkable in the little low chamber within, but the name seems to preserve a tradition of the position of the Tabernacle.

"The only water close to the village was once contained in a little tank with steps, south of the lower mosque. There is, however, a fine spring placed, as is often to be observed in Palestine, at a distance of no less than three quarters of a mile from the town, at the head of the valley which comes down behind the ruins from the east. A good supply of water here issues into a rocky basin, and was once carried by an underground aqueduct to a rock-cut tank, but is now allowed to run waste.

"The vineyards of Shiloh have disappeared, though very possibly once surrounding the spring, and perhaps extending down the valley westwards, where water is also found. With the destruction of the village desolation has spread over the barren hills around.

"A yearly feast was held at Shiloh, when the women came out to dance in the vineyards (Judges xxi, 31). It is possible that a tradition of this festival is retained in the name Merj el-'Aid, 'Meadow of the Feast,' to the south of the present site."

Shimron. The present Seminih is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 280) as "a small village on a knoll at the edge of the plain of Esdraelon [five miles west of Nazareth], with three springs . . . and contains probably less than one hundred souls." It has "artificial mounds, traces of ruins, and a sarcophagus" (ibid. p. 389).

Shinn, ASA, an eminent Methodist Protestant minister, was born in New Jersey, May 8, 1781, of poor but honest Quaker parents. He received his education chiefly among the western hills of Virginia, became a Methodist at the age of eighteen, was requested to become an exhorter, and before his twentieth year was employed as a travelling preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which connection he continued over twenty-seven years. The fact that he never saw an English grammar or a clock until he entered upon his first circuit pictures his illiterate and inexperienced condition; yet such was his progress that in 1809 we find him by appointment in the city of Baltimore. He gave himself wholly to the work, utilized his opportunities as a student, and whether in season or out of season, in town or in country, in the woods or on horseback, his tireless mind was at work, until he became a theologian before whose logic and masterly delivery no foe of the truth could stand. In 1825 Mr. Shinn was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1829 withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church, helped to organize the Methodist Protestant Church, and at its first conference, which was held that year, in Ohio, he was elected president. He afterwards was the first president of the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1834 he was elected editor of the Methodist Protestant, and served two years. When a young man Mr. Shinn experienced an accidental fracture of his skull, which, because of improper surgical attention, caused his insanity in old age, and he was removed to Brattleboro (Vt.) Lunatic Asylum, where he died, Feb. 11, 1833. Mr. Shinn produced two theological works: The Plan of Salvation, and The Benevolence and Rectitude of the Supreme Being; they evince great logical power, piety of heart, and loyalty to Christ. See Bassett, Hist. of the M. P. Church, p. 525.

Shorsewood, GEORGE, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Culter in 1449, and in 1453 was chancellor of the Church of Dunkeld. He was confessor to the king in 1454, in which year he went on an embassy to England. He was made bishop of the see of Brechin, Oct. 22 the same year, was also royal secretary, and afterwards became lord high chancellor. He was bishop there in 1462. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 164.

Short, Augustus, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born near Exeter in 1803. From Westminster School he was sent to Christ Church College, Oxford, where he graduated A.B. in 1824, and A.M. in 1826. He was appointed vicar of Ravensthorpe, Northamptonshire, in 1835; Bampton lecturer at Oxford in 1846, and the first bishop of Adelaide, South Australia, in 1847. He died Oct. 8, 1883.

Short, David Hawkins, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1806. He graduated from Trinity College in 1833, and from the General Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1836; was ordained the same year; for a number of years was employed as a teacher in Ridgefield, Conn.; in 1860 became rector of St. James's Church, Waisted; in 1861 of Grace Church, Broadbrook; in 1866 removed to Greenwich as rector of two churches, viz.: Calvary Church, at Round Hill, and Emmanuel Church, in Glenville; in 1867 officiated in St. John's Church, Hartford; the next year in the Memorial Church of the Holy Trinity, Westport. He resided in Portland, in 1870, without charge; but the following year officiated in Trinity Church, in that place; in 1872 he was chosen rector of St. Andrew's Church, Northford, where he remained for several years. He died in Fairfield, Jan. 21, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 170.

Shunem. Its modern representative, Sólum, is three and a quarter miles north of Zerin, and is briefly noted in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 87). The following particulars concerning its situation are given by Conder (Tent Work, i, 123):

"Westward the view includes Füleh—the crusading Castle of the Bean, with its fosse and marshy pool outside, and extends as far as Carmel, fifteen miles away. Thus the whole extent of the ride of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings iv, 94) under the burning noontide sun of harvest-time is visible. Were the houses of that time no larger than the mid-cabins of the modern village, it was not a great architectural undertaking to build 'a little chamber' for the prophet, and the enumeration of the simple furniture of that chamber—the bed, perhaps only a straw mat, the table, the stool, and the lamp, seems to indicate that it was only such a little but that was intended. Another point may be noted: how came it that Eli-sha so constantly passed by Shunem? The answer seems simple: he lived habitually on Carmel, but he was a native of Abel Meholah, 'the Meadow of Circles,' a place now called 'Ain Helweh, in the Jordan valley, to which the direct road led past Shunem down the valley of Jezreel."

Shur. Dr. Trumbull labors at great length (Kadesh-barnea, p. 44 sq.) to prove that Shur was the name of a line of fortifications extending from Suez to the Mediterranean; but in that case the word must have taken the article (the Wall), which, on the contrary, it never has. His etymologies connecting it in this sense with Etham are very forced. That there may have existed some such defences, in the way of forts, Migdol (q. v.) being the principal one, may very well be granted, without supposing a continuous or wall-like series, of which there is no evidence. Nor is the word itself ever used in any such relation. The phrase שׁוּר שׁוּר (Gen. xvi, 7), can only mean, in Hebrew idiom, "the way to Shur," like בִּיאַד שׁוּר (1 Sam. xv, 7), or, more exactly, בִּיאַד שׁוּרָה (1 Sam. xxvii, 8) not "the Wall-Road."

Shurtleff, Roswell, D.D., a Congregational professor, was born at Ellington, Conn., Aug. 29, 1773. He was educated at Chesterfield Academy and Dartmouth College. In 1800 he was appointed tutor, and in 1804 professor of theology and college pastor at Dartmouth. This office he held for twenty-three years, and from 1827 to 1838 he held the professorship of moral philosophy and political economy. His remaining years were spent quietly at home. He died at Hanover, N. H., Feb. 4, 1861. Dr. Shurtleff's mind was clear, far-sighted, versatile, and logical; his wit and humor were unfailing; his sympathies were strong, his preaching was powerful, and his learning was ample. In theology he was a Hopkinsian. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 215.

Siber, Urban Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 12, 1669, at Schandau, Saxony, and studied at Wittenberg. In 1703 he was deacon, and in 1708 archdeacon at Schneeberg. In 1711 he went to Leipsic, was in 1715 professor, in 1734 doctor of theology, and died June 15, 1741. He wrote, De ακληροκαρδία e Sententia Græcorum (Wittenberg, 1697):—De Gaza, Palæstinæ Oppido ejusque Episcopis ad Act. viii, 26 (Schneeberg, 1715):—Prolegomena ad Historiam Melodorum Ecclesiæ Græcæ (1714):—Ecclesiæ Græcæ Martyrologium Metricum (1727). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 590, 614, 621, 685; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Sieffert, Friedrich Ludwig, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Elbing, Prussia, Feb. 1, 1803. In 1826 he commenced his academical career at Present Appearance of Shunem. (From Thomson's Central Palestine and Phœnicia.)

Königsberg, was in 1828 professor, and died Nov. 2, 1877, doctor and professor of theology. He published, De Singulorum Librorum Sacrorum Auctoritate Canonica Recte Estimanda (Königsberg, 1833):—Ueber den Ursprung des ersten kanonischen Evangeliums (1832):—Theodorus Mopsuest. Veteris Testamenti Sobrie Interpretandi Vindex (1827):—Andeutungen über die apologetische Fundamentierung der christlichen Glaubenswissenschaft (Güterslohe, 1871). (B. P.)

Siegel, KARL CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Marienburg in 1781, and died at Leipzig in 1845, doctor of theology. He published, Neue Materialien zu Kanzelorträgen (Leipzig, 1827-28, 2 vols.):—Homiletischer Rathgeber (1832-33, 2 vols.):—De Artibus Quibus Signum Crucis in Sacris Christianorum miterum Præbuit (1839):—Handbuch der christlich-kirchlichen Alterthümer (1835-39, 4 vols.):—Die epistolischen Texte in kirchlich-archäologischer exegetischer Hinsicht (1842-43, 3 vols.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 609; ii, 124, 148. (B. P.)

Sigwart, HEINRICH CHRISTOPH WILHELM VON, professor of philosophy, who died in 1844 at Tübingen, is the author of, Zusammenhang des Spinozismus mit der cartesianischen Philosophie (Tübingen, 1816):—Der Spinozismus, historisch und philosophisch erläutert (1839):—Vergleichung der Rechts- und Staatstheorien des Bened. Spinoza und des Th. Hobbes (1842):—Das Problem von der Freiheit und der Unfreiheit des menschlichen Willens (1839):—Das Problem des Bösen oder die Theodice (1840). See Fürst, *Bibl. Sihler, WILHELM, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in 1801. Having completed his theological studies, he was for a time tutor at the Blochmann Institute at Dresden. In 1843 he came to America, labored for a time in the state of Ohio, and accepted a call as professor at the Lutheran seminary in Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1845, where he died, Oct. 27, 1885. He published, Lebenslauf als lutherischer Pastor (1880, 2 vols.):—Predigten (1862, 1874, 1883). (B. P.)

Siloam, POOL OF. A remarkable Hebrew inscription on an interior passage lately discovered behind the present Fountain of the Virgin, by which the water was reached by the inhabitants of the city, commemorates the cutting of the tunnel leading between these two reservoirs (see Dr. Guthe, in the Zeitschr. d. deutsch. morgenländ. Gesch. xxxvi, 3 m.). The following translation is by professor Sayce (in the Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund.," Oct. 1883, p. 210):

"1. (Behold) the excavation! Now this had been the history of the excavation. While the workmen were still lifting up

"2. the axe, each towards his neighbor, and while three cubits still remained to (cut through), (each heard) the voice of the other who called

"3. to his neighbor, since there was an excess of the rock on the right hand and on (the left). And on the day of the

"4. excavation the workmen struck, each to meet his neighbor, axe against axe, and there flowed

"5. the waters from the spring to the pool for a thousand two hundred cubits; and . . .

"6. of a cubit was the height of the rock over the heads of the workmen."

Simon, the name of several Scotch prelates:

1. Bishop of Dunblane in the 12th century. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 171.

2. Bishop of Ross in the 12th century. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 184.

3. Consecrated bishop of the Isles in 1226, and witnessed to a charter dated Jan. 9, in the seventeenth year of king Alexander II. He held a synod in 1239, where he made thirteen canons, which are to be found in the Monasticon Anglicanum. He died at his palace of Kirkmichael, in the isle of Man. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 299.

4. Dean of the see of Moray in 1232 and also in 1242, and advanced to the bishopric of Moray in the latter year. He was bishop nine years, and died in 1258. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 139.

5. Bishop of Galloway in 1321. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 1321.

Simpson, Calovius Abraham, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in 1789. He was educated at the Glasgow University, and left that institution with the highest testimonial of Christian character and scholarly attainment. He essayed to make proof of his ministry first at Fulbourne, and in 1820 removed to Haverhill, where he was ordained, and for eleven years greatly blessed in his work. In 1836 Dr. Simpson settled at Oundle, thence in 1842 he removed to Cardiff, and in 1844 entered upon his final pastorate at Long Sutton, Lincolnshire. He died March 17, 1866. "His literary reading was very wide; he had singular conversational powers and great urbanity of manner; his love of theological and metaphysical questions amounted to a passion, and on them he spoke with decision and authority." See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 318.

Simpson, Matthew, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Caliz, Harrison Co., O., June 10, 1810. He graduated from Madison College (afterwards merged into Allegheny University) in 1832. In 1833 he took the degree of doctor of medicine, but before the year was ended had decided to enter the Pittsburgh Conference. The second year thereafter he became pastor of the Liberty Street Church, Pittsburgh, where he soon gave evidence of the eloquence which eventually placed him among the greatest pulpit orators of the age. In 1837 he was called as professor of natural sciences to Allegheny University, and two years afterwards was appointed president of Indiana Asbury University, at Greencastle, Ind. Under his management the college grew in strength and usefulness. In 1848 Dr. Simpson was elected to the editorship of The Western Christian Advocate, of Cincinnati. In 1852 he was elected a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He adorned the episcopal office with gentleness, humility, and devotion. He was indefatigable in the discharge of his duties, and though careful in the maintenance, doctrine, and discipline of his Church, he did so without exciting enmity from those of his own or other sects. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., June 18, 1884. Bishop Simpson will be best remembered by his patriotic labors in aid of the government during the civil war, which gave him a national reputation. He was the trusted friend and adviser of president Lincoln, and it was at his request that bishop Simpson made a series of powerful addresses on the Union in many of the cities of the North. He was the staunch supporter of the colored race, and was urged by the secretary of war to undertake the organization of the freedmen at the establishment of the bureau, and was afterwards invited by president Grant to go as commissioner to San Domingo, both of which offers he declined. Besides the public addresses which the bishop delivered he was employed by the government on many missions of a confidential nature, which aided largely in strengthening the Union cause. In view of these services rendered during the war and under the direction of president Lincoln, it was fitting that he should have been chosen to deliver the nation's eulogy upon her martyred president. In 1870, on the death of bishop Kingsley, bishop Simpson visited Europe to complete the work which had been assigned to him on the Continent, and also as a delegate to the English Conference. In 1874 he visited Mexico, and in 1875 again went to Europe to attend the conferences held in Germany and Switzerland, and also to meet the missionaries on the Continent. In 1881 he attended the Ecumenical Council of the Methodist Church, which was held in London, and while there was the recipient of many kind attentions from the members of his denomination in England. He is the author of A Hundred Years of Methodism, a volume of Yale Lectures on Preaching, and was the editor of the Cyclopædia of Methodism, which contains information on almost every subject of interest to the denomination. Some of his Sermons have been edited by Dr. G. R. Crooks (N. Y. 1885); also his Life (ibid. 1890).

SIN, MAN OF (ὁ ἀνδραποῶς τῆς ἀμαρτίας, 2 Thess. ii, 8). In the admirable essay on this subject appended to Eadie's Commentary on Thessalonians (Lond. 1877), the untenableness of the earlier interpretations is clearly shown, and even that the popular application of the phrase by Protestants to the Roman papacy is not conclusive. The only unsatisfactory part of the discussion is the summary dismissal of Elliott's argument for an impersonal antichrist by simply denying the meaning (successor) assigned to the participles ὁ κατέχων and τὸ κατέχον, "that withholdeth" or "letteth" (p. 349). The proof that a person is meant does not depend upon that signification of these participles, but upon the fact that the personal masculine is thus exchanged for the impersonal neuter, and especially that the principal power is likewise designated by the abstract μυστήριον, "mystery" (ver. 7). In like manner the Johannine term "the antichrist" (ὁ ἀντίχριστος, 1 John ii, 22) is not a proper name, nor even the designation of an individual, for it is used in the plural in the same connection (ἀντίχριστοι, ver. 18; comp. 2 John 7), and also as a neuter or abstract (τὸ τοῦ ἀντίχριστου). To understand this impersonation of the evil principle (comp. ὁ διάβολος as an embodiment of Satanic influence), we must advert to the conventional use in the New-Test. figures, especially in eschatological passages, of the concrete terms and names of the Old Test., such as especially appears in the adoption of "Gog and Magog" from the prophecies of Ezekiel (xxxviii), where they probably designate a particular people, hostile to Judaism, to express a collective or abstract power of persecution in the future of Christendom (Rev. xx, 8). In like manner the "little horn" of Daniel, which invariably represents Antiochus Epiphanes, has been confounded with the persecuting beast of the Apocalypæ. The names of the Old Test. have been typically transferred to the symbology of the New Test., like Zion, Jerusalem, Babylon, etc., but have never lost their literal, local, and personal meaning. In fact, this very type of Antiochus was evidently in the apostle's mind while employing the masculine in the passage under discussion, and the whole aspect of the persecuting power is evidently borrowed from the description of that blasphemer in the book of Daniel. This explains what has been a puzzle to commentators, the impious arrogance of the future antichrist (2 Thess. ii, 4), which is exactly parallel with the prophet's language (Dan. vii, 8, 20, 25; viii, 10-12; xi, 36). We conclude, therefore, that in the eschatology of the New-Test. writers these expressions are to be interpreted figuratively, and not literally, as in the Old Test.; and that they probably refer to some great onset of infidelity near the close of the present dispensation. See MYSTERY OF INIQUITY.

Sinclair, a Scotch prelate, was dean of Restabrig and Edinburgh, and put into the see of Brechin in the 16th century. He died in 1566. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 165.

Sinclair, Henry, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Glasgow in 1539, and in 1541 abbot of the abbey of Kilwinning, which last benefice he exchanged for the deanery of Glasgow in 1550, where he had ministered two years before. He was bishop of Ross in 1561. He died in France, Jan. 2, 1564. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 193.

Sinclair, William, a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Dunkeld in 1312. He probably died in 1337. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 82.

Siric, archbishop of Canterbury, was educated at Glastonbury, and, having been a monk there, was removed to St. Augustine's, at Canterbury, where he became abbot. Siric was consecrated archbishop in 990, and went to Rome for his pallium. He was fond of pomp and display. He died in 994. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 432.

Skillman, ISAAC, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in New Jersey in 1740, and graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1766. He was sent into the ministry by the First Baptist Church of New York; in 1773 became pastor of the Second Baptist Church at Boston, and in 1787 returned to New Jersey. On Sept. 18, 1790, he was called to the pastoral charge of the Baptist Church at Salem, entered upon his duties the November following, and continued there until his death, June 8, 1799. Dr. Skillman was a man of learning and abilities, but never very popular as a preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 458.

Skinner, John (1), a Scotch Episcopal clergyman, was born at Balfour, Aberdeenshire, in 1721, studied at Marischal College, taught at Kenmay and Moneymusk, and in 1742 became minister at Longside. He died in 1806. In his early years he obtained considerable reputation as a Scotch poet, his poems forming vol. iii of his posthumous works (Edinburgh, 1809). His son edited his theological works, which were published with a memoir (Aberdeen, ed. 2 vols. 8vo). These works contain Letters to a Candidate for Orders, Dissertation on the Shechinah, Literal and True Radical Exposition of the Song of Songs, and Psalms viii, xxiii, and xlv, done into Latin verse.

Skinner, John (2), primus of the Scotch Episcopal Church, son of the foregoing, was born May 17, 1744. He was educated at Echt, by his grandfather, and at Marischal College, University of Aberdeen. In 1761 he became private tutor, and in 1763 was ordained by bishop Gerard. He was settled at Ellon, and in 1775 was preacher in a chapel at Aberdeen. In 1782 he was consecrated coadjutor to bishop Kilgour, of that see, and in 1784, on the elevation of Kilgour to the primacy of Scotland, Dr. Skinner was invested with the full honors of the episcopate. In 1788 he succeeded as primus of the Episcopal College. He died at Aberdeen, July 13, 1816. Under the fostering hand of this benevolent and untiring bishop, the Scotch Episcopal Church, from obscurity and depression, arose to respectability and distinction. It was bishop John Skinner who, with two other Scottish bishops, in an upper chamber of a mean dwelling-house in a lane in Aberdeen, consecrated the first bishop of the United States, in 1784. He wrote, A Course of Lectures for the Young (Aberdeen, 1786):—An Ecclesiastical History of Scotland (Lond. 1788, 2 vols. 8vo); a vindication of the Episcopal party:—A Layman's Account of his Faith and Practice (Edinburgh, 1801, 12mo):—Primitive Truth and Order Vindicated (Aberdeen, 1803, 8vo).

Bishop Skinner's elder son, JOHN, ordained in 1790, was a minister at Forfar, and the author of Annals of Scottish Episcopacy from 1788 to 1816, with a Brief Memoir of Bishop Skinner (Edinburgh, 1818, 8vo). See the (N. Y.) Christian Journal, February and March, 1820, vol. iv; Darling, Cyclop. Bibl. a. v.

Skinner, Robert, D.D., an English prelate of the 17th century, was born at Pisford, Northamptonshire, where his father was a clergyman. He became a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford; was rector at Launton, Oxfordshire; bishop of Bristol in 1636, translated to Oxford in 1640 and to Worcester in 1663, and died June 14, 1670. He is said to have been an eminent preacher. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 507.

Skinner, William, D.D., a bishop in the Church of Scotland, was born at Aberdeen in 1778, and died there, April 15, 1857. He was educated at Wadham College, Oxford; was ordained priest in 1802, when he became curate to his father at St. Andrew's Church, Aberdeen; in 1816 he was consecrated bishop of Aberdeen, and in 1841 elected primus of the Church in Scotland. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 314.

Slater, RICHARD, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1728. He graduated from Harvard College in 1739, studied medicine and became a skilful practitioner; then studied theology, and for some time supplied one of the pulpits in Boston. He was ordained pastor at Mansfield, Conn., June 27, 1744, and died there, April 14, 1789. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 421.

Slaughter, W. B., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New York city in 1828. He was converted early in life; graduated from Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y., and entered the Genesee Conference, in which he served Palmyra, Carlton, and Old Niagara Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Buffalo; then accepted a call to the principalship of the Academy at Coudersport, Pa., and later to that of the Genesee Model School, Lima, N. Y. Removing westward, he became pastor of Wabash Avenue Church, Chicago, Ill. He served in one of the Illinois regiments as an officer during the early part of the civil war. His next field of labor was in the Rocky Mountain Conference, he being appointed one of its two presiding elders. The rigor of the climate being too severe for his constitution, he was transferred to the Nebraska Conference, and stationed as pastor at Omaha, then at Lincoln, and three years later was made presiding elder of Omaha District. He died at Omaha, July 26, 1879. He published in 1876 a work of great ability, entitled Modern Genesis. He was a patient and thorough student, an affectionate father and friend, and a devoted and successful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 101.

Slavé Version of the Scriptures. The Slavé is spoken by the Indians of Mackenzie River, Canada. A translation of the gospels into Slavé was made by bishop Bompas, and printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1883 in the syllabic character, the proofs having been read by the Rev. W. D. Reeve, archdeacon of Chippewyan Fort. The syllabic character was adopted because, as Mr. Reeve says, "the Roman character is useful for those who have learned English, for 'whites' and others desirous of teaching the Indians, but for the Indians themselves the syllabic edition is the more useful." (B. P.)

Slovakien Version. See SLAVONIC VERSIONS.

Smallwood, WILLIAM A., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Washington, D. C., in 1805. He graduated from Columbian College, Washington; studied law at Litchfield, Conn., and theology at Alexandria, Va.; was ordained in 1829, and took charge of St. Matthew's Church, Bladensburg, and of Zion's Church, Prince George County, Md.; in 1836 became rector of St. James's parish, in Zanesville, O., where he remained seventeen years; in 1853 was pastor of Trinity Church, Chicago, Ill.; took charge, in 1857, of Zion and St. Paul's parishes, in Frederick County, Md.; in 1861 became rector of a church in Cincinnati, O., and in 1865 of Holy Trinity parish, St. Anthony's Falls, Minn., where he died, Jan. 2, 1867. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1867, p. 153.

Smedes, ALBERT, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city, April 29, 1810. He graduated from Transylvania University in 1826, and from the General Theological Seminary in 1832; from 1836 to 1839 was rector of St. George's Church, in Schenectady, N. Y.; in 1842 opened St. Mary's School, in Raleigh, N. C., of which he was rector until his death, April 25, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 170.

Smith, Benjamin Bosworth, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born at Bristol, R. I., June 13, 1794. He graduated from Providence College (now Brown University) in 1816, was ordained deacon April 27, 1817, and presbyter June 24, 1818. After having a charge at Marblehead for two years, he became rector of St. George's Church, Accomac, Va.; two years later of Zion's Church, Charlestown, with charge of Trinity Church in Shepherdstown: in 1823 of St. Stephen's Church, Middlebury, Vt. While there he edited The Episcopal Register. In 1828 he became rector of Grace Church mission, in Philadelphia, and editor of The Episcopal Recorder. In 1832 he was minister of Christ Church, Lexington, Ky. On Oct. 30 of the same year he was consecrated first bishop of the diocese of Kentucky, from which position he retired in 1880, and spent his remaining days in New York city, where he died, June 1, 1884.

Smith, David, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bozrah, Conn., Dec. 13, 1767. He graduated from Yale College in 1795; commenced preaching in Durham, Feb. 15, 1799, and was ordained Aug. 15 following; was dismissed Jan. 11, 1832, and died at Fair Haven, March 5, 1862. When ninety years old he was able to act as chaplain to the Cincinnati Society, in Boston, and preached at Washington, in Congress Hall. See Channery Memorial, p. 170. (J. C. S.)

Smith, Edward Dunlap, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greenwich, N. J., Sept. 17, 1802. He graduated from Princeton College in 1822, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1826; was licensed the same year; employed as a home missionary in Georgia in 1828 and 1829, and served as chaplain of the University of Virginia in 1830. In 1831 he was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., which church he served until 1835. During his pastorate in Washington he was chaplain of the House of Representatives. He next became pastor of the Eighth Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, where he remained until 1842, when he accepted the pastorate of the Chelsea Church, in the same city, and toiled there faithfully until his death, March 28, 1883. Dr. Smith was a fine scholar and an able preacher, but his excessive modesty, amounting to timidity, always kept him in the background. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 75. (W. P. S.)

Smith, George (1), D.D., an English Wesleyan author, was born about 1800, of humble parentage. He was educated in a Lancastrian school, and although engaged in secular business, acquired a large fund of information, which he used in the preparation of several historico-religious works, especially a series entitled Sacred Annals, which were reprinted in New York. He died at Camborne, Cornwall, Aug. 30, 1868.

Smith, George (2), D.D., an English Congregational divine, was born at Poplar, near London, July 31, 1803. After a course of theological instruction, he was sent out to preach under the direction of the "Tent Mission," and in 1827 was ordained pastor of Hanover Chapel, Liverpool. In 1834 he was settled over the New Tabernacle, Plymouth, and in 1842 removed to London as pastor of Trinity Chapel, where for twenty-eight years he preached with great acceptance. He died Feb. 19, 1870. Many large schools, both Sunday and day, were built, and still remain a monument of his labors. Dr. Smith was elected secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society. He was also a director of the London Missionary Society, and secretary of the Irish Evangelical Society and Congregational Union. His published works are, The Pentateuch:—Prayers for Domestic Use:—The Origin of Language:—The Spiritual Life. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 346.

Smith, George (3), D.D., a bishop of the Church of England, was born in 1815, and graduated from Magdalen Hall, Oxford. When China was opened to the residence of Christian missionaries, Mr. Smith offered himself for service there, and was accepted. After spending several years in the work of a missionary, a bishopric was founded in China, to which he was elected. For sixteen years bishop Smith discharged the duties of the episcopate in the British colony of Hong-Kong, among the British chaplains, and in the missionary fields occupied by the Church Missionary Society in that vast country. As a preacher he exercised a wide influence for good, as a bishop he ruled wisely, and as principal of St. Paul's College, Hong-Kong, he directed the education of many intelligent Chinese youths, who afterwards became influential members of the native community, not a few of them professing Christianity. The bishop twice returned to England to recruit his health, passing on one occasion through India, and on another by Japan and San Francisco through North America. Of his visit to Japan he published a very interesting journal. He died Dec. 14, 1871. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, Feb. 1872.

Smith, George (4), an eminent English Assyriologist, was born about 1840. Originally a bank-note engraver, he began, in 1857, the study of the cuneiform inscriptions, and after publishing several interesting discourses in a German periodical, was called in 1867 to a position in the British Museum, where he rendered important aid to Rawlinson in the preparation of volume three of his Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia. He made two visits to the ruins in Assyria, one in 1872, and another in 1876, and during the latter died at Aleppo, Aug. 19 of that year. Among his other contributions to antiquarian science are Chaldean Account of Genesis (1876), and many papers in the Journal of the Society of Biblical Archaeology.

Smith, George Charles, an English Baptist, known for more than half a century all over England as "Boatswain Smith," was born in London in 1782, brought up religiously by a pious mother, and went to sea while a boy. He was forcibly impressed into the king's service in the last century, and transferred into various ships of war, visiting most of the seaports of Europe. He fought in the battle of Camperdown, the battle of Copenhagen, and was engaged in the mutiny at the Nore. The dreadful scenes of immorality he witnessed on board ship and in seaports impelled him after his conversion to devote his life as a missionary to sailors and soldiers; and with a constancy, a persistency, and a self-denial quite heroic, he spent nearly sixty years of his life in that toilsome work, night and day often, and every day. In 1804 he began his labors at Plymouth, in 1807 was ordained to the ministry at Devonport, and in 1809 established the first Sailor's Gospel Mission at Mountbay. The work was blessed by God with the conversion of sailors, and he began to itinerate to all the British seaports, preaching everywhere, and supporting himself by holding his hat for gifts after he had preached. In 1810 Rev. Dr. John Rippon aided Mr. Smith to establish a Sailor's Mission for London, at his chapel, Carter Lane, by the river Thames. He wrote and published a dialogue in the sailor's dialect, and also the immensely popular story of The Cabin-boy, Bob. In 1814 he joined the duke of Wellington's army in the Spanish Peninsula as soldiers' missionary. In 1817 he resumed his labors among the sailors, and established the first Floating Chapel and the Bethel Union Society. He also commenced, and edited to the month of his death, The Soldier's and Sailor's Magazine, containing for over forty years some of the most remarkable experiences ever put into print, but it was so genuine and honest, though rough and illiterate, that it led the way for the lords of the admiralty to make many changes and improvements in the navy and in the conduct of ships. He established sailor's homes and seamen's friend societies; he benevolently took charge of numerous orphan children of sailors and soldiers; they travelled with him, he preached for them, mostly in the open air, daily—and the boys with their caps collected what was the means of their support for many years. He died at Penzance, Cornwall, Jan. 10, 1862.

Smith, Gervase, D.D., an English Wesleyan

minister, was born at Langley, Derbyshire, June 27, 1821. In his youth he received a liberal education, and early began, as a local preacher, to invite sinners to repentance. He was accepted as a candidate for the ministry in 1842, and spent three years in study at Didsbury, receiving his first appointment in 1845. His preaching was eminently evangelical, and very attractive from the beginning of his career. He also had a special adaptability to the presentation of the various benevolent enterprises of the Church. In 1878 he was elected secretary of the conference, and two years later its president. In 1874 he was appointed British representative to the first General Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada; and in 1877 to the Australasian Conference, with instructions to visit the districts in Polynesia formerly under the care of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. For nearly twelve years he was secretary of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund; and in 1880 became treasurer of the Auxiliary Fund. He died April 22, 1882. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 26.

Smith, Henry Augustus, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Palatine, Montgomery Co., N. Y., May 28, 1828. He graduated from Williams College in 1853 and from Union Theological Seminary in 1856; was ordained pastor of the South Street Church, Philadelphia, in 1858; resigned this charge in 1864 to become pastor of the Northminster Church, West Philadelphia, where he continued eighteen years, until ill-health compelled him to relinquish his work. He died there, March 7, 1888. Dr. Smith was an able, scholarly, eloquent divine, and his labors were attended with success. (W. P. S.)

Smith, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland. He became a deist from reading the works of Volney and Paine, came to America, settled in Tennessee, and edited a paper in Nashville. Soon, however, he was converted, and began to preach. In the winter of 1839, while upon a visit to Columbus, Miss., the home of Olmstead, author of the work, The Bible its Own Refutation, he was challenged to a public debate on the evidences of Christianity, and achieved a great victory. He afterwards compiled his argument, and published it in a book entitled Christian Evidences. Dr. Smith was connected with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Kentucky, but was thoroughly Calvinistic in his theology. The Springfield Church, in Illinois, of which he became pastor, April 11, 1849, prospered under his ministry. He was dismissed Dec. 17, 1856; acted for two or three years as agent for Peoria University, and, on Mr. Lincoln's accession to the presidency, was appointed consul to Glasgow. There he spent the closing years of his life, and died at Dundee, but the date does not appear. See Hist. of the Presbyterian Church in Illinois, p. 398.

Smith, J. Brinton, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector at Kingessing, Pa., several years preceding 1856. In 1859 he became rector at Troy, N. Y., whence he removed to Jersey City, N. J., as rector of St. Matthew's Church; in 1866 removed to New York city; in 1867 was elected principal of St. Augustine Normal School and Collegiate Institute, at Raleigh, N. C., and held this position until his sudden death, Oct. 1, 1872. See Prot. Epis. Almanac, 1873, p. 134.

Smith, John, an English Wesleyan minister, styled "the revivalist," was born at Cudworth, near Barnsley, Yorkshire, Jan. 12, 1794. Although trained religiously, he became profane, a gambler, and a pugilist. He was converted in 1812, and entered an academy at Leeds, where he enjoyed the instruction of David Stoner. He was received into the ministry in 1816, and labored on the York, Barnard Castle, Brighton, Windsor, Frome, Nottingham, Preston, Lincoln, and Sheffield Circuits. Like William Carvosso and Bramwell, he was a man of intense zeal and mighty faith. On his circuits the whole vicinity was stirred, the worst men were smitten, and hundreds were added to the Church. His chapels were crowded, and his prayer-meetings were like the day of Pentecost. But his work wore him out, and in Sheffield, his last circuit, he died in his prime, Nov. 3, 1831. See Treffrey, Memoirs of Rev. John Smith (Lond. 1832, 12mo; 2d ed. with introduction by Dr. Dixon); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 285 sq., 468; Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, iii, 33, 153, 154; Minutes of the British Conference, 1832; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 33 sq.

Smith, John Cotton, D.D., an eminent Protestant Episcopal clergyman, son of Dr. Thomas M., of Kenyon College, grandson of Dr. Leonard Wood, and a descendant of Cotton Mather, was born at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826. He studied at Phillips Academy, graduated from Bowdoin College in 1847, and from the Theological Seminary at Gambier, O.; was ordained deacon in 1849, presbyter in 1850, and the latter year became rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, Me.; in 1856 was assistant minister at Trinity Church, Boston, Mass., and in 1860 rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York city, where he died, Jan. 9, 1882. Dr. Smith was a man of great literary acquirements, and of broad and liberal ideas in religion, without, however, overstepping the pale of the orthodoxy of the creed to which he belonged. He was remarkable not only for his pulpit eloquence, but as an after-dinner speaker. He was a prominent member of the University Club, and of other social and religious associations of the day. The Ascension Church Mission was one of his noblest charitable conceptions, to elevate the tenement-house population, and has been very successful. He was the author of a number of works upon theological and social subjects, among which are, The Charity of Truth:—The Liturgy as a Basis of Union:—The Church's Law of Development:—The Oxford Essays and Reviews:—The Homeric Age:—The Principle of Patriotism:—The United States a Nation:—Evolution and a Personal Creator. He was also the editor of Church and State, an Episcopal journal of high standing. His published works have all been collected in two volumes.

Smith, Thomas Mather, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Stamford, Conn., in 1797. He was a son of Rev. Daniel Smith, who, for fifty years, was pastor of the Congregational Church at Stamford, and a descendant of the Cottons and Mathers of Puritan fame. Thomas graduated from Yale College in 1816, spent the following year in study with his uncle, John Cotton Smith, governor of Connecticut, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820. In 1822 he was ordained minister of the Congregational Church at Portland, Me., but, his health failing, he removed to Fall River, Mass.; was next pastor at Catskill, N. Y., and subsequently at New Bedford, Mass. During this period his views of the ministry underwent a change, and he was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Soon after he was appointed to the Milnor professorship of systematic divinity in the Theological Seminary at Gambier, O. He combined with the duties of his professorship the presidency of Kenyon College during four years. In 1863 he resigned his professorship at Gambier, receiving the appointment of emeritus professor. He died at Portland, Me., Sept. 6, 1864. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1864, p. 484.

Smyth, Arthur, D.D., an Irish prelate, was dean of Derry, and in March, 1752, was promoted to the united bishoprics of Clonfert and Kilmaeduaugh. In 1753 he was translated to the sees of Down and Connor, and in October, 1765, to that of Meath. On April 4, 1766, he was promoted to the archbishopric of Dublin. He died at St. Sepulchre, Dec. 14, 1771. Bishop Smyth amassed property to the amount of £50,000, of which he bequeathed £1000 to augment the funds of Swift's Hospital, £200 to the poor of St. Sepulchre's, and £50 to those of the parish of Tullagh. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 343.

Solitarus, PHILIP, a Greek monk, who lived in the latter part of the 11th century, in Constantinople, is the author of a mystico-ascetical work, written in the form of a dialogue, and entitled Διορρυπα, The Mirror. It is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. The work found favor, was commented by Michael Psellus, and translated into Latin prose by the Jesuit Jacob Pontanus (Ingolstadt, 1604). The Latin translation was republished in the Biblioth. Patr. Colon. tom. xii, and in the Biblioth. Patrum Muz. Lugdun. tom. xxi. The Latin translation, however, is, according to Lambecius, very deficient. Of the Greek text only a few fragments have been printed by Oudin, Lambecius, and Cotelierius. See Cave, De Scriptor. Eccles. p. 638; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. (B. P.)

Sommers, CHARLES G., D.D., a Baptist clergyman and author, was born in London in 1798. His parents removed to America in 1802, and in his early manhood he was employed as the confidential clerk and traveling agent of John Jacob Astor. Having prepared himself for the sacred office, he commenced his labors as preacher at the old almshouse in City Hall Park, New York city. His first regular settlement was with the First Baptist Church of Troy, where he remained several years, and in 1823 received an invitation to become the pastor of the South Baptist Church, New York city. In 1856 he retired to private life. He died in New York, Dec. 19, 1868. Dr. Sommers, at different periods of his life, was called to fill prominent positions in several religious organizations. (J. C. S.)

Sonntag, KARL GOTTLÖB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 21, 1758. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1787 rector at the cathedral-school at Riga, in 1791 first pastor there, and in 1799 assessor of the Livese consistory. In 1803 he was general superintendent and president of the superior consistory, and died July 17, 1827. He published, Diss. de Jesu Siracide, Ecclesiastico non Libro, sed Libri Faragine (Riga, 1792), besides a number of ascetical, liturgical, and homiletical works. See Döring, Die gelehrten Künzlebrer, p. 457-462; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 835; ii, 92, 164, 167, 173, 177, 296, 328, 370. (B. P.)

Sorek. The village by this name mentioned in the Onomasticon is probably represented by the present ruined site Kāurbet Surék, lying one and a half miles north of Wady Surar, and the same distance west of Surah (Zorah). It contains "traces of a ruined village, springs, with a rock-cut wine-press and cave to the west, and a sacred tree" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 126).

Sorin, MATTHEW, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 7, 1801, of Roman Catholic parents. His father died when Matthew was about nine years of age, and the latter was apprenticed to a paper-maker, whose family, though Protestants, were bitter enemies of the Methodists. He procured a New Test., read it secretly, and began its memorization. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1817: received license to preach in his early manhood; and in 1823 entered the Philadelphia Conference. He labored on Dauphin Circuit in that year; in Somerset, Md., in 1824; on the shores of the Chesapeake in 1825 and 1826; travelled Snow Hill Circuit in 1827; Salisbury Circuit and Accomac, Va., in 1829 and 1830; became discouraged, and located in 1831 at Drummond-town; started with his wife for the far West in 1832, but was overtaken and induced to return as senior preacher on Snow Hill Circuit, where, early in 1833, he was blessed with a great revival. That year he re-entered the effective ranks of the Philadelphia Conference, and was made presiding elder of the Chesapeake District. In 1836 he was stationed at Asbury, Wilmington, Del., then at Union Church, Philadelphia, Pa.; in 1839 at Ebenezer Church, same city; a failure of his nervous system rendering his supernumeration necessary, he tried book-publishing at Philadelphia between 1842 and 1848; then moved West, within the bounds of the Rock River Conference, and practiced medicine; removed to St. Paul, Minn., in 1852, and to Red Wing in 1853, where he took charge of the mission. His health being somewhat restored, he was transferred to the Missouri and Arkansas Conference in 1865, and appointed presiding elder of St. Louis District; in 1869 of Kansas City District; in 1873 and 1874 was stationed at Austin, Mo.; in 1875 at Rolla; in 1876, at the request of the Philadelphia Conference, he was retransferred to its active ranks, and stationed at Marcus Hook, Pa.; in 1877 was appointed to Bustleton; and in 1878 to Oxford, Chester Co., where he closed his active labors, took a superannuated relation, and spent the remainder of his days travelling in the far West. He died suddenly, in Pueblo, Col., Aug. 11, 1879. By his own energies and perseverance, Dr. Sorin became an able scholar in history, general literature, and theology. He was an intellectual and physical giant, one of the most powerful preachers of his day. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 27; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Souché, PIERRE, a Protestant theologian of France, was born in 1804. After having finished his studies at Montauban and Strasburg in 1827, he assisted the Rev. Gibaud, at Rouillé, Vienne. In 1829 Souché was elected pastor of the Church at Rouillé, and retired from the ministry in 1871. In acknowledgment of the great services which he rendered to the Church, he was made honorary president of the consistory, and died Jan. 25, 1878, highly respected and honored by both Protestants and Roman Catholics. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Spackman, HENRY S., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was assistant minister of the Church at Francisville, Pa., in 1853, served in the same relation to St. Clement's Church, Philadelphia, in the following year, and afterwards as its rector until 1864, when he was appointed chaplain in the United States Hospital, Chestnut Hill, same city. In 1866 he became rector of Trinity Church, Williamsport, and continued in this pastorate until 1868, when he was elected chaplain of the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia. This situation he retained until his death, Feb. 9, 1875, aged sixty-four years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Spalding, MARTIN JOHN, D.D., an eminent Roman Catholic prelate and author, was born near Lebanon, Ky., May 23, 1810, being descended from the Catholic settlers of Maryland. He graduated from St. Mary's Seminary, Marion County, in 1826, and in theology from St. Joseph's Seminary, Bardstown, after four years' study. In 1830 he went to Rome, and after four years in the Urban College of the Propaganda, publicly defended, for seven hours, in Latin, two hundred and fifty-six propositions in theology, was rewarded with the doctor's diploma, and ordained priest by cardinal Pediana. He was now made pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Bardstown, afterwards president of St. Joseph's College, and again pastor of St. Joseph's. In 1843 he was called to the cathedral of Louisville, where he served five years. He was one of the most zealous missionaries of his time in Kentucky. In 1848 he was consecrated bishop of Lengone in partibus, and coadjutor to bishop Flaget, of Louisville. In 1864, on the death of archbishop Kenrick of Baltimore, Dr. Spalding was installed seventh archbishop of Baltimore. He labored assiduously in his office. New churches were erected, schools founded, and noble charities endowed. He convened the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, over which he presided. He attended the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican at Rome in 1869 and 1870, where he was distinguished by his labors and zeal. With the other American bishops, he favored the dogma of papal infallibility as there defined. His last years were as laborious as his early priesthood. "His amiability, simplicity of character, love of his people, and especially of children, his devotion to the faith and to his duties, have placed his name high among the illustrious prelates" of the American Roman episcopacy. He died in Baltimore, Feb. 7, 1872. Dr. Spalding was a distinguished controversialist and literary reviewer. He was one of the editors of the United States Catholic Magazine. His principal works were, Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions of Kentucky (1844):—Hist. of the Prot. Reformation in Europe (Louisville, 1860, 2 vols.; 4th ed. Baltimore, 1866), being an enlarged ed. of his Revisio of D'Aubigne, Runke, etc. (1844), which was republished in London and Dublin (1846):—Lectures on the Evidences of Catholicity (1847, 4th ed. Baltimore, 1866, 8vo):—Life and Times of Bishop B. J. Flaget (Louisville, 1852, 8vo):—Lectures and Essays: Miscellanea (Lond., Baltimore, and Louisville, 1855; 4th ed. 1866, 8vo, edited, with introduction and notes, by Abbé and Darraz):—Gen. Hist. of the Catholic Church (N. Y. 1865-66, 4 vols. 8vo). His works are published in 5 vols. 8vo, by Murphy, Baltimore. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1873, p. 35; DeCoursey and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the United States, p. 178 sq.; Rev. J. L. Spalding, Life of the Most Rev. M. J. Spalding, D.D. (N. Y. 1873, 8vo).

Spangenberg, JOHANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, father of Cyriacus (q. v.), was born March 30, 1484, at Hardegsen, near Göttingen. He studied at Erfurt, joined the Lutheran reformation, was in 1521 archdeacon, in 1524 first evangelical preacher at Nordhausen, in 1546 at Eisleben, and died June 13, 1550. He published sermons, hymns, and ascetical writings. See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, i, 372 sq.; Beste, Kanzelredner, i, 140; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Sparks, BOWYER EDWARD, S.T.P., an English prelate, was born about 1759. He was a fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, official visitor of Peterhouse, St. John's, and Jesus colleges, and visitor to the master of Trinity College in that university. In 1809 he was consecrated bishop of the diocese of Chester, and in 1812 translated to that of Ely, which he held till his death, April 4, 1836. See The (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, May, 1836, p. 314.

Spectacular View of the ATONEMENT is an expression fitly applied to that doctrine of the person of Christ which represents his crucifixion as a mere semblance of suffering intended to impress beholders with his martyr-like sympathy in behalf of mankind, rather than as a veritable death for human sin. The divine nature is thus so far severed from the dying victim as to eliminate its vicarious virtue. The whole scene becomes a human transaction. Jesus is reduced to the level of a moral and religious reformer, who seals his career and attests his sincerity with his blood. The inadequacy of this as a satisfaction to God's law, and an equivalent for man's punishment, is obvious. It is but the old heresy of Docetism revived in a specious Unitarian form. That the sacrifice upon the cross was designed to have a powerful moral influence upon all who should become acquainted with it is certainly true, and, in our opinion, this affords the inner solution of the profound question why that mode of expiation was adopted; but this is a very different position from the above, for it is postulated upon the bona-fide union of the two natures in the atoning victim. See ATONEMENT.

Spence, James, D.D., an English Congregational divine, was born at Huntley, Scotland, April 6, 1811. He graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, accepted a call to the Congregational Church, Oxford, in 1848 removed to Preston, and in 1852 settled at Poultry Chapel, London. In 1865 he visited Egypt and the Holy Land. In 1868 Dr. Spence was appointed to the editorship of the Evangelical Magazine, and the functions of this office he was able to discharge till his death, Feb. 28, 1876. He published the Pastor's Prayer for the People's Weal:—Scenes in the Life of St. Peter:—Martha Dryland; or, Strength in Quietness:—Sunday Mornings with my Flock on St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians:—The Martyr Spirit:—The Religion of Mankind: Christianity Adapted to Man in all the Aspects of his Being. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 414.

Spence, Thomas, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Galloway in 1451, and was employed in several embassies, particularly in the treaty of marriage between the duke of Savoy and Lewis, count de Maurienne, with Arabella, in 1449. In 1451 he was appointed by king James II one of his ambassadors to negotiate a truce with England, and was made keeper of the privy seal in 1458. In 1459 he was translated to the see of Aberdeen. He died April 15, 1480. He erected a hospital at Edinburgh. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 114, 275.

Spencer, GEORGE TRIVOR, D.D., a missionary of the Church of England, was born in 1800. He graduated at University College, Oxford, in 1822; the same year was nominated incumbent of Buxton, Derbyshire, but resigned this position in 1829, when he was presented to the rectory of Leaden Roding, near Chipping Ongar. In 1837 he was nominated as bishop of Madras, but in 1849 returned to England. In 1860 he became rector of Walton-in-the-Wolds, and the same year chancellor of St. Paul's Cathedral. He died at Edgemoor, Buxton, England, July 18, 1866. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1866, p. 493.

Sperbach, KARL GOTTLIEB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Königsbrück, Upper Lusatia, Feb. 26, 1694. He studied at Leipzig, and commenced his academical career there in 1717. In 1734 he accepted a call to Wittenberg, and died July 6, 1772. He published, Causa Philosophica aduersus Atheismi Columnia Defensa (Leipzig, 1730):—Diss. qua Versio Syriaca 2 Epist. Johannis cum Textu Græco Conferitur (Wittenberg, 1735):—Observationes Philologicae in Nonnullis Pentateuchi Locis (1756):—De Vario Accentuum Hebraeorum Officio (1738):—De Genio Linguae Hebraicae (ed.).:—Academia Jabnensis atque ejus Rectores (1740):—De Judæis אלהים ad Hos. xi, 7 (1747):—De Voce Jehovah (1755). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., a. v. (B. P.)

Spieker, JOHANNES, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 26, 1756, at Wolfshagen, in Lower Hesse. He studied at Marburg, was in 1776 preacher at Rauschenberg, near Marburg, in 1800 preacher at Hersfeld, and in 1818 director of the theological seminary at Herborn. Spieker died April 18, 1825. He published, besides some catechetical and homiletical works, Ueber den Mysticismus, dessen Begriff, Ursprung und Werth (Herborn, 1825). See Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner, p. 472 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 365, 430; ii, 73, 103, 148. (B. P.)

Spotiswood, JOHN, a Scotch prelate, was born in 1565, became minister of Calder, in Mid-Lothian, in 1586, and in 1602 was chosen to accompany the duke of Lennox, as his grace's chaplain, in his embassy to France; consecrated bishop of Glasgow Oct. 21, 1610; in 1615 translated to the see of St. Andrews, and made chancellor of Scotland, Jan. 14, 1635. He was excommunicated by the rebellious Assembly at Glasgow, and died in London, Nov. 28, 1639. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 41, 263.

Sprague, NATHANIEL D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Cheshire County, N. H., Aug. 20, 1790. At the age of seventeen he entered Dartmouth College, where he remained only two years, but continued his studies privately; spent several years as an instructor in Oneida County, N. Y.; was professor in Royalton Academy, Vt., and began the study of law at that place. He had belonged successively to the Presbyterian and Congregational churches; having joined the Protestant Episcopal communion, he was ordained deacon in 1838, and shortly after became a presbyter, and ministered at Royalton, and afterwards, from 1844, at Drewsville, N. H. An unfortunate habit of stuttering was entirely overcome at the age of thirty-six. He died at Claremont, N. H., Oct. 29, 1853. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1854, p. 626.

Sprole, WILLIAM THOMAS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., March 16, 1809. He studied privately, and spent a year and a half (1827-28) at Princeton Theological Seminary, was licensed in 1829, ordained an evangelist the same year, and became pastor of the First General Reformed Church of Philadelphia in 1832; stated supply of the First Presbyterian Church at Carlisle, Pa., in 1837; pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Washington, D. C., in 1843, and for five years acted as chaplain of the House of Representatives. In 1847 he received the appointment of chaplain and professor of ethics in the Military Academy at West Point, but resigned in 1856 to accept a call to the First Presbyterian Church at Newburgh, N. Y., from which he was released in 1872. In 1874 he removed to Detroit, Mich., and became pastor of Woodworth Avenue Church, a charge which he resigned in 1877. He died at Detroit, June 9, 1883. See Neerol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1884, p. 12. (W. P. S.)

Spurden, CHARLES, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in London, England, May 25, 1812. In his twenty-fifth year he entered the Bristol Baptist College. On May 13, 1841, he was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church at Hereford, where he continued until the latter part of 1842, and then, in answer to application from the committee of the Baptist Education Society of New Brunswick, Canada, was sent out to take charge of the Seminary at Fredericton. In 1867 he resigned this position. He was one of the examiners of the University of New Brunswick and of the Provincial Training School until his death, Jan. 13, 1876. Dr. Spurden was a man of literary attainments, prudent, wise, modest, and a devoted Christian. See (Canada) Baptist Year-book, 1876, p. 84; Bill, Hist. of Baptists in Maritime Provinces (index).

Stafford, John (I), archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Hook, near Beaminster, England, and educated at Oxford. On Sept. 9, 1419, he became archdeacon of Salisbury, of which diocese he was chancellor in 1421. In 1422 he became dean of St. Martin's, in London, and Sept. 9, 1423, was installed dean of Wells. As a lawyer Stafford soon attracted the attention of archbishop Chicheley, who appointed him his vicar-general, and advanced him to the deanship of the Court of Arches. In May, 1421, he was keeper of the privy seal, and was subsequently appointed lord high-treasurer of England. He was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells at Blackfriars, London, May 27, 1425. As keeper of the privy seal he accompanied Henry VI to Paris in 1430, to receive the crown of France. On his return he was appointed lord chancellor, an office which he held eighteen years. On May 13, 1443, Stafford was translated to the see of Canterbury. He continued to hold the great seal, and to take an active part in the politics of his party. He was zealous in promoting the marriage of Henry VI with Margaret of Anjou, and officiated at the ceremony, April 22, 1445. John Stafford died at his manor of Maidstone, May 25, 1452. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, v, 130 sq.

Stafford, John (2), D.D., an English Independent minister, was born at Leicester in August, 1728. He was brought up a wool-comber, but devoting himself to the ministry, studied, first under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton, then in London, and finally at Mile End, and joined the church of Dr. Guyse, in New Broad Street. He was sent to preach at Royston and St. Neots, but in 1758 accepted a call as pastor in succession to Dr. Guyse, at New Broad Street, and for nearly forty years continued the pastor of that important church. He lived in a constantly prepared state for death, even in full health, and in that spirit died, Feb. 22, 1800. He published, The Scripture Doctrine of Sin and Grace Considered in Twenty-five Discourses (1772), which reached a second edition, and a Funeral Sermon for his daughter Elizabeth (1774). See Wilson, Disseminating Churches, ii, 243.

Stahl, Friedrich Julius, a famous jurist of Germany, was born at Munich, of Jewish parentage, Jan. 16, 1802. At the age of seventeen he embraced Christianity, and though he was entitled at that time to a professorship at the gymnasium, he betook himself to the study of jurisprudence, and was in 1829 made doctor of law. In 1827 Stahl commenced his academical career at Munich, was called in 1832 to Erlangen, and in 1840 to Berlin. Here he gathered crowded audiences, not only of juridical students, but at times, also, of educated people in general, as, for instance, in 1850, when he lectured on The Present Party Position in Church and State (which lectures were published after his death, Berlin, 1863). He also held the highest positions in the state government of the Church, and took a very active part in Prussian politics. His brilliant parliamentary talent soon made him one of the most prominent leaders of the conservative party, both in political and ecclesiastical affairs. Democracy and free-thinking he understood, and was not afraid of; but he hated liberalism and rationalism. The former is revolution, he said; but the latter is dissolution. Stahl died Aug. 10, 1861. In his Philosophie des Rechts (1830-37; 3d ed. 1854) he tried to show that philosophy is not the last end of God, but that God is the last end of philosophy. He called science to "repentance," and thus caused a great stir both among jurists and philosophers. To understand Stahl's greatness and influence one must study his Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestanten (2d ed. Erlangen, 1862):—Ueber Kirchenzucht (Berlin, 1845):—Der christliche Staat und sein Verhältnis zu Deismus und Judentum (1847):—Was ist Revolution? (1852):—Der Protestantismus als politisches Prinzip (4th ed. 1853):—Die katholischen Widerlegungen (1854):—Ueber christliche Toleranz (1855):—Wider Bunsen (3d ed. 1856):—Die lutherische Kirche und die Union (1860). Stahl was very intimately connected with professor Hengstenberg, and, like the latter, an able advocate of high Lutheran orthodoxy. See Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Groen van Prinsterer, Ter Nagedachtenis van Stahl, and especially Schwarz, Zur Geschichte der neuesten Theologie (4th ed. Leipsic, 1869), p. 240 sq. (B. P.)

Stamp, William Wood, D.D., a Wesleyan Methodist divine, was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, England, May 23, 1801, and educated at Woodhouse Grove School. He was converted in early manhood, during his residence in London as a medical student, entered the ministry in 1823, was governor of Richmond Theological Institution from 1846 to 1848, chairman of important districts, president of the Conference in 1860, became supernumerary in 1873, and died at Waterloo, Liverpool, Jan. 1, 1877. Dr. Stamp had studied the history and polity of Methodism with thoroughness and discrimination, and in its welfare he took persistent interest. During his long tenure of office as chairman he won the confidence, esteem, and admiration of ministers and laymen, by his intelligence, firmness, and urbanity. During the closing years of his life, his experience and judgment made his services in settling questions of discipline in much request. His fidelity as a friend and counsellor was unflinching. He was the author of, Memoir of Rev. John Croase, M.A., Vicar of Bradford, Yorkshire (Lond. 1844, 8vo):—Domestic Worship: a Sermon (ibid. 1846, 8vo):—Historical Notices of Wesleyan Methodism in Bradford and Vicinity (without date, 12mo):—The Orphan House of Wesley, with Notices of Early Methodism in Newcastle-upon-Tyne and its Vicinity (1863, 8vo). For some years, and until the issue for 1878, he was editor of the (Lond.) Wesleyan Methodist Connectional Record and Year-book. Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Anglican divine, son of bishop Edward Stanley, and nephew of the first baron Stanley of Alderley, was born at Alderley, Cheshire, Dec. 13, 1815. At the age of fourteen years he entered the Rugby School, and remained there five years. During this time he was a favorite student and enjoyed the especial friendship of Dr. Arnold—a fact which may, without doubt, be assumed to have had close connection with the broadness and liberality of his thought and doctrines as a churchman. In 1834, having won a scholarship in Balliol College, Oxford, young Stanley there entered upon a career that formed a fitting continuation of his brilliant student-life at Rugby. He won, in 1837, the Newdigate prize for his English poem, The Gypsies, the Ireland scholarship, gained the first class in classics, and became a fellow of University College. Two years later he received the Latin essay prize, and in 1840 the English essay prize and theological prizes. After his graduation, in 1838, he became for twelve years a tutor in University College. On taking orders in the Church of England he naturally affiliated himself with the "Broad Church" party, although the opposite sentiment prevailed at Oxford. In 1851 and 1852 he was secretary to the University Commission, and in 1858 became regius professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford and canon of Christ Church College. In 1872 he was a second time chosen select preacher to the University, and on March 31, 1875, was installed lord rector of the University of St. Andrew's. Early attracting attention as a pulpit orator, he was made, in 1854, chaplain to prince Albert; in 1857 to Dr. Tait, bishop of London, and to the queen and prince of Wales in 1862. From 1851 to 1858 he was canon of Canterbury Cathedral. He declined the archbishopric of Dublin in 1863, and early in the following year was made dean of Westminster, a position which he occupied until his death, July 18, 1881. In 1852 and 1853 he made an extensive tour in the East, visiting Egypt, Arabia, and Palestine, and gathering there material for his work on those countries. In 1862 he again visited the East in company with the prince of Wales. In 1878 he visited America in search of health and rest, and was greeted everywhere not only with the respect his genius commanded, but with warm personal friendship. During his stay he addressed the students of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, and preached at Trinity and Grace churches. He also met a number of prominent Baptist preachers, and was given receptions by the Methodist Episcopal clergy and the Century Club. After his college poems and essays dean Stanley's first literary venture was the biography of his former master, Dr. Arnold, in 1846. In the following year he published a volume of Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age. He edited, in 1851, a volume of his father's addresses and pastoral charges, adding thereto an affectionate memoir. A series of his lectures delivered to the Young Men's Christian Association was published in 1854, and was followed the next year by The Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians, with Notes and Dissertations:—Historical Memorials of Canterbury, and a number of sermons. His well-known work on Sinai and Palestine was issued, with some minor volumes, in 1856:—Lectures on the History of the Eastern Church (1861):—Lectures on the Jewish Church (1862-76):—Sermons Preached before the Prince of Wales during his Tour in the East, with Descriptions of Places Visited (1863):—Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey (1867):—Lectures on the Church of Scotland (1872). During these years he was the author, also, of numerous other volumes of essays, sermons, lectures, and disputations. He was a voluminous contributor to various reviews and periodicals, and furnished a valuable series of Biblical biographies to Dr. William Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. His sermon delivered at the funeral of Sir Charles Lyell in Westminster Abbey, Feb. 27, 1875, and since published, was notable for its hearty recognition of the services of that eminent geologist in having, as he believed, scientifically established the facts in regard to the creation of the earth and the human race. His latest literary work was performed as a member of the association for the revision of the Bible.

Stanley, James, D.D., brother of Thomas, earl of Derby, a native of Lancashire, England, was prebend of London in 1458, of York in 1460, of Durham in 1479, archdeacon of Richmond in 1500, precentor of Salisbury in 1505, and preferred bishop of Ely by Henry VII in 1506. He never resided at his own cathedral, but in the summer with his brother, the earl, and in the winter at his manor at Somersham, Huntingdonshire. He died March 22, 1515. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 195.

Stark, Christian Ludwig Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 28, 1790, at Jena, where he also pursued his theological studies. In 1815 he commenced his academical career there, was in 1817 professor, and was drowned in the Saale, July 1, 1818. He published, De Notione, quam Jesus Verbo ἑρμῆνεια Tribuerit (Jena, 1813):—Paraphrasen in Evangelii Johannis xiii-xvii (1814):—Beiträge zur Vervollkommenung der Hermeneutik, insbesondere der des Neuen Testaments (1818). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 107, 249, 396. (B. P.)

Staudt, Johannes Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died at Kornthal, Nov. 11, 1884, is the author of, Predigtsammlungen (Stuttgart, 1852, 1853, 1860):—Fingerzeige in den Inhalt und Zusammenhang der heiligen Schrift (2d ed. 1859):—Erklärung des württembergischen Konfirmationsbüchleins (1853). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Stedman, W., D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Eardisland in 1764. He was early converted, and baptized in April, 1784. Three years afterwards he preached his first sermon, and was admitted Aug. 20, 1788, into Bristol Academy. He was ordained, Nov. 2, 1789, pastor in Broughton, Hampshire; in 1804 he became the assistant of Rev. Isaiah Birt, in Devonport; in 1806 pastor of a colony from that Church; and in 1806 removed to Horton, near Bradford, where for more than thirty years he was president and theological tutor in the Baptist College, as well as pastor. He died at his residence, Ashfield Place, near Bradford, April 12, 1837. See (Lond.) Baptist Magazine, 1837, p. 229. (J. C. S.)

Stearns, Edward, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Oxford, March 23, 1798. He studied privately at Oxford; in 1819 entered the academy at Bristol; and in 1821 went to Edinburgh to prosecute his studies still further. While at Oxford and Edinburgh his services were much in demand as a preacher. In 1823 he entered upon his first and only pastorate at Camberwell. Failing health and the death of his wife induced his retirement from the pastoral office in 1862. He removed to New House Park, near Rickmansworth, where he died, May 8, 1882. Dr. Stearns was active and efficient in all the denominational enterprises, and instrumental in the organization of the Evangelical Alliance. He was one of the editors of the New Baptist Miscellany, and for some years editor of Evangelical Christendom. He published, besides numerous sermons, a volume entitled The Doctrine of Christ, as Developed by the Apostles, etc. (1872). See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1883, p. 276.

Stearns, Shubael, a noted Baptist minister, was born in Boston, Mass., Jan. 28, 1706. He was converted under the preaching of Whitefield about 1740, and became connected with the Separatists in 1745. In 1751 he embraced the views of the Baptists, was immersed at Tolland, Conn., and on May 20, was ordained for the ministry. He labored in New England for two or three years, and then went South and preached for some time, first in the counties of Berkeley and Hampshire, Va., then in Guilford County, N. C., where he made his permanent settlement. He died Nov. 20, 1771. His character was indisputably good as a man, as a Christian, and as a preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 60.

Steck, Daniel, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born near Hughesville, Lycoming Co., Pa., Nov. 18, 1819. After pursuing a partial course in the college at Gettysburg, he graduated from the theological seminary; in 1846 was licensed; and in 1847 began preaching in English in the German Church at Pottsville, from which grew, in about one year, an English Lutheran Church. In 1858 he was called to St. John's Church, in Lancaster; and in 1862 became pastor of the Main Street Church, Dayton, O., remaining a little more than two years. Subsequently he organized St. John's Church, and became connected with the English Synod of Ohio. The congregation in Pottsville recalled him in 1868, and he served them the second time nearly two years. From 1870 to 1875 he preached in Middletown, Md., and then became pastor of St. James's Church, Gettysburg, Pa. He died there, June 10, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, July 1, 1881.

Stedman, James Owen, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Fayetteville, N. C., Oct. 31, 1811. He graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1832, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1836. He was licensed the same year, and became stated supply of the First Church of Baltimore, Md. After this he labored as a missionary in Waynesboro, N. C., for a time, and was ordained pastor of the church in Tusculum, Ala., in 1837. In 1845 he became stated supply of the church in Wilmington, N. C., but in 1851, his wife's health failing, he removed to Philadelphia, Pa. During 1852 and 1853 he supplied the First Church of Chester. He was next called to the First Presbyterian Church of Memphis, Tenn., in 1854; and in 1868 organized the Alabama Street Church, in the same city, which he served until 1880, when failing health obliged him to retire from active work. He died in Memphis, April 28, 1882. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 33.

Steele, John Lawrence, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was residing, in 1872, in Ottawa, Ill., where he became the rector of Christ Church. In 1874 he removed to Key West, Fla., as rector of St. Paul's Church, and continued there until his death, Oct. 13, 1878, at the age of thirty-six years. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1879, p. 170.

Steele, William, LL.D., a Presbyterian clergyman, was born and educated in Scotland, and began his ministry at Dyserf, in Ayrshire, where he preached for some years. He came to London in 1751, and became pastor at Founder's Hall. His health soon gave way, and he died before he had been a year in the metropolis, yet he was so much esteemed that the Church collected two hundred and fifty pounds for the benefit of his wife and children. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 497.

Steele, Edward, LL.D., an English missionary prelate, was born in London in 1828. He graduated from the university of that city in 1847; was curate of Kingskerswell, Devonshire, from 1856 to 1858; next of Skegness, Lincolnshire; chaplain to bishop Tozer, in Central Africa, from 1862 to 1868; resigned his rectorship at Little Stepping, Lincolnshire, in 1872; was consecrated bishop of Central Africa at Westminster Abbey in 1874, and died at Zanzibar, Aug. 28, 1883. Besides being lawyer, preacher, and metaphysician, he was printer, master carpenter, and physician. He was the author of A Sketch of Persecutions under the Roman Emperors, and prepared an edition of Bishop Butler's Works, A History of the Bible and Prayer-book, and hymns and stories in the Shambella and Swabili languages.

Steffens, Heinrich, a German philosopher, was born at Stavanger, Norway, May 2, 1778. He was professor of natural sciences at Breslau and Berlin, but in 1831 he renounced his pantheistic errors, and published Wie ich wieder Lutheraner wurde, und was mir das Lutherthum ist. In the same year he published Die falsche Theologie und der wahre Glaube, which was directed against the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, as inaugurated by king Frederick William III of Prussia. Steffens's main work is Christliche Religionsphilosophie (Breslau, 1839, 2 vols.). He died in 1845. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v.; Steffens, Was ich erlebte (Breslau, 1840, 10 vols.).

Stelæ, SEPULCHRAL. These monumental slabs were generally placed at the bottom of the principal chamber of the tombs of the old dynasties of Egypt. They are square, and often of colossal proportions, with large hieroglyphics, sometimes in bas-relief, and spaced out. The representations are the façade of a building or tomb. At the time of the sixth dynasty they still have a degree of archaism. From the earliest period till the twelfth dynasty these tablets are dedicated to Anup, or Anubis, not Osiris, whose name is rarely found. Anubis is invoked as the god who presided over the funeral chapel and the embalming of the dead. The formula of dedication is short and elliptical, the usual expression "to give" is omitted, as also that of the gift; the name of Osiris is not found before that of the deceased, or the expression "justified" after the name. In the formula at this time a kind of abridgment of the calendar is often introduced, as a mention of the festivals of the beginning of the year, the new year, Thoth, that of the greater and lesser heat, the monthly and half-monthly. The numerous titles of the offices held by the deceased are given in detail. The tablets continued rude till the time of the eleventh dynasty, when the mention of the festival of the heliacal rising of Sothis, or the dog-star, is added. Under the twelfth dynasty the tablets change in shape and texts; most of them being rounded at the top, and forming the hutu of the texts. The upper part of the tablet has often the winged disk, the llut or Teb-hut. The dates of the years of the monarchs under whom the deceased was buried appear. The scenes represented are the acts of sepulchral homage or ancestral worship made by the children or other relatives of the dead to himself and his wife, the tables before them being loaded with offerings, among which appear the head and haunch of a calf, and other joints of the same animal, ducks or geese, circular or oval loaves or cakes of bread, gourds, onions, and papyrus or lotus flowers, while jars of wine or beer of conical shape are seen placed under the tables. The name of the god Anubis, which is so prominent in the tablets of Memphis, either disappears or becomes secondary to that of Osiris, and the dedication often contains the names of other deities, as the frog-headed goddess Haka, the ram-headed god Khuum, and others; but no god is represented on the tablets. The texts themselves also differ, as, in addition to the expressions of the fourth dynasty, the verb "to give," omitted at that time, as also the subject of the gift, is introduced into the text, the deceased is called "justified," but the name of Osiris does not precede his. His merits are often told in a verbose style, to which are sometimes added the public works in which he was engaged. The contents of these texts often contain curious historical and other information, throwing much light on the mythology and ethics of the Egyptians. Under the eighteenth dynasty the tablets changed again, and the scenes of ancestral or sepulchral worship became subordinate. The principal scene of the tablet, placed at the upper part, represents the deceased, sometimes attended by his wife, sister, son, or other member of the family, standing or kneeling in adoration to the solar boat, or deities, or Osiris, accompanied by Isis, Nephthys, Anubis, Horus, and other deities who presided over embalming and the future state, before whom is placed a table of altar offerings. A second division generally has the scenes of family worship, while in the accompanying text the adorations to the deities occupy the most important portion; and the merits of the deceased, or his public works, are only slightly mentioned. At the time of the nineteenth dynasty the name of Osiris appears first placed before the name of the deceased, while the title of "justified," or makhem, always follows. These tablets were in general use during the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, became rarer under the twentieth, exceedingly rare at the period of the twenty-sixth dynasty, and disappear after that time. They reappear, however, again under the Ptolemies, and besides the usual formula of dedication, often contain interesting notices relative to the functions and offices discharged by the deceased, and family details. They are at this period often accompanied by inscriptions in the cursive handwriting, the so-called Demotic, or Enchorial. Under the Romans the art and the inscriptions of the tablets again changed. The subjects are in bas-relief, and the deities represented in the hybrid types prevalent at the epoch. The inscriptions are in Greek, and follow the usual formulas used at that period; the older dedications to the gods being omitted, only the name of the deceased and date of his death being retained, a valedictory address being substituted. The Coptic sepulchral tablets, made after the introduction of Christianity into Egypt and at a late period, and those in Cufic, the tombstones of the Mohammedan conquerors of Egypt, follow also the forms of their respective nationalities, all trace of the old representations and formulas having been obliterated or superseded. See Birch, Guide to the British Museum (Vestibule).

Stem, Nathan, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Chester County, Pa. While young he entered upon a mercantile life in Philadelphia; but, his attention having been called to the ministry, he entered the Alexandria Theological Seminary in 1824. On account of ill-health he left the seminary, and subsequently attended Kenyon College, O.; afterwards removed to Worthington, and pursued his studies under bishop Chase, by whom he was admitted to the diaconate.

nate in 1828 and to the eldership in 1829. His first parochial charge was in Delaware, O., where he labored several years; then accepted an invitation to St. Stephen's, Harrisburg, Pa.; in 1838 he was called to St. John's, Norristown, a parish which he served until his death, Nov. 1, 1854, at the age of fifty-four years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1860, p. 179.

Stemler, JOHANN CHRISTIAN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 12, 1701. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1728 rector at Sangerhausen, in 1730 at Naumburg, in 1739 superintendent at Torgau, in 1741 doctor of theology, in 1751 professor at Leipsic, and died March 29, 1773. He published, De Critica Profano in Sacris Usu (Leipsic, 1727);—Conciliatio Pauli et Petri ad Rom. xiii, 2 et Petri ii, 13 (eod.);—De Emphasi Vocis ἀναμνηστικῆς ad 2 Tim. i, 6 (1729);—Nathanaelis de Christo Confessio (1755), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Stephen, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the Isles in 1253, and in the same year confirmed to the monastery of Paisley all the churches and lands they held within his diocese. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 300.

Stephen, WILLIAM, a Scotch prelate, was divinity reader in the University of St. Andrews, and was advanced to the see of Dunblane about 1422. He probably died in 1429. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 177.

Stern, HENRY AARON, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born April 11, 1820, at Unterreichenbach, Hesse-Cassel, of Jewish parentage. In 1840 he embraced Christianity in London, England, and in 1844 the London Jews' Society sent him as a missionary to Bagdad, to labor there among the Jews. At Jerusalem, where he stopped on the journey, he was admitted into deacon's orders by the late bishop Alexander, the first Protestant bishop in the Holy City. In 1849 Stern left his station for England, and was admitted into priest's orders by the bishop of London. In 1850 he returned to Bagdad, a few years afterwards was removed to Constantinople, and from this centre he undertook missionary journeys to Asia Minor, Arabia Felix, and the Crimea. At the request of the London committee, he then proceeded in 1859 to Abyssinia, for the purpose of making known the gospel among the Falasha Jews. For eighteen months he labored there, when he was invited to visit England with a view of setting before his society the importance of laboring in Abyssinia. In 1862 Stern started on his second journey to that country. The events of that journey were eventually to form no unimportant episode in the history of England. The semi-barbarous king of Abyssinia had endeavored in vain to open diplomatic relations with England. The infuriated king imprisoned the helpless missionary who came to pay his respects. The other Europeans, including the British consul, shared in Mr. Stern's sufferings and imprisonment. This happened in October, 1863, and not till April 11, 1868, were the prisoners delivered. Having recovered from his many sufferings, Stern accepted in 1870 the charge of the Home Mission in London. He died May 13, 1885. (B. P.)

Steuber, JOHANN ENGELHARD, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 16, 1693, at Marburg. In 1716 he commenced his academical career at Jena, was in 1721 professor at Rinteln, and died Dec. 6, 1747. He published, De Primogenitis, etc. (Marburg, 1711);—De Anno Jobelæ (Rinteln, 1721);—De Ligatione Fæderum ad Cornua Altaris (1723);—De Signo Filii Homini ad Matt. xxiv, 30 (eod.);—De Mutuo Psalmorum Nexu (1736);—De Philosophia Platonico-Pythagoræa (1744). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Stevens, JOHN, D.D., a Baptist minister and educator, was born at Townsend, Mass., June 6, 1798. He graduated from Middlebury College, Vt., in 1821, had charge of the Montpelier Academy for one year, then entered Andover Theological Seminary, was converted, and in 1823 was baptized and united with the First Church in Salem, Mass. From 1825 to 1828 he was a tutor in Middlebury College, and then, for three years, classical teacher in South Reading (now Wakefield) Academy. From 1831 to 1838 he was editor of the Ohio Baptist Weekly Journal, and was then chosen professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Granville College (now Denison University), a position which he occupied till 1843, when he accepted an appointment from the Missionary Union as district secretary for the states of Ohio and Indiana, and held this important office twelve years. In 1844 he was ordained in Cincinnati. In all educational matters affecting the welfare of the denomination he took great interest. For several years he was secretary of the Western Baptist Education Society; and was one of the early and warm friends of the theological institution established at Covington, Ky., and of the institution established at Fairmount, near Cincinnati. He was appointed professor of Greek and Latin in Denison University in 1859, and when a division was made in the two departments, he retained the chair of Latin until 1875; upon his resignation he was continued "emeritus" professor. He died in Granville, O., April 30, 1877. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1103. (J. C. S.)

Stevenson, ANDREW, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Strabane, Ireland, in 1810. He came to America when a young man, and after passing through a literary and theological course, was ordained pastor of the Second Reformed Presbyterian Church in New York city. He remained pastor of this church until his health failed, and on his resignation was continued senior pastor until his death, June 29, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Stewart, Abel T., D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born at Somerville, N. J., Aug. 4, 1822. He graduated from Rutgers College in 1843, from the New Brunswick Seminary in 1846; and in the same year was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick; was pastor at Greenville from 1846 to 1850, and at Greenville and Bronxville from 1850 to 1852; First Church, Tarrytown, from 1852 to 1866, Holland, Mich., from 1866 to 1878, and died May 24, 1878, at Watkins, N. Y. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 468.

Stewart, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, was first prior of Whithorn and then abbot of Inchaffray. He was made bishop of Moray in 1527, and remained until 1538. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 149.

Stewart, Andrew (1), a Scotch prelate, was sub-dean of Glasgow in 1466, and soon after rector of Monkland. In 1477 he was provost of Lincluden. He was elected dean of the faculty in the University of Glasgow, and was made bishop of Moray in 1482. He still held that office in 1492, and died in 1501. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 146.

Stewart, Andrew (2), a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Caithness in 1490. He died June 17, 1518. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 214.

Stewart, Hon. Charles James, D.D., a Canadian prelate, was born April 13, 1775. He was educated at All-Souls' College, Oxford, England, of which he became a fellow; ordained, and presented to the rectory of Orton Longueville, Huntingdonshire, and in 1807 proceeded to Canada as a missionary. He first settled at St. Armand, thence removed to Halley, and on Jan. 1, 1826, was consecrated bishop of Quebec. He died July 13, 1837. Bishop Stewart was pre-eminently a good man, and a faithful and successful worker in his adopted field of labor. See The Church of England Magazine, July, 1838, p. 35.

Stewart, Charles Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Flemington, N. J., Oct. 16, 1798. He graduated from New Jersey College in 1815, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819; was ordained Aug. 14, 1821; served as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands from 1822 to 1825, became chaplain in the United States navy in 1828, made his last cruise in 1862, and died at Cooperstown, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1870. He edited the United States Naval Magazine in 1836 and 1837, and published several interesting books of voyages and observations, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Stewart, David, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the see of Moray in 1462, and continued there until his death in 1477. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 144.

Stewart, Edward, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Orkney about 1511. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 223.

Stewart, James (1), a Scotch prelate, was dean of the see of Moray and lord-treasurer afterwards, in 1453, and in 1459 was advanced to the bishopric. He died in 1462. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 144.

Stewart, James (2), a Scotch prelate, was elected to the bishopric of St. Andrews in 1497, and in 1508 was both bishop and chancellor. This prelate also held the monastery of Arbroath. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 32.

Stewart, Robert (1), a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of the see of Caithness in 1542. He never was in priest's orders. He had the title of bishop in September, 1583, and died at St. Andrews, March 29, 1586. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 215.

Stewart, Robert (2), a veteran missionary of the Presbyterian Board, was born in Kentucky in May, 1798. He was licensed to preach and ordained for missionary work in southern Illinois, where he spent a long, laborious, and successful ministry, preaching to the very last of his life. He organized many churches in that destitute region, which he supplied with preaching, and multitudes, through his instrumentality, were brought into the fold of Christ. After an active service of over fifty years, he died, in Troy, Madison Co., Ill., July 11, 1881. See Presbyterian Monthly Record, Sept. 1881. (W. P. S.)

Steward, Thomas, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of St. Andrews, and was elected bishop of the same in 1401, but declined. He probably died about 1414. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 27.

Stewart, William, a Scotch prelate, was born in Glasgow about 1479. He was doctor of laws and afterwards minister of Lochmaben, then rector of Ayr, and a prebendary of Glasgow. In 1527 he was preferred to the deanery of Glasgow, and in 1528 sat in parliament. In 1530 he was made lord-treasurer and provost of Lincluden, and was elected bishop of Aberdeen in 1532. After seven years he resigned the treasury. He died about 1545. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 121.

Stichart, Franz Otto, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Werdan, Saxony, in 1810, and died at Dresden in 1883. He published, Die Lehre vom Beistande des heiligen Geistes zur Besserung (Leipzig, 1835);—Jubelchronik der dritten kirchlichen Säcularfeier der Einführung der Reformation in Sachsen (1841);—De Reditu Christi ad Judicium Solemne (eod.);—Paulus Odonius aus Werdau (1843);—Dr. Martin Luther's Tod (1846);—Kirchenpforte oder Belehrung über die heiligen Tugde, Orte und Gebräuche der Christen (2d ed. 1859);—Die kirchliche Legende über die heiligen Apostel (1861);—Erasmus von Rotterdam, seine Stellung zur Kirche und den kirchlichen Bewegungen seiner Zeit (1870). Stiebritz, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Halle, Aug. 7, 1707. He studied there and at Jena, commenced his academic career at Giessen in 1731, was professor at Halle in 1738, and died Dec. 12, 1772. Stiebritz published, De Accommodatione Scripturae, etc. (Halle, 1727);—Nova Loci 1 Cor. xv, 28 Explicatio (1731);—De Prophetis a Leone Necato, 1 Reg. xiii, etc. (1738);—De Deo Medico (1736);—De Platonismo, Coloss. ii, 9 (eod.);—De Sacerdotibus Vitio Corporis Laborantibus, ad Levit. xxi, 21-23 (1752);—De Vero Sensu Hosea xi, 1 in Matt. ii, 15 (1753);—Betrachtungen über Gegenstände der Schrift und der Religion (1769), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Stinson, Joseph, D.D., a Wesleyan minister, was born at Castle Donington, Leicestershire, England. He was converted at Gainsborough when about twenty years of age, received into the ministry in 1823, and appointed to eastern Canada. From 1829 to 1832 he labored on the Gibraltar mission, leaving the Church there in much prosperity. In 1833 he resumed his work in Canada, spending three years in Kingston and five in Toronto, being general superintendent of missions and president of the Canadian Conference in 1838. In 1842 he for the first time received an appointment to a circuit in England (Sevenoaks), and after laboring in Sheffield, Leeds, London, Bradford, and Manchester, he again left for Canada. In 1858 he was again elected president of the Canadian Conference, and he spared no labor to meet the demands upon his time and talents. There was a genial warmth and suavity in his spirit and manners; he had a well-cultivated mind and a fine taste. He died in Toronto, Aug. 26, 1862, in his sixty-first year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1867, p. 18; Minutes of Canadian Conferences, 1868; Carroll, Case and His Contemporaries, index, vol. v.

Stip, Gerhard Chryno Hermann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 4, 1809, at Norden, East Frisia. He studied at Göttingen and Bonn, and was for a time preacher to a country congregation. He then travelled through Switzerland, and settled for a time at Berne, where he became acquainted with Schneckenburger. In 1841 he lived in London, in the house of Bunsen, whose sons he instructed. Having returned to Germany, he settled at Alexandrowka, near Potsdam, and died June 21, 1882. Stip belongs to the most prominent hymnologists of the 19th century, and published, Beleuchtung der Gesangbuchbearbeitung (Gotha, 1842, 2 vols.);—Hymnologische Reisebriefe (1858, 2 vols.);—Kirchenfried und Kirchenlied (eod.);—Das evangelische Kirchenlied und die confessionelle Brandfackel (1854);—Unverfälschter Liedersegen (1851);—Das Kleinod der evangelischen Religionsfreiheit: Erhalt uns Herr bei deinem Wort (1855), etc. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Stockton, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Washington, Pa., Nov. 18, 1808. He graduated from Washington College in 1820, and was for two years teacher of Latin in that institution; prosecuted his theological studies under Rev. Drs. Wylie and Anderson, and spent one year (1825-26) in Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor of the Cross Creek Church in 1827, and remained in this charge until 1877, when he was released from responsible duties, with the title of pastor emeritus. During the fifty years of his pastorate, fifteen hundred and forty-five members were added to the Church, more than forty ministers of the Gospel were raised up, and one hundred elders were ordained. One year after his settlement he founded a classical school, which was a means of great usefulness to the surrounding country. He died at Cross Creek, May 5, 1882. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 20. (W. P. S.)

stant contributor to its press, was born at Burlington, N. J., April 8, 1785. From a youth he developed a taste for good reading that never left him. In 1820 his first book was published, entitled Truth Versus a Wesleyan Methodist. In 1821 he published Seven Nights, aimed against the use of ardent spirits as a beverage. He became identified with the periodical known as The Wesleyan Repository, and was one of the first to agitate with his pen the subject of lay representation. He assisted in the publication of the first American edition of Wesley's works, wrote the article on the "Methodist Protestant Church" in Hay's edition of Buck's Theological Dictionary, contributed to the secular press as an editorial writer, and also wrote for Methodist periodicals. One of his most important literary undertakings was the publication of Whitehead's Lives of John and Charles Wesley. He was a distinguished philanthropist, and as such was well known in the city of Philadelphia. In 1860 he removed to Burlington, the place of his birth, and died there, Nov. 20 of that year. See Colhouer, Founders of the M. P. Church, p. 48.

Stoever, MARTIN LUTHER, LL.D., a Lutheran educator, was born at Germantown, Pa., Feb. 17, 1820. In 1833 he entered the preparatory department of Pennsylvania College at Gettysburg, and graduated from that institution in 1838. In the fall of that year he took charge of a school in Jefferson, Md. One year afterwards he became principal of the preparatory department of Pennsylvania College, assisting also in the college proper. During the presidency of Dr. Krauth, professor Stoever lived in the college building, and acted as president pro tem. The last ten years of his life were more especially devoted to instruction in Latin. His literary labors were almost entirely confined to the Evangelical Quarterly Review, in every number of which, from its beginning in 1849, with the exception of two issues, one or more of his articles appeared. In 1862 he became sole editor and proprietor of that periodical. During the civil war he was prominently connected with the United States Christian Commission. It was his original purpose to enter the Lutheran ministry, but he was deterred by his hesitancy of speech. In many respects he was one of the most distinguished men in his Church. He died in Philadelphia, July 22, 1870. See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry, 1878, p. 252.

Stohlman, CHARLES F. E., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Klein Bremen, kingdom of Hanover, Germany, Feb. 21, 1810. He studied at the gymnasium of Buckeburg; was a student of theology at the University of Halle, under Dr. Tholuck; after his graduation came to America, in September, 1834, and, with his family, settled in Erie, Pa., taking charge of a small congregation. He began his career in New York city, Sept. 12, 1838, as pastor of St. Matthew's German Lutheran Church, in Walker Street, a position which he held until his death, May 8, 1868. See Lutheran Observer, May 15, 1868.

Stolz, ALBAN, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 3, 1808, at Bühl, Baden. In 1833 he was made a priest, was for some time vicar at Rothenfels, in 1841 teacher at the gymnasium in Bruchsal, in 1848 professor of pastoral theology at Freiburg, and died Oct. 16, 1883. Stolz's writings comprise thirteen volumes (Freiburg, 1877 sq.). (B. P.)

Stone, James R., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Westborough, Mass., in 1818. He removed to Providence, R. I., when a child, and united with the First Baptist Church in that city in 1833. After studying two years in Brown University, he became principal of Washington Academy, in Wickford, and, in 1839, was ordained pastor of the church in that place. A few years afterwards he became pastor of the Stewart Street Church, in Providence; subsequently held pastorates in Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, and

Rhode Island. For two years he had charge of the Worcester (Mass.) Academy. In 1864 he was appointed district secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society for West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. In 1869 he became pastor of the Church in Fort Wayne, Ind. For several years he was president of the Indiana Baptist State Convention. His last pastorate was in Lansing, Mich. He died Feb. 1, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1112. (J. C. S.)

Stone, John Seely, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal divine, was born at West Stockbridge, Mass., in 1795. He graduated from Union College in 1823; was ordained deacon in 1826; began his ministry in Maryland; was afterwards (1832-41) settled in New Haven, Conn., Boston, Mass., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Brookline, Mass.; was some years lecturer in the Philadelphia Divinity School; in 1869 became dean of the Theological School at Cambridge, Mass., and died there, Jan. 13, 1882. Besides numerous tracts, etc., he published, The Mysteries Opened (1844);—Life of Bishop Griswold (eod.);—The Church Universal (1846; enlarged under the title The Living Temple, 1866);—The Contrast (1853);—Life of James Milnor (1848);—Lectures on the Christian Sabbath (1867);—The Christian Sacraments (eod.).

Stork, THEOPHILUS, D.D., a Lutheran minister, son of Rev. Charles A. G. Stork, of Brunswick, Germany, was born near Salsburg, N. C., in August, 1814. He graduated from Pennsylvania College in 1835, and from Gettysburg Theological Seminary in 1837, in which year he was licensed to preach, and was immediately called to Grace Lutheran Church, Winchester, Va. In 1841 he became pastor of St. Matthew's Church, Philadelphia, where he labored nine years. In 1842 he was one of the active promoters of the organization of the East Pennsylvania Synod. The large church, known as St. Mark's, in Philadelphia, was organized by him in 1850. Eight years after he was called to the presidency of the new Lutheran College at Newberry, S. C. In 1860 he became pastor of St. Mark's Church, in Baltimore, Md., where he labored until 1865, and then returned to Philadelphia and organized St. Andrew's Church, which was afterwards merged in the Messiah Mission, since the Church of the Messiah. Impaired health compelled him to resign pastoral labor in 1873. He died in Philadelphia, March 28, 1874. Dr. Stork was a scholar of fine literary taste, an elegant writer, and an eloquent preacher. At various times he was editor of the Home Journal, of the Lutheran Home Monthly, and joint editor of the Lutheran Observer; also author of, Luther at Home;—Luther and the Bible;—Luther's Christmas Tree;—Children of the New Testament;—Home Scenes of the New Testament;—Jesus in the Temple;—Afternoon. A volume of his Sermons was published after his death. See Pennsylvania College Year-book, 1882, p. 201.

Stosch, Eberhard Heinrich Daniel, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Liebenberg, Prussia, March 16, 1716, and studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1738 he was assistant preacher at Jerichau, in 1744 at Soldin, in 1748 professor at Duisburg, in 1749 at Frankfort, and died March 27, 1781, doctor of theology. He published, Commentatio Historico-Critica de Librorum Novi Testamenti Canonis (Frankfort, 1755);—De Ecclesia Divinam Bibliorum Inspirationem Testante (1751);—De Septem Domini Oculis Perlustrantibus Totam Terram ex Zachar. iv. 10 (1751);—De Revelatione Divina Ante Moysen Scripto Consignata (1752);—Introductio in Theologiam Dogmaticam (1778);—Institutio Theologia Dogmatica (1779). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. a. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 77, 292, 305, 394, 535. (B. P.)

Stosch, Ferdinand, a brother of the foregoing, was born Dec. 30, 1717, at Liebenberg. He studied at Frankfort, was in 1743 con-rector at Lingen, in 1761 professor at the Joachimsthal Gymnasium in Berlin, in 1771 member of consistory and general superintendent at Detmold, and died Aug. 17, 1780. He wrote, De Nominibus Urbis Thyatiræ (Lingen, 1743):—De Angelo Ecclesiæ Thyatiræ (eod.):—De Sepultura Jephthæ ad Jud. xii, 7 (1746):—De Ecclesiæ Novi Testamenti Prophetis non Indigente, ad Ephes. iii, 2, 3 (1748):—De Septem Epistolarum Apocrypticarum Ordine (1749):—De Adamo, Principum Primo ad Psal. lxxzii, 7 (1754):—Compendium Archaeologiæ Economicae Novi Testamenti (Leipzic, 1769), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 78, 274. (B. P.)

Stowell, WILLIAM HENRY, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born on the Isle of Man in 1800. He entered secular business at an early age in Liverpool; was there persuaded to enter the ministry; studied theology at Blackburn Academy, and settled as pastor at North Shields in 1821. In 1833 he was invited to the presidency of Rotherham Independent College, and the pastorate at Masborough, which offices he filled until his acceptance of the presidency of Chesham College in 1850. He retired from public duty about a year and a half before his death, which took place at his residence at Bransbury, Jan. 2, 1858. Dr. Stowell's scholarship was extensive and varied. He was well acquainted with history and ethics, good in the classics, and able in theology. He published, History of the Puritans in England (1837):—Memoir of Richard Winter Hamilton, D.D., LL.D. (1850):—The Work of the Spirit (1858), and a volume of Sermons, as well as several lesser works. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 222; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Strachan, DAVID, a Scotch prelate, was pastor of Fettercairn, and upon the king's restoration promoted to the see of Brechin, and consecrated June 1, 1662, where he continued until his death in 1671. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 167.

Strain, JOHN, D.D., a Scotch Catholic prelate, was born Dec. 8, 1810. He was consecrated bishop of Abila (in partibus) by Pius IX, Sept. 25, 1864, and appointed vicar-apostolic of the eastern district of Scotland. On the restoration of the hierarchy by Leo XIII, in March, 1878, he was translated to the archiepiscopal see of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. He died July 2, 1888.

Strathbrock, ROBERT, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Caithness about 1444. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 214.

Straube, CARL, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born at Berlin, Oct. 27, 1807. After completing his theological studies, he assisted his father in the ministry at Mittenwalde from 1829 to 1835, was then appointed pastor at Werder, in 1856 at Falkenhagen, and died March 2, 1881. Straube was very active in the work of home and foreign missions, and his Reise-poller has become a household work in the Christian families of Germany. (B. P.)

Strauss, OTTO, son of Gerhard Friedrich Abraham (q. v.), who died March 6, 1880, is the author of Nahum de Nino Vaticinium Explicatum ex Assyriis Monumentis (Berlin, 1853), the publication of which entitled him to the right of lecturing at the Berlin University. In 1857 he was military preacher at Posen, and in 1865 first preacher of the Sophienkirche, in Berlin, where he labored to his end. Besides the work on Nahum, he published, Ninive und das Wort Gottes (1855):—Der Psalter als Gesang- und Gebetbuch (1859):—and, in connection with his brother, Friedrich Adolph, Länder und Städte der heiligen Schrift (1861). See Pank, Zur Erinnerung an Lic. Otto Strauss (Berlin, 1880). (B. P.)

Strickland, WILLIAM PETER, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal, and later a Presbyterian, divine, was born at Pittsburgh, Pa., Aug. 17, 1809. He studied at the Ohio University, entered the Ohio Conference in 1832, labored several years in Cincinnati, and then became agent of the American Bible Society. In 1856 he engaged in literary labor in New York, chiefly in connection with the Methodist press, and as assistant editor of the Christian Advocate. In 1862 he was chaplain of the 48th New York regiment at Port Royal, S. C. In 1865 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church at Bridgehampton, L. I., and in 1874 was installed its pastor. Three years later he resigned through ill-health, and retired to private literary work. He died at Ocean Grove, N. J., July 15, 1884. Dr. Strickland was a frequent contributor to the religious journals, and also to the cyclopædias, and was the author of numerous volumes, of which we may mention, Hist. of the Amer. Bible Society (New York, 1849; new ed. 1856):—Hist. of Meth. Missions (1850):—Genius and Mission of Methodism (1851):—Christianity Defended (1852):—Memoir of J. B. Finley (1858):—Manual of Biblical Literature (eod.):—Light of the Temple (1854):—Astrologer of Chaldea (1856):—Pioneers of the West (eod.):—Life of Asbury (1858):—Life of Groben (1859):—Old Mackinaw (1860); besides editing the Literary Casket, the Western Review, and the Autobiography of Peter Cartwright (1856).

Strobel, GEORG THEODOR, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 12, 1736, and studied at Altdorf. In 1769 he was preacher at Rasch, in the neighborhood of Altdorf, in 1774 at Wörd, and died Dec. 14, 1794. Strobel published, Melanchthoniana (Altdorf, 1771):—Nachrichten von den Verdiensten Melanchthons um die heilige Schrift (1778):—Bibliotheca Melanchthoniana (Nuremberg, 1775; 3d ed. 1782):—Literärgeschichte von Ph. Melanchthon's Locis Theologicis (1776):—Ph. Melanchthonis Libellus de Scripturis Ecclesiasticis (1780), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 295, 745, 746, 767, 851. (B. P.)

Stuart, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was postulated bishop of the see of Dunkeld in 1515, and was afterwards put into the see of Caithness. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 98.

Stuart, John, D.D., an Episcopal minister, was born at Harrisburg, Pa., in 1740. He graduated at the College of Philadelphia, was ordained in 1770, and appointed to the mission at Fort Hunter. He prepared a Mohawk translation of the gospel of Mark, an Exposition of the Church Catechism, and a compendious History of the Bible. During the revolutionary war he became an object of suspicion, and was subjected to many hardships. At length he removed to Canada, and in 1786 opened an academy at Kingston. About 1799 he was appointed chaplain to the garrison. He died at Kingston in August, 1811. He has been called the "Father of the Upper Canada Church." See Sabine, Loyalists of the Revolutionary War, ii, 339. (J. C. S.)

Stuart, Robert L., a philanthropic merchant, was born in the city of New York, July 21, 1806. He inherited a considerable fortune from his father, together with his business, the refining of sugar and the manufacture of candy, by which he amassed a large property, and liberally contributed of it for religious and benevolent purposes, especially to the library and mission enterprises of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a consistent and devout member. He died in his native city, Dec. 13, 1883. It is estimated that the total gifts of himself and his brother, Alexander (died in December, 1879), amounted to nearly three million dollars.

Stubbs, ALFRED, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Turk's Island, West Indies, May 12, 1815. He passed his school-days at Bloomingdale and in Brooklyn, graduated at Yale College in 1835, and at the General Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1839. In the latter year he was chosen rector of Christ Church, New Brunswick, a position which he continued to hold until his death, Dec. 11, 1882. He was a warm-hearted and generous man, and of untiring energy and earnest devotion to the principles of the Church. In the convention of the diocese he took an active and leading part, and frequently was sent as deputy to the General Convention. He had been for a long time president of the Standing Committee. In 1867 Dr. Stubbs made a charge against the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., of violating the canon laws of the Church by preaching in a Methodist meeting-house in New Brunswick. Dr. Stubbs was a prominent person in that trial, which attracted wide attention.

Stutteville, ROBERT DR., a Scotch prelate, was probably bishop of the see of Dunkeld in 1272. He died in 1300. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 81.

Stütze, JOHANN NEPOMUK, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, born in 1807 at Scheer, Württemberg, was made a priest in 1832 at Augsburg, called to Balzhhausen, Augsburg diocese, in 1849, and died April 17, 1874. He published, Versuch einer Harmonisirung der Welt- und Kirchengeschichte (Zurich, 1868):—Handbuch zum römisch-katholischen Religionsunterrichte (Augsburg, 1868, 2 vols.):—Stunden der Andacht für Katholiken (Troppau, 1869-73). (B. P.)

Styles, JOHN, D.D., an English Congregational minister and author, commenced his ministry in early life at Cowes, Isle of Wight, thence removing to Brighton, where for many years he attracted large audiences. His next charge was Holland Chapel, North Brixton, which he built, and which he left in 1835. From 1836 to 1844 he officiated in Claylands Chapel, at the same place. In the latter year he became pastor at Foleshill, where he remained until his death at Kennington, June 22, 1849. A masculine energy, a noble generosity and benevolence of disposition, were his characteristics. His mind was energetic and powerful, he could write on almost any topic, was an acute critic, had superior colloquial powers, richness of fancy, and his style was polished, vivacious, and luminous. Dr. Styles published, An Essay on the Stage (2d ed. Lond. 1807, 12mo):—Legend of the Velvet Cushion (exposing in a masterly manner a writer on the Puritans):—Sermons (ibid. 1813, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo) [the sermon on The Spirituality of God (Isle of Wight, 1806), and that on Temptations of a Watering-Place (Brighton, 1815) were published separately]:—Sermon on Lord Byron's Works (Lond. 1824):—Prize Essay on the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (elegant and convincing):—Critical Papers in Ward's Miscellany and in the Evangelical Magazine. See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, August, 1849, p. 393.

Summers, THOMAS OSMOND, D.D., LL.D., an eminent divine of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Corfe Castle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, England, Oct. 11, 1812. He was trained by Dissenters, came to America while a youth, joined the Methodists in 1832, was converted the following year, soon began to preach, and entered the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1835. In 1840 he became a missionary in Texas, and was one of the first members of that conference; was transferred to the Alabama Conference in 1844, with which he ever afterwards remained connected, occupying for several years its most important charges, and afterwards engaged in literary work, as the editor of the Southern Christian Advocate (1846), of the Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church South (1855), and other periodicals. He acted as secretary of every General Conference of his Church, from its organization in 1845 to his death, which occurred during the session of that body at Nashville, Tenn., May 5, 1882. During the civil war he served as a pastor in Alabama, and for several of his later years he was a professor in the Vanderbilt University. He was a man of encyclopædic information, untiring diligence, and wide liberality of sentiment. He wrote and edited very many works for the press of his Church, and numberless articles of value for its journals. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences of the

M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 125; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Life by Fitzgerald (Nashville, 1884).

Sumner, CHARLES RICHARD, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Kenilworth, Warwickshire, in 1790. He was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge; became rector of St. Helen's, Abingdon, Bucks, and librarian and historiographer to George IV; prebend of Worcester in 1822; of Canterbury in 1825; dean of St. Paul's, prebend of London, and bishop of Llandaff, all in April, 1826; was translated to Winchester in 1827; and resigned his see, on account of the infirmities of age, in September, 1869. He died Aug. 15, 1874. Bishop Sumner was an earnest, evangelical preacher, and a hearty supporter of the Bible and missionary societies. He published, Prælectiones Academicae Oxoniæ Habita (Lond. 8vo):—Ministerial Character of Christ Practically Considered (ibid. 1824, 8vo; 2d ed. 1835, 8vo), and several Charges. See The (Lond.) Christian Observer, May, 1876, p. 325.

Supper, THE LAST, is a modern phrase often used to designate the Lord's Supper, in view of the fact that it was the last meal of which Jesus partook with his disciples (Matt. xxvi, 29; Mark xiv, 25; Luke xxii, 18). The circumstances of the repast have been so fully discussed in preceding articles, that it remains to consider more particularly only one feature, namely, the relative position of the guests at the table: as this reflects special light upon several incidents and expressions in the narratives of the evangelists.

1. The place of Peter would properly be that of honor among the disciples; and it is agreed upon all hands that such was by custom the uppermost or left-hand one on the highest or left-hand wing of the triclinium or dinner-bed, reckoned according to the fact that the guests reclined upon their left side (so as to leave the right hand free for eating with), each facing the person next below. In this arrangement also he would be the first to whom the Master would come for the foot-washing, as is evident from the account of that incident ("began," John xiii, 5). Moreover, he would thus be opposite John, and sufficiently removed from him to render "beckoning" necessary in order to ascertain through him the person of the traitor (John xiii, 24).

2. The interesting group of which the Lord himself formed the centre consisted, besides him, of Judas and John, who were so situated that the latter, as he lay "in Jesus' bosom," could lean back (ἰκνέσθω, John xiii, 25, for which many read ἀνακνέσθω, both to be carefully distinguished from the ἀνακνέμενος of the verse preceding), and whisper to the Master; and the former so located that he could readily receive the sop from the Master's hands. All this renders it plain that Judas occupied the honorable position above, i. e. at the back of Jesus; and John the next favored location below or just in front of him.

According to classical etiquette, the master or host reclined on the middle place of the middle bed; and in that case the arrangement of the whole would be as in the accompanying diagram (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Antig. s. v., triclinium). This meets the ordinary sense of propriety also. But Edersheim maintains (Life and Times of Jesus, ii, 494), from certain rabbinical notices, that the appropriate place for the giver of the feast was at the foot of the table, and in that case John would be exactly opposite Peter, at the other extreme of the entire series, as in the subjoined diagram. In this way, however, these two disciples would seem to be too near each other to suit the need of signs, since they could freely converse across the table; and they would not so fully face one another, since they would be reclining rather back to back. Süsskind, FRIEDRICH GOTTLÖB VON, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 17, 1767. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1795 deacon at Urach, in 1798 teacher at Tübingen, in 1805 court-preacher and member of consistory at Stuttgart, and died Nov. 12, 1829. He published, Quonam Sensu suam Jesus Doctrinam Divinam Perhibuerit? (Tübingen, 1798-1801; in German, ibid., 1802):—Symbolæ ad Illustrandam Quædam Evangeliorum Loca (1802-1804, 3 parts):—Magazin für christliche Dogmatik und Moral (1803-12):—Prüfung der Schellingschen Lehre von Gott (1812). See Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner, p. 502-505; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 21, 284, 400. (B. P.)

Sutcliffe, JOSEPH, M.A., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Baildon, Yorkshire. He was converted in early life, was appointed by Wesley to Reith in 1786, introduced Methodism into the Scilly Isles in 1788, spent the last twenty years of his life in retirement in London, and died May 14, 1856. His course was one of "unspotted Christian purity and progressive excellence. In Biblical scholarship he especially excelled." He was an indefatigable writer, publishing in all thirty-two works on religious subjects, the chief being A Commentary on the Old and New Testament (Lond. 1834, 2 vols. royal 8vo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856, p. 211; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 348; Smith, Hist. of Wesl. Methodism, ii, 647; Wesl. Meth. Magazine, 1856, p. 503; Osborn, Meth. Bibliography, p. 181; Wesleyan Takings, i, 303.

Sutton, AMOS, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Sevenoaks, Kent, Jan. 21, 1802. At fifteen he resided in London, at twenty returned home and joined the Baptist Church. He was accepted as a general Baptist missionary, and sailed for Calcutta in 1824, thence to Cuttack, Orissa, India, where he labored till his health failed in 1832, and then returned to England. He returned to Cuttack in 1837, and labored till 1847, when he had again to seek rest in England, and became pastor at Leicester. In 1850 he returned again to India by way of America. He reached his station in India only to die, Aug. 17, 1851.

Swain, THOMAS, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Pemberton, N. J., March 30, 1817. He was for a time a student in Brown University in the class of 1838, and having completed his college course in Madison University, graduated from Hamilton Theological Seminary in 1844. He was ordained in November, 1846, pastor at Washington, Pa. At the end of four years' successful labor, he accepted an agency in the service of the missionary union for six months, and then was pastor in Flemington, N. J., sixteen years. In 1867 he became the financial secretary of the New Jersey Classical and Scientific Institute at Hightstown, and in 1868 district secretary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., March 24, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1124. (J. C. S.)

Swain, LEONARD, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Concord, N. H., Feb. 26, 1821. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1841, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1846; was immediately ordained pastor of the Church in Nashua, establishing from the outset a reputation as an able and eloquent preacher. His next pastorate was over the Central Church of Providence, R. I., from 1852 to 1869. For nearly two years he was laid aside from his work, and died July 14, 1869. See Rhode Island Biographical Cyclopædia, s. v. (J. C. S.)

Swan, JABEZ SMITH, a noted Baptist evangelist, was born at Stonington, Conn., Feb. 23, 1800. He had early educational advantages; was converted at the age of twenty-one; licensed the following year; studied at the Hamilton Institute, N. Y.; became pastor at Stonington in 1827; Norwich, N. Y., in 1830; Preston in 1837; Oxford in 1842; New London, Conn., in 1843; Albany, N. Y., in 1848; at New London again in 1849; served as a missionary through the state of New York for several years; became pastor at Waterford, where his health failed in 1862; and died Nov. 19, 1884. He was powerful in prayer and preaching, and great revivals followed his labors. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Sycaminum. See HAIFA.

Sydeserf, THOMAS, a Scotch prelate, was translated from Brechin to Galloway in 1638, and was excommunicated. He was the only bishop who survived the troubles, and then was translated to the see of Orkney, Nov. 14, 1662. He died in February, 1676. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 228, 281.

Sydney, KARL LEOPOLD ADOLF, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 23, 1800, at Berlin. He studied theology under Schleiermacher; in 1828 was chaplain and tutor in the military school at Berlin, and in 1837 was called as court and military chaplain to Potsdam. In 1841 he was sent by Frederic William IV to England, to study there, in connection with other commissioners, the institutions for the religious care of the population of London and other large cities, and to report of his experience, and at the same time of the newly founded Anglo-Prussian bishopric at Jerusalem. This he did in his Amliche Berichte über die in neuerer Zeit in England erwachte Thätigkeit für die Vermehrung und Erweiterung der kirchlichen Anstalten (1845). As this mission brought him in connection with the queen of England and prince Albert, he was requested to prepare a paper on the movement then pending in Scotland for separating the Church from the State. This he did in his Beiträge zur Charakteristik der kerklichen Dinge in Grossbritannien (1844-45, 2 parts), in which he freely advocated the separation. In 1846 he accepted a call as pastor of the Neue Kirche in Berlin, which position he occupied till the year 1876. In connection with Eltester, Thomas, and Pischon, he published the Monatschrift, afterwards Zeitschrift für die unierte Kirche, which, in 1854, was replaced by the Protestantische Kirchenzeitung. In 1848 he was a member of the Berlin National Assembly, and ten years later the theological faculty of Jena honored him with the doctorate of theology. When, in 1872, he delivered a lecture, in which he declared that Jesus was the natural son of Joseph and Mary, the Brandenburg consistory deposed him from his office. He died Oct. 22, 1882. Besides the writings already mentioned, he published Sammlung geistlicher Vorträge (Berlin, 1838), and, in connection with F. A. Schulze, he translated and published fifteen volumes of Channing's works (1850-55). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1801. (B. P.)

Sylburg, FRIEDRICH, a German scholar, was born in 1586 at Wetter, near Marburg, and died Feb. 16, 1596, at Heidelberg. Sylburg is known as the editor of some of the works of the Church fathers, to which he made annotations. Thus he edited the works of Clement of Alexandria, in Greek and Latin (Heidelberg, 1592), an edition which is still highly praised. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 331, 883, 888, 898. (B. P.)

Syme, ANDREW, D.D., an Episcopal minister, was born in Lanarkshire, Scotland, in September, 1764. He went to Petersburg, Va., before 1800, and remained till his death, Oct. 26, 1845, being at the time the oldest citizen in the town, and the oldest clergyman in the state. See Sturgh, Amer. Biog. Notes, p. 386. (J. C. S.)

Symington, W., D.D., a minister in the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, was born in 1795, and died at Glasgow, professor of theology in the seminary of his mother Church, Jan. 28, 1862, in the forty-third year of his ministry. His works on the Atonement and Intercession of Christ, and on the Mediatorial Dominion of Christ, were the best known to the public. He was also the author of a volume of Sermons. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1862, p. 683.

Symmons, CHARLES, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1749. He was educated at Westminster, at the University of Glasgow, and at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D. in 1776; was presented to the rectory of Narberth by the king in 1778, and died at Bath, April 27, 1826. His first publication was in 1788, an octavo volume of Sermons. In 1789 he published in quarto A Sermon for the Benefit of Decayed Clergymen in the Diocese of St. David's; and in 1790, The Consequence of the Character of the Individual, and the Influence of Education in Forming It; in 1797 he produced Inez, a dramatic poem; and in 1800 another called Constantia. In 1806 appeared his Life of Milton, prefixed to an edition of Milton's prose works, of which he was not the editor. In 1813 he published an octavo volume of poems, partly his own, and partly the compositions of his wondrously gifted, but then deceased, daughter. Subsequently he amused his leisure hours with writing A Rhymed Translation of the Æneid, which was published in 1817. His last work was a sketch of Shakespeare's life. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 247.

Syriac (Modern) Version OF THE SCRIPTURES. The modern Syriac language, written in Nestorian characters, and spoken by the Christians of the latter name, is a very corrupt dialect of the ancient Syriac, abounding in Persian, Turkish, and Kurdish words, and pronounced very harshly. Mr. Perkins, of the American Board of Missions, commenced, in 1836, a translation of the Scriptures from the ancient or ecclesiastical language into the vernacular now in use among the people. The gospels were soon issued from the press at Oroomiah, and later the entire Bible. See Bible of Every Land, p. 46.

Syro-Roman Christians are a class of converts to the Romish faith in Malabar and Travancore, in India. They have their own bishops and priests. Their forefathers appear to have belonged to the Christians of St. Thomas, as they were called; and were gained over to the Romish Church by the Portuguese, who compelled the churches nearest the coast to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. The Syro-Roman Christians, along with the converts from other tribes in the district, are said to amount to upwards of one hundred thousand souls. They are allowed to retain their own language in divine worship, as well as their own liturgy, and they have a Syriac college.

Taanach. The present Tannuk lies six miles north-west of Zerin (Jezreel), and is "a small village on the south-east side of the great tell or mound of the same name, at the [south-west] edge of the great plain [of Esdraelon]. It has olives on the south, and wells on the north, and is surrounded by cactus hedges. There is a white dome in the village. The rock on the sides of the tell is quarried in places, the wells are ancient, and rock-cut tombs occur on the north, near the foot of the mound" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, ii, 46; comp. p. 63).

Taanath-Shiloh is thought by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 195) and Conder (Tent Work, ii, 340) to be the present ruin Tana, seven miles south-east of Shechem, and two north of Janohoh (Yanüm), containing "foundations, caves, cistern, and rock-cut tombs" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, ii, 245, comp. p. 232).

Tabaraud, MATTHIEU MATHURIN, a French controversialist, was born at Limoges in 1744. He was educated by the Jesuits, was for some time professor of belles-lettres at Nantes, professor of theology and Hebrew at Arles, in 1783 superior of the college at Pézenas, in 1787 at Rochelle, emigrated in 1791 to England, and died at Limoges, Jan. 9, 1832. He published, Traité Historique et Critique de l'Élection des Evêques (Paris, 1792, 2 vols.):—De la Necessité d'une Religion d'Etat (1803, 1804):—Principes sur la Distinction du Contrat et du Sacrement de Mariage (1802, 1816):—Histoire de Pierre de Bérulle, Fondateur de la Congregation de l'Oratoire (1817, 2 vols.). Tables, THE FOUR. During the fierce contest in Scotland between the adherents of the Church of England and the Presbyterians, several outbreaks occurred. On Nov. 15, 1687, there was a meeting of the Privy Council, and large numbers of Presbyterians assembled at the capital. In order to prevent any tumultuous commotion, the nobles were requested to use their influence to induce their friends to return to their homes. This was consented to on condition that a sufficient number should remain to look after their interests. It was arranged that as many of the nobility as pleased, two gentlemen from every county, one minister from every presbytery, and one burgess from every burgh, should form a general commission, representing the whole body of the Presbyterians. Still more to concentrate their efforts, a smaller number was selected, who should reside at Edinburgh, watch the progress of events, and be ready to communicate with the whole body on any emergency. This smaller committee was composed of sixteen persons—four noblemen, four gentlemen, four ministers, and four burgesses, and from the circumstance of their sitting in four separate rooms in the parliament house, they were designated The Four Tables. A member from each of these constituted a chief table of last resort, making a supreme council of four members. See Hetherington, Hist. of Church of Scotland, i, 291.

Taboo (or Tabú), an institution common to all the Polynesian tribes, which solemnly interdicted whatever was esteemed sacred. Hence the term was used to denote anything devoted. With persons or places that were tabooed, all intercourse was prohibited. There were tabooed or sacred days, when it was a crime to be found in a canoe. Pork, bananas, cocoa-nuts, and certain kinds of fish were tabooed to women, and it was death for them to eat these articles of food. The eating together by man and wife was also tabooed, as was the preparation of their food in the same oven. Anything of which a man made an idol, and articles of food offered to idols, were tabooed to him. There were other instances of taboo, as the ariki, or head chief, of an island, who was so sacred that his house, garments, and everything relating to him were taboo. The taboo arose from the idea that a portion of the spiritual essence of the divinity indwelling in sacred things and persons was more or less transmitted to anything else brought in contact with it.

Tabunisozton, among the Kalmucks, is a deity of the second rank, who has appeared fifty-two times in as many different forms. The principal form is that of a woman, which, in all external appearance, is entirely like that of the Kalmuck women in general. She sits with crossed legs upon an elevation, is in part unclothed, and wherever the flesh appears is painted red. Head-dress and clothing are about tantamount to each other in most Kalmuck deities; the lower part of the body is enveloped in a light robe, while the head is crowned with a towering ornament, and adorned with flowers. Tabunisozton holds in her hands a vessel of fruit, and is regarded as the goddess of earthly fruitfulness, with which her frequent reviviscence agrees.

Tae-Keih is the fundamental unity of the Chinese literati, the absolute, or, literally, the "great extreme." Beyond this, they allege, no human thought can soar. Itself incomprehensible, it girdles the whole frame of nature, animate and inanimate. From it alone, as from the fountain-head of nature, issued everything that is. Creation is the periodic flowing forth of it. Tae-Keih is identical with Le, the immaterial element of the universe.

Tafel, JOHANN FRIEDRICH IMMANUEL, a Swedenborgian, who died at Stutgard in 1863, professor, is the author of, Religionssystem der Neuen Kirche (Tübingen, 1832):—Geschichte und Kritik des Skepticismus und Irrationalismus in ihrer Beziehung zur neuern Philosophie (1834):—Vergleichende Darstellung und Beurtheilung der Lehrgesetze der Katholiken und Protestanten (1835):—Zur Geschichte der Neuen Kirche (1841):—Swedenborg und seine Gegner (2d ed. ed.):—Die Hauptwahrheiten der Religion (1852):—Die Unsterblichkeit und Wiedererinnerungskraft der Seele (1853):—Swedenborg und der Aberglaube (1856), etc. See Zuchold, *Bibl. Tallory, THE, a room adjoining the wardrobe in monasteries, where a number of the lay brethren, with a vocation for that useful craft, were continually at work, making and repairing the clothes of the community. These two rooms and the lavatory were in charge of the camerarius or chamberlain. See Hill, English Monasticism, p. 20.

Tait, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, D.D., LL.D., an English prelate, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, Dec. 22, 1811. He graduated from the Edinburgh High School, Edinburgh Academy, Glasgow University, and Oxford University, from the last with the highest honors. He became a public examiner of the university, and in 1842 head master at Rugby, where he remained eight years. He was appointed dean of Carlisle in 1850, where he instituted an extra pulpit service, and gave much time to visiting and instructing the poor. In 1866 he became bishop of London, and successfully originated a scheme for adding to the Church accommodation in the metropolis, by raising in ten years a fund of five million dollars. He was translated to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury in December, 1868. He presided over the Pan-Anglican Synod in Lambeth in 1867, the Church Congress in Croydon in 1877, and the Congress of Anglican Bishops in Lambeth in 1878. He died in London, Dec. 3, 1882. Archbishop Tait was a churchman of conservative spirit. He wrote, Dangers and Safeguards of Modern Theology:—The Word of God the Ground of Faith:—Charge to the Clergy:—Some Thoughts on the Duties of the Church of England:—Letters on Education and Kindred Topics, in Scots and British reviews. (W. P. S.)

Talbot, RICHARD, an Irish prelate, was collated to the precentorship of Hereford in 1407, and in 1416 was elected to the primacy of Armagh. In 1417 he was consecrated archbishop of the see of Dublin. In 1423 he was lord justice, and subsequently lord chancellor of Ireland, and in 1424 had a grant for all his services of all the estates of Matthew St. John, deceased. He was at the same time constituted justice and guardian of the peace in the county of Dublin. In 1426 he reduced the proxies that were formerly paid by the prior and convent of the Holy Trinity to the archbishops of Dublin, from five marks to two and a half, which concession pope Eugenius afterwards confirmed. He was again constituted lord chancellor in 1428. In 1432 he established a chantry in St. Michael's Church, which, from being a chapel, he constituted parochial, and likewise founded the chantry of St. Anne in St. Auden's Church, for the maintenance of six priests to pray for the king, the founder, and their successors. In 1443 he was elected archbishop of Armagh, but refused the dignity. In 1445 he was a fourth time lord deputy of Ireland, and in 1447 was appointed deputy to the earl of Ormond, viceroy of Ireland. He died Aug. 15, 1449. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 153.

Talismans were used by the Chaldean magicians to prevent the attacks of evil spirits, injury from wicked sorcery, poison, etc. We give the following translation of part of the seventeenth formula on the tablet found in the library of the royal palace at Nineveh:

"Two double bands of white cloth upon the bed on the platform as a talisman if he binds on the (right) hand, two double bands of black cloth if he binds on the left hand."

The possessor of this talisman was assured that all evil spirits and other ills would leave him, never to return. These talismans were of different kinds. First of all there were those which consisted of bands of cloth, covered with certain written formulæ, and were fastened to the furniture or the garments, like the phylacteries of the Jews. There were also AMULETS (q. v.). Vessels, containing food and drink for the gods and genii, were placed in the apartments as protecting talismans. The demons were represented by figures of such hideous forms that it was believed that they were only to be shown their own image to cause them to flee away. In the museum of the Louvre is a bronze statuette of Assyrian workmanship; a figure of a horrible demon in an upright position, with the body of a dog, the feet of an eagle, the claws of a lion, the tail of a scorpion, the head of a skeleton but half decayed, and adorned with goat's horns, the eyes still remaining, and, lastly, four great expanded wings. See Lenormant, Chaldean Magic, p. 850; Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 160; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 140, 217; comp. CHARM.

Tall Brothers, an epithet (from their stature) of four Nitrian monks, named Dioscurus, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius, who were reluctantly induced by Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria, to leave the desert and receive ordination. They were so disgusted during the troubles of the time of Chrysostom that they returned once more to their solitude, and although condemned and denounced, A.D. 401, and even personally attacked by Theophilus, they persisted in remaining there.

Tantalus, a Greek mythological character, was, according to some, a son of Zeus, or, according to others, of Tmolus. All traditions agree in stating that he was a wealthy king, but assign him to different kingdoms, as Lydia, Sipylus, in Phrygia or Paphlagonia, and Argos or Corinth. Tantalus is peculiarly celebrated in ancient story for the severe punishment inflicted upon him after his death. The following are some of the traditions, of which the most common is that Zeus invited him to his table and communicated his divine counsels to him. Tantalus divulged these secrets, and the gods punished him by placing him in the midst of a lake, of which he could never drink, the water always withdrawing when he stooped. Branches laden with fruit hung temptingly near, but withdrew whenever he reached after them. Over his head there was suspended a huge rock ever threatening to crush him. Another tradition relates that, wishing to try the gods, he cut his son Pelops in pieces, boiled them, and set them before the gods as a repast. A third account states that Tantalus stole nectar and ambrosia from the table of the gods, and gave them to his friends; while a fourth relates the following story. Rhea caused the infant Zeus and his nurse to be guarded by a golden dog, whom subsequently Zeus appointed guardian of his temple in Crete. Pandarus stole the dog, and carrying him to Mount Sipylus, in Lydia, gave him to Tantalus to take care of. But when Pandarus demanded the dog back, Tantalus took an oath that he had never received him. The punishment of Tantalus was proverbial in ancient times, and from it the English language has borrowed the verb "to tantalize," that is, to hold out hopes or prospects which can never be realized. See Ixion.

Tantras (from tanu tan, to believe) are the sacred writings of the Hindûs, which are said to have been composed by Siva, and bear the same relation to the votaries of Siva that the Puranas do to the votaries of Vishnu. The Saiva sect look upon the Tantras as the fifth Veda, and attribute to them equal antiquity and superior authority. The observances they prescribe have, indeed, in Bengal, almost superseded the original ritual. The date of the first composition is involved in considerable obscurity; but professor Wilson thinks that the system originated early in the Christian æra, being founded on the previous worship of the female principle and the practices of the Yoga, with the Mantras or mystical formulæ of the Vedas. The principal Tantras are the Syamarakasya, Rudrayamala, Mantramahodadhi, Saradatilaka, and Kalikatantra. Rammohun Roy alleges, in his Apology for Vedantic Theism, that among the Tantras there are forged works and passages, published as if genuine, "with the view of introducing new doctrines, new rites, or new precepts of secular law." Some of the Tantras appear to have been written chiefly in Bengal, and in the eastern districts of Hindustan, being unknown in the west and south, and the rites they teach having there failed to set aside the ceremonies of the Vedas, although they are not without an important influence upon the belief and practices of the people. The Saktas (q. v.) derive the principles of their sect, and their religious ceremonies, wholly from the Tantras, and hence are often called Tantraists.

Tantum Ergo (So great therefore). The concluding part of the hymn for Corpus Christi day, entitled Pange lingua, which is sung in the Latin Church when the holy sacrament is exposed for the worship, and elevated for the benediction of the faithful.

"Tantum ergo Sacramentum
Veneremur cernui:
Et antiquum documentum
Novo cedat ritui:
Præstet fides supplementum
Sensuum defectui.

"Genitori, genti quoque
Laus et jubilatio,
Salus, honor, virtus quoque,
Sit et benedictio:
Procedenti ab utroque
Compar sit laudatio. Amen."

Tapestry. The Church of the Middle Ages required for various purposes a great number of tapestries—for dorsalia at the back of the choir-stalls, for closing the doors and windows, for the protecting enclosures of the altars, for the veiling of the sanctuary during the fast-time (fasting-cloths), and especially for clothing the walls and the floor. At first the tapestry came from the East, until, in the 4th century, a tapestry manufactory was formed at Palermo, which, under the hands of Saracen and Byzantine workmen, imitated the Oriental patterns. These old silk webs, of which we find remains here and there in collections, show a strictly architectonic style, and are covered with figures of animals of a typical character, such as griffins, unicorns, lions, elephants, peacocks, and parrots. In the northern cloisters, tapestry-weaving was learned and soon practiced, even from the beginning of the Romanesque period, and the circle of representations was increased by Biblical and symbolical scenes, to which were added representations out of favorite poets. Tapestry-embroidery was an occupation followed with zeal in the nunneries. From the 14th century, carpets painted with size-colors on linen were also made. With the entrance of Gothic art, there appears in use a frieze-like composition, hand in hand with a naïve naturalistic border, which drives out the severe style of the earlier times. Interesting tapestries of the Romanesque period, partly with antique mythological representations, are to be seen in the treasury of the collegiate church at Quedlinburg; others of the same time, with Christian representations, in the cathedral at Halberstadt, intended for the backs of choir-stalls. A complete selection of tapestries is in the monastery of Wenhauzen, near Zell, one of them an embroidery with the history of Tristan and Isolde; others in the St. Elizabeth Church at Marburg, in St. Sebald and St. Lorenz, at Nuremberg, and in many church treasuries.

Tappan, HENRY PHILIP, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished educator, was born at Rhinebeck on the Hudson, April 23, 1805. He graduated from Union College in 1825, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1827; became assistant to the Rev. Dr. Van Vechten, in the Reformed Dutch Church at Schenectady; the next year was settled as pastor of the Congregational Church at Pittsfield, Mass.; and in 1831 was compelled by ill-health to resign. In 1832 he was appointed professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in the University of the City of New York, and resigned in 1838. During the next few years he spent most of his time in writing books and conducting a private seminary in New York city. He published, A Review of Edward's Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will (1839);—The Doctrine of the Freedom of the Will Determined by an Appeal to Consciousness (1840);—The Doctrine of the Freedom of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility (1841);—Elements of Logic, with an Introductory View of Philosophy in General, and a Preliminary View of the Reason (1844);—a treatise on University Education (1851). In the latter year he went to Europe, and on his return in 1852 published A Step from the New World to the Old. He was president of the University of Michigan from 1852 to 1863, and gave it a new life by his administration. After his retirement from this school he lived almost entirely abroad, and died Nov. 15, 1881, at Vevay, Switzerland.

Tappuah. The present Tuffah, which probably represents Beth-tappuah (Josh. xv, 53), is briefly described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey (iii, 810). Beit-Atah, which we have conjectured to be the Tappuah of Josh. xii, 11; xv, 34, is copiously described, ibid. p. 22 sq., 83; but Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 48) for the latter Biblical site the present Artuf, which lies three and a half miles to the north-west of Beit-Atah, and one and a quarter miles south-east of Surah (Zorah). It is described in the above Memoirs (iii, 22) as "a small village on a low hill, with an open valley to the west. There is a pool in the valley, where the village obtains its water. Olive-trees occur around the place." There do not seem to be any traces of antiquity. The third Tappuah, or that of Ephraim (Josh. xvi, 8; xvii, 8), or En-tappuah, is conceded by Tristram (ut sup. p. 195) to be the modern Atuf, but to this Conder objects (Memoirs, ii, 357) that there is no spring and no tombs, and that the names have but one letter in common. The place is "a mud village, built on an older site, and supplied by wells and cisterns" (ibid. p. 227).

Tasso, TORQUATO, a celebrated Italian poet, was born at Sorrento, where his parents were visiting, March 11, 1544. Soon after his parents returned to Naples with him, and committed their son, at the age of three years, to the care of a man of learning. At four he was sent to the college of the Jesuits, where he made such rapid progress that at seven years of age he was pretty well acquainted with the Latin and Greek tongues. Bernardo, the father of the poet, following his patron, the prince of Salerno, into France, committed his son, then nine years old, to Maurice Cataneo, who assiduously cultivated the early disposition of his pupil to polite literature. When Tasso was twelve years of age he went to join his father, who soon afterwards placed him in the University of Padua, where he wrote Rinaldo, a poem, being then in his eighteenth year. Invited by the principal persons of the city and college of Bologna, he took up his residence there, but shortly after, upon the invitation of Scipio Gonzaga, prince of the academy at Padua, returned to that city, and became incorporated into the academy, at the age of twenty years. He here formed the design of his celebrated poem, Jerusalem Delivered, and being urged by Alphonso II, duke of Ferrara, took up his residence in his palace. He continued to work upon his great poem, which he completed in his thirtieth year, but it was printed, even then, against his will. Not long after, being engaged in a duel, he was arrested by order of the duke, ostensibly to screen him from the designs of his enemies. After about a year's detention, he escaped, and retired to Turin, where he endeavored to remain concealed. He soon became known, and was received by the duke of Savoy, who showed him every mark of esteem. Fearful of being given up to the duke of Ferrara, he left Turin and went to Rome, where he was treated with great honor by all classes. Shortly after he took up his residence with his sister at Sorrento, and then returned to Ferrara, hoping to have his writings restored to him. Failing in this he left that city, and went to Mantua, Padua, and Venice, finally trying his fortune once more with the duke, who, pretending to believe that his mind had become affected, caused him to be confined in the hospital of Santa Anna. After seven years' confinement, his release was procured by Vincenzio Gonzaga, prince of Mantua, who brought him to his own city. Wearied with dependence, he resolved to retire to Naples, and from there he went to Bisaccio with his friend Manso. At the approach of winter they returned to Naples, and soon after Tasso went to Rome, where he lived about a year, and, after some wandering, took up his residence at Naples again with the count of Palena. Here he applied himself to the composition of Jerusalem Conquered. He abandoned Naples again to go to Rome upon the invitation of cardinal Cynthio Aldobrandini. Disgusted with the life of a courtier, he obtained permission to retire to Naples, where he took up his lodging in the Benedictine convent of San Severino. He was, however, soon recalled to Rome, to be publicly crowned with laurel in the capitol. He arrived in that city in the beginning of 1595, but while the preparations for the ceremony were being made, Tasso fell ill, and died, in the monastery of San Onofrio, April 25, 1595.

Tatwine, archbishop of Canterbury, was a distinguished scholar, poet, and divine. He was appointed to the see of Canterbury in 731, and passed the remainder of his life in the quiet routine of episcopal duty. He died in 734. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 195 sq.

Taylor, Benjamin C., D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 24, 1801. He graduated from Princeton College in 1819, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1822; was licensed the latter year, and immediately became pastor at Greenbush and Blooming Grove, Rensselaer Co., N. Y.; in 1825 at Aquackanock (now Passaic), N. J.; in 1828 at Bergen, where he was made pastor emeritus in 1870, and died, Feb. 2, 1881. He published several sermons and addresses, and a volume entitled Annals of the Clusius and Township of Bergen (1856).

Taylor, Francis, an English theologian of the 17th century, is the author of a Latin translation of Aben-Ezra's Commentary on and Rushi's Exposition of Lamentations (Lond. 1645):—Targum Hierosol. in quinque Libros Legis in Latinum Conversum (1649):—Pirke Aboth cum Versione Latina a Phil. Aquino, Additis Notis Marginalibus (1651):—Targum Prius et Posterius in Estheram, etc. (1655). Together with Arnold Boote, he published, Examen Prefationis Joh. Morini in Bibbia Græca de Textus Hebraici Corruptione et Græci Auctoritate (Leyden, 1636). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Taylor, James Barnett, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Barton-upon-Humber, England, March 19, 1804. He came to New York with his parents while an infant; removed to Virginia in 1817, having already, at the age of thirteen, made a profession of religion; began to preach at the age of sixteen, and was formally licensed at twenty. He performed, for a year or two, missionary labor in the Meherran District, Va.; was ordained May 2, 1826, at Sandy Creek, and, the same year, was called to the pastorate of the Second Church at Richmond, where he remained thirteen years. He was elected chaplain of the University of Virginia in 1839, and in 1840 became pastor of the Grace Street Church, Richmond, where he remained until 1844, and then entered upon his duties as corresponding secretary of the Southern Baptist Convention, which office he held with distinguished ability for twenty-six years. During thirteen of these years he was pastor of the Taylorsville Church, and was also in the Confederate army as colporteur and post-chaplain. For a short time he was editor of The Religious Herald. The Southern Baptist Missionary Journal and Home and Foreign Journal were established by him. He wrote also a Life of Lot Carey, a Life of Luther Rice, Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, and had prepared, in part, a History of Virginia Baptists. After the war he took a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of the freedmen. He died Dec. 22, 1871. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1134. (J. C. S.)

Taylor, John Lord, D.D., a Congregational divine, was born at Warren, Conn., May 20, 1811. He graduated from Yale College in 1835 and at the Divinity School in 1839, having been a tutor in the college for two years; was ordained pastor of the South Church, Andover, Mass., the last-mentioned year; became professor of theology and homiletics in Andover Theological Seminary in 1868, resigned in 1879, and died there, Sept. 23, 1884. Besides many contributions to the literary journals, he wrote, a Memoir of Hon. Samuel Phillips (1866):—Memorial of the Semi-Centennial Celebration of Andover Theological Seminary (1859).

Taylor, Joseph van Sommern, a missionary of India, was born at Bellary, Southern India, in 1820, where his father was a missionary of the London Society. He was educated at the Bishop's College in Calcutta and at Glasgow, graduating at the latter place in 1845. In the same year, having been accepted by the London Missionary Society, he left England for Gujerat, where he labored for thirty-four years, the last twenty-one years in connection with the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. He died in 1881. Mr. Taylor, besides translating the Confession of Faith into Gujerati, wrote two of the best grammars in that language. The natives of Gujerat are indebted to him for a History of the Christian Church, founded on that of Dr. Barth, as well as for a Book of Christian Praise and a Manual of Devotion. Several of the best tracts in the list of the Gujerat Tract and Book Society are from his pen. He also translated the Shorter Catechism, and was engaged at the time of his death on a translation of the Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation, which he left unfinished. (B. P.)

Teaching of the Twelve Apostles is the title of a newly discovered writing belonging to the Patristic period. In the year 1883 Philotheos Bryennios, metropolitan of Nicomedia, published from the Jerusalem manuscript of the year 1056, and preserved at Constantinople, a hitherto unknown writing, bearing two titles, Διδαχή τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων and Διδαχή κυρίου διὰ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. An edition with critical emendations was published in 1884 by Hilgenfeld, in his Novum Testamentum Extra Canonem Receptum (Leipzig, 1884, iv, 94-103), and from that time the republic of letters has been kept alive by translations, essays, etc.

I. Contents.—The "Teaching" comprises sixteen chapters, and may be divided into four parts: ch. i-vi, comprising the doctrinal and catechetical part, setting forth the whole duty of the Christian; ch. vii-x and xiv contains the liturgical and devotional part, giving directions for Christian worship; ch. xi-xiii and xv contains the ecclesiastical and disciplinary part, concerning church officers, and ch. xvi the eschatological part, or the Christian's hope.

II. Theology of the Teaching.—God is the Creator (i, 2), who made all things (x, 8), and is our Father in heaven (viii, 2). Nothing can happen without him (iii, 10); he is the giver of all good gifts, the author of our salvation, the object of prayer and praise (ix and x), to whom belongs all glory through Christ Jesus (viii, 2; ix, 4; x, 4). Christ is the Lord and Saviour (x, 2, 8), God's servant and God's son (ix, 2), and David's God (x, 6), the author of the gospel (viii, 2; xv, 4). He is spiritually present in his Church, and will visibly come again to judgment (xvi, 1, 7, 8). Through him knowledge and eternal life have been made known to us (ix, 8; x, 2). The Holy Spirit is associated with the Father and the Son (vii, 1, 8); he prepares man for the call of God (iv, 10), speaks through the prophets, and the sin against the Spirit shall not be forgiven (xi, 7).

The Teaching speaks of the Lord's Day as a day to be kept holy (xiv, 1), and recognises only two sacraments, Baptism and the Eucharist (vii, 1-4; ix, x, xiv).

Man is made in the image of God (v, 2) but sinful, and needs forgiveness (viii, 2); he must confess his transgressions to receive pardon (iv, 14; xiv, 1, 2). There are only two ways, the way of life and the way of death.

III. Language of the Teaching.—The "Didache" is written in Hellenistic Greek, like the New Test. It is the common Macedonian or Alexandrian dialect, with "a strong infusion of a Hebrew soul and a Christian spirit." The "Didache" contains 2190 words, 504 are New Test. words, 497 are classical, and 479 occur in the Septuagint, 15 occur for the first time in the "Didache," but are found in later writers.

IV. Authenticity of the Teaching.—It is first quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, i, 20), who cites a passage from it as "Scripture." Eusebius (died A.D. 340) mentions it as "the so-called Teachings of the Apostles" (Hist. Eccl. iii, 25), and so does Athanasius (died A.D. 373) (Epist. Fest. 39, in Opera, ed. Bened. i, 2, 963). The last mention of the "Teaching" is by Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople (died A.D. 828), who speaks of such a book as among the Apocrypha of the New Test.

V. Date, Place, and Authorship.—The most prevailing view as to the time when the Teaching was composed is between A.D. 80 and 120; but this date seems to us rather early. The majority of scholars assign the Teaching to Alexandria in Egypt, a minority to Palestine or Syria. Who the author of the Teaching was is not known. From the work itself, it may safely be stated that he was a Jewish Christian.

VI. Scripture Quotations and Allusions in the Didache.—The author of the Teaching quotes not only the Old and New Testa., but also the Apocrypha of the Old Test., as the following table will exhibit:

The absence of any reference to so many books of the New Test. accords with the view that we have before us a very early document; but it does not, of course, prove that the sacred writings were unknown to the writer, and still less does it furnish any argument for the view that they were not then known to the Church in general. The object of the writer was very limited; his intention was to furnish a manual or catechism for catechumens.

VII. Literature.—Although so recently discovered, this little tract has already been the subject of very numerous essays and expositions. In addition to the treatise mentioned above and De Rimestin, Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (Lond. 1884, 8vo), the most complete and exhaustive work, giving, besides the original text, an English translation and literary matter, is the one published by Ph. Schaff, The Oldest Church Manual, called "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" (New York, 1885). (B. P.)

Ten Broeck, ANTHONY, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city in 1815. He graduated from Columbia College, and from the General Theological Seminary in 1837; for many years was engaged in teaching; was connected with a school in Orange, N. J., under the supervision of bishop Doane; taught in the Mt. Auburn Institute in Washington; founded the bishop Bowman Institute at Pittsburgh, Pa.; and became rector of Burlington College. He was rector of St. James's Church, Eatontown, N. J., at the time of his death, Sept. 22, 1880. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881, p. 175.

Tennent, WILLIAM MACKAY, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1763, and in 1772 was ordained pastor at Greenfield, Conn. In 1781 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Abingdon, near Philadelphia, where he continued until his death, in December, 1810. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 26.

Tenney, ERDIX, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Dr. Joshua Tenney, was born at Corinth, Vt., June 11, 1801. He studied at Bradford Academy; in 1826 graduated from Middlebury College; in 1829 from the Andover Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor, Jan. 5, 1831, at Lyme, N. H., and was dismissed Aug. 12, 1867. From 1867 to 1880 he resided at Westborough, Mass., without charge; and from 1880 until death, Nov. 13, 1882, at Norwich, Conn. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 33.

Tent. The following description of this Arab domicile, from Conder's Tent Work, ii, 275, contains some additional information:

"The tents are arranged in different ways. Among the Sagar a large encampment was set out in parallel lines some fifty yards apart, the tents in each row being close together, end to end. Among the Ta'amireh and Jahalin the usual form is a rectangle. The average length of the tent is from twenty to twenty-five feet, but the small ones will sometimes be only ten feet long, and the larger forty feet. The distance between two tents in a line is about four feet. Thus a camp of twenty tents occupied a space of two hundred feet by seventy feet. In another case the form was a triangle, the reason of this arrangement being that the flocks are driven into the enclosure at night, and thus protected from the attacks of robbers or prevented from straying by themselves.

"The Arab tent is extremely unlike the usual representations, in which it is shown either as a sort of hut, as among the Turkomans, or as a bell-tent, instead of a long black 'house of hair,' with a low, sloping roof and open front. It has, however, been carefully described by Burckhardt, and there is little to add to his account. The canvas of the roof and side walls is of goat's hair, black, with occasionally stripes of white running horizontally (Cant. i, 5). The pieces of stuff are about two feet wide, and thirty to fifty feet long. The tent has generally nine poles (Awamid), arranged three and three, those in the centre being the longest; thus the tent has a low ridge both ways in order to run the rain off. The cloths at the side can be easily removed as the sun and wind requires, one side being always left open. The tents are supported by cords and by pegs (Autal), which are driven with a mallet (Judg. iv, 21). The average height of a tent is about seven feet.

"Frail and cold as these habitations might be thought to prove in winter, they are really far more comfortable than would be expected. Being so low, the wind does not blow them over, and they are, moreover, most skillfully pitched, generally below a steep bank or low swell. Even in heavy storms I have found the interiors dry, and the heavy canvas does not let the rain through. The Arabs, however, suffer very much from rheumatism in winter. In summer they occasionally inhabit reed huts ('Aish), which are cooler than the tents."

Ter Haar, BERNARD, a Dutch theologian, was born at Amsterdam, June 13, 1806. He studied at Leyden, and was in 1839 doctor of theology. After having served several congregations with great success, he was in 1843 called to Amsterdam, and was made professor of theology in 1854 at Utrecht. In 1874 he retired to Velp, near Arnheim, and died Nov. 19, 1880. He published, Jean et Thérèse (Arnheim, 1838);—Histoire de la Réformation (1845; 5th ed. 1854);—De Historie Ecclesiastica et Theologia Moralis Studio (Utrecht, 1854);—De Historica Religiosa Christiana Indole (1860);—L'Historiographie de l'Histoire Ecclésiastique (1870-71, 2 vols.). Theberath, CHARLES S., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in one of the Rhenish provinces of Prussia in 1807. He came to America in 1840, and settled in New York city, where he founded a Sunday-school in the fifteenth ward, from which sprang the Second German Presbyterian Church. He was the first pastor of this church, where he labored successfully several years. Receiving a call from the German Presbyterian Church of Paterson, N. J., he accepted the same, and remained four years. After this he took charge of a mission-school in Albany, N. Y., where he continued until his health failed, when he resigned and removed to Newark, N. J., where he died, Oct. 8, 1882. (W. P. S.)

Thebez. The modern Tabús is described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey (ii, 229, 247).

Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, was born in Normandy, the year of his birth not being known. He was the third archbishop supplied to the Church of England by the celebrated abbey of Bec. He was appointed prior in 1127, and ten years afterwards was elected abbot. In 1138 he was invited to England by king Stephen and his queen, Matilda. He was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury in 1139. It reflects credit upon the character of Theobald that, in that rude and boisterous age, his residence became the centre of all the learning and ability of the kingdom. "For two generations several of the most distinguished men in the country could refer to the happy hours they had passed at Theobald's court." He appears to have been banished by the king at one time, but he returned to England, and matters were again set right. The last time Theobald appeared in public was at the consecration of Richard Peche, bishop of Lichfield. He was too infirm to officiate, but witnessed the consecration. He died April 18, 1161. He published, Das Reich Gottes, etc. (Ludwigsburg, 1862):—Predigten (ibid. 1874, 2d ed. 1879):—Blicke in die Herrlichkeit des Vater-Unsers (1881, 2d ed. 1882). (B. P.)

Thiersch, HEINRICH WILHELM JOSIAS, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Munich, Nov. 5, 1817. In 1840 he commenced his academical career at Erlangen, and in 1843 was professor at Marburg, but resigned his professorship in 1850 on account of his conversion to the "Catholic Apostolic Church." He spent many years as a private tutor in South Germany, continuing all the time active and fertile in the production of theological works. In 1875 Thiersch retired to Basle, and died Dec. 8, 1885. He published, Ad Pentateuchi Versionem Alexandrinam Critice Pertractandum Prolegomena (Erlangen, 1840):—De Pentateuchi Versione Alexandrina Libri Tres (1841):—Hebräische Grammatik (1842; 2d ed. 1858):—Versuch zur Herstellung des historischen Standpunkts für die Kritik der neutestamentlichen Schriften (1845):—*Einige Worte über die Aechtheit der newest. Thomas, the name of several Scotch prelates.

1. Bishop of Galloway, who swore fealty to Edward I of England in 1296, and recognised king Robert Bruce's title to the crown in 1304. He was bishop here before 1309. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 273.

2. Bishop of the Isles about 1334. He died in Scotland, Sept. 20, 1338. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 303.

3. Bishop of Galloway in 1362. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 274.

4. Bishop of Ross in 1481, and founder of the collegiate church of Tain the same year. He was still bishop there in 1487. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 189.

Thomas OF WILTON, D.D., was made first chancellor and then dean of St. Paul's, London. In his time (during the reign of Edward IV) occurred the contest between the prelates and friars, the latter upbraiding the former for their pomp and plenty. Wilton entered into this contest, and charged upon the monks that, although confessing their poverty, they really, by their influence at the confessional, opened the coffers of all the treasures in the land. He wrote a book, An Validi Mendicantes sint in Statu Perfectionis, maintaining that such were rogues by the laws of God and man, and fitter for the house of correction than a state of perfection. Wilton flourished in 1460. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 335.

Thomas, Benjamin, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in South Wales in 1823, and, when quite young, removed to Ohio. He graduated from Denison University, was ordained in 1846, and, for a time, taught in Vermillion College. His pastorates were as follows: Mansfield, Monroeville, First Church in Zanesville, Bradfield, and Newark, all in Ohio. Subsequently he removed to Bloomington, Ill., and became western secretary of the American Bible Union. Having occupied other prominent positions in his denomination in Illinois, he removed to Arkansas in 1864, and became president of the university at Judsonia. During the war he served as a soldier in the Federal army, and became brevet-colonel. He died at Little Rock, Ark., March 5, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1147. (J. C. S.)

Thomas, John, M.D., the founder of the Christadelphians (q. v.), was born at Hoxton Square, London, April 12, 1805. His father was a Dissenting clergyman while in England and a Baptist clergyman after coming to the United States in 1832. John was educated as a physician, beginning, at the age of sixteen, a medical course under a private physician, and continuing it for three years at St. Thomas's Hospital. He then assisted a London physician a year, and practiced medicine at Hackney three years. Although a member of his father's church from boyhood, his first attention to creeds was in 1830 or 1831, when he began the study of the subject of immortality, upon which he made contributions to The Lancet. Purely as a business venture he sailed for New York, May 1, 1832. Shortly after reaching Cincinnati he became acquainted with Walter Scott, the original founder of the "Christians," or Campbellites. Before he was aware of it, he had heard from Scott a full exposition of his doctrines, had assented to them as appearing rational, and had been induced to indicate that assent by immersion at ten o'clock at night in the Miami canal. On a trip east, in 1833, he met and visited Alexander Campbell, was forced reluctantly into assisting him in public addresses, and was so well received by the people that, on reaching Baltimore, he made addresses every evening for a week upon religious topics. During 1834 and 1835 he practiced medicine in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, speaking to the Campbellite congregations on Sundays. In May, 1834, he issued the first number of The Apostolic Advocate, a monthly magazine, of which five volumes were issued in all. His first opposition to the received views of the sect consisted in publishing, in No. 6 of his magazine, an article on Anabaptism, resulting in controversy between him and Mr. Campbell. The former insisted upon the re-immersion of persons coming to the sect from Baptist churches; the latter denied its necessity. On Dec. 1, 1835, Dr. Thomas made another advance in free-thought by publishing thirty-four questions which hinted at materialism, annihilation of the wicked, a physical kingdom, etc. The chief outcry against him was for his materialistic tendencies. By 1836 Mr. Campbell denounced him openly. About this time Dr. Thomas moved to Amelia County, Va., abandoned the practice of medicine, set up a printing-office on his farm, and devoted himself largely to literary work. In August, 1837, he engaged in a public discussion with a Presbyterian clergyman, Rev. Mr. Watt. In November he was publicly disfellowshipped by Mr. Campbell, while, in response to the demands of the latter, he was called to account by the churches at Painesville and Bethel for his views. They did not, however, see fit to discipline him, contenting themselves with some suggestions concerning the spirit in which he should carry on the discussion. In 1838 he made a preaching tour through the southern counties of Virginia, coming in conflict more or less with Mr. Campbell. In 1839 he removed to Longrove, Ill., took up two hundred and eighty-eight acres of land, and for two years confined his attention to farming. After a brief residence at St. Charles, where his printing-office and physician's office were burned, he opened an office at Hennepin, and was appointed lecturer on chemistry in Franklin Medical College. The Advocate having now been suspended for nearly three years, he started, in 1842, a monthly called The Investigator, of which he issued twelve numbers. In 1843 he began The Herald of the Future Age, at Louisville, Ky., and continued it at Richmond, where, in 1844, he held his first meetings separately from the Campbellites. Collisions with the latter led to further study and to wider divergence of creed. He published his articles of belief at this time, and in October, 1846, delivered a series of ten lectures in New York in defence thereof. Having still further perfected his declaration of belief, he decided, in February or March, 1847, that he ought to be baptized into that belief; accordingly, he requested a friend to immerse him and to say over him, "Upon confession of your faith in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, I baptize you into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." After fourteen years of search he was now satisfied that he had reached the truth. He began to advocate it more earnestly than ever, visiting Baltimore, where he was permitted to speak in the Campbellite meeting-house; Buffalo, where he was furnished with the Millerite place of worship, and New York, where he was received by the Campbellites. With letters from many Campbellites and other friends he sailed from New York in June, 1848, for England. His enemies had communicated his peculiar doctrines to the Campbellites of Nottingham and other places. He was therefore refused audience by them, but he addressed the Millerites of Nottingham, Derby, Birmingham, and Plymouth. The London Campbellites denounced him officially. Those of Lincoln and Newark received him, and the former made him their delegate to the Church convention at Glasgow. An effort to prevent his sitting was unsuccessful, and he addressed large audiences in the City Hall. A call for the publication of his views, while at Glasgow, led to the preparation of Elpis Israel (478 pp. royal 8vo). At Edinburgh he delivered a course of ten lectures. Spending the winter of 1848-49 in London, upon his book, he made subsequent tours through England and Scotland lecturing and preaching. In November, 1850, he came again to the United States, resumed The Herald of the Future Age in 1851, and published vol. i of Eureka. He travelled and advocated his views through the States and Canada until 1862, when the war caused the cessation of his paper, and he sailed for Liverpool. He visited all the places where groups had been organized to advocate his views, and, returning to the United States, issued the second volume of Eureka. The third volume was published in 1868. A third trip to Great Britain was made in 1869, when he found that his Birmingham church had grown from twelve to one hundred and twenty-three members. Crossing to the United States for the fourth time, in May, 1870, he began a tour of the country, but was prostrated at Worcester, Mass., and compelled to give up his work. He died in New York, March 5, 1871. In addition to the periodicals and books mentioned above, he issued, The Apostasy Unveiled (1838, 148 pp.):—Anatolia (1854, 102 pp.):—Anastasia (46 pp.):—Phanerois, and several tracts and lectures. Thomas, Robert S., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Scott County, Ky., June 20, 1805. He united with the Church in 1821, was ordained, in 1830, pastor at Columbia, Mo., and for several years performed much evangelical labor in Missouri, being the first to introduce Sabbath-schools into that state. He was chosen professor of languages and moral science in the State University, and in 1853 president of William Jewell College. He finally removed to Kansas City, where he organized a church, of which he was the pastor until his death, June 12, 1859. See Catholic, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1149. (J. C. S.)

Thomas, Thomas, D.D., a Welsh Baptist minister and educator, was born at Cowbridge, Jan. 12, 1805. He began to preach when fifteen years of age, and labored with much zeal. At the age of seventeen he entered the Baptist College at Abergavenny, and two years later removed to Stepney College, where he spent four years in faithful study. In 1828 he entered upon the pastorate of the Church in Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, London, where he remained eight years. In 1836, on the removal of Abergavenny College to Pontypool, he became its president, and retained the office until 1877. In the beginning of this work he was energetic in his ministerial labors, and soon formed a Baptist Church, which, in time, became the leading one of the town. He died Dec. 6, 1881. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1883, p. 278.

Thomas, Thomas E., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in London, England, in 1812, and graduated from Miami University in 1834. His first pastoral charge was at Harrison, near Cincinnati, and his second at Hamilton, for twelve years. He then accepted the presidency of Hanover College, Ind., and passed from that to a professorship in the Theological Seminary at New Albany. In 1859 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Dayton, O., and in 1871 was elected professor of Biblical literature in Lane Theological Seminary. He died Feb. 2, 1875. Dr. Thomas was a man of strong mind, and one of the leaders of the anti-slavery party in the Presbyterian Church long before the civil war. See Presbyterian, Feb. 13, 1875.

Thompson, Thomas Jefferson, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Dorchester County, Md., March 13, 1803. He was converted in his thirteenth year, began his itinerant career in 1823, and in 1826 entered the Philadelphia Conference. In it he served in turn Milford and Talbot Circuits; St. George's, Philadelphia; Rahway, N. J.; St. John's, Philadelphia; Kent Circuit, Md.; Trenton, N. J.; Newark; East Jersey District; Harrisburg, Pa.; Fifth Street, Philadelphia; St. Paul's; Snow Hill District; Asbury Church, Wilmington; Union Church, Philadelphia; South Philadelphia District; Reading District, as general agent of Wesleyan Female College; Dover, Del.; Easton District, Dover District, and Wilmington District—thus summing twenty-two and a half years on circuits and stations, two years as agent, and twenty-five years as presiding elder. In 1836 the New Jersey Conference was organized and Mr. Thompson became identified therewith, but the next year returned to the Philadelphia Conference. In 1868, on the formation of the Wilmington Conference, he fell within its limits, and therein remained till his death, at Wilmington, Del., Nov. 29, 1874. Dr. Thompson was a member of the General Conferences of 1844, 1852, 1856, 1860, 1868, 1872. He was characterized by promptness and sterling integrity, zeal and solid worth. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 27.

Thorne, James, an eminent minister of the Bible Christians, was born at Shebbear, Devonshire, England, Sept. 21, 1795. At an early age he was converted, and in 1816 entered the ministry. By nature and grace he was peculiarly fitted to be a leading spirit in the Connection. His gifts were diversified, his piety deep, his devotion to the work thorough, and his spirit catholic, childlike, and forbearing. He was president of the Conference five times, viz., in 1831, 1835, 1842, 1857, and 1865; secretary from 1819 to 1830, from 1832 to 1835, in 1849 and 1850, and in 1853—eighteen times; and for several years editor and book-steward. He died Jan. 28, 1872. See Minutes of the Conference, 1872; Jubilee Volume, published in 1866.

Thorneborough (or Thornburgh), John, B.D., an English divine of the 17th century, was born at Salisbury, Wiltshire, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, was preferred bishop of Limerick in 1593, dean of York in 1603, bishop of Bristol in 1617, at the same time holding his deanery and his Irish bishopric in commendam with it. He was translated to Worcester in the latter year, and died July 19, 1641. His skill in chemistry is spoken of. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 326.

Throp, CHARLES, D.D., F.R.S., an English divine, was born at Gateshead rectory, Oct. 13, 1783. He was educated at the Cathedral School, and at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and subsequently was appointed tutor of University College. In 1807 he was presented with the rectorship of Ryton, where he spent several years in active service; in 1829 was presented with a prebendal stall in the Cathedral of Durham; and about 1831 was promoted to the archdeaconry of Durham. At the same time he was elected one of the lord Crewe trustees, in which capacity he exerted himself to the utmost. On the establishment of the University of Durham, he became its first warden. He died at Ryton rectory, Durham, Oct. 10, 1862. Dr. Throp was proverbial for his love of the fine arts, his gallery of pictures surpassing any other in the north of England. He was a man of rare benevolence, giving £400 per annum to endow the parish of Winlaton, and erecting a house of worship at Greenside, at his own expense, to the memory of his parents. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1862, p. 693.

Thube, CHRISTIAN GOTTLÖB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Saxony, March 19, 1742. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1775 rector at Butzow, Mecklenburg, in 1776 preacher at Baumgarten, and died Jan. 25, 1826. He published, Anleitung zum richtigen Verstande der Offenbarung Johannis (Minden, 1786; 2d ed. 1799):—Das Buch des Propheten Daniel, neu übersetzt und erklärt (1797):—Das Buch des Propheten Sacharja, neu übersetzt und erklärt (1801). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Thummell, C. B., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Germany in 1802; in 1820 entered the University of Halle, Prussia, and graduated from the University of Tübingen, in Wurtemberg. In the spring of 1824 he was licensed to preach, and was ordained in 1826. On his arrival in America, in August of that year, he commenced the study of the English language. The first year he was employed as a missionary. From 1827 to 1838 he was professor of languages in Hartwick Seminary; and then accepted a professorship in the Lutheran Seminary at Lexington, S. C. In 1845 he removed to Prairieville, Ill., where he remained until the close of his life, May 23, 1881. For fifteen years he was secretary and treasurer of the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Palmyra, Ill. See Lutheran Observer, July 29, 1881.

Thurston, ELI, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Brighton, Mass., June 14, 1808. At the age of seventeen he went to Millbury to learn the gunsmith's trade, but having been converted in his twentieth year, he immediately began to study for the ministry, attending Day's Academy at Wrentham, and graduating from Amherst College in 1834. The year following he spent in Andover Theological Seminary, and the two succeeding studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Jacob Ide, of West Medway. He was ordained pastor in Hallowell, Me., Jan. 3, 1838, and filled this position for ten years. The following twenty years, dating from March 21, 1849, he was pastor of the Central Church in Fall River, Mass. He died there, Dec. 19, 1869. In theology Dr. Thurston was ranked as a Hopkinsian Calvinist, and his sermons were all constructed on the basis of his theology. As a preacher he was remarkable for clearness of statement and directness of argument. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 433.

Tiben (also written Twin or Dwin), COUNCILS OF (Concilium Therinense). Tiben (perhaps the same as Thevis or Divo, supposed by some to be the present Erivan), under Chosroes II, became the capital of Armenia, and the religious centre of the realm. Several councils were held there.

I. The first council, held in 452, declared Tiben the seat of the catholicos.

II. The second council was summoned by the catholicos, Nerses II, in 527, and passed thirty-eight canons, the last of which ordered a fast of one week every month.

III. The third council was held in 551, under Moses II, with a view of regulating the Easter festival. The 11th day of July, 553, was to begin the Armenian æra, and was declared the New Year's day of the first year.

IV. The fourth council, held in 596, was important for bringing about a separation between the Armenians and Georgians. Up to the year 580 the Georgians elected their own catholicos, who was always ordained by the Armenian. About that time, when the Georgian catholicos had died, the Georgians asked Moses II to elect one for them. He appointed Cyron, a very learned theologian, who decreed the acceptance of the acts of the Council of Chalcedon. Moses' successor, Abraham I, who differed with Cyron concerning the Council of Chalcedon, urged the Georgian catholicos to reject the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, but in vain. At the fourth Council of Tiben, Cyron and his followers were condemned. This act was the occasion of much controversy among the Armenians.

V. The fifth council, held under Nerses III, in 645, condemned all heretics, and especially the Council of Chalcedon and its supporters.

VI. The sixth council was convened by Nerses III, in 648, which again condemned the Council of Chalcedon.

VII. In 719 the seventh council was held, under John IV; thirty-two canons were passed, which provided, among other things, that the altar and baptismal font should be made of stone, unleavened bread and unmixed wine should be used in the communion, the clause "Thou that wast crucified for us," in the Trisagion, should be sung three times, morning and evening, as well as at the mass, etc. The last canon strictly forbade the intercourse with the Paulicians.

VIII. The last or eighth council was held in 726, and condemned Julian Halicarnassensis, his followers, and his writings. Tiben is also celebrated for the martyrdom which some faithful Christians suffered there. See Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. (B. P.)

Tiberias. The present Tubariya is described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, i, 361, 418.

Tidman, ARTHUR, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Mickleton, Nov. 14, 1792. He was educated for the medical profession, but afterwards studied theology with Rev. George Collison, and in 1813 commenced missionary work in Sidmouth. In 1818 he received a call from Frome, and in 1828 settled at Barbican Chapel, London. During the last years of his pastorate he held the office of foreign secretary of the London Missionary Society. He died March 6, 1868. Dr. Tidman was well versed in all civil and diplomatic questions of the day; cool, far-seeing, and practical in all questions of Church doctrine or government, and especially distinguished by the wisdom, energy, and depth of his spiritual perception. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 281.

Tieftrunk, JOHANN HEINRICH, a Lutheran theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born in 1760 at Oestenhäfen, near Rostock. He studied at Rostock and Halle, was in 1792 professor at Halle, and died Oct. 7, 1837. He published, Einzig möglicher Zweck Jesu aus dem Grundgesetze der Religion entwickelt (2d ed. Halle, 1793):—Versuch einer Kritik der Religion (1790):—Censur des christlichen protestantischen Lehrbegriffs nach den Prinzipien der Religionskritik (Berlin, 1791-95, 3 parts; 2d ed. 1796):—De Modo Deum Cognoscendi (1792):—Dilucidationes ad Theoreticum Religiosæ Christianæ Partem (1798, 2 parts):—Religion der Mündigen (1800, 2 parts). Timann (or Tidemann), JOHANN, the reformer of Bremen, was born at Amsterdam about the year 1500. In 1522 he went to Wittenberg, where he made the acquaintance of Luther and Melancthon. In 1524 he went to Bremen, and was appointed pastor of St. Martin's. He now introduced those reformatory changes which have immortalized his name. In 1529 count Enno II, of East Frisia, called him to Emden to work there against the Anabaptists. In 1533 the city council adopted a church order, which was, no doubt, prepared by Timann, and was approved by Luther and Bugenhagen. Timann was also present at the colloquy in Worms, and at the meetings held at Ratisbon in 1541. He died Feb. 17, 1557, at Nienburg. See Rotermund, Lexikon aller Gelehrten in Bremen, ii, 216 sq. (where a list of Timann's writings is given); Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Timnah (or Timnath). There seem to be three localities thus designated.

1. In the mountains of Judah (Gen. xxxviii, 12-14; Josh. xv, 57). For this no modern representative of a corresponding name (Tibneh) has been discovered in the region required, for the ruined site, Tibna, two and a half miles east of Beit Netfif, and nine miles west of Bethlehem, suggested by Conder (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 53), and containing only "foundations" (ibid. p. 161), is entirely out of the neighborhood of the associated localities (in Josh.).

2. In the plain of Judah (Josh. xv, 10; Judg. xiv, 1, 2, 5; 2 Chron. xxviii, 18). The present representative, Tibnah, lies five and a half miles north-east of Tell es-Safieh (Gath), and eight miles south of Abu Shushah (Gezer). It is merely described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 441) as "ruined walls, caves, and wine-presses, with rock-cut cisterns. The water supply is from a spring on the north side."

3. In Mount Ephraim (Josh. xix, 50; xxiv, 30; Judg. ii, 9). The modern ruin, Tibneh, which lies ten miles north-west of Beitin (Bethel), and ten and a half miles north-east of Jimzû, is described at length in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 374 sq. Lieut. Conder remarks (Tent Work, ii, 229):

"It seems to me very doubtful how far we can rely on the identity of the site with that of Timnath-Heres. It is certain that this is the place called Timnath by Jerome, a town of importance, capital of a district in the hills, and on the road from Lydda to Jerusalem, the position of which is fixed by references to surrounding towns. But the Jewish tradition, and also that of the modern Samaritans, points to Kefr Hâris as the burial-place of Joshua. It is remarkable, however, that a village called Kefr Ishw'a, or 'Joshua's hamlet,' exists in the immediate neighborhood of the ruin of Tibneh."

Tiphseh (2 Kings xv, 16) is thought by Lieut. Conder (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 169) to be (different from that of 1 Kings iv, 24) the present Khurbet Tufsa, six miles south-west of Shechem (Nablûs), and described (ibid. p. 198) as "a small ruined village in gardens, appears to be modern."

Tirzah. The present Teisur, which Tristram assumes (Bible Places, p. 196) as the modern representative, lies twelve miles east by north from Sebastieh (Samaria), and is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 228, 245). As to the identity of the name, Lieut. Conder remarks (Tent Work, ii, 108):

"It contains the exact letters of the Hebrew word, though the last two radicals are interchanged in position, a kind of change not unusual among the peasantry. The beauty of the position and the richness of the plain on the west, the ancient remains, and the old main road to the place from Shechem, seem to agree well with the idea of its having once been a capital; and if I am right in the suggestion, then the old sepulchres are probably, some of them, those of the early kings of Israel before the royal family began to be buried in Samaria."

Titelmann, FRANCIS, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1497 at Hasselt, Belgium, and studied at Liege. Having completed his studies, he joined the Capuchins, went to Rome in 1537, and died the same year. He wrote, Commentaria in Omnes Psalmos:—Paraphrastica Elucidatio in Librum Job:—Commentaria in Ecclesiasten Salomonis:—Commentaria in Cantica Canticorum:—Collatio pro Editione Vulgata Sacre Scriptura:—Elucidatio in Omnes Epistolas Pauli, etc. See Miræus, Flugiu Illustrum Belgii Scriptorum; Andree, Bibliotheca Belgica; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Titius, GERHARD, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Quellinburg, Dec. 17, 1620, and studied at different universities. In 1646 he was professor of Hebrew at Helmstädt, in 1650 doctor of theology, and died June 7, 1681. Titius was a voluminous writer. Of his publications we mention, De Principio Fidei Christianæ seu Canonica Scriptura:—De Ministris Ecclesiæ:—De Beatitudine et Damnatione Aeterna ex Mischnajoth et Commentariis Rabbinorum Considerata:—De Theopaschitarum Hæresi:—De Orthodoxa Fidei Christianæ Doctrina:—De Jesu Christi Officio Prophetico, Sacerdotali et Regio, etc. See Witte, Memoria Theologorum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Tobenz, DANIEL, an Augustinian, was born at Vienna in 1743. In 1768 he was made a priest, in 1772 doctor of theology, and in 1775 professor of theology at Vienna. In 1811 he retired from his professorship, and died Aug. 20, 1819. He published, Institutiones, Usus et Doctrinæ Patrum (Vienna, 1779-83):—Examen Tractatus Joannis Barbegræi de Doctrina Morali Patrum Ecclesiæ (1785):—Commentarius in Novum Testamentum 1804-6, 2 vols.):—Paraphrasis Psalmorum ex Hebraico

Adornata, Notis et Summariis Instructa (2d ed. 1814). His works were published under the title Opera Omnia (1822, 15 vols.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Todd, AMBROSE S., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Ambrose Todd, was born at Huntington, Conn., Dec. 6, 1798. His early education was acquired at Cheshire Academy, and Yale College conferred upon him the honorary degree of A.M. in 1824. He was ordained presbyter June 30, 1823, and his first charge comprised the parishes of Reading, Danbury, Greenwich, New Canaan, Darien, and Stamford. For thirty-eight years he was rector of St. John's, in the latter place, and died there, June 23, 1861. He filled many offices of honor and responsibility in the diocese, and was universally respected. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1862, p. 557.

Toles, RUSSELL G., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Dunham, N. Y., in 1811. He graduated from Madison University at an early age, studied theology, and then took charge of a Baptist Church in Cooperstown, where he was ordained. At the breaking-out of the rebellion he was given control of one branch of the Christian Commission, and stationed at Fortress Monroe. From these duties he was called to the Howard Mission of New York. He founded, with the aid of ten wealthy laymen, the Wanderers' Home, in Baldwin Place, Boston, in 1865. At first it was a mission school as well as a home, and children, and even infants, were carried there in the daytime by their parents, and then taken home at night; but eventually it became a permanent home for children until adopted into families. Dr. Toles died in Boston, July 11, 1884.

Tonel, SIMON DE, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Moray in 1171. He was a monk of Melrose, and before that he had been abbot at Cogshall, in Essex, England. He died in 1184. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 136.

Torry, PATRICK, D.D., a bishop of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, died at Peterhead, Oct. 3, 1852, aged ninety years. He was consecrated Oct. 12, 1808. At the time of his death he was bishop of Dunkeld, Dunblane, and Fife, Scotland. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1853, p. 159.

Tosiphta (תוספתא, the addition or supplement) is the title of a great halachic work, which originated in the time of the Mishna (q. v.). It is of great importance, because the Tosiphta (or Tosefta, as it is also called) contains the decisions of the Jewish teachers in their original form, while the Mishna gives them in an abbreviated manner. Thus many things are contained in the Tosiphta which are not found in the Mishna. The Tosiphta is also richer in quotations from the Old Test. While we have noticed twelve variations in the "textus receptus" of the Mishna—we say "textus receptus," because Lowe's edition, from the Cambridge MS. (The Mishnah on which the Palestinian Talmud Rests, edited from the unique MS. preserved in the University Library of Cambridge [Cambridge, 1883]) does not always agree with the common text—and about ninety-five in the Gemara, we have collated two hundred and thirty-three variations from the Tosiphta, that is, more than double the number that the Talmud presents. The best edition is that of M. S. Zuckerman, Tosefta nach den Wiener und Erfurter Handschriften herausgegeben (Pasewalk, 1880), and it is to this edition that our references are made. The following incomplete list of variations will at once show the importance of this work for the Old-Test. scholar.

Exod. xxxix, 43, כֹּל is omitted, p. 521.

Lev. vii, 19, כֹּל is omitted, p. 169.

vii, 29, the reading is, "the blood of the peace offerings," for "the sacrifice of his peace offerings," p. 47.

xiv, 57, "and to teach," so Sept., Syr., p. 618.

xvi, 13, "upon the ark," instead of "upon the testimony," p. 181.

Numb. v, 15, "he shall put no oil upon her nor put frankincense upon her," the reading is עֲלֶיהָ וְעָלֶיהָ, p. 234.

xi, 22, the first וְשָׂא לָהֶם omitted, p. 305.

Dent. v, 14, וְאֵבֶרֶךְ וְאֵמָחָד omitted, p. 355.

xvii, 9, חֲבֵרִים הָלִוִּים וְאֵל omitted, p. 311.

xxiv, 19, כִּשְׁדָּךְ omitted, p. 22.

Josh. i, 1, the last three words omitted, p. 515.

iii, 16, מֵאֲדָם, so all versions, p. 310; the Revised Version, "at Adam," with marginal note; another reading, "from Adam."

Josh. iv, 3, the reading is, "hence from under the feet of the priests twelve," p. 310.

iv, 5, at the end, "and leave them in the place where the feet of the priests stood," p. 310.

viii, 33, and their officers, וְשֹׁטְרֵיהֶם, p. 311; so also Targum (ed. Lagarde), and Mishna, Sota, ch. vii, § 5; but Lowe's Cambridge edition reads as the present text of the Bible.

1 Kings x, 27, "for abundance" omitted, p. 71.

2 Kings xviii, 4, "children" omitted, p. 465.

Job xxxvi, 11, "they shall walk old in the good of their days." The Masoretic text reads יִכְלִי, and the mark חֲדָא ל. e. it is thus written, viz. with ח, indicates that there already existed a diversity of readings. Indeed, Michaelis (Hebr. Bible, in loco) adduces a number of MSS. which read יִכְלִי, with bet.

Prov. ix, 1, "wise women build." The plural noun with a singular verb is strange; the Sept., Targ., and Syr. read חֲכָמֹת.

xx, 27, "the lamp of God" = אֶלְכֹהִים, p. 154; so Targ., Talmud Penachim, fol. 7, col. 2; fol. 8, col. 1, and ancient Midrashim.

Ezek. xlvii, 4, "and caused me to pass through the waters, waters that were to the joins." Bär and Delitzsch, in their edition of Ezekiel, remark, in loco, "in tractatu Yoma 77b, et Tosefta, Succa iii, hic locus adducitur, tanquam si scriptum esset קִיְיִם עָלֶיהָ עַד מִי עַד רֵעֵרָא in Reuchliniano prima manus sic scripserat."

xlviii, 8, "to Galilee to the Front Sea," אֶל הַיָּם הַקִּדְמוֹנִי, p. 196; the "Front Sea" is explained by דָּוִד יִצְחָק שֶׁל סוּדוֹם, i. e. that is the sea of Sodom. The reading is not, as in the Masoretic text, הַיָּם הַקִּדְמוֹנִי, but הַיָּם הַקִּדְמוֹנִי, so read Sept., Targ., Syriac. One codex to which Bär and Delitzsch attach great importance, the codex Javanensis, reads, as the two editors note, הַיָּם הַקִּדְמוֹנִי, cum gimmel Kamezato.

xlviii, 11, יָרֵם, p. 196; so also Bär and Delitzsch, against the לָא of the textus receptus.

Zech. viii, 19, "love truth," וְהִאֲמַרְוּ, p. 241; so also Talmud, Yebamoth, fol. 14, col. 2.

A few of these variations have already been noted by De Rossi in his Varie Lectiones. A complete list is given by Pick in Stadel's Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft (Giessen, 1886). (B. P.)

Totten, SILAS, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was for a long time engaged in educational work in Williamsburg, Va., until 1859. In that year he was elected president of the Iowa State University, and also ministered in Trinity Church, Iowa City. For a number of years he was one of the standing committee of the diocese of Iowa; was one of the trustees of Griswold College, Davenport, and was identified with the missionary work in his diocese. In 1864 he was rector of St. John's Church, Decatur, Ill.; in 1867 became rector of Christ Church Seminary, Lexington, Ky., in charge of which he remained until his death, Oct. 7, 1873. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 139.

Toussain (Lat. Thassanus), PIERRE, father of Daniel, was born at St. Laurent, Lorraine, in 1499. He studied theology at Cologne, Paris, and Rome, and was made a canon at the cathedral of Metz. When the persecution against the Protestants began, he fled to Basle, and formally embraced the Reformation. Two attempts which he made to propagate his views in France

(at Metz and in Paris) ended with imprisonment; but in 1539 the duke of Württemberg made him superintendent of Mümpelgard, where he introduced the Reformation, not without great difficulties, however, as he was a Calvinist, and the duke a Lutheran. Toussain died in 1573. See Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Townley, CHARLES GOSTLING, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in 1780. He devoted himself to the study of law, but with his brother Henry prepared himself for the ministry. After studying divinity at Hoxton Academy he began to preach in Ireland, laboring with self-denying devotedness for the good of both Romanists and Protestants. From 1817 to 1841 he preached in Limerick and vicinity. He then returned to England, where he resided at Brixton, afterwards at Pimlico, and became pastor of a small church at Mortlake, Surrey, where he erected school-houses at his own expense. He died at Pimlico, June 17, 1856. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 209.

Townsend, STEPHEN, M.D., Ph.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1808, and was for forty-six years a member of the Philadelphia Conference, being a supernumerary from 1875 until his death, Aug. 5, 1881. He was a man of extensive scholarship. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 71.

Townson (or Tonson), ROBERT, D.D., a divine of the 17th century, was born in St. Botolph's Parish, Cambridge, became fellow of Queen's College, being admitted therein when but twelve years of age. He was an excellent preacher, attended king James as chaplain into Scotland, became dean of Westminster in 1617, bishop of Salisbury in 1620, and died May 15, 1621. See Fuller, Worthies (Nuttall), i, 231.

Tracy, SAMUEL WALTER, D.D., an English Independent minister, was born at Portsea, in February, 1778. He studied under Rev. Dr. Bogue, preached at Lichfield, next at Hot Wells, near Bristol, then at Yeovil, was secretary of the London Missionary Society, spent several years on the Continent, and afterwards preached at Hounslow, Chelsea, and Brixton Rise. He died Feb. 16, 1853. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 256.

Trail, WALTER, a Scotch prelate, a canon of St. Andrews, was elected bishop of that diocese in 1385, and was still there in 1400. He died in the castle of St. Andrews in 1401. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 26.

Transcaucasian Tartar Version of the Scriptures. A peculiar and rather corrupt dialect of the Turkish is spoken by the greater part of the Moslem population in Georgia, Shusti, Shirwan, Derbend, and North-west Persia. As it is vernacular in numerous tribes in all the Russian provinces beyond the Caucasus, this dialect has been termed, by way of distinction, the Transcaucasian. Parts of the New Test. were prepared in this language many years ago by Mirza Ferookh and the Rev. Dr. Pfander. In 1875 the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society proposed to reprint the gospels under the superintendence of Mr. Abraham Amirchanjanz, the son of Mirza Ferookh, who has latterly been employed in the service of the Basle missions. From the report of 1877 we learn that the British Bible Society resolved to print the remaining portions of the New Test., and Mr. Amirchanjanz has revised the remainder of his father's manuscript, and translated the Epistle to the Romans. In 1878 the entire New Test. was printed under the superintendence of Messrs. Amirchanjanz and Sauerwein. From the report of 1881 we learn that the British and Foreign Bible Society had secured the entire services of Mr. Amirchanjanz for editorial work, and that he had undertaken a translation of the Old Test. This translation, which was completed in 1883, induced the American missionaries to give up their version, on which they were engaged, and unite with Mr. Amirchanjanz in a final revision of the Old Test., in order to secure but one version of the Bible in the Transcaucasian language. (B. P.)

Trapier, PAUL, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, was for several years prior to 1856 rector in Charleston, S. C. In 1857 he resided in Lynchburg, Va., and remained there until 1859, when he removed to Camden, S. C., having been appointed professor of ecclesiastical history and the evidences of Christianity in the theological seminary there. When the seminary was removed, in 1866, to Spartansburg, Dr. Trapier removed to that place, holding the same professorship. In 1868 he was assigned to ecclesiastical history and exegesis. In 1870 he removed to Locust Grove, Md., and became rector of Shrewsbury parish, where he remained until his death, July 12, 1872, aged sixty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 133.

Treat, SKIAH BURR, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Hartland, Conn., Feb. 19, 1804. After studying at Lenox Academy and Hopkins Grammar-school, he graduated from Yale College in 1824; in 1826 was admitted to the bar, and began the practice of his profession at East Windsor Hill, removing, however, in 1831 to Penn Yan, N. Y.; where he became a Christian, and, abandoning the law, graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1835. The next year he became pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J. In 1840 he was associated with Rev. Dr. Abalom Peters in editing the Biblical Repository and American Eclectic, in New York. In 1843 he was appointed editor of the Missionary Herald. In 1847 he was elected one of the secretaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, his special work being the carrying on the correspondence with the missionaries among the North American Indians. In 1859 he was called to take charge of the home department of the board, and continued in this office until a few months before his death, which occurred March 27, 1877. He had continued his editorial labors until 1856, at which time he took a second somewhat extended trip abroad, his first journey having been taken in 1850. See Cong. Quarterly, xix, 347, 375. (J. C. S.)

Tregury, MICHAEL, D.D., an Irish prelate, was a native of the village of Tregury, in Cornwall, and for some time fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. He was consecrated in St. Patrick's Church archbishop of Dublin in 1449. In 1450 he had restitution of the temporalities of his see. In 1467 Tregury assigned a moiety of the parish of Lusk for the treasurer of St. Patrick's, and constituted the rectory of St. Andeon in the city. In 1468 he held a visitation in the chapter-house of St. Patrick's Cathedral. He died in 1471. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 159.

Trench, HON. POWER LE POER, D.D., a prelate of the Irish Episcopal Church, was born June 10, 1770, and educated at Dublin University. His first preferment on being ordained was the union of Creagh, in the diocese of Clonfert. He was consecrated bishop of Waterford, Nov. 21, 1802; in 1810 translated to the see of Elphin; and in 1819 appointed to the archbishopric of Tuam, which he held till his death, March 21, 1839. Archbishop Trench was a fine scholar, a profound theologian, a devout Christian, a brilliant orator, and diligent in the performance of all life's duties. See The (Lond.) Church of England Magazine, June, 1841, p. 380; The (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, May, 1839, p. 315.

Tresenreuter, JOHANN ULRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 31, 1710, and studied at Altdorf and Leipzig. In 1738 he commenced his academical career at Altdorf, was preacher at Coburg in 1739, and died March 31, 1744. He published, De Rabube contra jus Naturæ Juste Agente (Altdorf, 1733):—De Paradiso Igne Delecto (1735):—De Persona Christi (1738):—De Signo, quod Deus Caino Dedit (eod.):—De Vaticinatione Henochi in Epistola Judæ

(1789):—De Libro, qui Quartus Esra Vulgo Inscriptur (1742):—De Sectis Judaeorum in Genere (1748):—De Esauorum Nomine (eod.), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Trevor, RICHARD, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1707; became canon of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1785; was consecrated bishop of St. David's in 1744, translated to the see of Durham in 1752, and died at his home in Tenderden Street, Hanover Square, London, June 9, 1771. He published several sermons. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1771, p. 179; Life (1776).

Triffechov, ADAM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 11, 1641, at Lübeck, studied at different universities, was in 1672 ecclesiastical counselor at Gotha, in 1677 general superintendent, and died Aug. 17, 1687. He published, Historia Chiliasmus:—De Impositione Manuum in Sacrificiis ex Hebræorum nec non Christianorum Monumentis:—De Emphasi Scripturæ Sacræ ad Ies. i, 1-6:—De Rechabitis ad Jerem. xxxv:—De Angelis:—De Mose Egyptiorum Osiride:—De Concursum Dei:—Historia Naturalium a Prima sua Origine ad Nostræ æque Tempora per suas Classes Deducta (edited and published by his son, Jena, 1700). See Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Trimurti (Sanskrit, tri, "three," and murti, "form"), the name of the Hindû triad, the gods Brahma (masculine), Vishnû, and Siva, which are considered an inseparable unity, though three in form. Different works assign the chief place to different members, according to the schools from which they emanate. The Padma-Purana of the Vaishnava (q. v.) sect assigns to Vishnû the highest rank in the trimurti, and thus defines its character: "In the beginning of creation the great Vishnû, desirous of creating the whole world, became threefold—creator, preserver, and destroyer. In order to create this world the Supreme Spirit produced from the right side of his body himself, as Brahma; then, in order to preserve the world, he produced from the left side of his body Vishnû; and, in order to destroy the world, he produced from the middle of his body the eternal Siva. Some worship Brahma, others Vishnû, others Siva; but Vishnû, one, yet threefold, creates, preserves, and destroys; therefore let the pious make no difference between the three." The Mat-sya-Purana, speaking of the Mahat, or intellectual principle, says, "Mahat becomes distinctly known as three gods, through the influence of the three qualities, goodness, passion, and sin; being one person and three gods, viz., Brahma, Vishnû, and Siva." We are thus enabled to see that, aside from sectarian belief, which makes its own god the chief, trimurti implies the unity personified of the three principles of creation (Brahma), preservation (Vishnû), and destruction (Siva). When represented, the trimurti is one body with three heads: in the middle that of Brahma, at its right that of Vishnû, and at its left that of Siva. The symbol of the trimurti is the mystical syllable om, in which o is equivalent to a and u, and where a means Brahma, u means Vishnû, and m means Siva.

Trinius, JOHANN ANTON, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 6, 1722. He studied at Leipzig, Helmstädt, and Halle; was in 1748 assistant minister at Braunroda, in the county of Mansfeld, Saxony, and died at Eisleben, May 8, 1784. He published, Schediasma Historicum de Conjugiis Proselytorum Judaicorum (Helmstädt, 1744):—Diatrise Historico-apologetica de Digamia Clericorum quibusdam Erosu (1746):—De Pathopatridalgia Sanctorum (Rostock, 1752):—

Theologisches Wörterbuch (Leipzig, 1770), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 875, 500, 856. (B. P.)

Triton, in Greek mythology, was primarily a son of Neptune, by Amphitrite, who lived with his father and mother on the bottom of the sea in a golden palace. Hence the name was applied to any demon of the Mediterranean Sea, who rode, sometimes upon horses, at other times on monsters of the deep, and occasionally appeared, assisting other deities in riding. Such Tritons are described differently. They are probably of the double nature, half man and half fish. The hair of their head is green, they have fine scales, gills under their ears, a human nose, a broad mouth with animal teeth, green eyes, hands, fingers, and nails rough, and instead of feet they possess the tail of a dolphin. They blow a spiral-formed trumpet.

Trotter, JOHN, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian clergyman, was born in Edinburgh in 1728, in which city his father was a magistrate. He showed marks of true piety in his youth, and a preference for the ministry. He studied the learned languages, philosophy, and divinity at the City University, passed his trials before the Synod of Edinburgh in 1749, and was soon afterwards presented to the living at Ceres, Fifeshire, where he was very popular for seventeen years. The Swallow Street Church, in London, became vacant in 1769, and Dr. Trotter accepted the pastorate there in December of that year, and with uniform and unwearied diligence performed the duties for nearly forty years. After a short illness he died, Sept. 14, 1808, and was interred in Bunhill Fields Cemetery. He made Calvinistic theology his careful study through his long life of more than fourscore years. He published a short memoir of his first wife in 1771. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ix, 49.

Trottet, JEAN PIERRE PHILIPPE, a Protestant theologian of Switzerland, was born at La Tour de Peilz, in the canton of Vaud, Dec. 12, 1818. He studied at Lausanne and at some German universities, and was ordained in 1851. In 1853 he published a volume of Discours Évangéliques (Paris), and spent some years at Stockholm as pastor of the French Church. In 1860 he was called to the Hague as pastor of the Walloon Church, where he published, against Groen van Prinsterer, Le Parti Orthodoxe Pur dans l'Église Wallonne de La Haye:—Le Parti Anti-Revolutionnaire et Confessionnel dans l'Église Réformée des Pays-Bas:—Pourquoi je Prends Congé de l'Église Wallonne de La Haye (1860-61). In 1862 he retired to Geneva, and died Aug. 30 of the same year. He published also, Grands Jours de l'Église Apostolique, Considérés Relativement à l'Époque Actuelle (Paris, 1856):—Génie des Civilisations (1862, 2 vols.). See Montet, Dict. Bénédict. des Genev. et des Vaud, ii, 583 sq.; Chrétien Évangélique, 1859, 1862; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Trübner, NICHOLAS, a publisher of London, who died April 8, 1884, deserves an honorable mention for the great interest he took in Oriental research, and more especially in Indian studies. His Record has always been a welcome and invaluable visitor to all those who were interested in such pursuits, and the assistance which it has rendered to Oriental learning cannot be overestimated. But Mr. Trübner's interests and sympathies were not confined to these researches. The history of religions, the study of languages, the development of political life in the East, all claimed a share of his time and thoughts. Many struggling scholars have lost in him the best friend they had. (B. P.)

Trudpert is the name of a hermit and founder of a celebrated monastery in the Breisgau, Baden. About the year 640 he came into the region of the upper Rhine, and settled at the river Neumage. Othpert, a German noble, gave to Trudpert the land, besides six servants, who were to assist him in the clearing and making arable the wooded country. Soon a chapel was built in honor of St. Peter. Three years Trudpert led an ascetic life, when two of the servants killed him while resting from his manual labor. Othpert had Trudpert buried in the chapel. During the 8th century the place lay waste, but in 816 Rambert, one of Othpert's descendants, built a splendid basilica in honor of Peter and Paul, and Trudpert's remains were placed there. See Mone, Quellenammlung zur badi-schen Landesgeschichte, i, 17-28; Rettberg, Kirchen-geschichte Deutschlands, ii, 48-50; Hefele, Geschichte der Einführung des Christenthums im südwestlichen Deutsch-land, p. 314-329; Friedrich, Kirchengeschichte Deutsch-lands, ii, 607-613; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. Trullan Councils, THE, were held in a room of the imperial palace at Constantinople, which had a dome (τρουλλον), whence the name.

I. The first Trullan council was called in 680 by the emperor Constantine Pogonatus, and held eighteen sittings. The legates of pope Agatho were accorded the highest rank, then followed in order the patriarch George of Constantinople, the legate of the patriarch of Alexandria, Macarius of Antioch, the legate of the patriarch of Jerusalem, three delegates from the Western Church, delegates from Ravenna, and finally the bishops and abbots present. In the very first session the papal legates accused the patriarchs of Constanti-nople and Antioch of heresy. Macarius defended him-self against this accusation, and referred to the canons of the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and of the fifth Constantinopolitan council. In the eighth sitting George of Constantinople went over to the Roman doctrine. In the sixteenth sitting pope Honorius I was anathematized for his monothelitic views, and the anathema was repeated at the eighteenth session. Pope Agatho's confession of two wills in Christ, in his Epi-stoli ad Imperatores, was declared the doctrine of the council, and all monothelites were anathematized. The patriarch Macarius was deposed at a later time.

II. The second Trullan council, called together by Justinian in 692, is known as the Concilium Quini-sextum, for which see the art. QUINISEXTUM CON-CILIUM. See, besides, the Church-histories of Schröckh and Gieseler; Pichler, Geschichte der kirchlichen Tren-nung zwischen Orient und Occident (Munich, 1864), i, 87 sq.; Hergenröther, Photius, Patriarch von Constanti-nopel (Ratisbon, 1867), i, 208-226; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. Truyna, CHARLES, D.D., a Roman Catholic priest of the Jesuit order, was born in Belgium in 1813. In 1837 he came to the United States, and was an officer of the St. Louis University and of St. Charles College, La. For some time he was engaged in missionary work among the Indians, and, later in life, was pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Bardstown, Ky. He died at St. Louis, Mo., Dec. 14, 1868. See Hough, Amer. Biog. Notes, p. 398. (J. C. S.)

Tucker, JOHN, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Amesbury, Mass., Sept. 19, 1719. He graduated from Harvard College in 1741, studied theology with Rev. Paine Wingate, of Amesbury, and was ordained at Newbury, Mass., Nov. 20, 1745, as col-league-pastor with the Rev. Christopher Toppan. His death occurred March 22, 1792. He was the author of several published sermons and controversial pam-phlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 451.

Tucker, MARK, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Whitestown, N. Y., June 7, 1795. He stud-ied at Whitestown, graduated from Union College in 1814, and was instructed in theology by president E. Nott, D.D.; ordained pastor at Stillwater, Oct. 8, 1817, and dismissed in 1823; installed colleague with Rev. Solomon Williams, at Northampton, Mass., March 10, 1824, and dismissed Aug. 16, 1827; called to the Second Presbyterian Church, at Troy, N. Y., Oct. 31, 1827; to the Beneficent Church, at Providence, R. I., in June of 1837, and dismissed March 24, 1856; installed at Vernon, Conn., April 15, 1857, and was pastor of this church un-til 1863. He resided without charge at Ellington and Old Saybrook, and after 1865 at Weathersfield, where he died, March 19, 1875. He was chosen a director of the American Home Missionary Society in 1832, a vice-president in 1844, and was a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions from 1838. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 435.

Tulloch, THOMAS de, a Scotch prelate, was bish-op at Orkney about 1422. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 221.

Tulloch, WILLIAM, a Scotch prelate, was sent by James III into Denmark in 1468 to negotiate a mar-riage between him and the princess Margaret of that nation. He was bishop of Orkney in 1470. He was made lord privy seal, March 26, 1473. In 1477 he was translated to the see of Moray. He died about 1482. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 222.

Tupper, CHARLES, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cornwallis, N. S., Aug. 6, 1794. He was bap-tized by Rev. E. Manning, May 14, 1815, taught school in Cornwallis, was ordained July 17, 1817, labored as a home missionary in several parts of the province, be-came pastor at Amherst in 1819, at St. John, N. B., in 1825, at Tryon and Bedeque, P. E. I., in 1833, at Amherst again in 1834, where he was also in charge of the gram-mar school, was principal of the Baptist Seminary at Fredericton, N. B., in 1835-36, returned to Amherst in 1840, made several evangelistic tours through the provinces, became pastor at Aylesford, N. S., in 1851, and in this relation he continued until his death, assisted after 1870 by a colleague. He died at Kingston, Aylesford, Jan. 19, 1881. In January, 1827, Tupper became editor of the Baptist Missionary Magazine of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which he continued until 1833, and followed by the Christian Messenger (Halifax, N. S.) in 1837. He published a review of Rev. Dr. G. Burns, of St. John, N. B., on The Subjects and Modes of Baptism (1830):—Baptist Principles Vindicated, in reply to Rev. J. W. D. Gray, of St. John (1844):—A Discussion of the Translation of "Baptizo" and a Vindication of the Action of the Baptist Missionaries in Burmah (1846):—Expository Notes on the Syriac Version of the Scriptures. He was a man of vast linguistic learning. He was one of the pioneers of temperance. See Bill, History of the Baptists in the Maritime Provinces of Canada (St. John, 1881), p. 680 sq.; Baptist Year-book of Maritime Provinces, 1881, p. 71. His autobiography appeared in the Christian Messenger, Jan. 2, 1880.

Turner, JOHN M., D.D., an Anglican missionary bishop, was born in England about 1786; educated at Christ Church, Oxford; in 1823 presented to the vicarage of Abingdon; in 1824 removed to the rectory of Wilmslow, Cheshire; and in 1829 appointed to the bishopric of Calcutta, India, which he held till his death, July 7, 1831. Bishop Turner was a man of exemplary piety, faithful in the discharge of his duties, and much loved and respected by all with whom he was associated. See appendix to the (Lond.) Christian Observer for 1831, p. 815; The (Lond.) Christian Guardian, Feb. 1832, p. 73.

Turney, EDMUND, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Easton, Conn., May 6, 1816. He received his education at the Hamilton Institute, N. Y., and his first pastorate was in the Second Church, Hartford, Conn. Subsequently he was pastor in Granville, O., and Utica, N. Y. He became professor of Biblical criticism in the Hamilton Seminary in 1850, and for five years (1853-58) was professor in Fairmount Theological Seminary, O. After preaching without settlement for a few years, he started, in Washington, in 1865, the first experiment for the education of colored teachers and preachers. With great disinterestedness and self-sacrifice he labored in this department of Christian effort for several years. "He seemed inspired with the conviction that God had specially intrusted this great business to him, and nothing could change his impressions of duty." He died Sept. 28, 1872. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1177. (J. C. S.)

Turpin, a Scotch prelate, was elected to the see of Brechin in 1178. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 156.

Tustin, SEPTIMUS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, who died at Washington, D. C., Oct. 28, 1871, was in 1836 chaplain of the University of Virginia, and in 1844 was elected chaplain of the United States Senate. At a later period he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hagerstown, Md., and of the First Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Pa. He was the delegate from the Old-school Assembly to the New-school Assembly, which sat in Philadelphia in 1863. He was warmly interested in the reunion of the Presbyterian Church.

Twining, ALIN TABOR, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Topsham, Vt., Feb. 9, 1811. He spent two years at the University of Vermont; studied theology under bishop Hopkins; was ordained deacon Aug. 21, 1836; was rector of St. Paul's, Vergennes; of Trinity, West Troy, N. Y., and of Trinity, Lansingburgh, for twenty-three years; secretary of the domestic committee of the Board of Missions from 1864 till his death, in New York city, Nov. 11, 1882. See The Church Almanac, 1883, p. 115.

Tyng, STEPHEN HIGGINSON, D.D., an eminent Protestant Episcopal divine, was born at Newburyport, Mass., March 1, 1800, being the son of Hon. Dudley Atkins, but assumed the name of his relative, James Tyng, whose estate he inherited. He graduated at Harvard College in 1817; engaged for some time in commercial pursuits; afterwards studied theology; was ordained in 1821; and was rector successively in Georgetown, D. C. (1821-23); in St. Anne's Parish, Md. (1823-29); in St. Paul's, Philadelphia, Pa. (1829-33); in the Church of the Epiphany in the same city (1833-45); and thereafter in St. George's, New York city, until 1878, when, on account of failing health, he was made pastor emeritus. He died at Irvington, N. J., Sept. 4, 1885. Dr. Tyng was one of the most evangelical, popular, and useful preachers of his denomination. He was editor at different times of The Episcopal Recorder, The Theological Repository, and The Protestant Churchman, while he was also the author of several religious and homiletical works, including observations made during a visit to Europe.

Ulf, HERMANN WILHELM, a Swedish theologian, was born June 19, 1830, and studied at Upsala and Erlangen. In 1867 he commenced his academical career at Upsala, in 1872 he was made pastor at Stora Skedwi, in 1877 doctor of theology, and died Dec. 18, 1882, greatly lamented by the Lutheran Church of Sweden. (B. P.)

Ulmann, KARL CHRISTIAN, a German Protestant bishop, who died at Walk, Livonia, Oct. 20, 1871, doctor of theology, is best known as the editor of Mittheilungen und Nachrichten für die evangelische Geistlichkeit Russlands (Dorpat, 1839 sq.); besides he published, Sermons (1840):—Das gegenwärtige Verhältnis der evangel. Brüdergemeinde zur evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche in Lief- und Esthland (Berlin, 1862):—Wie die Baptisten der luth. Kirche die Bibel entgegenstellen (St. Petersburg, 1865). (B. P.)

Ulrich, JEAN, a Protestant theologian, was born Dec. 20, 1622, in Switzerland. He studied at Zurich, and after having travelled through Holland, England, France, and Germany, was appointed pastor at Creutz in 1650; in 1658 became professor of Hebrew, in 1669 pastor at the Frauen-Münster, and died in 1682. He wrote, Oratio de Duobus Testibus Apocalypses:—Oratio de Anti-Christi Adversus Militantem in Terris Christi Ecclesiam Ultimo Conatu, etc. See Allgemeines Historisches Lexikon, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ulrici, HERMANN, a philosophical writer of Germany, was born March 23, 1806, at Pforten, Lower Lusatia. He studied law at Halle and Berlin, and commenced to practice in 1827. Upon the death of his father, in 1829, he gave up the practice of law, and began studies which were more congenial to him. In 1833 he commenced his academical career in the philosophical faculty at Berlin, went to Halle in 1834, and died Jan. 11, 1884. Ulrici belonged to the school of speculative philosophy which combated the idealistic pantheism of Hegel by a theistic view of the universe, based upon the facts of natural philosophy and psychology. His principal works are, Glauben und Wissen, Speculation und exakte Wissenschaft (Leipsic, 1858):—Gott und die Natur (1862; 2d ed. 1866):—Gott und der Mensch (1866). (B. P.)

Ummah is probably the present Alma ash-Shavâ, two and a half miles south-east of en-Nakûrah (near the promontory of the same name), described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, i, 150, as "A large Christian village, containing about five hundred inhabitants. The houses are clean and well built. There are two chapels, and the place seems increasing in size. It is situated on a ridge, with figs, olives, pomegranates, and arable land around. To the east and north the land is covered with brushwood. There is a spring within reach, and about thirty rock-cut cisterns in the village."

Vadian. See WATT, JOACHIM.

Vail, STEPHEN M., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Union Vale, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Jan. 15, 1816. At fourteen he entered Cazenovia Seminary, where he was converted. In 1838 he graduated from Bowdoin College, and in 1842 from Union Theological Seminary. After completing his studies he joined the New York Conference, and was stationed successively at Fishkill, N. Y.; Sharon, Conn.; and Pine Plains. He was two years principal in Pennington Seminary, N. J., and from 1849 to 1868 was professor of Hebrew in the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H. His health giving way, he resigned his professorship and returned to his home on Staten Island. In 1869 he was appointed consul to Bavaria, where he remained five years. Returning home, he continued the literary labors in which he had been engaged for years, preaching as he had strength and opportunity, without salary, until his death, which occurred in Jersey City, N. J., Nov. 26, 1880. He wrote numerous articles for the Quarterly Review and other periodicals. Among his literary works were, Ministerial Education:—Bible against Slavery:—and a Hebrew Grammar. He lived an earnest, faithful, noble Christian life, characterized by the strictest integrity and honor to the Church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 85.

Van Doren, WILLIAM H. See DOREN.

Van Ingen, JOHN V., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of a church in Rochester, N. Y., until 1854, and of Christ Church, St. Paul, Minn., until 1862, when he became chaplain in the United States army; in 1864 he returned to Rochester as rector of Trinity Church. While in that city he was appointed chaplain of the Rochester institutions and missionary at Victor. In 1877 he became rector of St. John's, in Clyde. His death occurred Dec. 1 following, at the age of seventy-one years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 170.

Van Oosterzee. See OOSTERZEE.

Van Pelt, PETER, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, served as secretary of the Board of Missions of his Church for several years prior to 1856, residing during that time in Philadelphia. Shortly after he was elected adjunct professor of English literature in the Diocesan College at Burlington, N. J. In 1859 he was professor of Hebrew in that college, and at the same time held the position of secretary to the General Board of Missions in Philadelphia. In 1862, although still holding the secretaryship, he was elected professor of Oriental languages in the Protestant Episcopal Divinity School, in Philadelphia. He retired from this position in 1867, but remained a resident of that city until his death, Aug. 20, 1873, at the age of seventy-five years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 38.

Van Santvoord, STAATS, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, grandson of Cornelius, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., in 1790. He graduated from Union College in 1811, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1814; was licensed in the latter year, and preached at Belleville, N. J., until 1828, when he became agent for the New Brunswick Seminary for one year, and thereafter successively pastor at Scholack (1829, including Coeymans in 1830), New Baltimore (1834), Onisquethan (1839, including New Salem in 1843), and Jerusalem (1845-57); in 1864 he engaged in the service of the Christian Commission, at Nashville, Tenn. He died May 31, 1882. Dr. Van Santvoord published several sermons. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 521.

Van Zandt, ABRAHAM BROOKS, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Nov. 16, 1816, in Albany County, N. Y. His preparatory education was acquired under private tutors at Auburn and Schenectady; he graduated from Union College in 1840, teaching the grammar-school at Schenectady during the last half of his senior year, and for the same time after his graduation; studied at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1840 to 1842; was licensed by the Presbytery of Troy, Feb. 18 of the latter year, and ordained by the Presbytery of North River, at Matteawan, Dutchess Co., June 29 following; on the same day he was also installed pastor of the Matteawan Church, from which he was released Oct. 29 following; was pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Newburgh from 1842 to 1849; of the Tabb Street Presbyterian Church at Petersburg, Va., from 1849 to 1856; of the Central Reformed Dutch Church on Ninth Street, New York city, from 1856 to 1859; of the Reformed Dutch Church at Montgomery, N. Y., from 1860 to 1872; was inaugurated professor of didactic and polemic theology in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, N. J., Sept. 24 of the same year. On account of ill-health he was released from the active duties of this professorship, June 3, 1881, but was continued as professor emeritus until his death, July 21 following. He was a man of marked ability, an eloquent and scriptural preacher, and one of the foremost scholars of his denomination. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 43.

Vardill, JOHN, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1752. He graduated from King's (now Columbia) College, and, for a time, was tutor in that institution. In 1774 he went to England to take orders, and the same year was elected assistant rector of Trinity Church, New York city, but preferred to remain abroad. The British government employed him in some department of labor. He wrote some satirical poems on the Whigs, and Trumbull alludes to him in his McFingal. He became rector of Skirbeck and Fishtoft, Lincolnshire, and died in 1811. See Sabine, Loyalists of the Revolutionary War, ii, 881. (J. C. S.)

Vatke, JOHANN KARL WILHELM, a Protestant theologian, was born at Behndorf, Saxony, March 14, 1806. He studied theology and philosophy at Halle, Göttingen, and Berlin, and was privat-docent in theology at the latter place in 1830. His publication of Die Religion des Alten Testaments (1835) excited the wrath of the late professor Hengstenberg to such a degree that he declared, in Wilhelm Vatke, Peter von Bohlen, and David Friedrich Strauss, the antichrist has appeared, with three heads. Vatke was in 1837 appointed professor in extraordinary, and died April 19, 1882, doctor of theology. Besides the work mentioned already, in which Vatke shows himself to be the forerunner of writers like Wellhausen, Kuenen, Reuss, and others, who regard the prophets as older than the law, and the Psalms as more recent than both, he published Die menschliche Freiheit in ihrem Verhältnis zur Sünde und zur göttlichen Gnade (1884). In philosophy Vatke belonged to the left wing of the Hegelian school. See Benecke, Wilhelm Vatke (Bonn, 1883). (B. P.)

Vaughan, WILLIAM, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Feb. 22, 1785. In 1810 he was converted, licensed in 1811, and ordained in 1812. He settled in Mason County, Ky., where he preached to several churches, and had charge of a school for about fifteen years. During this period he became an earnest defender of Campbellism. For two and a half years, from 1831, he was in the service of the American Sabbath-school Union, and established in Kentucky not far from one hundred Sunday-schools. He was for a time general agent for Kentucky of the American Bible Society. In 1836 he became pastor of the Bloomfield Church, and resigned in 1868. He died May 31, 1877, universally loved and honored. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 119. (J. C. S.)

Vaus, GEORGE, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the see of Galloway in 1489, and was still bishop in 1505. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 276.

Veesenmeyer, GEORG, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Ulm, Nov. 20, 1760, and died April 6, 1833, doctor of theology. He published, Literargeschichte der Briefsammlung und einiger Schriften von Luther (Berlin, 1821):—Kleine Beiträge zur Geschichte des Reichthums zu Augsburg 1530 und der Augsburg. Confession (Nuremberg, 1830):—Literarisch-bibliographische Nachrichten von einigen evangelischen catechetischen Schriften, etc. (Ulm, ed.).—Denkmal der einheimischen und fremden Theologen, etc. (1831). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 25, 752; ii, 212; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Vehmio Court (Fehmgericht, probably derived from reme, i. e. "punishment") was the name of a peculiar judicial institution, which, according to tradition, was founded by Charlemagne and Leo III, and continued to exist, at least nominally, in Westphalia down to the present century, when it was suppressed (in 1811) by Jerome Bonaparte. The tribunal was composed of freemen of spotless character, but not necessarily belonging to any certain social rank or state; both the emperor and the peasant could be members. The presence of seven members was necessary in order to form the court. When duke Heinrich of Bavaria was sentenced, in 1434, over eight hundred members were present. The court took cognizance of all kinds of cases, as heresy, witchcraft, rape, theft, robbery, murder, and summoned all kinds of persons, except ecclesiastics, Jews, and women, to appear before it. Its sittings were partly public—held under open sky—partly secret, and its verdicts were executed by its own members. In the course of time, when the state became able to maintain its laws, the Vehmio Court became superfluous, and in the 16th century it held its last open session. See Wigan, Geschichte der Fehmgerichte (Weitzlar, 1847); Walter, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte (Bonn, 1857), ii, 682; Geisberg, Die Fehme (Münster, 1858); Kampshulte, Zur Geschichte des Mittelalters (Bonn, 1874); Esellen, Die westfälischen Frei- oder Fehmgerichte (1877). Vent, HANS LORENZ ANDREAS, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hademarschen, Holstein, April 10, 1785. In 1811 he was deacon at Tallingstedt, and from 1815 to 1863 pastor in his native city. He resigned the pastorate in 1863, and died April 21, 1879, member of consistory. He published, Luther's Werke in einer das Bedürfniss der Zeit berücksichtigenden Auswahl (Hamburg, 1826, 10 vols.):—Homiletisches Magazin über die evangelischen Texte des ganzen Jahres (2d ed. ibid. 1839, 2 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 25, 584; ii, 126, 827; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Vermeil, ANTOINE, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Nîmes, March 19, 1799, and studied at Geneva. In 1824 he was pastor at Bordeaux, where he founded many benevolent institutions. In 1840 he was called to Paris, and died in 1864. Vermeil has immortalized his name by his great monument, The Institute of Deaconesses, which he founded at a time when Fliedner's name was not yet known in France. A biographical sketch of Vermeil is given in his sermons, Catechisme Liturgique, published after his death (Paris, 1869 sq. 3 vols.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Vernes, JACOB, a Protestant theologian of Geneva, was born in 1728, and died in 1791. He is the author of, Lettres sur le Christianisme de J. J. Rousseau (1763)

—Dialogue sur le Christianisme de J. J. Rousseau (ed.): —Confidence Philosophique (1776, 2 vols.): —Sermons (1790, 2 vols.): —Catéchisme à l'Usage de Toutes les Communions Chrétiennes (1774; 8d ed. 1778). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Verny, Louis Edouard, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Mayence, March 17, 1808. He studied law at Strasburg, and practiced at Colmar. In 1828 he gave up his profession and betook himself to the study of theology. In 1830 he was appointed principal of the college at Mulhausen, and in 1835 accepted a call to the Lutheran Church at Paris. He died Oct. 19, 1854, in the pulpit of St. Thomas, at Strasburg, where he had made the opening address of the session of the Superior Consistory. After his death a volume of Sermons, containing also a biographical sketch, was published (Paris, 1867). See Scherer and Colani, in Revue Théologique, of Strasburg, first series, ix, 265 sq.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Vialart (de Herse), Felix, a French ecclesiastic, was born in Paris, Sept. 4, 1813, of a noble family, and pursued his studies at the Collège de Navarre. In 1638 he was made doctor of theology, and in 1641 coadjutor to the bishop of Châlons, whom he succeeded in the following year. Vialart died June 10, 1680, highly esteemed by all classes. He published, Rituel ou Manuel de l'Eglise de Châlons (Paris, 1649): —Ordonnances, Mandements et Lettres Pastorales pour le Rétablissement de la Discipline Ecclesiastique (1660, 1662): —L'Ecole Chrétienne, a kind of catechism. See Gouget, Vie de Messire Vialart de Herse, Evêque et Comte de Châlons (new ed. Utrecht, 1789). Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Villers, Charles François Dominique de, a distinguished French writer, was born at Belchen, in Lorraine, Nov. 4, 1764. He was educated in the military school at Metz, and entered the army in 1782, but studied at the same time classical literature and philosophy. His De la Liberté (1791) proved too moderate for the Jacobins, and in 1792 he was compelled to flee. He settled at Lübeck, and became, in the course of time, thoroughly acquainted with the German language and literature. Having written with great openness against the violence of Napoleon's generals, he was expelled from the Hanse Towns by Davoust in 1806. Villers went to Paris, and obtained from the emperor the repeal of the order. In 1811 he was made professor of philosophy at Göttingen, from which position, however, he was dismissed in 1814 by the returning Hanoverian dynasty. Villers died Feb. 26, 1815. His principal works are, Essai sur l'Esprit et l'Influence de la Réformation de Luther (5th ed., published by Mæder, Strasburg, 1851), which received the prize of the French Academy in 1804, and was translated both into German and English: —Philosophie de Kant (Metz, 1802, 2 vols.). See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 325, 326, 742, 743. (B. P.)

Vilmar, Jacob Wilhelm Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1804, and died Dec. 7, 1884, at Melsungen. He was the leader of the Separate Lutherans of Hesse, and published, Die protestantische Lehre der Rechtfertigung durch den Glauben (Cassel, 1838): —Was fasset der biblische Begriff der Sünde in sich? (1840): —Die kurhessische Kirche (1845): —Protestantismus und Christenthum (1847): —Der gegenwärtige Kampf der hessischen Kirche um ihre Selbstständigkeit (1871). (B. P.)

Vincent, Jacques Louis Samuel, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Nîmes, Sept. 8, 1787. After having studied at Geneva, he settled in his native city as pastor. In 1825 he was made president of the consistory. After the revolution, the French Reformed Church gradually sank down into the deism of Rousseau, and its theology became mere conventionalism without any true vitality. Vincent felt the evil, and it is his great merit that he procured the remedy. His first original production was an attack on Lamenais's Essai sur l'Indifférence en Matière de Religion, and his Observations sur l'Unité Religieuse (1820), and Observations sur la Voie d'Autorité Appliquée à la Religion, created quite a sensation. From 1820 to 1824 he published Mélanges de Religion, de Morale et de Critique Sacrée (10 vols.), which made the French public acquainted with and interested in German theology. Of still deeper influence were his Vues sur le Protestantisme (1829, 2 vols.; republished by Prevost-Paradol, 1860), and Méditations Religieuses (most complete edition by Fontanés, 1863). Vincent died July 10, 1837. Vincent, Philippe, a Reformed theologian of France, was born in 1595. Having completed his theological studies, he was ordained in 1620, was appointed, in 1626, pastor of the Reformed Church at La Rochelle, and died March 12, 1651. He is the author of Paraphrase sur les Lamentations du Prophète Jérémie (1646). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Vinton, Alexander Hamilton, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Providence, R. I., May 2, 1807. He studied medicine at New Haven, Conn., and practiced as a physician from 1828 to 1832. He then studied theology in the Protestant Episcopal Seminary in New York city, and was ordained in 1835. For about a year he was pastor of a church at Portland, Me., and from 1836 to 1842 was stationed at Providence, R. I. From 1842 to 1858 he was a pastor in Boston, Mass. He then went to Philadelphia, Pa., remaining in that city until 1861. He next became rector of St. Mark's Church, New York city, until 1869, when he went to Boston as rector of Emanuel Church, and later was a professor in the Protestant Episcopal Divinity School, Cambridge, Mass. He died there, April 26, 1881. Dr. Vinton published a volume of Sermons (1855) and several separate discourses and addresses.

Vinton, Francis, D.D., D.C.L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Providence, R. I., Aug. 29, 1809. He graduated at West Point in 1830; became lieutenant of artillery; was stationed in Boston Harbor; studied law in Harvard College, and acted as civil engineer; left the army in 1836; and after studying in the General Theological Seminary, was rector in Brooklyn, N. Y., several years prior to 1856, and shortly after became assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York city. About 1870, in addition to his pastoral duties, he was elected Ludlow professor of ecclesiastical polity and law in the General Theological Seminary at New York. He died in Brooklyn, Sept. 29, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 134.

Vormbaum, Rinkhold, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died Oct. 2, 1880, at Kaiserswerth, where he had been laboring for more than thirty years, is the author of, Evangelische Missionsgeschichte in Biographien (Elberfeld, 1850-61, 4 vols.): —Missionsregeln. Lebensbilder aus der Geschichte der evang. Heidenmission (1852): —Jochims Neander's Leben und Lieder (1860). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1404 sq. (B. P.)

Vullers, Johann August, a German Orientalist, was born at Bonn, Oct. 23, 1808, and died at Giessen, Jan. 21, 1880, where he had been professor of Oriental languages since 1833. He published, Fragmente über die Religion des Zoroaster (Bonn, 1831): —Institutiones Linguae Persicae cum Samacrita et Zendica Lingua Comparata (Giessen, 1840-50, 2 vols.): —Lexicon Persico-Latinum Etymologicum (Bonn, 1855-64, 2 vols.): —Sup- plementum Lexici Persico-Latini, Continens Verborum Lingua Persica Radices (1867).—Grammatica Lingua Persica (Giessen, 1870). (B. P.)

Vulliemin, Louis, a Protestant theologian, was born at Yverdon, Switzerland, Sept. 7, 1797. He was educated in the institute of the famous Pestalozzi, and pursued his philosophical as well as theological studies at Lausanne. He was ordained in 1821, and acted for several years as vicar in various places. But his delicate health prevented him from assuming a pastorate, and he betook himself to literary work. In 1828 he published an Essai sur l'Évangile; in 1829, Considerations sur les Mœurs des Chrétiens, leur Culte et leur Gouvernement Pendant les Trois Premiers Siècles. To the same period belongs his translation of Geschichte der Schweizer Confédération, by Johannes von Müller. In 1849 Vulliemin was made professor of theology at Lausanne, and took an active part in the ecclesiastical affairs of his country. In 1865 he resigned his professorship, and died Aug. 10, 1879. See Secretan, in the Gazette de Lausanne, Oct. 3 and 4, 1879; Pingaud, Louis Vulliemin (Besançon, 1881); Marc Debrin, in the Journal de Genève, Aug. 12, 1879; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. W.

Wackerhagen, Augustus, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Hanover, Germany, May 22, 1774. He was educated at the University of Göttingen; employed for a time in a young ladies' seminary, and also as private tutor in a nobleman's family. In 1801 he arrived in America, acted as tutor three years to the son of Mr. Boblen, a Philadelphia merchant, then visited Europe. Returning to the United States, was shipwrecked, but his life was saved. In 1805 he accepted a call to Schoharie, N. Y.; in 1816 was pastor of various churches in Columbia County; for several years had charge of the academy at Clermont, and died there, Nov. 1, 1865. Dr. Wackerhagen was a diligent student of ancient and modern languages. For twelve years he presided over the New York Ministerium, and was an original trustee of Hartwick Seminary. Except a sermon on the Lutheran Pulpit, the only work he published was a German volume, Faith and Morals (Philadelphia, 1804). See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry (1878), p. 63.

Wadsworth, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Litchfield, Conn., May 8, 1814. He graduated from Union College in 1837, and after teaching one year at Canajoharie, N. Y., graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1840. He was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Troy, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1842; in 1850 was called to the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., which, under his charge, became large, influential, and flourishing; in 1862 he accepted a call to the Calvary Church, San Francisco, Cal.; in 1869 returned to Philadelphia as pastor of the Third Reformed (Dutch) Church, which in 1873 united with the Immanuel Presbyterian Church. He died in Philadelphia, April 1, 1882. Dr. Wadsworth was an earnest, eloquent preacher, and had few equals in the pulpit. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 89. (W. P. S.)

Wait, Samuel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Washington County, N. Y., Dec. 19, 1789. He made a profession of religion March 12, 1809; was ordained at Sharon, Mass., June 3, 1818, and afterwards pursued his studies at Columbian College, Washington, D. C., where for a time he was a tutor. He became pastor at Newbern, N. C., in 1827, and for a number of years travelled through that state. Under his auspices the religious organ of the denomination, the Recorder, was established. To him, also, Wake Forest College owes its existence. It was started as a manual-labor institution in 1833, and he was called to preside over it. The school, in 1839, having abandoned the manual-labor feature, was made a college, and Dr. Wait continued at its head until 1846, and then resigned, filling the position of pastor of one or two churches until 1851, when he became principal of a female school in Oxford, N. C., where he remained until 1856. He died July 28, 1867. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1198. (J. C. S.)

Walcott, Mackenzie E. C., a minister of the Church of England, was born at Bath, Dec. 15, 1821. He was educated at Winchester and Oxford, at a very early period in life entered upon authorship, and for more than thirty years issued a constant succession of works on topographical and ecclesiastical history. As a curate of the churches of St. Margaret and St. James, Westminster, he was naturally drawn to the story of the historical associations connected with those parishes. His three volumes on the narrative of Westminster, and the two most famous parish churches which bear its name, were published before 1851. In that year he published The English Ordinal: its History, Validity, and Catholicity; with an Introduction, The Three Holy Orders of Ministers in the Church. In 1863 he was appointed to the precentorship and prebendal stall of Oving, at Chichester, and illustrated the history of the cathedral to which he was attached by numerous volumes on its bishops and episcopal registers. He died at London, Dec. 22, 1880. Besides the writings already mentioned, he published, Sacred Archaeology (Lond. 1868).—Traditions and Customs of Cathedrals (1872).—The Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical of the Church of England (1874).—Church-work and Life in English Minsters (1880). Mr. Walcott was also a frequent contributor to the Transactions of the British Archaeological Association and the Royal Society of Literature. (B. P.)

Waldby, Robert, D.D., an Irish prelate, was born in the city of York, and received the rudiments of his education in the abbey of Tickell, in Yorkshire. He became divinity professor at Toulouse. In 1383 he was sent by Richard II to treat with John, duke of Lancaster, another time to negotiate a neutral league with Charles, king of Navarre, and a third to effect the reduction of John, earl of Armagnac, to true obedience. In 1391 he succeeded to the see of Dublin. In 1392 he was constituted chancellor of Ireland. In 1395 he was summoned to a great council to be held at Kilkenny. He was translated to the see of Chichester, and from that promoted to the archbishopric of York. He died in 1397. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 146.

Walker, Joseph R., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was ordained deacon in 1817. For fifty-five years, that is, from 1823 to 1878, he was rector of St. Helena's Parish, Beaufort, S. C. He died April 2, 1879, aged eighty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 172.

Walkurea. See WALKTRIES.

Wallace, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was minister at Barnwell, Ayrshire, and was consecrated bishop of the Isles, at St. Andrews, in January, 1661. He died in 1675. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 310.

Waller, William J., M.D., S.T.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born Jan. 5, 1799. He was ordained deacon in 1844, and presbyter in 1845. From 1847 to 1859 he was president of Shelby College, and then removed to Louisville, Ky. About 1864 he returned to his former position at Shelbyville, and there remained until about 1868, when he went to Lebanon. About 1873 he removed to Louisville. In 1877 he went to Anchorage, where he died, April 21, 1879. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 172.

Walter (1), a Scotch prelate, was probably bishop of St. Andrews in the 12th century. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 9.

Walter (2), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Dunkeld in 1324. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 88.

Walters, W. T., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Pittsylvania County, Va., in 1825. He made a profession of religion early in life, and graduated from Wake Forest College in 1848, in which he became first a tutor and then professor of mathematics, remaining in that position until the college was closed by the civil war. He was chosen, in 1867, corresponding secretary of the North Carolina State Convention, and for three years was engaged in the duties of that office. He was also for some time occupied in editorial work, being connected for a while with the Biblical Recorder, of which for several years he was the agricultural editor. Two churches, those of Littleton and Wilson, N. C., were organized by him. He died Dec. 31, 1877. See Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclop. p. 1208. (J. C. S.)

Walton (called Mouster), JOHN, an Irish prelate, was the eighteenth abbot of Osney, near Oxford, to the government of which house he was appointed in 1452. From this abbacy he was advanced to the archbishopric of Dublin, consecrated in England, and invested with the pall in 1472. He did not receive formal restitution of the temporalities of his see until 1477. In 1478 this prelate annexed the perpetual vicarage of St. Kevin to his choral vicar of the prebend of Cullen. He resigned in 1484. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 166.

Warburton, CHARLES MORGAN, D.D., an Irish bishop, was born in 1755, in the north of Ireland. He was intended for the Roman Catholic Church, sent to study in one of the institutions on the Continent endowed for the education of Romish priests, but was thrown by accident into the society of the earl of Moira, who induced him to become a Protestant. He was, after taking orders, appointed chaplain to a regiment in America. Not long afterwards he changed his name from Morgan to Warburton, became dean of Ardingh, then bishop of Limerick in 1806, and of Cloyne in 1820. He died at Cloyne palace, Aug. 9, 1826. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 270.

Ward (prop. וָרָד or וָרָדָה, φυλακή; occasionally וָרָדָה [Ezek. xix, 9], or וָרָדָה [ix, 1, 11], custody ["oversight," etc.]), a prison (q. v.) or an apartment thereof (Gen. xl, 3; Acts xii, 10); also a watch-post at the gates of the Temple (Neh. xii, 25; 1 Chron. ix, 23). This term is likewise used to designate a class or detachment of priests or Levites (xxv, 8; Neh. xii, 24; xiii, 30).

Ward, JOHN, LL.D., an English Baptist educator, was born in London in 1679, his father being a Baptist minister. He possessed learning of the highest order, and loved the acquisition of knowledge with an intense affection. He was elected professor of rhetoric in Gresham College in 1720, and died in 1758. Among the productions of his pen were, The Lives of the Gresham Professors;—The Westminster Greek Grammar. He assisted Horsley in his Briamnia Romana, and Ainsworth in his Dictionary. See Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclop. p. 1208. (J. C. S.)

Ward, Seth, D.D., F.R.S., an eminent English divine and mathematician, was born at Buntingford, Hertfordshire, in 1617. He graduated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, about 1637, and became a fellow of the same college in 1640; but was ejected from his fellowship in 1643, for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. He then became a private tutor, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy in 1649, and remained at that post until 1661. He was elected principal of Jesus College in 1657, but did not receive possession; and president of Trinity College in 1652 but was obliged to resign this position at the Restoration, in 1660. The same year, however, he received the vicarage of St. Lawrence, Jewry, London, and the precentorship of Exeter; and was promoted to the deanery of Exeter in 1661. He became bishop of Exeter in 1662, bishop of Salisbury in 1667, chancellor of the Order of the Garter in 1671, prebendary of Salisbury in 1672, archdeacon of Wilts in 1675, prebendary of Winchester in 1676, chancellor of Salisbury in 1681, and treasurer of Salisbury in 1687. In 1682 he founded at Salisbury a college for the widows of clergymen. About 1687 he lost his mental faculties, and died at Knightsbridge, Jan. 6, 1689. He was a distinguished astronomer, and one of the founders of the Royal Society. He was the author of An Essay on the Being and Attributes of God; on the Immortality of the Soul, etc. (Oxford, 1652);—a volume of Sermons (Lond. 1674);—Prælectio de Cometis, etc. (1653);—Astronomia Geometrica (1656);—and other works.

Warden, a keeper, a guardian; a term sometimes applied to the head of a college, and sometimes to the superior of the chapters in conventual churches.

Wardlaw, WALTER, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of Lothian, and secretary to king David II, when he was consecrated bishop of the see of Glasgow in 1368. He was bishop here in 1389. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 246.

Wardrobe (וָרָדָה, 2 Kings xxii, 14; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 22; clothing or garments, as usually rendered), the vestry of the palace or temple (q. v.).

Warne, JOSEPH ANDREWS, D.D., a Baptist minister, born in London, England, in 1795, was converted in early life, graduated at Stepeny College in 1821, in 1822 came to America, settling first in North Carolina, where, after teaching some time, he became pastor of the Church in Newbern, and afterwards principal of the Furman Academy of Edgefield, S. C. Later he came north, and supplied the pulpit successively of the First Baptist Church in Providence, R. I.; South Reading (now Wakefield), Mass.; Brookline (seven years); the Second Baptist Church in Providence, and the Sansom Street Church, Philadelphia. He died at Frankford, March 9, 1881. Dr. Warne was greatly interested in foreign missions. He was editor of a Baptist edition of The Comprehensive Commentary. See The National Baptist, March 17, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Warneford, SAMUEL WILSON, D.C.L., a clergyman of the English Church, was born at Sevenhampton, near Highworth, in Wiltshire, in 1758. He was educated at University College, Oxford, where he received the degree of A.M. in 1786, and B.C.L. in 1790. He became rector of Liddiard Millicent, Wilts, in 1809; and of Bourton-on-the-Hill, in Gloucestershire, in 1810, where he lived plainly, and bestowed the large fortune of which he was then in possession in gifts of public charity and benevolence. He founded schools and almshouses in his own parish, and contributed largely to schools, colleges, and hospitals throughout the kingdom. To the Clergy Orphan-school he gave thirteen thousand pounds, and to Queen's College, Birmingham, upwards of twenty-five thousand pounds. In 1844 the bishop of Gloucester conferred on him an honorary canonry in Gloucester Cathedral; and in 1849 a statue of him was erected in the Warneford Lunatic Asylum at Oxford, the expense of which was met by public subscription. He died at Bourton, Jan. 11, 1855.

Warnefrid, PAUL. See PAUL THE DEACON.

Warner, JOHN (1), D.D., an English ecclesiastic, was born in the parish of St. Clement Danes, London, in 1585. He was elected demy of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1599; graduated A.B. in 1602; made perpetual fellow in 1605; dean of Lichfield in 1633; and bishop of Rochester, Jan. 14, 1638. He died in 1666. Being a loyalist, he suffered during the usurpation of Cromwell. He was the author of Church Lands not to be Bold (Lond. 1646):—and Letter to Dr. Jeremy Taylor concerning the Chapter on Original Sin in the Usus Necessarium (1656). He also published several sermons. He possessed considerable fortune, and was very liberal with it, giving during his lifetime and bequeathing at his death some twenty thousand pounds for charitable purposes.

Warner, John (2), D.D., an English clergyman, son of Dr. Ferdinando Warner, was born at Rode, Wiltshire, in 1736. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, from which he graduated in 1758; preached many years at a chapel in Long Acre; became rector of Hockliffe and Chalgrave, Bedfordshire, in 1771, and afterwards of Stourton, Wilts. He died in St. John's Square, Clerkenwell, Jan. 20, 1800. He resided in France during the Revolution, and thus became an ardent republican. He was the author of Metronarration; or, A New Pleasure Recommended in a Dissertation upon a Part of Greek and Latin Prosody (Lond. 1797); and Memoirs of Meckerchus, in the Gentleman's Magazine.

Warpulla, in Slavonic mythology, is the god of the winds; one in the train of followers of Perun, the god of thunder. He causes the roaring of the storm.

Warren, John (1), D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1670, became prebendary of Exeter in 1709, and died in 1786. He published some single sermons which have been commended. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Warren, John (2), LL.D., an English prelate of the 18th century, became archdeacon of Worcester in 1775, bishop of St. David's in 1779, was translated to Bangor in 1788, and died in 1800. He published six single sermons (1777-92). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Warren, Joseph W., D.D., one of the oldest missionaries of the Presbyterian Board in India, was born at Brunswick, Me., Aug. 30, 1809. After a course of study at the academy at Plymouth, N. H., he learned the art of printing at Concord, and afterwards resumed his studies at Phillips Academy, Exeter, where he was converted, and soon after determined to devote himself to the work of the ministry. At the age of twenty-five he entered Lane Theological Seminary, and was one of the large body of students who left on account of the abolition excitement. He completed his studies at the Allegheny Seminary, where he connected himself with the Presbyterian Church. In October, 1828, in company with Messrs. Freeman and Scott, he left for India, where his knowledge of printing contributed to his great usefulness in superintending the press. He took with him and set up at Allahabad the first mission press ever established in India north of Serampore. He was much engaged in promoting the cause of education in India, and aided in establishing the high-school at Agra for European and Eurasian children. In 1853 he returned to the United States to make provision for the education of his children, and entered for a time upon pastoral work in Indiana. He served also as chaplain during the late civil war. In October, 1872, he returned to India and completed a Grammar of the Urdu Dialect, and partially completed a translation of Genesis's Hebrew Lexicon. The Rev. John S. Woodside, of Dehra, Northern India, in communicating the death of Dr. Warren, writes, among other things, "Throughout his illness his constant prayer was for patience, that he might have grace to endure all he had to suffer. He did not desire that his life should be unduly prolonged, but his prayer was, 'Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly.'" He died at Morar Gualior, March 7, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Warren, Samuel, LL.D., eminent in the history of English Methodism, commenced his career as a Wesleyan minister in 1802. He was a man of large ability, and occupied some of the most important circuits in England. Jealous of the rising influence of Dr. Jabez Bunting, he objected to certain features in the formation of a theological institution in 1834, and not ceasing in his opposition, he was suspended from his ministerial functions at a special district meeting at Manchester, where he was then stationed, in October of that year. Controversial publications were issued by both parties, violent language was indulged in, an extensive agitation followed, and a large defection from the societies was the result, Dr. Warren's case exciting much sympathy. Deeming himself unconstitutionally suspended, Warren appealed to the high court of chancery, but on March 25, 1835, the lord high-chancellor denied the appeal. At the Wesleyan conference at Sheffield, in August following, Dr. Warren was expelled from the connection. Many of his sympathizers amalgamated with the Leeds secessionists, who had adopted the title of the Protestant Methodists in 1828, and assumed the name of the Wesleyan Association Methodists in 1835, and in 1857 both united in the formation of that respectable body, the United Methodist Free Church. Dr. Warren himself, becoming tired of the excitement and extremes connected with an agitation, many features of which could never have been congenial to his sober and deliberate judgment, was received into the Episcopal Church, and became the incumbent of All-Souls' Church, Ancoats, Manchester, which preferment he held until his death, in 1874. Dr. Warren published, besides a number of sermons, Memoirs and Select Letters of Mrs. A. Warren (1832, 12mo):—A Digest of the Laws and Regulations of the Wesleyan Methodists (2d ed. Lond. 1835). See Stevenson, Hist. of City Road Chapel, p. 557; Adeline Waddy, Life of S. D. Waddy, D.D., p. 98; Smith, Hist. of Wesl. Methodism (see supra and Appendices H-P), iii, 575-606; Minutes of Conference, 1835, vii, 542-591; Jackson, Life of Robert Newton, D.D. (Lond. and N. Y. 1855), p. 142 sq.

Warren, William, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Waterford, Me., Oct. 21, 1806. He was a student at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass.; also in Bowdoin College from 1834 to 1836; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1838; preached in Wells, Me., six months; was ordained at Windham, Feb. 14, 1840; installed at Upton, Mass., Nov. 14, 1849; dismissed April 29, 1856; was district secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for northern New England, residing at Gorham, Me., from 1857 to 1878, and died Jan. 28, 1879. He published, Geography and Atlas (1843):—Household Consecration and Baptism (1846):—Teacher's Institute Lecture (1848):—Spirit's Sword (1853):—Funeral Sermon:—Religious Progress:—A Voice to the Young, and other sermons. Also a work on, Theories of the Will:—Twelve Years with the Children:—Our Indebtedness to Missions. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 31.

Warrener, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was received into the work by Wesley in 1779. After laboring in Great Britain for seven years, he went as a missionary to the West Indies, "being the first of our preachers," say the Minutes, "who was regularly appointed to that work." He, with Clarke and Hammet, went over with Dr. Coke, in 1786, on that celebrated voyage intended to terminate in Nova Scotia, but which ended really eighteen hundred miles south, at the island of Antigua. Warrener was stationed on that island, where a most flourishing cause was inaugurated, the society having been, in fact, already formed by Nathaniel Gilbert and John Baxter. In 1797, after a successful career, he returned to his own country and was appointed to a circuit. In 1818 he retired; and on Nov. 27, 1826, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, he passed away, "triumphing gloriously over death." He was the first Methodist missionary who addressed the great annual gatherings of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, doing so at the memorable meeting at Leeds. See Smith, Hist. of Wesl. Methodism, iii, 101 sq.; also i, 544; ii, 282, Wars OF THE LORD, Book of the (מִלְחָמוֹת יְהוָה), a document cited Numb. xxi, 14. It was probably a collection of poems or songs celebrating the victories which had been achieved by the Israelites by the help of God. That it was an Amoritic work, as Michaelis suggested, is disproved by the use of the term מִלְחָמוֹת, which Michaelis vainly attempts to show is to be taken as a verb, and the passage translated: "As it is said in the book of the wars, it shall be." There is no reason to doubt that there were minstrels enough in Israel at all times of their history to record the events of that history in song, and those composed before the date of this notice might have been written in a book. What confirms this are the undoubted fragments of ancient songs in ver. 17, 18, and 27-30.

It is not clear what the passage cited means; but it seems to give a geographical notice, and probably was of some importance as indicating the ancient boundaries of the Moabitish territory (Rosenmüller, ad loc.; Hävernick, Einkl. I, ii, 504, Eng. transl. p. 321; Bleek, Einkl. p. 199). Hengstenberg has a peculiar view (Beiträge, ii, 223), which Baumgarten (Theolog. Commentar, ii, 844) follows. He translates: "And Vaheb (he took—i. e. Jehovah) in the storm, and the brooks, the Arnon and the valley of the brooks which goes down to the dwelling of Ar, and leans on the borders of Moab." This is not very different from the Sept. version: διὰ τοῦτο λέγεται ἐν βιβλίῳ· πόλεμος τοῦ Κυρίου τὴν Ζωὴν (they probably read מִלְחָמוֹת יְהוָה) ἐφ' ὧς, καὶ τοὺς χειμάρρους Ἀρνὼν.—Kitto. It was evidently one of the documents used by Moses in the composition of the Pentateuch. It may have contained, among other matters, the history of the expeditions occasionally made by the Hebrews, while in Egypt, among the surrounding tribes. At any rate, some such document seems to have been used by the writer of Chronicles, and its contents are characterized as "ancient things" (1 Chron. iv, 21-23; vii, 21, 22). See New-Englander, Jan. 1862. See PENTATEUCH.

Warton, Joseph, D.D., an English clergyman, son of Thomas Warton, Sr., was born at Dunsford, Surrey, in 1722. He was educated at Winchester School, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1744; took orders in the Church of England, and was curate to his father at Basingstoke from 1744 to 1746; curate at Chelsea from 1746 to 1748; became rector of Winslade, Hampshire, in 1748; travelled in France and elsewhere on the Continent with the duke of Bolton in 1751; became rector of Tunworth in 1754, of Wickham in 1782, and of Upham in 1788. He was second master of Winchester School from 1755 to 1766, and head master from 1766 to 1793. He became chaplain to Sir George Lyttelton in 1756; prebendary of St. Paul's, London, in 1782; and prebendary of Winchester in 1788. He died at Wickham, in Hampshire, Feb. 23, 1800. His principal published works are, Odes on Various Subjects (1746):—a poetical translation of the Eclogues and Georgics of Virgil (1753):—an Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope (1756-82):—twenty-four critical papers in The Adventurer:—and editions of the works of Pope (1797, 9 vols.) and Dryden (1811, 4 vols.). A Biographical Memoir of Dr. Joseph Warton, with a selection from his poetry and literary correspondence, was published in 1806 by Rev. John Woolf, master of the school at Midhurst, in Sussex.

Waser, Caspar (or Gaspar), a Swiss theologian, was born at Zurich, Sept. 1, 1565. He studied at Altdorf and Heidelberg, travelled extensively through Holland, England, Ireland, and Italy, and after his return, in 1593, was appointed pastor at Wittikon, which place he exchanged, in 1596, for the deanery at Zurich, connecting at the same time the professorship of Hebrew. In 1607 he received also the chair of Greek, and in 1611 the theological chair, and died Nov. 9, 1625. He wrote, Archetypus Gram. Hebraica, Duabus præcipue Partibus, Etymologia et Syntaxi Absolutus, etc. (Basle, 1600, and often):—Tractatus de Antiquis Nummis Hebræorum, Chaldeorum, et Syrorum (Zurich, 1605):—De Antiquis Hebræorum Mensuris:—Elementale Chaldaicum, etc. See Jodoc. a Kuosen, *Oratio de Vita et Obitu C. Wash (denoted by several Hebrew words of varying import; but in Greek νίπτω, which applies to a part of the person, is clearly distinguished from λούω, which applies to the whole body, in John xiii, 10, where the A. V. unfortunately confounds the two). This act for ordinary purposes of personal cleanliness is considered under ΒΑΠΤΙΣΜ. We here treat it under its ceremonial aspect. See ABLUTION.

The Jews had two sorts of washing for purposes of religious purification: one, of the whole body by immersion, טָבַל, tabal, which was used by the priests at their consecration, and by the proselytes at their initiation; the other, of the hands or feet, called dipping, or pouring of water, טָבַף, tsabaf, which was of daily use, not only for the hands and feet, but also for cups and other vessels used at their meals (Matt. xxv, 2; Mark vii, 3, 4). The six water-pots of stone used at the marriage feast of Cana in Galilee (John ii, 6) were set for this purpose. To these two modes of purification our Lord seems to allude in John xiii, 10, where the being "clean every whit" implies one who had become a disciple of Christ, and consequently had renounced the sins of his former life. He who had so done was supposed to be wholly washed, and not to need any immersion, in imitation of the ceremony of initiation, which was never repeated among the Jews. All that was necessary in such a case was the dipping or rinsing of the hands or feet, agreeably to the customs of the Jews. See WASHING (the Hands and Feet). Sometimes the lustration was performed by sprinkling blood or anointing with oil. Sprinkling was performed either with the finger, or with a branch of cedar and hyssop tied together with scarlet wool (Lev. xiv, 4-6; Numb. xix, 18; Psa. li, 7). See BAPTISM.

The practice of frequent ablutions was not peculiar to the Hebrews; we find it rigidly enjoined by the Mohammedan law. We quote the following extract from Taylor, History of Mohammedanism:

"The Sonna of the Mohammedans exactly corresponds with the מִשְׁנָה, Mishnah, of the Jews, and comprehends all their religious traditions. (a.) From it we take the following account of the greater purification, Ghassl. It must be remembered that there are seven species of water fit for rightly performing religious ablutions; that is to say, rain, sea, river, fountain, well, snow, and ice water. But the principal requisites for the lustration Ghassl are three: (1) intention; (2) a perfect cleansing; (3) that the water should touch the entire skin and every hair. There are five requisites of the traditional law, or Sonna: (1) the appropriate phrase, Bismillah ('In the name of the most merciful God'), must be pronounced; (2) the palms must be washed before the hands are put into the basin; (3) the lustration Wodú must be performed; (4) the skin must be rubbed with the hand; (5) it must be prolonged. (We omit the cases in which this lustration is required.) (b.) The second lustration, Wodú. The principal parts, indeed the divine (they are called divine because taken from the Koran) institutions, of the lustration Wodú are six: (1) intention; (2) the washing of the entire face; (3) the washing of the hands and forearms up to the elbows; (4) the rubbing of some parts of the head; (5) the washing of the feet as far as the ankles; (6) observance of the prescribed order.

"The Institutes of the traditional law about this lustration are ten: (1) the preparatory formula, Bismillah, must be used; (3) the palms must be washed before the hands are put into the basin; (3) the mouth must be cleansed; (4) water must be drawn through the nostrils; (5) the entire head and ears must be rubbed; (6) if the beard be thick, the fingers must be drawn through it; (7) the toes must be separated; (8) the right hand and foot should be washed before the left; (9) these ceremonies must be thrice repeated; (10) the whole must be performed in uninterrupted succession. (We omit the cases in which this lustration is required.)

"Of purification by sand. The divine institutions respecting purification by sand are four: (1) intention; (2) the rubbing of the face; (3) the rubbing of the hands and forearms up to the elbows; (4) the observance of this order. But the Sounite ordinances are three: (1) the formula Bismillah; (2) the right hand and foot precede the left; (3) that the ceremony be performed without interruption. The Mohammedans have borrowed the permission to use sand for water, in case of necessity, from the Jews. Indeed, Cedrenus mentions an instance of sand being used for a Christian baptism. Their necessity dictated the permission; we need not therefore have recourse to Reland's strange theory, that sand is really a liquid. Four requisites to its validity are added by the commentators: (1) the person must be on a journey; (2) he must have diligently searched for water; (3) it must be at the stated time of prayer; (4) the sand must be clean."

Washburn, Alvin H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of Christ Church, at Hyde Park, Mass., in 1862, and in 1866 removed to Cleveland, O., as rector of Grace Church, where he continued until his death, near Ashtabula, Dec. 30, 1876. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 170.

Washburn, Edward Abiel, D.D., an eminent Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Boston, Mass., April 16, 1819. After receiving a good primary education, he entered the Boston Latin School for preparation for Harvard College, where he was admitted at the age of sixteen. He graduated in 1838 with high honors. After studying a short time at the Theological Seminary at Andover and the Yale Divinity School, he served for about six months as a licentiate under the Worcester Association of Ministers, but in 1843 took orders as a deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In 1845 he was ordained presbyter by bishop Eastburn, of his native state. His first call was to the rectory of St. Paul's Church at Newburyport. After laboring seven years in this parish, he spent two years in travel in the East and on the continent. Returning home in 1854, he succeeded Dr. Cuxe at St. John's Church, Hartford, Conn. His next parish was St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, Pa. In 1865 he accepted a call to the Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church on East Twenty-first Street, New York city, where he labored until his death, Feb. 2, 1881. Dr. Washburn was a large-minded, warm-hearted theologian, an evangelical preacher, and an admirable pastor. He was also active in the religious enterprises of his day. He was a member of the American committee for the revision of the Bible, aided Dr. Schaff in the preparation of one of the volumes of Lange's Commentary, and was the author of a volume of Sermons on the Ten Commandments.

Washing THE HANDS AND FEET. The particular attention paid by the Jews to the cleansing of the hands and feet, as compared with other parts of the body, originated in the social usages of the East. As knives and forks were dispensed with in eating, it was absolutely necessary that the hand, which was thrust into the common dish, should be scrupulously clean; and, again, as sandals were ineffectual against the dust and heat of an Eastern climate, washing the feet on entering a house was an act both of respect to the company and of refreshment to the traveller. In the following account of them, we add many particulars not given in previous articles. See WASH.

1. Washing the Hands was transformed by the Pharisees of the New-Test. age into a matter of ritual observance (Mark vii, 3), and special rules were laid down as to the times and manner of its performance. The neglect of these rules by our Lord and his disciples drew down upon him the hostility of that sect (Matt. xv, 2; Luke xi, 38). Whether the expression πυνγι used by Mark has reference to any special regulation may, perhaps, be doubtful; the senses "oft" (A. V.) and "diligently" (Alford) have been assigned to it; but it may possibly signify "with the fist," as though it were necessary to close the one hand, which had already been cleansed, before it was applied to the unclean one. This sense appears preferable to the other interpretations of a similar character, such as "up to the wrist" (Lightfoot); "up to the elbow" (Theophylact); "having closed the hand" which is undergoing the washing (Grotius; Scaliger). The Pharisaical regulations on this subject are embodied in a treatise of the Mishna entitled Yadain, from which it appears that the ablution was confined to the hand (ii, § 3), and that great care was needed to secure perfect purity in the water used. The ordinary, as distinct from the ceremonial, washing of hands before meals is still universally prevalent in Eastern countries (Lane, i, 190; Burckhardt, Notes, i, 63; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 184). See HAND.

The Mosaic law directed that in certain cases the Jews should wash their hands, to signify that they were guiltless of the blood of an unknown person found murdered (Deut. xxi, 6). Pilate was probably aware of this custom, for, from Matt. xxvii, 24, we find, "When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, he took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it." He knew that this symbolical act was calculated to make an impression, and would be distinctly understood. To himself, also, the adoption of this ceremony was perfectly natural, as the rite was common among the Greeks and Romans as one of expiation for an act of unintentional or unwilling homicide. See the monographs on the subject cited by Volbeding, Index Program, p. 55, 59, 121. See RUD HIKER.

II. Washing the Feet did not rise to the dignity of a ritual observance except in connection with the services of the sanctuary (Exod. xxx, 19, 21). It held a high place, however, among the rites of hospitality. Immediately after a guest presented himself at the tent-door, it was usual to offer the necessary materials for washing the feet (Gen. xviii, 4; xix, 2; xxiv, 32; xliii, 24; Judg. xix, 21; comp. Hom. Od. iv, 49). It was a yet more complimentary act, betokening equally humility and affection, if the host actually performed the office for his guest (1 Sam. xxv, 41; Luke vii, 38, 44; John xiii, 5-14; 1 Tim. v, 10). Such a token of hospitality is still occasionally exhibited in the East, either by the host or by his deputy (Robinson, Res. ii, 229; Jowett, Res. p. 78, 79). The feet were again washed before retiring to bed (Cant. v, 3). A symbolical significance is attached in John xiii, 10 to washing the feet as compared with bathing the whole body, the former being partial (πάρτω), the latter complete (λουώ); the former oft repeated in the course of the day, the latter done once for all; whence they are adduced to illustrate the distinction between occasional sin and a general state of sinfulness. After being washed, the feet were on festive occasions anointed (Luke vii, 38; John xii, 3). The indignity attached to the act of washing another's feet appears to have been extended to the vessel used (Psa. lx, 8). See FOOT-WASHING.

Feet-washing (pedilavium) became as might be expected, a part of the observances practiced in the early Christian Church. The real signification, however, was soon forgotten, or overloaded by superstitious feelings and mere outward practices. Traces of the practice abound in ecclesiastical history, and remnants of the abuse are still to be found, at least in the Romish Church. The reader who wishes to see an outline of these may consult Siegel, Handbuch der christl.-kirchl. Alterthümer, ii, 156 sq.

Wash-pot (פֶּרֶק רַחֵץ), a basin or ewer for washing the hands and feet; put figuratively for the meanest vessel (Psa. lx, 10). Respecting the ancient Egyptians, Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt. i, 77 sq.) remarks as follows: "To those who arrived from a journey, or who desired it, water was brought for their feet previous to entering the festive chamber. Joseph ordered his servants to fetch water for his brethren that they might wash their feet before they ate (Gen. xliii, 24; comp. also xviii, 4; xxiv, 32; 1 Sam. xxv, 46). It was always a custom of the East, as with the Greeks and Romans (comp. Luke vii, 44, 46). The Egyptians also washed their hands before dinner, the water being brought in the same manner as at the present day; and ewers, not unlike those used by the modern Egyptians, are represented, with the basins belonging to them, in the paintings of a Theban tomb. In the houses of the rich they were of gold or other costly materials. Herodotus mentions the golden server Vishnu. She also carries the surname Surabhi—cow of plenty; which is not in the least an unbecoming comparison, as it might seem, because the cow in India is worshipped and held sacred to the gods. In poetry she receives still other surnames: the dark border of the ocean, the sea-bordered earth, etc.

Wasuthr, in Norse mythology, is the personification of a condition of the weather. His son was Wind-loni (ice wind). He made with Swasuthr (warm wind) the season of summer. To this dynasty belong, yet in an unknown degree of kindred, Grimmer and Swalbriostatur.

Watch, in Heb. שָׂמַר, denoting "to cut into," thence "to impress on the mind," "to observe," "to watch," in the sense of keeping or guarding; or שָׁמַר, the original meaning of which is "to look out," thence "to watch," as in English, "to keep a lookout," in the sense of spying or noticing. Watching must have been coeval with danger, and danger arose as soon as man became the enemy of man, or had to guard against the attacks of wild animals. Among a primitive and nomadic people this is especially necessary. Accordingly, we find traces of the practice of watching in early portions of the Hebrew annals. Watching must have been carried to some degree of completeness in Egypt, for we learn from Exod. xiv, 24 that the practice had, at the time of the Exode, caused the night to be divided into different watches or portions, mention being made of the "morning watch" (comp. 1 Sam. xi, 11). In the days of the Judges (vii, 19) we find "the middle watch" mentioned (see Luke xii, 38). At a later period Isaiah plainly intimates (xxi, 5, 6) that there was a watch-tower in Jerusalem, and that it was customary on extraordinary occasions to set a watchman. Watchmen were, however, even at an earlier day, customarily employed in the metropolis, and their post was at the gates (2 Sam. xviii, 24 sq.; 2 Kings ix, 17 sq.; Psa. cxxvii, 1; cxxx, 6; Prov. viii, 34), where they gave signals and information, either by their voice or with the aid of a trumpet (Jer. vi, 17; Ezek. xxxiii, 6). At night watchmen were accustomed to perambulate the city (Cant. iii, 8; v, 7). In the New Test. we find mention made of the second, the third, and the fourth watch (Luke xii, 38; Matt. xiv, 25).—Kitto. On the watch at Christ's sepulchre (Matt. xxvii, 66), see the monographs cited by Volbeding, Index Programmaticum, p. 67. See WATCHMAN.

WATCH OF THE NIGHT (שִׁמּוּר לַלַּיְלָה; φυλακή). The Jews, like the Greeks and Romans, divided the night into military watches instead of hours, each watch representing the period for which sentinels or pickets remained on duty. The proper Jewish reckoning recognised only three such watches. These would last respectively from sunset to 10 P.M.; from 10 P.M. to 2 A.M.; and from 2 A.M. to sunrise. It has been contended by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in Matt. xiv, 25) that the Jews really reckoned four watches, three only of which were in the dead of the night, the fourth being in the morning. This, however, is rendered improbable by the use of the term "middle," and is opposed to Rabbinical authority (Mishna, Berach. i, 1; Kimchi, On Psa. lxxiii, 7; Rashi, On Judg. vii, 19). We find, however, different opinions on this subject as early as the Talmud (Berach. iii, b, etc.). The Old Test. mentions expressly:

1. ראש אֶשְׁמֹרֶת, head, first, of the watches (Lam. ii, 19).
2. אֶשְׁמֹרֶת הַתְּרִיבָּה, middle watch (Judg. vii, 19), which, according to those who affirm that there were always four, means the middle of those three watches which fell in the time of complete night.
3. אֶשְׁמֹרֶת הַבֹּקֶר, morning watch (Exod. xiv, 24; 1 Sam. xi, 11).

foot-pan in which Amasis and his guests used to wash their feet. The Greeks had the same custom of bringing water to the guests, numerous instances of which we find in Homer—as when Telemachus and the son of Nestor were received at the house of Menelaus, and when Asphalion poured it upon the hands of his master and the same guests on another occasion. Virgil also describes the servants bringing water for this purpose when Æneas was entertained by Dido. Nor was the ceremony thought superfluous, or declined, even though they had previously bathed and been anointed with oil."

Subsequently to the establishment of the Roman supremacy, the number of watches (vigilia) was increased to four, which were described either according to their numerical order, as in the case of the "fourth watch" (Matt. xiv, 25; comp. Josephus, Ant. v, 6, 5), or by the terms "even, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning" (Mark xiii, 35). These terminated respectively at 9 P.M., midnight, 8 A.M., and 6 A.M. Conformably to this, the guard of soldiers was divided into four relays (Acts xii, 4), showing that the Roman régime was followed in Herod's army. (See Veget. De Re Mil. iii, 8, "In quatuor partes ad clepeydram sunt divisæ vigiliæ, ut non amplius quam tribus horis nocturnis, necesse est vigilare;" Censorin, De Die Natul. Illepi φ. τετράριον; Josephus, Ant. xviii, 9, C. Illepi φ. τετράριον; Diod. Sic. 18, 40; Xenoph. Anab. iv, 1, 5; Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud.; Fischerus, Prologus de Vitis Lex. N. Test.). Accordingly, in the New Test. four night-watches are mentioned (Mark xiii, 35):

1. Ὠφεί, the late watch, lasting from sunset to the third hour of the night, including the evening dawn; also called Ὠφεί ὥρα, even-tide (Mark xi, 11), or simply Ὠφεί, evening (John xx, 19).
2. Μεσονύκτιον, midnight, from the third hour to midnight.
3. Ἀλεκτορυγία, cock-crowing, from midnight to the third hour after midnight. This ended with the second cock-crowing.
4. Πρωί, early, from the ninth hour of the night to the twelfth, including the morning dawn or twilight. It is also called πρωία, morning-tide or morning (John xviii, 28).

See NIGHT-WATCH; VIGIL.

Watcher (רִמְיָה, waking), a class of angelic beings mentioned in the description of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dan. iv, 18-17). The Chaldeans appear to have believed that God had delegated the moral government of the earth to celestial spirits, who had the charge of making inquisition into human actions, and punishing the guilty. See ANGEL.

Watchers, a class of monks who are said to have performed divine service without intermission, by dividing themselves into three classes, and taking their turns at the service at stated hours. See AGNETÆ. The term is applied to the keepers of the Easter sepulchre. Usually there were two or three who sang psalms and maintained the watch. The term is also used to designate the keepers of the Church who went the rounds at night.

Watching with the dead. See WAKE.

Watching Loft is an apartment over the aisle, sacristy, or porch of a Church or cathedral, from which the great shrines were observed by the watchers of the Church. Such lofts remain at Nuremberg, Germany; and at Oxford, Lichfield, St. Albans, Westminster, Exeter, Hereford, and other places in England.

Watchman (רִמְיָה, 2 Kings xvii, 9; xviii, 8; Jer. xxxi, 6; "watcher," Jer. iv, 16; elsewhere "keeper," "preserver," etc.; but usually שָׂמֹר or שֹׁמֵר). Even strong walls and double gates would not of themselves secure a city from the enemy. Men were therefore employed to watch day and night on the top of the walls, and especially by the gates. It was thus that the messengers from the army were seen long before they reached the place where David anxiously sat (2 Sam. xviii, 24-27). In like manner the watchman of Jezreel saw in the distance the company of Jehu driving furiously (2 Kings ix, 17-20). So Isaiah, in one of his sublime visions, saw a watchman standing by his tower day and night (Isa. xxi, 5-12). A figurative use of the watchman and his work is beautifully made in Isa. lxii, 6; Ezek. xxxiii, 2, 6, 7; Hab. ii, 1. There were others whose duty it was to patrol the streets of the city and preserve order (see Psa. cxxvii, 1; Song of Solomon iii, 3). There are such in Oriental cities to-day, and they challenge all persons found abroad after certain hours of the night, arresting those that are not able to give a good account of themselves, and sometimes subjecting them to rough treatment. In Persia the watchmen were obliged to indemnify those who were robbed in the streets, and make satisfaction with their own blood for those who were murdered; which accounts for the vigilance and severity which they display in the discharge of their office, and illustrates the character of watchman given to Ezekiel, who lived in that country, and the duties he was required to perform. If the wicked perished in his iniquities without warning, the prophet was to be accountable for his blood; but if he duly pointed out his danger, he delivered his own soul (Ezek. xxxiii, 5). These terms, therefore, were neither harsh nor severe; they were the common appointments of watchmen in Persia. They were also charged to announce the progress of the night to the slumbering city: "The burden of Dumah; he calls to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night" (Isa. xxi, 11). This is confirmed by an observation of Chardin, that, as the people of the East have no clocks, the several parts of the day and of the night, which are eight in all, are announced. In the Indies, the parts of the night are made known, as well by instruments of music, in great cities, as by the rounds of the watchmen, who, with cries and small drums, give them notice that a fourth part of the night is past. Now, as these cries awoke those who had slept all that quarter part of the night, it appeared to them but as a moment. There are sixty of these in the Indies by day, and as many by night; that is, fifteen for each division. They are required not only at each watch of the night, but at frequent intervals in the progress of it, to cry aloud, in order to give the people, who depend upon them for the protection of their lives and property, assurance that they are not sleeping at their posts or negligent of their charge. On these latter occasions, their exclamations are made in a form calculated to enliven the tediousness of their duties, as, "God be merciful to you;" while the other responds, "Blessings be on you likewise." This practice of salutation, when they met, in the form of a set dialogue, was observed also by the ancient officers of this description among the Jews, the watchword being then, as we have seen it is still among the watchmen of the caravans, some pious sentiment, in which the name of Jehovah was specially expressed. Two remarkable instances of this occur in Scripture. The one is in the prophecies of Isaiah, where, speaking of the watchmen of the Temple, who were always Levites, and among whom the same regulations subsisted as among other watchmen, he addresses them under the poetical description of "Ye that make mention of the Lord," i. e. Ye whose watchword is the name of Jehovah (Isa. lxii, 6). The other instance is in Psa. cxxxiv, the whole of which, as is justly observed by bishop Lowth, is nothing more than the alternate cry of two different divisions of the watch. The first watch addresses the second, reminding them of their duty; the second answers by a solemn blessing. The address and the answer seem both to be a set form, which each proclaimed aloud at stated intervals to notify the time of night:

First band of watchmen—"Bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, who by night stand in the house of the Lord. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the Lord."

Second band of watchmen answer—"The Lord bless thee out of Zion, the Lord that made heaven and earth."

Watch-night is a Wesleyan custom. Near the beginning of Methodism the members of that body in Bristol began to meet at night, that they might worship without interruption. Mr. Wesley, knowing that such meetings would soon be misinterpreted, made them public, and for a time held them once a month. Afterwards, however, they were observed only on the eve of the new year, which custom prevails to a certain extent to the present time.

Watch-tower (מִצְדָּה, Isa. xxi, 5; מִצְדָּה, 2 Chron. xx, 24; Isa. xxi, 8), a structure over or by the side of city gates in the East, in which a watchman was stationed to observe what was going on at a distance, especially in times of danger (2 Sam. xviii, 25). We find that he went up by a staircase from the passage, which, like the roof of the dwelling-houses, was flat, for the purpose of descrying at a distance those that were approaching the place, or repelling the attacks of an enemy. The observations made by the watchman were not communicated by him immediately to the king, but by the intervention of a warder at the outer gate of the tower; and it appears that a private staircase led from the lower room, in which David (in the above passage) was sitting, to the upper room over the gateway; for by that communication he retired to give full vent to his sorrow (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 411). See CITY; GATE; TOWER.

Waterford, COUNCIL OF (Synodus Guaterfordia). Waterford is a city of Ireland, capital of the county of the same name, situated near the southern coast, on the right bank of the Suir, nine miles from the sea. An ecclesiastical council is said to have been held there about 1158, in which it was ordered that all the English slaves throughout Ireland should be liberated to avert the divine wrath. It seems that many of the English had been in the habit of selling their own children to the Irish for slaves, and that not under the pressure of extreme want. See Mansi, Concil. x, 1183.

Both the date and place of this council are probably incorrect, as the account of it in Labbe exactly coincides with that of the Council of Armagh in 1171 (q. v.), and in both the council is said to have been convoked apud Ardmaciam.—Landon, Manual of Councils, v.

Waterhouse, EDWARD, an English author who became a clergyman, was born in 1619. He received a learned education, became a member of the Royal Society in 1668, and took holy orders the same year. He died May 30, 1670. He was the author of Humble Apology for Learning and Learned Men (1653):—Two Contemplations (ed.):—Discourse of the Piety, Policy, and Charity of Elder Times and Christians (1655):—Gentleman's Monitor (ed.):—Short Narrative of the Late Dreadful Fire of London (1667):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, v.

Waterlanders (or Waterlandians), a sect of Anabaptists (q. v.) in Holland, so called to distinguish them from the Flemings, or Flandrians, and also because they consisted, at first, of the inhabitants of a district in the north of Holland called Waterland. The Flemings were more rigid in their views and practice than the Waterlandians. Both are governed by presbyters and deacons, and each congregation is independent of all foreign jurisdiction. The Waterlanders are also called Johannites, from John de Ries, who was of great service to them in many respects, and who was one of the composers of their Confession of Faith in 1580. The Waterlanders of Amsterdam afterwards joined with the Galenists (q. v.). See MENNONITES.

Waterman, HENRY, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Centreville, Warwick, R. I., Aug. 17, 1813, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1831. He pursued his theological studies, in part, at Cambridge, at a school taught by Rev. John Henry Hopkins and Rev. George Washington Doane, which, on their appointment as bishops—the one of the diocese of Vermont, and the other of the diocese of New Jersey—was given up. Mr. Waterman completed his course of study at the Episcopal Seminary in New York, and was ordained deacon by bishop Griswold, at Providence, in June, 1835, and presbyter by the same, at Boston, in 1837. He commenced the active duties of the ministry at Woonsocket, R. I., as rector of St. James's Church, where he remained six years (1835–41), and then took charge of the parish of St. Stephen's in Providence, commencing his ministry in November, 1841. Here he continued for four years (1841–45), and then went to Andover, Mass., where he was rector of Christ Church until June, 1849. He spent nearly a year in foreign travel for his health, and, on his return, in the summer of 1850, he again became rector of St. Stephen's Church, occupying that position until October, 1874, a period of twenty-four years, during which a strong and vigorous parish grew up under his administration. Resigning his parish, he continued to reside in Providence, preaching in different parts of Rhode Island and other places as his health allowed him. His death occurred in Providence Oct. 18, 1876. "Dr. Waterman," says Prof. Gammell, "was an instructive and effective preacher, and a careful student of the works of the old English divines, and was thoroughly Anglican in all his ecclesiastical views. Beyond his immediate sphere as a clergyman, he seldom cared to appear in public. In that sphere, however, he exerted a very important influence, and was greatly respected by his brethren." (J. C. S.)

Waters, FRANCIS, D.D., a local deacon and elder, and a noted educator in the Methodist Protestant Church, was born Jan. 16, 1792, in Maryland. He graduated in Pennsylvania University, in 1810, and took charge of Washington Academy in Somerset County, Md. In 1818 he was elected president of Washington College, in Chestertown, Kent Co., and resigned this position in 1823. From this date until 1828 he resided in Somerset County; from 1828 to 1835 he taught private school in Baltimore. In 1840 he became president of the Theological and Literary School for the education of young men for the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Protestant Church; in 1846 he went to reside in Baltimore, and filled several important positions of an educational character until Jan. 30, 1860, when, on account of feeble health, he was obliged to resign. He was president of the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1846 and 1862. He died April 23, 1868. See Cothouer, Founders of the M. P. Church, p. 182.

Water-spout is the rendering, in the A. V. at Ps. xlii, 7, of מַיִם, teimér (from מַיִם, a root of doubtful import), which Gesenius thinks a cataract or water-course ("gutter," 2 Sam. v, 8), and First a pipe or conduit. Water-spouts, it seems, are actually seen on the Mediterranean (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 256). See GUTTER.

Watson, George, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector in Norwalk, O., in 1854, and from that time until 1865 served the parish of St. Paul, in that city. He died Nov. 15, 1870, aged sixty-eight years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1871, p. 118.

Watson, James Clemson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Donegal township, Lancaster Co., Pa., Jan. 27, 1805. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1827; studied at Princeton Theological Seminary between two and three years; was licensed in 1830, and ordained, in 1832, pastor of the united churches of Gettysburg and Great Conewago, Pa., where he labored until 1849; then became pastor at Clinton, N. J.; next at Kingston in 1851, and finally in 1854 at Milton, Pa., where he died, Aug. 31, 1880. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 31.

Watson, Robert, LL.D., a minister of the Church of Scotland, professor and author, was born at St. Andrew's about 1780. He was educated at the universities of St. Andrew's, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. In 1751 he began to deliver in Edinburgh a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres, which he repeated for several successive winters. He became a minister of the Church of Scotland in 1758; professor of logic, rhetoric, and belles-lettres in the College of St. Salvador, at St.

Andrew's, soon after; and principal of the United College of St. Leonard and St. Salvador, and minister of the Church and parish of St. Leonard, in 1777. He died at St. Andrew's, March 31, 1781. He was the author of a History of the Reign of Philip II, King of Spain (Lond. 1777, 2 vols.); and a History of the Reign of Philip III (1783). The latter work was left unfinished at the author's death, and was completed for the benefit of his family by William Thomson, LL.D. The former was translated into French, Dutch, and German. Both works have been republished in the United States (N. Y. 1818), but are of little value, being heavy and inelegant in style, and yielding inevitably to the more philosophical and elegant works of Prescott.

Watson, Thomas (1), D.D., an eminent English prelate, was born about 1520. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow and master in 1553. He took orders in the Church of England; was appointed dean of Durham in 1553; bishop of Lincoln in 1557; and was preacher to queen Mary. On the accession of queen Elizabeth, he refused to take the oath of supremacy, was deprived of his bishopric, and from that time until his death adhered firmly to the Roman Church. He was imprisoned near London until 1580, when he was removed to Wisbeck Castle, where he died, Sept. 25, 1582. His published works are Two Notable Sermons before the Queenes Highnes concerning the Reall Presence (1554); and Holesome and Catholyke Doctryne concerninge the Seven Sacramentes (1558). He was also the author of a Latin tragedy, which was greatly admired, but never published.

Watson, Thomas (2), an eminent Nonconformist divine, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was pastor of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, London, in 1646. Ejected for nonconformity in 1662, he preached in Crosby Hall in 1672, and died in Essex about 1689. Watson was an eminent preacher, and one of his sermons, entitled Heaven taken by Storm, was often reprinted. Besides A Body of Practical Divinity, consisting of one hundred and seventy-six sermons on the Assembly's Catechism (1692; last ed. N. Y. 1871), he published The Christian Charter:—The Art of Divine Contentment:—A Discourse of Meditation (6th ed. Lond. 1660). His Select Works were published in London in 1821, and in New York in 1855. See Plutt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Watt (also Vadianus), Joachim von, the Reformer of St. Gall, was born Dec. 30, 1484, of ancient family in that city. His father was a merchant, his mother a judicious and pious woman. His early education was conducted by his mother and pedagogues of his native town, but he soon went to Vienna in order to avail himself of the superior privileges there afforded. He there became acquainted with Ulric Zwingli and Heinrich Loriti (Glareanus). A period of dissolute behavior ensued in his life, but it was speedily followed by a continuous season of earnest classical study. A Virgil which he was wont to use as a pillow in those days is still preserved in the town library of St. Gall. He also tried his powers in Latin verse, and, in obedience to the customs of his day, changed his name into the Latin Vad'us, afterwards Vadianus. After a tour through Poland, Hungary, and Carinthia, and an essay at teaching in Villach, he returned, by way of Venice, to Vienna, and resumed his studies. He joined the learned society known as the Danube Association, and included jurisprudence, theology, and medicine in his course, obtaining the doctorate in the last-named department. After the death of Cuspinian, Watt filled the chair of the Greek language and literature. In 1514 he was made poet-laureate by the emperor Maximilian. Four years afterwards he returned to St. Gall for a visit, but was given the post of town-physician, by which he was held to that city as long as he lived. In 1519 he married Martha Grebel.

The Church of St. Gall was wholly controlled by the spirit of Middle-Age Catholicism; but Watt, who had become acquainted with the writings of Luther and the ideas of the Reformation while at Vienna, gave himself to the work of improving its spiritual condition. He was assisted in his endeavors by the newly installed minister of St. Laurent, Benedict Burgauer, and his helper, Wolfgang Wetter. He maintained an active correspondence with Zwingli. He presided in the Colloquy of Zurich in 1523, and of Berne in 1526. He became the chief promoter of the Reformation initiated in St. Gall after the Zurich Colloquy, and incurred much hatred in consequence. The Anabaptist movement in St. Gall and Appenzell also gave him trouble; but the continued support accorded him by his fellow-citizens sustained him even when his brother-in-law, Conrad Grebel, of Zurich, was drowned in punishment of his heresies. He was chosen burgomaster of St. Gall repeatedly, and in that capacity gave himself to the work of instructing the populace and increasing their comforts. He also participated in the theological controversies of his time, particularly the Sacramentarian and Schwenkfeldian disputes, and in connection with them wrote several books. He died April 6, 1551, and was mourned by Calvin and others as being lost to the great work of the Reformation in whose promotion he took so influential a part.

The life of Watt was first described by Kessler, the friend whom he had brought under the influence of Luther and Melancthon, and thereby gained for the Reformation. Kessler's MS. is preserved in the Library of St. Gall. Other biographers are, Huber, Ehrensgedächtniss des . . . Joachim v. Watt (St. Gall, 1683); Fels, Denkmalschweiz, Reformatoren (ibid. 1819); Pressel, Joachims Vadium, etc. (Elberfeld, 1861), pt. ix.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Watters, Nicholas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, and brother of William Watters, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., Nov. 20, 1739. He entered the travelling connection about the year 1773, and was appointed as follows: Kent, Md., 1776; Hanover, 1777-78; Union, S. C., 1794; Seleuda, 1799; Harford, Md., 1800; Winchester, Va., 1801; Lancaster, 1802; Broad River, Ga., 1803; Charleston, S. C., 1804, where he died in peace and triumph Aug. 10, 1804. Benet Kendrick, his colleague in the ministry, reported to the South Carolina Conference that Nicholas Watters was peculiarly attentive in visiting the sick, and would not let a favorable opportunity slip. He exercised a great degree of humanity in his Christian and ministerial duties. His last words were, "I am not afraid to die, thanks be to God!" See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1805, p. 126; Bangs, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 174; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 21; iii, 393; iv, 240-241.

Watters, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Oct. 16, 1751, of Church of England parents. He was naturally vain, self-willed, and passionate, but his devotion to his widowed mother led him to seek religion early in life. He acquired a good education; joined the Methodists at the age of twenty; soon began earnest Christian work by prayer and exhortation; and in 1773 entered the Philadelphia Conference. In 1775 he was appointed to Frederick, in 1776 to Fairfax, in 1777 to Brunswick, and in 1779 to Baltimore Circuit. In 1782 he retired from the regular work to his little farm in Fairfax County. In 1786 he re-entered the active ranks, and was appointed to Berkeley Circuit, Va., but was soon obliged to return home because of sickness. He labored in Alexandria, D. C., in 1801, Georgetown in 1803, Alexandria in 1804, and in 1805 was appointed to Washington city. The remainder of his life was spent on his farm in retirement. He died March 29, 1827. Mr. Watters accomplished a great amount of good under very adverse circumstances, and was universally respected and revered. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 46.

Wave-breast (חֶבֶט הַחֵלֶב; Sept. σπένδιον ἀσπίσμαρος or ῥῆς ἐπισίματος; A. V. in Exod. xxix, 27, "breast of the wave-offering") was the breast of the victim offered in sacrifice, a ram (Exod. xxix, 27; Numb. vi, 20), at the consecration of a priest or the purification of a Nazirite after his vow; or of any other animal in thank-offerings (Lev. vii, 34; x, 14 sq.); or of the first-born-offering (Numb. xviii, 18). It was so called because waved by the priest (Exod. xxix, 27; Numb. vi, 20), and belonged to him (Exod. xxix, 27; Lev. vii, 34), to be eaten by the members of his family who were in a state of ceremonial purity (x, 14).—Winer. See WAVING.

Wave-loaf (לֶחֶם הַחֵלֶב) was the first-fruit of bread made of fine wheat flour and leavened, which at the Paschal festival was presented to Jehovah in connection with a burnt, sin, or thank offering (Lev. xxiii, 17 sq. See WAVING.

Wave-offering (הֲנִיחָה, "a waving," from הָנַח, "to wave," הֲנִיחָה לִפְנֵי יְהוָה, "a waving before Jehovah"). This rite, together with that of "heaving" or "raising" the offering, was an inseparable accompaniment of peace-offerings. In such the right shoulder, considered the choicest part of the victim, was to be "heaved," and viewed as holy to the Lord, only eaten therefore by the priest; the breast was to be "waved," and eaten by the worshipper. On the second day of the Passover a sheaf of corn, in the green ear, was to be waved, accompanied by the sacrifice of an unblemished lamb of the first year, from the performance of which ceremony the days till Pentecost were to be counted. When that feast arrived, two loaves, the first-fruits of the ripe corn, were to be offered with a burnt-offering, a sin-offering, and two lambs of the first year for a peace-offering. These likewise were to be waved.

The Scriptural notices of these rites are to be found in Exod. xxix, 24, 28; Lev. vii, 30, 34; viii, 27; ix, 21; x, 14, 15; xxiii, 10, 15, 20; Numb. vi, 20; xviii, 11, 18, 26-29, etc.

We find also the word חֶבֶט applied, in Exod. xxxviii, 24, to the gold offered by the people for the furniture of the sanctuary. It is there called חֶבֶט הַחֵלֶב. It may have been waved when presented, but it seems not impossible that חֶבֶט had acquired a secondary sense so as to denote "free-will offering." In either case we must suppose the ceremony of waving to have been known to and practiced by the Israelites before the giving of the law.

It seems not quite certain from Exod. xxix, 26, 27, whether the waving was performed by the priest or by the worshipper with the former's assistance. The Rabbinical tradition represents it as done by the worshipper, the priest supporting his hands from below.

In conjecturing the meaning of this rite, regard must be had, in the first instance, to the kind of sacrifice to which it belonged. It was the accompaniment of peace-offerings. These not only, like the other sacrifices, acknowledged God's greatness and his right over the creature, but they witnessed to a ratified covenant, an established communion between God and man. While the sin-offering merely removed defilement, while the burnt-offering gave entirely over to God of his own, the victim being wholly consumed, the peace-offering, as establishing relations between God and the worshipper, was participated in by the latter, who ate, as we have seen, of the breast that was waved. The rabbins explain the heaving of the shoulder as an acknowledgment that God has his throne in the heaven, the waving of the breast that he is present in every quarter of the earth. The one rite testified to his eternal majesty on high, the other to his being among and with his people.

It is not said in Lev. xxiii, 10-14 that a peace-offering accompanied the wave-sheaf of the Passover. On the contrary, the only bloody sacrifice mentioned in connection with it is styled a burnt-offering. When, however, we consider that everywhere else the rite of waving belongs to a peace offering, and that, besides a sin and a burnt offering, there was one in connection with the wave-loaves of Pentecost (Lev. xxiii, 19), we shall be wary of concluding that there was none in the present case. The significance of these rites seems considerable. The name of the month Abib, in which the Passover was kept, means the month of the green ear of corn, the month in which the great produce of the earth has come to the birth. In that month the nation of Israel came to the birth; each succeeding Passover was the keeping of the nation's birthday. Beautifully and naturally, therefore, were the two births—that of the people into national life; that of their needful sustenance into yearly life—combined in the Passover. All first-fruits were holy to God: the first-born of men, the first-produce of the earth. Both principles were recognised in the Passover. When, six weeks after, the harvest had ripened, the first-fruits of its matured produce were similarly to be dedicated to God. Both were waved, the rite which attested the Divine presence and working all around us being surely most appropriate and significant in their case. See WAVING.

Wave-sheaf (חֶבֶט הַחֵלֶב, Sept. δράγμα ροῦ ἐπισίματος, A. V. "sheaf of the wave-offering," Lev. xxiii, 15) was the first-fruit of the harvest, which at the beginning of the harvest or Passover (q. v.) was presented to the Jehovah by the ceremony of waving (Lev. xxiii, 11 sq., 15). See WAVE-OFFERING.

Waving and Heaving as Ceremonial Manipulations of Offerings. See OFFERING.

I. Waving before Jehovah (הֲנִיחָה לִפְנֵי יְהוָה or הֲנִיחָה) occurs as a special ceremony by the priests in the Jewish ritual not only in connection with meat-offerings (Exod. xxix, 24 [Lev. viii, 27]; Numb. v, 25), in the case of the first-fruits and the first-born (Lev. xxiii, 11 sq.; xvii, 25), but also of bloody offerings, whether (especially in thank-offerings) of single pieces only, as the breast or right shoulder or fore-leg (Exod. xxix, 26 sq.; Lev. vii, 30, 34; ix, 21; x, 14; Numb. vi, 20), or of the whole animal (a lamb, Lev. xix, 12, 24; xxiii, 23), which was waved before Jehovah in token of presentation; and this principle extended even to the persons of the Levites as an initiatory rite to their office (Numb. viii, 11, 15). The waving in case of meat-offerings or pieces of animals was performed upon (with) the hands (Exod. xxix, 24; Lev. viii, 27; according to the rabbins, it was held upon the hands of the offerers, beneath which were placed those of the priest [Tosiph-ta, Menach. vii, 17], so as to fulfil the requirement of Exod. xxix, 24; Numb. vi, 19, 20; while whole animals were waved by the hands of the priest alone [Mishna, Menach. v, 6]); each having previously been laid upon the altar; in the case of whole animals this was done before slaughtering them (Lev. xiv, 12 sq., 24 sq.). It consisted, according to the rabbins (Mishna, Menach. v, 6), like the porricere of the Romans (Macrob. Sat. iii, 2), also the obnotere or commovere (Cato, Res Rust. 134) in certain respects (Zorn, Biblioth. Antiq. i, 74), of a forward and backward motion upward of the articles; while living objects were simply moved to and fro. Whether the motion was ever to the right and left is uncertain, although the import of the word הֲנִיחָה (see Isa. xxx, 28; Deut. xx, 25) would justify such an opinion, which, moreover, would be highly significant. The act, at all events, indicates a festive surrender to Jehovah as a personal service like the peace-offering; beyond this all is speculation (Bähr, Symbol. ii, 376 sq.; see Reland, Antiq. Sacr. p. 276). See WAVE-OFFERING.

II. Heaving (הֲרִיחָה or הֲרִיחָה) is associated with the tossing (Exod. xxix, 27), as the heave-shoulder (שֵׁכַם הֲרִיחָה) occurs along with the wave-breast (Exod.

xxix, 27; Lev. vii, 30, 32, 34), and what is called (Exod. xxxviii, 24) wave-gold is also called heave-gold (Numb. xxxi, 52). Indeed, the Jews scarcely distinguish between the two (תְּרִיבָּהּ and תְּרִיבָּהּ) as ritualistic acts, but explain each as an upward and downward motion (Mishna, Menach. v, 6), a sort of elevatio. Both would thus stand as generally expressive of supreme consecration to God as the universal Owner and Giver (see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 866; Bähr, Symbolik, ii, 355 sq., 377). Some moderns incorrectly regard the two acts as identical (Jahn, Archäol. iii, 38), or take "heaving" (תְּרִיבָּהּ) in the vague sense of offerre or auferre (like Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1277), and connect חִיבָּהּ, Exod. xxix, 27, with חִיבָּהּ, contrary to the accents and the parallelism; but see Kurtz, Mos. Opfer, p. 146 sq. See HEAVE-OFFERING.

Wax (דֹּגֶג or דֹּגֶג, dongg, supposed to come from a root דָּג, significant of melting or yielding), the soft sticky substance of which bees form their cells, and which is readily separated from the honey by melting in warm water (Psa. xxii, 14; lxviii, 2; xcvii, 5; Mic. i, 4). This is properly called beeswax, and is of vegetable origin, although manipulated by the bees from the pollen of flowers. But there are other kinds of wax, made from resins, either vegetable or mineral (the latter originally vegetable likewise), by the addition of proportions of grease, such as shoemaker's wax, grafting-wax, etc. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews were acquainted with any of these artificial sorts.

Waxen Figures. A well-known custom of cursing an enemy in the Middle Ages was that of making a waxen figure, and, as it melted before the fire, the person represented by it was supposed similarly to waste away. This practice is referred to in Horace (Satires, i, 8, 30 sq.), and it is worthy of remark that the same custom is described in the incantations of the ancient Accadian sorcerers. See Lenormant, Chaldean Magic, p. 5.

Way. This word has now in ordinary parlance so entirely forsaken its original sense (except in combination, as in "highway," "causeway"), and is so uniformly employed in the secondary or metaphorical sense of a "custom" or "manner," that it is difficult to remember that in the Bible it most frequently signifies an actual road or track. Our translators have employed it as the equivalent of no less than eighteen distinct Hebrew terms. Of these several had the same secondary sense which the word "way" has with us. Two others (דֶּרֶךְ and מִסְלָל) are employed only by the poets, and are commonly rendered "path" in the A. V. But the term which most frequently occurs, and in the majority of cases signifies (though it also is now and then used metaphorically) an actual road, is דֶּרֶךְ, derek, connected with the German treten, and the English "tread." It may be truly said that there is hardly a single passage in which this word occurs which would not be made clearer and more real if "road to" were substituted for "way of." Thus Gen. xvi, 7, "the spring of the road to Shur;" Numb. xiv, 24, "the road to the Red Sea;" 1 Sam. vi, 12, "the road to Bethshemesh;" Judg. ix, 37, "the road to the oak of Meonenim;" 2 Kings xi, 19, "the road to the gate." It turns that which is a mere general expression into a substantial reality. In like manner the word δόγ in the New Test. is almost invariably translated "way." Mark x, 32, "They were on the road going up to Jerusalem;" Matt. xx, 17, "and Jesus took the twelve disciples apart in the road"—out of the crowd of pilgrims who, like themselves, were bound for the Passover.

There is one use of both derek and δόγ which must not be passed over, viz. in the sense of a religious course. In the Old Test. this occurs but rarely, perhaps twice: namely in Amos viii, 14, "the manner of Beersheba," where the prophet is probably alluding to some idolatrous rites then practiced there; and again in Psa. cxxxix, 24, "look if there be any evil way," any idolatrous practices, "in me, and lead me in the everlasting way." But in the Acts of the Apostles δόγ, "the way," "the road," is the received, almost technical, term for the new religion which Paul first resisted and afterwards supported. See Acts ix, 2; xix, 9, 23; xxii, 4; xxiv, 14, 22. In each of these the word "that" is an interpolation of our translators, and should have been put into italics, as it is in xxiv, 22.

The religion of Islām is spoken of in the Koran as "the path" (et-tarik, iv, 66), and "the right path" (i, 5, iv, 174). Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 353) has collected examples of the same expression in other languages and religions. See ROAD.

Waynflete, WILLIAM OF, an eminent English prelate of the 15th century, founder of Magdalen College, Oxford, was born of a noble family in Waynflete, Lincolnshire. He was educated at Winchester School and one of the colleges at Oxford. He was ordained deacon in 1420, and presbyter in 1426; became head-master of Winchester School in 1429; rector of Wroxall in 1433, master of St. Mary Magdalen Hospital in 1438; removed to Eton with a part of his school in 1440, by the advice of Henry VI; became bishop of Winchester in 1447, in which position he continued for thirty-nine years. In 1450 he was called upon by king Henry for advice in the matter of the rebellion of Jack Cade, which he tendered with great prudence; and soon after rendered a like service, when Richard, duke of York, took up arms against his majesty. In 1453 he baptized the prince of Wales, afterwards Edward IV. In 1456 he was appointed lord high chancellor, and resigned the office in 1460. He died Aug. 11, 1486, and was buried in Winchester Cathedral, in a magnificent sepulchral chapel, which is kept in the finest preservation by the Society of Magdalen College. He founded Magdalen College, established a free school in his native town, and was a benefactor to Eton College and Winchester Cathedral. He possessed considerable ability as an architect, which he employed in connection with his benefactions.

Wayside Chapel is a small house of worship at some frequented place on a public highway, formerly resorted to on pilgrimage, or as a place of safety by pilgrims. "These buildings were commonly attached to bridges at the entrance of towns—as at Rochester, Stamford, Elvet, Durham, Exeter, Newcastle, and London. Two still exist at Castle Barnard and Wakefield, the latter being of the 14th century. It has a remarkable carving of the Resurrection. In France, Switzerland, and Italy they are still common; there is a good example at Pisa, about 1230. They were frequented sometimes as objects of pilgrimages, but more commonly by pilgrims going and returning from a shrine, and by ordinary travellers when the dangers of the highway and bypaths were considerable. Until recent times the bishop of Chichester was met at St. Roche's Hill by the civic authorities, on his return from Parliament, to congratulate him upon his safe arrival home."

Wayside Cross is a cross erected on the public highway, either to commemorate some remarkable event, to indicate the boundary of an estate, to designate a customary station for a public service, or the temporary resting-place of the corpse on a royal or noble funeral; or to mark the confines of a diocesan, monastic, or parochial boundary. Anciently, in England, wayside crosses were abundant, and reminded the faithful of the duty of prayer. They were often of stone, standing on the steps; though, no doubt, wooden wayside crosses were frequently set up. Stone crosses partook of the distinct architectural features of the age and time in which they were erected. One removed from the site of the abbey is preserved in Langley Park, Norfolk. The Weeping Cross at Shrewsbury was a station on Corpus Christi Day, when the various guilds, religious and corporate bodies visited it; and there offered prayers for an abundant harvest, returning to hear mass in St. Chad's. There was a weeping cross at Caen, erected by queen Matilda in memory of her sorrows at the cruel treatment of her husband, William of Normandy. Sometimes it commemorated a battle, as the Neville's Cross, near Durham, erected in 1346; or a death, like the memorial of Sir Ralph Percy, who was killed on Hedgeley Moor in 1464. There are remains of wayside crosses near Doncaster and at Braithwell, with inscriptions, inviting the prayers of the passing traveller. In Devonshire alone there are one hundred and thirty-five places called by the name of the cross. At Penceran and St. Herbot, Brittany, there are superb specimens; and others, richly carved, at Neven, Carew, and Newmarket. Valle Crucis Abbey took its name from Eliseg's sepulchral cross of the 7th century. In Spain, Italy, Lubbeck (near Louvain), Willebrock, and on Bonthill, Berwickshire, there are memorials of a violent death. In the life of St. Willebald the English laborers are said to have gathered round a cross in the middle of a field for daily prayer as an ordinary custom.

Webbe, GEORGE, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Bromham, Wiltshire, in 1581. He was educated at Oxford University, took holy orders, and became minister of Steeple Aston, Wiltshire, where he also kept a grammar-school, as he afterwards did at Bath. In 1621 he became rector of St. Peter and St. Paul's in Bath; was made chaplain to Charles I. on his accession to the throne; and was consecrated bishop of Limerick, Ireland, in December, 1634. Some time before his death he was confined in Limerick Castle by the rebels, and died there near the close of 1641. He was the author of Practice of Quietness (3d ed. 1681).—A Brief Exposition of the Principles of the Christian Religion (1612).—Arraignment of an Unruly Tongue (1619).—Augur's Prayer; or, The Christian Choice (1621).—The Protestant's Calendar (1624).—Lessons and Exercises out of Cicero ad Atticum.—some other text-books for schools, and several Sermons, which appeared from 1609 to 1619. He was accounted the best preacher in his time in the royal court, and the smoothest writer of sermons that were then published.

Webber, Francis, D.D., an English clergyman of the 18th century, was rector of Exeter College, Oxford; and in 1756 became dean of Hereford. He published five single Sermons (1738–58). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Webber, George, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Shapleigh, Me., March 18, 1801. He embraced religion in early life, and, after spending some time as a student in Maine Wesleyan Seminary, joined the Maine Conference in 1828, and was appointed as junior preacher on Strong Circuit, which embraced nearly the whole valley of Sandy River. His reputation as an able preacher soon spread, and he was sought by all the important charges in the Conference. No preacher in the Maine Conference had ever been so highly honored by his brethren. Sixteen years he served as presiding elder; five times was a delegate to the General Conference; once to the Evangelical Alliance in London; and once to the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada. At the General Conference of 1852 he was a prominent candidate for the office of bishop. For many years he was a trustee of Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and was prominently connected with all the great interests of the Conference for nearly half a century. As a preacher, Mr. Webber was solid rather than brilliant, profoundly impressive, evincing thorough mastery of his subject, deliberate and exhaustive, and purely extemporaneous. His forty-seven years of ministerial record stand without a blemish. In 1874 he superannuated, and retired to his home at Kent's Hill, and died May 11, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 86.

Weber, Ananias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Lindenhayn, in Saxony, Aug. 14, 1596. He studied at Leipsic, where he also took the different theological degrees. In 1627 he was appointed to the pastorate at Mutschen, in 1634 to the superintendency at Leissnig, having in the same year received the degree of licentiate of theology. In 1638 he went to Leipsic as archdeacon of St. Thomas's, was appointed in 1639 professor of theology, and in 1640 received the doctorate of divinity. In 1645 he was called to Breslau, in Silesia, where he occupied the highest ecclesiastical positions. He died Jan. 26, 1665. He wrote, Adventus Messianus Dudum Factus et in hunc Mundum Datus, etc.:—Problema Theolog. de Auctoritate Divina et Infallibili Verbi Dei Scripti, etc.:—Synopsis Doctrinae Orthodoxae de Conversione Hominis Irregulii contra Pseudodoxiam Pelagianorum, etc., Asserta; Paulus anti-Calvinismus, etc. See Kempf, Memoria Ananiae Weberi (Lips. 1739); Freher, Theatrum Eruditiorum; Orationes in Honorem Scriptorum Illustre; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 496. (B. P.)

Weber, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 27, 1718, at Eisleben. From 1738 to 1742 he studied at Jena and Leipsic. In the latter place he publicly spoke on De Cognitione Spiritus Finitis circa Mysterium (1742). In 1749 he was called as professor of philosophy to Halle, and in 1750 to Göttingen, where he lectured till 1770, when he accepted a call to Kiel as professor of philosophy and theology. He died May 26, 1781. He wrote, Die Uebereinstimmung der Natur und Gnade, etc. (Leips. 1748–50, 3 vols.):—Commentatio de Prima Melanchthonis Locorum Communium Editione (Kiloni, 1771):—Progr. utrum Judæus Mosi ut Legislatori solum, non ob Miracula, quibus Conspicuis erat, Religiosam Obedientiam Debeat, etc. (ibid. 1771). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 659 sq. (B. P.)

Weber, Beda, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 26, 1798, at Lienz, in the Tyrol. In 1824 he received holy orders, and in 1825 was called as professor to Meran. In 1849 he accepted a call to the pastorate in Frankfort, where he died, Feb. 28, 1858. He wrote, Tirol und die Reformation (Innsbruck, 1841):—Giovanna Maria della Croce und ihre Zeit (Ratisbon, 1846):—Predigten an das Tiroler Volk (Frankfort, 1851):—he also translated six books of Chrysostom on the priesthood (Innsbruck, 1833). See Theol. Universal-Lexikon, s. v.; Brühl, Geschichte der kath. Lit. Deutschlands (Vienna, 1861), p. 411 sq. (B. P.)

Weber, Christian Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 4, 1764, at Cannstadt, and died as dean at Nürtingen, in Würtemberg, in the year 1832. He wrote, Beiträge zur Gesch. des neuest. Kanons (Tübingen, 1791):—Neue Untersuchungen über das Alter und Ansehen des Evang. der Hebräer (ibid. 1806):—Doctrina Axi Primæ ac Præcipue Mosæici de Ente Summo (Stuttgart, 1828):—Schnurrer's Leben, Charakter u. Verdienste (Cannstadt, 1823):—Hegesippus qui dicitur sive Egeippus de Bello Judæico Ope Codicis Casselani Recognitus (Marburg, 1858). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 77, 85, 412, 867; Fluret, Bibl. Jud. iii, 496. (B. P.)

Weber, Ferdinand Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 22, 1836, at Schwabach. His preparatory education he received at the gymnasium in Nuremberg, which he left in 1855 for the University of Erlangen. Here he attended the lectures of Hofmann, Delitzsch, Thomasius, Heyder, and Harnack; and, besides theology, he also studied history and Rabbinic literature. After the completion of his academic curriculum, he became vicar of the well-known Löhle, and second teacher at the mission school in Neuendettelsau. On account of a dissertation Ueber den Begriff des Schönen und Erhabenen bei Kant, he received the degree of doctor of philosophy. At Neuendettelsau his great talents found a wide scope for usefulness. Here he published his well-known work, Vom Zorne Gottes (with an introduction by Delitzsch) in 1862, and his Introduction to the Writings of the Old and New Testaments (ed. 5th ed. 1878). In 1864 he went to Diebach, where he labored until 1872, when he was appointed Löhe's successor. Bodily infirmities, however, soon obliged him to retire to Pölsingen, where he died, July 10, 1879. Besides the works already mentioned, he published, Hermann der Prämonstratenser, oder die Juden und die Kirche des Mittelalters (Nördlingen, 1861), with a preface by Löhe:—Kurze Betrachtungen über die Evangelien und Episteln der Sonn- und Feiertage des Kirchenjahrs:—Der Prophet Jesaja in Bibelstunden ausgelegt (2 pts. 1875, 1876). He left in manuscript Grundzüge der palästinisch-jüdischen Theologie aus Targum, Midrasch und Talmud dargestellt, which will soon be published. See Delitzsch, Saut auf Hoffnung (Erlangen, 1879), p. 228 sq. (B. P.)

Weber, Georg Gottlieb, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who was born in 1744, and died Feb. 18, 1801, as court deacon and member of consistory at Weimar, is the author of, Die Augsbürgische Confession nach der Urschrift im Reichsarchiv (Weimar, 1781):—Kritische Geschichte der Augsbürgischen Confession, aus archivalischen Nachrichten (Frankf. 1783). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. i, 826, 828. (B. P.)

Weber, Johann Georg, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Herwigsdorf, near Zittau, July 10, 1687. He studied at Leipsic, and was appointed there in 1718 preacher in the university church. In 1719 he was called to Weimar, where he was made chief court preacher in 1720. In 1729 he was made general superintendent and chief preacher of St. Paul and St. Peter's, at the same time having the superintendence of the gymnasium there. He died Nov. 24, 1758. Besides a number of ascetical works, he published, Dissertatio de Sueria Nocturna (Lips. 1718):—Ordo Ecclesiasticus in Augustana Confessione Triumphans (Vimaræ, 1730):—Doctrina Tutor de Descensu Christi ad Inferos, etc. (ibid. 1731):—O 'AMHN kai rô 'AMHN, hoc est, Commentatio Ezergetico-theologica in Amen Evangelicum, vel Veritatem Doctrinæ Evangelicæ Jurejurando Christi Confirmatam, etc. (Jenæ, 1734). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 662. (B. P.)

Weber, Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 23, 1753, at Rhain, in Bavaria. In 1776 he received holy orders; in 1779 he was appointed lecturer on canon law and catechetics at the seminary in Pfaffenhausen; in 1781 he was made professor of philosophical sciences at Dillingen; and in 1800 he was made doctor of divinity. In 1826 he was appointed cathedral dean and general vicar at Augsburg, where he died, Feb. 14, 1831. He wrote, Leitfaden zu Vorlesungen über die Vernunftlehre (Dillingen, 1788):—Institutiones Logicæ (ibid. 1790):—Logica in Usum eorum qui eidem Student (Landshut, 1793):—Metaphysica in Usum eorum, etc. (ibid. 1795):—Charakter des Philosophen und Nichtphilosophen (Augsburg, 1786):—Philosophie, Religion und Christenthum im Hunde zur Veredlung und Beseeligung des Menschen (Munich, 1806-11):—Lichter für Erbauung suchende Christen (ibid. 1816-20, 3 vols.), etc. See Felder, Gelehrten-Lexikon, ii, 482 sq.; Schmid, Domdecan Joseph v. Weber (Augsburg, 1831); Theolog. Universal-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Weber, Michael, a German doctor and professor of theology, was born Dec. 8, 1754, at Gröben, near Weisenfeld. In 1784 he was called as professor of theology to Wittenberg, and in 1815 to Halle, where he died, Aug. 1, 1833. He wrote, Authentia Capitis Ultimi Evangelii Johannis, etc. (Halle, 1823):—Eclogæ Ezergetico ad Nonnullos Libror. N. T. Historicor. Locos (ibid. 1825-52):—Interpretatio Nova Novi Præcepti a Christo Dati

Joh. xiii, 34, 35 (ibid. 1826):—Paraphr. Capitis III Epistolæ Pauli ad Galatas (ibid. 1833):—De Descensu Christi ad Inferos e Loco i. Petr. iii, 19 Tollendo, etc. (Wittenb. 1805):—*Libri Symbol. Webster, Alexander, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born in Edinburgh in 1707. He became minister of Culross in 1733, and of Tolbooth Church, Edinburgh, in 1737; drew up for the Scotch government in 1755 the first attempt at a census; published several sermons and poems; and died Jan. 25, 1784. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Webster, Noah, LL.D., the lexicographer, was a learned layman of the Congregational Church, and born in Hartford, Conn., Oct. 16, 1758. Under the guidance of Rev. Nathan Perkins, he was fitted for college, and entered Yale in 1774, at the age of sixteen. The Revolution seriously interrupted the college exercises, and in his junior year he joined the army. Notwithstanding, he graduated with his class in 1778. After graduation he was occupied more or less in teaching, and also in the study of law with Oliver Ellsworth, of Hartford, afterwards Chief-justice of the United States. In 1781 he was admitted to the bar, but still taught school; and for a time was principal of an academy in Goshen, N. Y. In 1782 he conceived the plan of preparing and publishing a series of school-books, and returned from Goshen to Hartford; and in the following year published the American Spelling-book. Soon after he issued an English Grammar and a Reader. The spelling-book attained an unprecedented popularity. Five million copies had been issued up to 1818, and in the year 1847 24,000,000 had been published. After that time the annual demand was about 1,250,000 copies. Since 1861 the sale has been about 500,000 copies annually. Among his publications may be mentioned, Sketches of American Policy (1784-85):—Dissertations on the English Language (1789):—Effects of Slavery on Morals and Industry, etc. In 1788 he began the publication, in New York, of the American Magazine; in 1793 he established there a daily paper called the Minerva; and afterwards a semi-weekly paper known as the Herald. Between 1783 and 1822 his time was passed at Hartford, New Haven, New York, and Amherst. He removed from Amherst to New Haven in 1822, and made that place his residence until his death. His great work is, of course, his Dictionary of the English Language, which he began in 1807. Preliminary to this, he had published, in 1806, an octavo dictionary. In 1823 he received the degree of LL.D. from Yale College; and then, having nearly completed his large dictionary, he sailed for France, in June, 1824; spent two months at Paris in consulting rare works in the Royal Library; and then went to England, spending eight months at the University of Cambridge, with free access to the libraries. There he finished the American Dictionary. An edition of 2500 copies was printed in the United States at the close of 1828, which was followed by an edition of 3000 in England. In 1840 a second American edition was issued—3000 copies in two volumes. In 1843 he published a volume entitled A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects. As a religious man, Dr. Webster was earnest and prayerful, having united with the Church in 1808. The Bible was his daily study, and he prepared a revised edition of the common English version (New Haven, 1833, 8vo). He died at New Haven, May 28, 1843. See Cong. Quar. 1865, p. 1.

Webster, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bradford, Mass., in 1718. He graduated from Harvard College in 1737; was ordained pastor of the Church at Salisbury, Aug. 12, 1741, and died July 18, 1796. In 1757 he published a pamphlet entitled A Winter Evening's Conversation upon the Doctrine of Original Sin, etc., which brought out rejoinders from Rev. Peter Clark and others. Mr. Webster issued a defence of his pamphlet, which led to a general controversy. This was conducted with great spirit and ability on both sides. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 291.

Webster, William, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in 1689. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1711. He became curate of St. Dunstan in the West, London, in 1715; was removed in 1731; became curate of St. Clement Eastcheap in 1732; rector of Deptden, Suffolk, in 1733; resigned his curacy and rectory for the vicarages of Ware and Thunderidge. He died Dec. 4, 1758. He was the author of The Clergy's Right of Maintenance Vindicated—Two Discourses, on the nature of error in speculative doctrines and the doctrine of the Trinity (1729);—A Translation of Simon's New Testament (1730);—The Fitness of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Christ Considered (1731);—and several other works, chiefly pamphlets of temporary interest. He also edited the Life of General Monk (1725); and conducted The Weekly Miscellany for a short time, beginning in 1733. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wechselbalg, in German mythology. The elves or dwarfs sometimes purloin well-formed children from the cradle, and put their own ugly, deformed children, or even themselves, in their stead. These spurious beings are therefore called Wechselbälge. The object for changing seems to be a desire on the part of the elves to improve their race. A protection against such changing, in the popular estimation, is to place a key or a part of the father's clothing, or steel or sewing-needles, in the cradle. An interesting piece of superstition is the manner of freeing one's self from such a Wechselbalg. It is necessary, first, by some strange and unusual act, to bring him to an acknowledgment of his own age, and then of the theft and change, upon which he immediately withdraws and the stolen child returns, as the elves want nothing gratis. For example, if the Wechselbalg should see water boiling in egg-shells over a fire, he calls out, "Now I am as old as Westerwald, and have never yet seen water boil in egg-shells."

Weda, in German mythology, is one of the two gods of war among the Friesians. He was represented and worshipped with his brother god Freda. The head was covered with a feathered helmet, the breast with a shield; and he was also represented as having wings. Because Weda and Freda appeared as twins, it was thought they were Castor and Pollux returned.

Wedag, Friedrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1758 at Neuenrade, in Westphalia. He studied at Halle and Duisburg; and after the completion of his academical curriculum he acted as a private tutor. Having no prospects for obtaining a position in his own country, he thought of going to Amsterdam, and there to obtain from the East India Company a position as preacher in the East or West Indies. Having received a call from the Reformed congregation at Dortmund in 1786, he remained at home. But his position was such that he was often obliged to preach in other congregations in order to keep himself. On one occasion he had to preach at Leipsic, where he proved himself such an excellent pulpit orator that after Zollikofer's death (1788) he was called as his successor. Here he labored until his death,

May 18, 1799. He published some works of an ascetical character, for which see Döring, Deutsche Kanzelredner, p. 563; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 98, 198, 244. (B. P.)

Wedderburn, James, a Scotch prelate, was born in Dundee, and studied at Oxford. In 1631 he became a prebendary of Whitechurch, in the diocese of Wells, England. He was afterwards professor of divinity at St. Andrews. In February, 1636, he was preferred to the see of Dunblane, and in 1638 deprived and excommunicated by the Assembly at Glasgow. He died in 1639. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 182.

Wedding (γάμος, Matt. xxii, 8, 10, 12; Luke xii, 36, xiv, 8, marriage, as elsewhere rendered). See the monographs cited in Volbeding, Index Program. p. 152, 153. See MARRIAGE; RING, WEDLOCK.

Wedge of GOLD שֶׁטֶן lushôn, Josh. vii, 21, 24, a tongue, as elsewhere rendered; more elliptically, שֶׁטֶן ke'them, Isa. xiii, 12, fine gold, as elsewhere rendered). See GOLD.

Wedlock, a word that occurs but once in the A. V. (in the phrase "break wedlock," שֶׁטֶן, Ezek. xvi, 38, to commit adultery, as elsewhere rendered); but the relation is very often referred to both in its literal and figurative (spiritual) sense in the Scriptures. The term properly designates the state of lawful matrimony as distinguished from all illicit or irregular connection of the sexes. As this is a subject having extensive social relations, we give here a treatment of the several topics embraced under it, presenting some additional points to those given under previous articles, and supplementing the whole from various sources, especially the prescriptions and regulations of the Talmud.

I. The Married State.—This among the Hebrews was contracted by the fathers of the two parties (Gen. xxxiv, 4; xxxviii, 6; 1 Kings ii, 17; comp. Homer, Iliad, ix, 394; xix, 291; Arvieux, Voy. iii, 254 a), and only in their absence by the mothers (Gen. xxi, 21; by daughters with the consent of their full brothers, xxiv, 50; xxxiv, 10), so that the bride (כַּתֻּבָּה) and the bridegroom (חָתָן) often did not even see each other previously (as is still customary, at least with the inhabitants of cities in the East; see Russell, Alleppe, i, 414; Burckhardt, Prov. p. 178; Descr. de l'Égypte, xviii, 84; but comp. Judg. xiv, 1 sq.; Cant. viii, 1 sq.; Tob. vii, 10). Indeed, the parents sought the wife for their son (Gen. xxxiv, 4, 8; xxxviii, 6; Judg. xiv, 1; comp. Ruppell, Abys. ii, 49; yet see Tob. vii, 10), and a formal price (כֶּתֶר, dowry) had to be stipulated (Gen. xxix, 15 sq.; xxxiv, 12; Exod. xxii, 15 sq.; 1 Sam. xviii, 25; Hos. iii, 2), a rule which prevailed likewise with the ancient Greeks (Homer, Odyss. viii, 318 sq.; Aristotle, Polit. ii, 8; Pausan. iii, 12, 2), Germans (Tacitus, German. c. 8; see Strodtmann, Deutsch. Ælther. p. 309 sq.), Babylonians (Herod. i, 196), and Assyrians (Ælian, V. H. iv, 1; Strabo, xvi, 745), as still among the Arabians (Arvieux, iii, 21, 254; Buckingham, ii, 129; Joliffe, Trav. p. 304), Kurds (Niebuhr, Reis. ii, 420), Persians (Olear, Voy. p. 318), and other Asiatics and Africans (Ruppell, Abys. ii, 49; comp. B. Michaelis in Pott's Sylog. ii, 81). This sum was naturally very various (Gen. xxxiv, 12; 1 Sam. xviii, 23; Hos. iii, 2, etc.), but in one case (Deut. xxii, 29) was to be fifty shekels as a minimum (see, on the other hand, Hos. iii, 2). The practice of the modern Egyptians illustrates this; for with them the dowry, though its amount differs according to the wealth of the suitor, is still graduated according to the state of the bride. A certain portion only of the dowry is paid down, the rest being held in reserve (Lane, i, 211). Among the modern Jews also the amount of the dowry varies with the state of the bride, according to a fixed scale (Picart, i, 240). See DOWRY. Different from this was the present (תְּכֵנֶה) which the wooer bestowed beforehand (Gen. xxiv, 53; xxxiv, 12; Gr. προφ.). In some cases, where the suitor was poor or a particular task was exacted, the daughter was earned (Gen. xxix, 20, 27; Josh. xv, 16; Judg. i, 13; 1 Sam. xviii, 24 sq.; 2 Sam. iii, 14; comp. Pausan. iii, 12, 2; Herod. vi, 127; Diod. Sic. iv, 42, 64; Burckhardt, i, 465), and sometimes a dowry accompanied the bride (1 Kings ix, 16; comp. Josh. xv, 18 sq.; Tob. viii, 23). But it is a disgrace, according to Oriental ideas, for a maiden to make the match herself (Isa. iv, 1). The Talmudists specify three modes by which marriage might be effected, viz., money, marriage contract, and consummation (Kiddush. i, 1). The matrimonial agreement between the parents was verbal in the presence of witnesses, but occasionally ratified by an oath (Mal. ii, 14); it is only after the Exile (Tob. vii, 15) that we meet with a written marriage contract (Talmud, קידושין, lit. a writing; see the Mishnic tract entitled Kethuboth). The technical term of the Talmudists for the dowry which the wife brought to her husband, answering to the dos of the Latins, was נתינת. The technical term used by the Talmudists for betrothing was kiddushin (קידושין), derived from קדש, "to set apart." There is a treatise in the Mishna so entitled, in which various questions of casuistry of slight interest to us are discussed. As to the age of the parties, nothing is specified in the Mosaic law: but later enactments require full twelve years for the girl and thirteen for the boy (puberty in both sexes being much earlier in warm climates, so that females of ten or eleven years often become mothers, and lads but little older fathers; see Rittpell, Nub. p. 42; Abyas. i, 201; ii, 50, 57; Harmer, Obs. ii, 312), though the usual age was about eighteen (Mishna, Pirke Aboth, v, 21; Carpov in the Brem. Biblioth. ii, 907 sq.). See BETROTHAL.

The Mosaic law permitted several wives to one man, as is universally customary in the East; yet before the Exile this practice seems to have been mostly confined to princes and important personages. See POLYGAMY. Second marriages, especially on the woman's part, were held in disesteem (see Rau, De Olio Secund. Nuptiarum [Lips. 1803]), at least in later times (Luke ii, 36 sq.; 1 Cor. vii, 8; 1 Tim. i, 9), if we may judge from the priestly (Josephus, Life, § 75, 76) and the apostolical regulations (1 Tim. iii, 2; Tit. i, 6), as generally among the Greeks and Romans (Diod. Sic. xiii, 12; Virgil, Æn. iv, 23 sq.; Plutarch, Quæst. Rom. c. 105; Val. Max. ii, 2, 8; Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 6). The celibacy of the Essenes (Philo, ii, 482, 633; Josephus, Ant. xviii, 1, 5; War. ii, 8, 2; Pliny, v, 15) was a disreputable asceticism (1 Tim. iv, 3). See MATRIMONY.

II. The Wedding Itself.—In this the most observable point is that there were no definite religious ceremonies connected with it. It is worthy of note that there is no term in the Hebrew language to express the ceremony of marriage. The substantive chalunnâh (חלונאה) occurs but once, and then in connection with the day (Cant. iii, 11). The word "wedding" does not occur at all in the A. V. of the Old Test. It is probable, however, that some formal ratification of the espousal with an oath took place, as implied in some allusions to marriage (Ezek. xvi, 8; Mal. ii, 14), particularly in the expression "the covenant of her God" (Prov. ii, 17), as applied to the marriage bond, and that a blessing was pronounced (Gen. xxiv, 60; Ruth iv, 11, 12) sometimes by the parents (Tob. vii, 13). But the essence of the marriage ceremony consisted in the removal of the bride from her father's house to that of the bridegroom or his father. There seems, indeed, to be a literal truth in the Hebrew expression "to take" a wife (Numb. xii, 1; 1 Chron. ii, 21), for the ceremony appears to have mainly consisted in the taking. Among the modern Arabs the same custom prevails, the capture and removal of the bride being effected with a considerable show of violence (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 108). The bridegroom prepared himself for the occasion by putting on a festive dress, and especially by placing on his head the handsome turban described by the term peir (Isa. lxi, 10; A. V. "ornaments"), and a nuptial crown or garland (Cant. iii, 11); he was redolent of myrrh and frankincense and "all powders of the merchant" (ver. 6). The bridegroom's crown was made of various materials (gold or silver, roses, myrtle or olive), according to his circumstances (Selden, Ux. Ebr. ii, 15). The use of the crown at marriages was familiar both to the Greeks and Romans. The bride prepared herself for the ceremony by taking a bath, generally on the day preceding the wedding. This was probably in ancient, as in modern, times a formal proceeding, accompanied with considerable pomp (Picart, i, 240; Lane, i, 217). The notices of it in the Bible are so few as to have escaped general observation (Ruth iii, 3; Ezek. xxiii, 40; Eph. v, 26, 27); but the passages cited establish the antiquity of the custom, and the expressions in the last ("having purified her by the laver of water," "not having spot") have evident reference to it. A similar custom prevailed among the Greeks (Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. "Balneæ"). The distinctive feature of the bride's attire was the taaph (תאף) or "veil"—a light robe of ample dimensions, which covered not only the face, but the whole person (Gen. xxiv, 65; comp. xxxviii, 14, 15). This was regarded as the symbol of her submission to her husband, and hence in 1 Cor. xi, 10 the veil is apparently described under the term ἐξουσία, "authority." The use of the veil was not peculiar to the Hebrews. It was customary among the Greeks and Romans; and among the latter it gave rise to the expression nubo, lit. "to veil," and hence to our word "nuptial." It is still used by the Jews (Picart, i, 241). The modern Egyptians envelop the bride in an ample shawl, which perhaps more than anything else resembles the Hebrew taaph (Lane, i, 220). She also wore a peculiar girdle, named kishkurim (קישקרים; A. V. the "attire"), which no bride could forget (Jer. ii, 32). The girdle was an important article of the bride's dress among the Romans, and gave rise to the expression solvere zonam. Her head was crowned with a chaplet, which was again so distinctive of the bride that the Hebrew term kallâh (כלה, "bride") originated from it. The bride's crown was either of gold or gilded. The use of it was interdicted after the destruction of the second Temple, as a token of humiliation (Selden, Ux. Ebr. ii, 15). If the bride were a virgin, she wore her hair flowing (Kethub. ii, 1). Her robes were white (Rev. xix, 8), and sometimes embroidered with gold-thread (Psa. xlv, 13, 14), and covered with perfumes (ver. 8): she was further decked out with jewels (Isa. xlix, 18; lxi, 10; Rev. xxi, 2). When the fixed hour arrived, which was generally late in the evening, the bridegroom set forth from his house, attended by his groomsmen, termed in Hebrew neraim (נרים; A. V. "companions," Judg. xiv, 11), and in Greek νιοι του νυμφου (A. V. "children of the bride-chamber," Matt. ix, 15). Winer (Reale. s. v. "Hochzeit") identifies the "children of the bride-chamber" with the shoshbenim (שושבענים) of the Talmudists. But the former were the attendants on the bridegroom alone, while the shoshbenim were two persons selected on the day of the marriage to represent the interests of bride and bridegroom, apparently with a special view to any possible litigation that might subsequently arise on the subject noticed in Deut. xxii, 15-21 (Selden, Ux. Ebr. ii, 16). These attendants were preceded by a band of musicians or singers (Gen. xxxi, 27; Jer. vii, 84; xvi, 9; 1 Macc. ix, 39), and accompanied by persons bearing flambeaus (2 Eodr. x, 2; Matt. xxv, 7; comp. Jer. xxv, 10; Rev. xviii, 23, "the light of a candle"). With these flambeaus we may compare the δᾶδες νυμφαί of the Greeks (Aristoph. Pax, 1317). The lamps described in Matt. xxv, 7 would be small hand-lamps. Without them none could join the procession (Trench, Par- ables, p. 257, note). See LANTERN. Having reached the house of the bride, who with her maidens anxiously expected his arrival (Matt. xxv, 6), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house. The bride was said to "go to" (לָלַךְ בְּתוּלָה) the house of her husband (Josh. xv, 18; Judg. i, 14)—an expression which is worthy of notice, inasmuch as it has not been rightly understood in Dan. xi, 6, where "they that brought her" is an expression for husband. The bringing home of the bride was regarded in the later days of the Roman empire as one of the most important parts of the marriage ceremony (Bingham, Christ. Ant. bk. xxii, ch. iv, § 7). This procession was made with every demonstration of gladness (Psa. xlv, 15). From the joyous sounds used on these occasions the term halal (לָלַךְ) is applied in the sense of marrying in Psa. lxxviii, 63 (A. V. "their maidens were not given to marriage," lit. "were not praised," as in the margin). This sense appears preferable to that of the Sept., οὐκ ἐπὶ νύμφῃ, which is adopted by Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 596). The noise in the streets attendant on an Oriental wedding is excessive, and enables us to understand the allusions in Jeremiah to the "voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride." On their way back they were joined by a party of maidens, friends of the bride and bridegroom, who were in waiting to catch the procession as it passed (Matt. xxv, 6; comp. Trench, Parables, p. 244, note). The inhabitants of the place pressed out into the streets to watch the procession (Cant. iii, 11). At the house a feast was prepared, to which all the friends and neighbors were invited (Gen. xxix, 22; Matt. xxii, 1-10; Luke xiv, 8; John ii, 2), and the festivities were protracted for seven or even fourteen days (Judg. xiv, 12; Tob. viii, 19). The feast was regarded as so essential a part of the marriage ceremony that ποῦν γάμον acquired the specific meaning "to celebrate the marriage feast" (Sept. at Gen. xxix, 22; Esth. ii, 18; Tob. viii, 19; 1 Macc. ix, 37; x, 58; Matt. xxii, 4; xxv, 10; Luke xiv, 8), and sometimes to celebrate any feast (Esth. ix, 22). The guests were provided by the host with fitting robes (Matt. xxii, 11; comp. Trench, Parables, p. 280), and the feast was enlivened with riddles (Judg. xiv, 12) and other amusements. The bridegroom now entered into direct communication with the bride, and the joy of the friend was "fulfilled" at hearing the voice of the bridegroom (John iii, 29) conversing with her, which he regarded as a satisfactory testimony of the success of his share in the work. In the case of a virgin, parched corn was distributed among the guests (Kethub. ii, 1), the significance of which is not apparent; the custom bears some resemblance to the distribution of the mutuccum (Juvenal, vi, 202) among the guests at a Roman wedding. The modern Jews have a custom of shattering glasses or vessels by dashing them to the ground (Picart, i, 240). The last act in the ceremonial was the conducting of the bride to the bridal chamber, chéder (חֶדֶר), Judg. xv, 1; Joel ii, 16), where a canopy, named chuppáh (חֻפָּה), was prepared (Psa. xix, 5; Joel ii, 16). The term occurs in the Mishna (Kethub. iv, 5), and is explained by some of the Jewish commentators to have been a bower of roses and myrtles. The term was also applied to the canopy under which the nuptial benediction was pronounced, or to the robe spread over the heads of the bride and bridegroom (Selden, Ux. Ebr. ii, 15). The bride was still completely veiled, so that the deception practiced on Jacob (Gen. xxix, 23) was very possible. If proof could be subsequently adduced that the bride had not preserved her maiden purity, the case was investigated; and if she was convicted, she was stoned to death before her father's house (Deut. xxii, 18-21). A newly married man was exempt from military service, or from any public business which might draw him away from his home, for the space of a year (xxiv, 5); a similar privilege was granted to him who was betrothed (xx, 7). See MARRIAGE.

III. Violation of Marriage Vows.—Unfaithfulness on the part of the wife was punished with death (Lev. xx, 10; Deut. xxii, 22; Ezek. xvi, 38, 40; Sus. 45; comp. Josephus, Apion. ii, 24; Ant. iv, 8, 23) by stoning (Deut. xxii, 4; Ezek. xvi, 40), and not by strangulation (as the Talmudists maintain, Mishna, Sanhedr. xi, 1, 6). The legislation of other nations was milder (Tacitus, German. 19; Ælian. v, 11, 6; xii, 12; xiii, 24; yet see Arnob. iv, 23). The Roman law (Lex Julia de Adulteris Coe-cendis) only prescribed confiscation of part of the culprit's goods, and public infamy, as the extreme penalty. Constantine first made adultery a capital crime (see Dick, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1832, vol. iv; Rein, Rom. Criminalrecht, p. 839). The ordeal of the bitter waters (Numb. v, 14 sq.) is detailed in the Mishna (Sota, ii, 2), and has its parallel in other nations (Ælian. Anim. i, 57; Achil. Tat. viii, 3; see Groddeck, in Ugolino, Thesaur. xxx; Otho, Lex. Rubb. p. 52). See ADULTERY.

IV. Dissolution of the Marriage Tie.—Separation of a man from his wife was legitimate (Deut. xxiv, 1), except in two cases (xxii, 19, 29), when he found reason (פְּרִיטָה, a phrase that led to much Talmudical casuistry); but must be done by a regular certificate of dismissal (פְּטוּרָה, סֵפֶר פְּטוּרָה, Isa. i, 1; Jer. iii, 8; Talmudic פְּטוּרָה or פְּטוּרָה; βιβλίον ἀποστασίου, Matt. xix, 7; Mark x, 4; or ἀποστασίον simply, Matt. v, 31; comp. repudi-um, Suet. Calig. § 36). The subject is treated at great length in the Talmud (tract Gittin), and by Selden (Ux. Hebr.) and Buxtorf (Sponsal. et Divort.). See DIVORCE.

Wednesday is a day often marked by special religious exercises, being numbered among the Rogation and Ember days in the Church of England. At a very early period in the history of the Christian Church, the custom of meeting for divine worship on Wednesdays and Fridays was adopted. Both days were considered as fasts, on the ground that our Lord was betrayed on a Wednesday and crucified on a Friday. The fasting continued till three in the afternoon; hence they were called semi-jjuna, or half-fasts, in opposition to the fast of Lent, which was continued till the evening. Subsequently the Montanists introduced the custom of limiting the kind of food to be taken, which consisted only of bread, salt, and water. These fasts were called stationes, from the practice of soldiers keeping guard, which was called statio by the Romans. Lent begins on that day (see ASH WEDNESDAY). In the Western Church Saturday at length took the place of Wednesday as a fast. See FAST; LENT.

Wedurhoelner, in Norse mythology, is the hawk, sitting between the eyes of the eagle, that dwells on the top of the ash Ygdrasil.

Weed (שִׁבְיָה, sûph, Jon. ii, 6; elsewhere rendered "flag," Exod. ii, 8; Isa. xix, 6, but usually as an epithet of the Red Sea, lit. the weed-sea; Sept. φῦκος; Lat. alga, see Pliny, xxxi, 46, 4; ix, 25), the sea-weed (Fucus nutans of Linn.; Fucus marinus, Pliny, xxvi, 66 and 79), a sort of sea-grass with lanciform, serrated leaves, and threadlike knotted stalks, which grows in great abundance on the shores of the Mediterranean (Jon. ii, 6; see Hirtius, Bell. Afric. 24), but especially of the Hellespont (Ovid, Heroid. xviii, 108; Belon, Obserr. ii, 8), as likewise of the Red Sea (comp. Strabo, xvi, 773; Diod. Sic. iii, 19, μύριον), the last taking its name (שִׁבְיָה) from that circumstance. See RED SEA. The plant is described by Acosta (in Clusii Exoticor. Libb. [Antw. 1605], p. 293), Delile (Flora Egypt. in Descr. de l'Égypte, xix, 113), Bochart (Phaleg, iv, 29), Celsius (Hierobot. ii, 67 sq.). There are several varieties (see Pliny, xxvii, 25; xxxii, 22; Galen, Med. Simpl. viii, 21, 9), of which it is uncertain which is the Egyptian species (Pliny, xiii, 44; Theophr. Plant. iv, 9; see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 944). See FLAG. Noxious weeds in general seem to be denoted by the phrase "thorns and thistles" (Gen. iii, 18). See THORN.

Weed, Bartholomew, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Ridgefield (now Danbury), Conn., March 6, 1793. He was trained in the Calvinistic faith and became a Baptist in 1809, but joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the eighteenth year of his age, under the ministry of Rev. Seth Crowell; was licensed to exhort in 1812; obtained local preacher's license in 1815; and joined the Philadelphia Conference in 1817. During his ministry of sixty-four years he filled appointments in Philadelphia, Bridgeton, Trenton, etc., and was four years a presiding elder in the Rock River Conference, from which he was elected delegate to the General Conference of 1844. His last years were spent in the Newark Conference, which, in 1864, gave him a superannuated relation. During the last eleven years of his life he acted as chaplain of Essex County Jail. He died in Newark, N. J., Jan. 5, 1879. Mr. Weed was ardent in his attachment to the doctrines, discipline, and usages of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and bore with cheerfulness a part in the sacrifices and sufferings of her pioneer work. His ministry was characterized by clearness, warmth, and strength. He was a man of simple tastes and manners, of strong convictions and attachments, and of a heroic and magnanimous spirit. Preaching was his loved employment, and it seemed as hard for him to quit it, though in his eighty-sixth year, as it was for him, a few weeks later, to die. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 73. (R. V.)

Weed, Henry Rowland, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Ballston, N. Y., July 30, 1789. He graduated from Union College in 1812, and with the first class of Princeton Theological Seminary in 1815; was ordained pastor at Jamaica, L. I., in 1816; in 1822 went to Albany, N. Y., as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church; in 1830 became agent for the Board of Education; in 1832 pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Wheeling, Va., and died at Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 14, 1870. In the councils of the Church he was greatly respected.

Week (שבוע, or שבעה, shabua, from שבע, "seven," lit. a heptad of anything, but specifically used for a period of seven days; Sept. ἑβδομας; Vulg. septimana). See SEVEN.

1. The origin of this division of time is a matter which has given birth to much speculation. Its antiquity is so great, its observance so wide-spread, and it occupies so important a place in sacred things, that it has been very generally thrown back as far as the creation of man, who, on this supposition, was told from the very first to divide his time on the model of the Creator's order of working and resting. The week and the Sabbath are, if this be so, as old as man himself, and we need not seek for reasons either in the human mind or the facts with which that mind comes in contact, for the adoption of such a division of time, since it is to be referred neither to man's thoughts nor to man's will. A purely theological ground is thus established for the week and for the sacredness of the number seven. They who embrace this view support it by a reference to the six days' creation and the Divine rest on the seventh, which they consider to have been made known to man from the very first, and by an appeal to the exceeding prevalence of the hebdomadal division of time from the earliest age—an argument the force of which is considered to be enhanced by the alleged absence of any natural ground for it. See DAY.

To all this, however, it may be objected that we are quite in the dark as to when the record of the six days' creation was made known; that as human language is used and human apprehensions are addressed in that record, so, the week being already known, the perfection of the Divine work and Sabbath may well have been set forth under this figure, the existing division of time moulding the document, instead of the document giving birth to the division; that, old and wide-spread as is the recognition of that division, it is not universal; that the nations which knew not of it were too important to allow the argument from its prevalence to stand; and that, so far from its being without ground in nature, it is the most obvious and convenient way of dividing the month. Each of these points must now be briefly considered:

(1.) That the week rests on a theological ground may be cheerfully acknowledged by both sides; but nothing is determined by such acknowledgment as to the original cause of adopting this division of time. The records of creation and the fourth commandment give, no doubt, the ultimate and therefore the deepest ground of the weekly division, but it does not therefore follow that it was not adopted for lower reasons before either was known. Whether the week gave its sacredness to the number seven, or whether the ascendancy of that number helped to determine the dimensions of the week, it is impossible to say. The latter fact, the ancient ascendancy of the number seven, might rest on divers grounds. The planets, according to the astronomy of those times, were seven in number; so are the notes of the diatonic scale; so also many other things naturally attracting observation.

(2.) The prevalence of the weekly division was indeed very great, but a nearer approach to universality is required to render it an argument for the view in aid of which it is appealed to. It was adopted by all the Shemitic races, and, in the later period of their history at least, by the Egyptians. On this side of the Atlantic we find it, or a division all but identical with it, among the Peruvians. It also obtains now with the Hindûs, but its antiquity among them is matter of question. It is possible that it was introduced into India by the Arabs and Mohammedans. So in China we find it, but whether universally or only among the Buddhists admits of doubt. (See, for both, Prieux's Questions Mosaiques, a work with many of the results of which we may be well expected to quarrel, but which deserves, in respect not only of curious learning, but of the vigorous and valuable thought with which it is impregnated, to be far more known than it is.) On the other hand, there is no reason for thinking the week known till a late period either to Greeks or Romans.

(3.) So far from the week being a division of time without ground in nature, there was much to recommend its adoption. Where the days were named from planetary deities, as among first the Assyrians and Chaldees, and then the Egyptians, there of course each period of seven days would constitute a whole, and that whole might come to be recognised by nations that disregarded or rejected the practice which had shaped and determined it. But, further, the week is a most natural and nearly an exact quadripartition of the month, so that the quarters of the moon may easily have suggested it.

(4.) Even if it were proved that the planetary week of the Egyptians, as sketched by Dion Cassius (Hist. Rom. xxxvii, 18), existed at or before the time of the Exode, the children of Israel did not copy that. Their week was simply determined by the Sabbath; and there is no evidence of any other day, with them, having either had a name assigned to it, or any particular associations bound up with it. The days seem to have been distinguished merely by the ordinal numerals, counted from the Sabbath.

2. History among the Hebrews.—Whatever controversies exist respecting the origin of the week, there can be none about the great antiquity, on particular occasions at least, among the Shemitic races, of measuring time by a period of seven days. This has been thought to be implied in the phrase respecting the sacrifices of Cain and Abel (Gen. iv, 3), "in process of time," literally "at the end of days." It is to be traced in the narrative of the subsidence of the Flood (viii, 10), "and he stayed yet other seven days;" and we find it recognised by the Syrian Laban (xxix, 27), "fulfil her week." It is needless to say that this division of time is a marked feature of the Mosaic law, and one into which the whole year was parted, the Sabbath sufficiently showing that. The week of seven days was also made the key to a scale of seven, running through the sabbatical years up to that of jubilee.

We have seen in Gen. xxix, 27 that it was known to the ancient Syrians, and the injunction to Jacob, "fulfil her week," indicates that it was in use as a fixed term for great festive celebrations. The most probable exposition of the passage is that Laban tells Jacob to fulfil Leah's week, the proper period of the nuptial festivities in connection with his marriage to her, and then he may have Rachel also (comp. Judg. xiv). So, too, for funeral observance, as in the case of the obsequies of Jacob, Joseph "made a mourning for his father seven days" (Gen. l, 10). But neither of these instances, any more than Noah's procedure in the ark, goes further than showing the custom of observing a term of seven days for any observance of importance. Nor does it prove that the whole year, or the whole month, was thus divided at all times, and without regard to remarkable events.

In Exodus, of course, the week comes into very distinct manifestation. Two of the great feasts—the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles—are prolonged for seven days after that of their initiation (Exod. xii, 15-20, etc.), a custom which remains in the Christian Church, in the rituals of which the remembrances and topics of the great festivals are prolonged till what is technically called the octave. Although the Feast of Pentecost lasted but one day, yet the time for its observance was to be counted by weeks from the Passover, whence one of its titles, "the Feast of Weeks."

The division by seven was, as we have seen, expanded so as to make the seventh month and the seventh year sabbatical. To whatever extent the laws enforcing this may have been neglected before the Captivity, their effect, when studied, must have been to render the words שבוע, ἑβδομάς, week, capable of meaning a seven of years almost as naturally as a seven of days. Indeed, the generality of the words would have this effect at any rate. Hence their use to denote the latter in prophecy, more especially in that of Daniel, is not mere arbitrary symbolism, but the employment of a not unfamiliar and easily understood language. This is not the place to discuss schemes of prophetic interpretation, nor do we propose giving our opinion of any such, but it is connected with our subject to remark that, whatever be the merits of that which in Daniel and the Apocalypse understands a year by a day, it cannot be set aside as forced and unnatural. Whether days were or were not intended to be thus understood in the places in question, their being so would have been a congruous, and we may say logical, attendant on the scheme which counts weeks of years, and both would have been a natural computation to minds familiar and occupied with the law of the sabbatical year. See DAY.

8. Christian Observances.—In the New Test., we of course find such clear recognition of and familiarity with the week as need scarcely be dwelt on. Sacred as the division was, and stamped deep on the minds and customs of God's people, it now received additional solemnity from our Lord's last earthly Passover gathering up his work of life into a week.

Hence the Christian Church, from the very first, was familiar with the week. Paul's language (1 Cor. xvi, 2, κατὰ μίαν σαββάτω) shows this. We cannot conclude from it that such a division of time was observed by the inhabitants of Corinth generally, for they to whom he was writing, though doubtless the majority of them were Gentiles, yet knew the Lord's day, and most probably the Jewish Sabbath. But though we can infer no more than this from the place in question, it is clear that if not by this time, yet very soon after, the whole Roman world had adopted the hebdomadal division. Dion Cassius, who wrote in the 2d century, speaks of it as both universal and recent in his time. He represents it as coming from Egypt, and gives two schemes, by one or other of which he considers that the planetary names of the different days were fixed (Dion Cassius, xxvii, 18). Those names, or corresponding ones, have perpetuated themselves over Christendom, though no associations of any kind are now connected with them, except in so far as the whimsical conscience of some has quarrelled with their Pagan origin, and led to an attempt at their disuse. It would be interesting, though foreign to our present purpose, to inquire into the origin of this planetary week. A deeply learned paper in the Philological Museum, by the late archdeacon Hare, gives the credit of its invention to the Chaldees. Dion Cassius was, however, pretty sure to have been right in tracing its adoption by the Roman world to an Egyptian origin. It is very striking to reflect that while Christendom was in its cradle, the law by which she was to divide her time came, without collusion with her, into universal observance, thus making things ready for her to impose on mankind that week on which all Christian life has been shaped—that week grounded on no worship of planetary deities, nor dictated by the mere wish to quadripartite the month, but based on the earliest lesson of revelation, and proposing to man his Maker's model as that whereby to regulate his working and his rest—that week which once indeed in modern times it has been attempted to abolish, because it was attempted to abolish the whole Christian faith, but which has kept, as we are sure it ever will keep, its ground, being bound up with that other, and sharing therefore in that other's invincibility and perpetuity. Weeks, FEAST OF. See PENTECOST.

WEEKS, SEVENTY. See SEVENTY WEEKS.

Weeks, John Willis, D.D., a colonial bishop of the Church of England, died March 25, 1857, having just returned to Sierra Leone, of which he was bishop, on the 17th of that month, after visiting the stations of the Yarriba Mission. His consecration to this see occurred in 1855. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 471.

Weeks, William Raymond, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Brooklyn, Conn., Aug. 6, 1788. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1809; studied theology at the Andover Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Association in Vermont, and was ordained and installed by the Columbia Presbytery as pastor of the church in Plattsburg, N. Y., in February, 1812. He resigned this charge in 1814, and was occupied in supplying different churches and teaching until 1832, when he became pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J., where he continued to perform the double duty of preaching and teaching a school until 1846, when, on account of declining health, he had to give up both. He died June 27, 1848. Dr. Weeks had a mind of more than ordinary activity and independence; the classics and the Hebrew language were the studies of his life, and in these departments few have attained to greater accuracy of scholarship. He published, Nine Sermons on the Decrees and Agency of God (1813, three editions);—Scripture Catechism (1813, two editions);—Pilgrim's Progress in the Nineteenth Century (1849, 12mo, posthumous);—also single Sermons, Letters, and a series of Short Tracts. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 473; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Weepers (προκλαίωντες, flentes), the class who lay in the porch weeping and beseeching the prayers of all who entered.—Walcott, Sacred Archaeol. s. v.

Weeping (ἔλπι, elaiw). The ancient Hebrews wept and made their troubles to appear openly, in mourning and affliction; they were not of opinion that courage and greatness of soul consisted in seeming to be insensible in adversity, or in restraining their tears. It was even looked upon as a great disrespect for any one not to be bewailed at his funeral. Job says of the wicked man, "His widow shall not weep" (Job xxvii, 15). The Psalmist, speaking of the death of Hophni and Phinehas, says, "Their priests fell by the sword, and their widows made no lamentation" (Psa. lxxiii, 64). God forbids Ezekiel to weep or to express any sorrow for the death of his wife, to show that the Jews should be reduced to so great calamities that they should not have the liberty even to mourn or bewail themselves (Ezek. xxiv, 16). See MOURNING; TEARS.

Wegelin, Josua, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 11, 1604, at Augsburg. He studied at Tübingen, and was appointed in 1627 deacon in his native place. In 1629, when, at the command of the emperor Ferdinand III, the evangelical churches were closed and divine service was prohibited, Wegelin had to leave the city with the other evangelical ministers. He returned again in 1632, after Gustavus Adolphus had entered the city, to leave it again in 1635. He went to Presburg, in Hungary, where he died, Sept. 14, 1640. For the benefit of his members in Augsburg, he composed Augsburger Betbüchlein (2d ed. Nuremb. 1648), and Hand-, Land- und Stambüchlein (ibid. 1637). After his death, his ascetical writings were published under the title Gebete und Lieder (ibid. 1660). One of his hymns, Auf Christi Himmelfahrt allein, has also been translated into English, "Since Christ has gone to heav'n, his home," in the Choral Book for England, No. 64. See Hartmann, Württembergisches Magisterbuch, 15th series; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 169 sq. (B. P.)

Wegelin, Thomas, a Protestant divine of Germany, was born at Augsburg, Dec. 21, 1577. At the Ratisbon Colloquy he acted as amanuensis of the Protestant theologians. He died as professor of theology and president of the church-convent at Strasburg, March 16, 1629. He wrote, Dissert. III de Scripturæ Sacræ Auctoritate, Linguis et Versionibus:—Hypomnema Theologicum de Hymno Trisagio:—Prolectiones in Pentateuchum:—De Christo:—De Majestate Christi:—De Indulgentiis:—De Resurrectione Mortuorum, etc. See Serpilus, Epitaphia Theologorum; Witte, Memoria Theologorum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lex. a. v. (B. P.)

Weger, Laurentius, a German philologist, was born Dec. 30, 1653, at Königsberg. He prosecuted his studies at his native place and Leipzig, and was appointed, in 1679, professor of Oriental languages in his native city, where he died, May 21, 1715. He wrote, Dissert. de Verbo Dei Occasione Phrasæ Chaldaicæ כִּי־יִרְאֶה (Leipz. 1720):—De Osculatione Manus Idololatrica ex Job xxii, 26, etc. He also wrote on Psa. xxii; Hos. iii, 4; Ezek. viii, 17. See Arnold, Hist. der Königsbergischen Universität; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lex. a. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 497. (B. P.)

Wegleiter, Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 22, 1659, at Nuremberg. He studied at Altdorf and other universities. In 1688 he was appointed professor of theology and preacher at Altdorf, where he died, Aug. 16, 1706. Besides some dissertations, he is also the author of sermons and hymns. See Programma Funebre in Obitum Dr. Wegleiteri (Altdorf, 1706); Zeltneri Vita Theol. Altorphin. (1720), p. 435 sq.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lex. a. v.; Koch, Gesch. des deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 502 sq. (B. P.)

Wegner, Gottfried, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Oels, March 18, 1644, and died June 14, 1709, as doctor and professor of theology, and court preacher at Königsberg. He is the author of, Dissert. Hist.-theol. de Sabbato Christianorum Judaico (Königsb. 1702):—Disput. Hist. Ecclesiast. de Alba

Veste Baptizatorum (ibid. 1700, 1734):—Horologium Hebraicum cum Isaago (Frankf. 1678):—Programma de Computo Ecclesiastico et Accentuatione Hebræa (ibid. 1680), reprinted in Synagma Disputationum Francofurtensium (ibid. 1700):—Specimen Analysis Hebr. de Verbo כִּי־יִרְאֶה (ibid. 1670). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. i, 617, 631, Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 497; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, No. 2130. (B. P.)

Weimar Hymn-book was a work prepared by Herder at Weimar in 1778. His plan was to restore the old hymns to their original readings, and introduce as many as possible that were already established in the hearts of the people. He thought it subversive of the highest interests of the Church to alter these compositions to meet the peculiar views of theologians of successive generations, yet he would not pursue his own method of restoration without certain restrictions within the bounds of reason. See Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church in the 18th and 19th Centuries, ii, 53 sq.

Weinbrenner, Friedrich, an eminent German architect, was born at Karlsruhe in 1766. He was trained as a carpenter and builder, and in 1788 began to travel for improvement, visiting in turn Zurich, Dresden, and Berlin, and in 1792 started for Italy. Here he discovered his own want of training and instruction, and entered upon a thorough course of study and research, supporting himself in part by giving instruction in architecture to numerous persons, some strangers of distinction. He returned to Karlsruhe in 1797, where he became inspector of buildings, and soon after erected a synagogue and some private mansions. He removed to Strasburg two years after, but did not find much employment, and in a short time returned to Karlsruhe in his former capacity. He entertained higher views of his art than his countrymen generally, and did much to diffuse the same sentiment throughout the next generation by his instructions. At Karlsruhe he constructed the Catholic church, Lutheran church, Theatre, Museum, Mint, Hochberg Palace, and other edifices. At Baden he supervised the erection of numerous buildings. He also constructed several churches, mansions, villas, etc., in various parts of Germany. He published a number of works on different branches of architectural study, viz., Zeichnungslehre (1810):—Optik (1811):—Perspectivlehre (1817-24):—Ueber Form und Schönheit (1819):—Ueber architektonische Verzierungen (1820):—and other works. He died March 1, 1826.

Weinrich, Johann Michael, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 12, 1683, at Dettern, in Franconia, and died as court-deacon at Meiningen, March 18, 1727. He wrote, Kirchen und Schulenstaat des Fürstenthums Henneberg alter und mittlester Zeiten (Leipz. 1720):—Historische und theologische Betrachtungen der merkwürdigen Alterthümer und gelehrten Dinge (Coburg, 1725):—Comparatio Poeseos Germanicorum cum illa Hebræorum Veteri (printed in Misc. Lips. x, 76 sq.). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. i, 803; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 502. (B. P.)

Weinrich, Thomas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died May 4, 1629, at Leipzig, is the author of, Examen Synodi Dordracena de Absoluto Prædestin. Decreto:—Thronum Christi Regalem ex Psa. lx, 8, Homiliis Explicatum:—Controversia de Spiritu S. contra Photinianos:—Εἰσαγωγὴ Αὐθιμολογίας Pontificiæ. (B. P.)

Weinzierl, Franz Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 24, 1777, at Pfaffenberg, in Bavaria. He studied at Munich and Ratisbon, received holy orders in 1801, and acted as chaplain at Penting for a short time. In 1802 he went to Ratisbon as professor of the gymnasium, where he labored until 1806, when he was appointed cathedral preacher. He died Jan. 1, 1829. He published, Die Klugesänge des Propheten Jeremias nach der Vulgata, in Versen (Augsburg, 1805):—Die sieben Busspsalmen in gereimten Versen (ibid. 1814):—Die Psalmen nebst den Klugeliedern Jeremia und den übrigen Gesängen der heiligen Schrift in gereimten Versen (ibid. 1819; 2d ed. 1823):—Sprüche der Weisheit, aus den heiligen Büchern in gereimten Versen übersetzt (ibid. 1821). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 682 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 602; Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. ii, 118. (B. P.)

Weis, NICOLAUS VON, a German prelate, was born March 8, 1796, at Schönhof, in the bishopric of Metz. He studied at Mayence, was appointed pastor at Dudenhofen in 1820, and two years later capitulary at Speyer, where he was consecrated as bishop July 10, 1842. He died Dec. 13, 1869. In connection with the bishop of Strasburg, Andreas Räss, he founded the Catholic, a very influential paper in Germany, and translated many works into German; thus they translated Butler's Lives of the Saints (Mayence, 1821–27, 23 vols.) from the French translation of Godescard; and from the latter language they also translated Robelet's work On the Influence of Luther's Reformation upon Religion, Politics, etc. (ibid. 1823). See Literarischer Handweiser für das katholische Deutschland, 1869, p. 550; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 350, 352, 405, 673, 742, 818, 847; ii, 23, 85, 88, 112, 118. (B. P.)

Weise, GEORG ANDREAS, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Dec. 11, 1737, at Astrakhan, in Russia. He went to Halle with his father in 1748, and here he received, not only his early education, but also his theological instruction, and Franke, Michaelis, Freylinghausen, Baumgarten, and Knapp were his teachers in the university. From 1761 to 1768 he superintended the schools of the Orphan Asylum; in the latter year he was appointed deacon of St. George's, and in 1774 pastor of that church. In 1783 he was called to Magdeburg, where he died, June 16, 1792. He published, Ueber die Reden des sterbenden Mitleids (Halle, 1778):—Reden über die Weissagung des Jesais von Christi Leiden und Auferstehung (ibid. 1780). He also published sermons for the Christian year. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 684 sq. (B. P.)

Weiser, DANIEL, D.D., a German Reformed clergyman, was born at Selinsgrove, Pa., Jan. 13, 1799. In his youth he learned the trade of a nailsmith in Lewisburg, and in 1814 served four months in the United States army. He began to study for the ministry at Hagerstown, Md., in 1819, was licensed in 1823, and ordained in 1824. His first charge embraced three congregations in the vicinity of Selinsgrove, which he extended to eleven. After laboring in this field for ten years, he became pastor at New Goshenhoppen and Great Swamp, in Montgomery Co., Pa., to whom he ministered for thirty years. In 1863 he withdrew from the active ministry, but until the close of his life frequently assisted his son, who succeeded him, and supplied neighboring pulpits. He died Dec. 2, 1875. Dr. Weiser was a hard-working pastor, a close student, and a good preacher. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, v, 146.

Weishaupt, ADAM, founder of the sect of the Illuminati (q. v.), was born at Ingolstadt, Feb. 6, 1748. He was educated at the seminary of the Jesuits in his native city, but soon quitted it for the university, where he was made doctor in 1768, and in 1772 professor of jurisprudence. In 1775 he displaced the Jesuits in the chair of canon law, and thenceforth became their opponent, first by means of a powerful secret society, and afterwards by the establishment of the mystical or enthusiastic sect above named, in whose interest his works (for which see Hoefler, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.) were written. In 1785 he resigned his professorship, and retired to Gotha, engaged in scientific and social labors, still occupying the honorary position of aulic counsellor. He died there Nov. 18, 1830.

Weismann, CHRISTIAN EBERHARD, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 2, 1677, at Hirschau. He studied at Tübingen, was appointed in 1701 deacon at Calw, and in 1704 court chaplain at Stuttgart, but in 1707 he exchanged his position for that of professor of church history and philosophy at the gymnasium there. Here he published Einleitung in die Merkwürdigkeiten der Kirchenhistorie N. Testaments zur Beförderung der Erkenntniss des Reichs Gottes, etc. (1718, 1719, 2 pts.). In 1721 he was called as professor of theology to Tübingen, was honored in the same year with the degree of D.D., and succeeded G. Hoffmann as provost of St. George's in 1729. He died May 26, 1747. Besides his Institutiones Theologicae Exegetico-dogmaticae (1739), he wrote some very fine hymns. See Moser, Beitrag zu einem Lexico der jetzt lebenden luth. und reform. Theologen (Züllichau, 1740), p. 444–454; Brucker, Bildersaal heutigen Tages lebender Schriftsteller (Augsb. 1741); Römer, *Kirchl. Weiss, Charles, a Protestant theologian, was born at Strasburg, Dec. 10, 1812. On publishing his Richard de Saint-Victor et la Théologie Mystique, he was appointed professor of history in the Lycée Bonaparte; and both his L'Espagne Depuis le Règne de Philippe II, etc. (Paris, 1844, 2 vols.), and his Histoire des Réfugiés Protestants de Paris (1853, 2 vols.) were crowned by the Academy. While preparing a second edition of the last work, Weiss became insane (1864), and spent the rest of his life in an asylum at Vanves, near Paris, where he died in 1881. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Weiss (Lat. Weitzius), George Michael, a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was a native of the Palatinate of the Rhine, but was licensed and ordained to the Gospel ministry at Heidelberg in 1725. With about four hundred German emigrants, he settled in Pennsylvania in 1726–27, accompanying them by request of his classis as their spiritual teacher. They were aided on their way by the Classis of Amsterdam. In 1731 the colony numbered fifteen thousand souls, who sought here a refuge from oppression. Mr. Weiss settled and founded a Church at Skippack, about twenty-four miles west of Philadelphia. In 1728 he asked help for these scattered sheep in the wilderness from his classis of the Palatinate. But these persecuted "churches under the cross" could only refer them to the Synod of Holland. In 1729–30 he visited Holland with an elder, J. Reif, to solicit money, which was given to a large amount for that day. But Reif stole most of it, only one hundred and thirty-five pounds being recovered. The Classis of Amsterdam sent over ministers and money to sustain these German churches, and thus began that system of missionary labor and supervision out of which the German Reformed Church has grown up, and which formed a strong and early tie between her and the Reformed Church of Holland. When Weiss returned to America in 1731, he settled among the Germans in New York state, in Schoharie and Dutchess and Greene counties, at Catskill (now Leeds). Coxsackie, etc. Indian depredations obliged him about fourteen years afterwards to return to Pennsylvania. He was a member of the first German ecclesiastical assembly, held in Philadelphia in 1746, and was minister of three German congregations west of Philadelphia about fourteen years. He died at the age of sixty-five. He is represented to have been a fine scholar, speaking Latin as well as he did his native German. His ministry was entirely a pioneer work, prosecuted under great difficulties and with manifest blessings attendant upon it. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 262, 263. (W. J. R. T.)

Weiss, Michael, a German divine, contemporary with Luther, was born at Neisse, in Silesia. When the Reformation began, the Bohemian Brethren were among the first to hail it; as early as 1522 they sent messengers to Luther to wish him success and confer with him on questions of Church discipline. One of these was Michael Weiss, who afterwards became pastor of the German branch of the Bohemian Brethren at Landskron and Fulneck, in Bohemia, and for their benefit translated into German the finest of the Bohemian hymns, adding some of his own. Weiss died in 1540. Of his own hymns we mention: Christus ist erstanden (Eng. transl. in Chorale Book for England, No. 58: "Christ the Lord is risen again"); — Lob sei dem allerhöchsten Gott (Eng. transl. in Moravian Hymn-book, No. 24: "To God we render thanks and praise"). (B. P.)

Weiss, Paul, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1548 at Strelitz, in Silesia. In 1568 he was appointed professor of Greek at the Königsberg University, and in 1581 professor of theology there. In 1589 he was appointed court preacher, and died Jan. 5, 1612. He wrote, Disputationes de Peccato Originali ex Jerem. xlii, 9; — De Ecclesia ejusque Signis, etc. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Arnold, Historie der königsbergischen Universität; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Weisse, Christian Hermann, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born Aug. 10, 1801, at Leipzig. At first he studied law, but betook himself more and more to the study of Hegelian philosophy, and commenced lecturing in his native place in 1823. In 1828 he was appointed professor of philosophy, but in 1837 he retired to spend his time entirely in literary pursuits. Having thus spent a few years, he again commenced lecturing, and in 1845 he was made professor in ordinary of philosophy, lecturing at the same time as Privatdocent on theology. He died Sept. 19, 1866, having been honored with the doctorate of divinity in 1838 by the Jena University. At first a follower of Hegel, he soon emancipated himself from that system, as may be seen from his Ueber den Begriff, die Behandlung und die Quellen der Mythologie (Leipzig, 1827). Prominent among his works are: — Die Idee Gottes (Dresden, 1833); — Die philosophische Geheimlehre von der Unsterblichkeit (ibid. 1834); — Grundzüge der Metaphysik (Hamburg, 1834); — Die evangl. Geschichte kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (Leipzig, 1838, 2 vols.); — Ueber die Zukunft der evang. Kirche (ibid. 1849); — Philosophische Dogmatik (1855-62, 3 vols.); — Christologie Luthers (ibid. 1855); — Die Evangelienfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigen Studium (ibid. 1856). After his death were published, Beiträge zur Kritik der paulin. Briefe (ibid. 1867); — Psychologie und Unsterblichkeitslehre (1869). See Seydel, Chr. H. Weisse (Leipzig, 1866); Theolog. Univers.-Lexikon, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1481; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 412, 472. (B. P.)

Weissel, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1590 at Domnau, in Prussia. He was rector at Friedland for three years, and in 1623 became minister of the newly erected Rosengarten Church at Königsberg. He is said to have quickened the poetic powers of others, and especially of Simon Dach, his junior contemporary. He died Aug. 1, 1635. Weissel is the author of some very fine hymns, which are still used in the German Evangelical Church, e. g. Macht hoch die Thür, das Thor macht weit (Eng. transl. in Lyra Germ. i, 10: "Lift up your heads, ye mighty gates"). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 180 sq. (B. P.)

Weissenbach, Joseph Anton, a Roman Catholic divine of Germany, was born Oct. 15, 1734, at Bremgarten, and died April 11, 1801, at Luzerne. He wrote, Kritisches Verzeichniss der besten Schriften, welche in verschiedenen Sprachen zum Beweis und zur Vertheidigung der Religion herausgekommen (Basle, 1784); — De Elo- quentia Patrum Libb. XIII (Augsburg, 1775, 9 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 380, 882. (B. P.)

Weissenborn, Friedrich Ludwig, a German theologian, was born April 16, 1816, at Parkentin, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He occupied the philosophical chair at Halle, and afterwards at Marburg, where he died, June 4, 1874. He published, Vorlesungen über Schleiermachers Dialektik und Dogmatik (Leipzig, 1847, 2 pts.); — Vorlesungen über Pantheismus und Theismus (Marburg, 1859). (B. P.)

Weissenborn, Jesaias Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 15, 1673, at Smalcald. He studied at Erfurt, in 1700 was appointed pastor of St. Michael's there, was made superintendent in 1722, professor of theology in 1724, and died July 3, 1750. He wrote, Dissert. de eucharistia; — De Sabbathi Obligatione Naturali; — Jesus Pontificiorum cum Jesu Lutheramorum Collatus; — Detrimentum Fidei et Pietatis e Dogmate Reformatum de Absoluto Decreto Exatum; — De Negatione Resurrectionis Christi Detectanda e Pauli Verbis 1 Cor. x, 17, 18; — De Divinitate Spiritus S. contra Pneumatomachos, etc. See Moser, Lexikon jetztlebender Gottesgelehrten; Neubauer, Nachricht von jetztlebenden Gottesgelehrten; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Weissenborn, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Sigtitz, in Thuringia, Nov. 21, 1644. He studied at Jena, was appointed rector of the Evangelical Lutheran school at Smalcald in 1672, and in 1683 went to Hildesheim as director of the gymnasium there. In 1691 he received a call as pastor to Erfurt, was made doctor of divinity in 1692, and in 1700 followed a call as professor of theology and superintendent to Jena, where he died, April 20 of the same year. He is the author of Schmalkaldisches kernhaftes Gebetbuch nebst allerhand geistreichen Lebensregeln (1706; new ed. 1716). See Pipping, Memor. Theol. Decas IX (1707); Zeumeri Vita Prof. Theol. Jenensis, p. 252; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 418 sq. (B. P.)

Weissensoe, Philipp Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 6, 1673, at Vickberg, in Würtemberg. He studied at Tübingen, was appointed in 1703 teacher at the monastery in Maulbronn, and in 1708 he was called for the same position to Blaubeuren. In 1722 he received the prelate in the same school, and in 1727 that of Hirschau. In 1740 he was appointed provost and general superintendent at Denkendorf, and died Jan. 6, 1767, as senior of the evangelical church of Würtemberg. He is the author of some fine hymns which are still in use in Germany, and published in 1718 an edition of Thomas à Kempis's book, The Imitation of Christ, in German rhymes. See Burk, Der Christenbote, 1847, No. 3, p. 25-28; No. 11, p. 130 sq.; No. 16, p. 187; No. 25, p. 297; Pregizers, Gottg. Porrie (Tüb. 1727), p. 280-285; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 79 sq. (B. P.)

Weissmann, Ehrenreich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born July 15, 1641, at Weyerburg, in Lower Austria. Religious intolerance obliged him to leave his country. He went to Würtemberg and studied at Tübingen. In 1662 he was appointed pastor at Hirschau; in 1680 special superintendent and pastor at Waitlingen; in 1693 he was called to Stuttgart; was made general superintendent and abbot at Maulbronn in 1711; and died Feb. 28, 1717. He wrote Rhetorica Sacra, besides ten vols. on homiletical subjects. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 58; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Weiss, George, a pioneer of the German Reformed Church in Ohio. He was born in Northumberland County, Pa., June 21, 1798. He served as a volunteer in the War of 1812, and was appointed quartermaster. He began his theological studies with Rev. Isaac Gerhart, and finished with Rev. Dr. Samuel Helfenstein in Philadelphia. In 1816 he was appointed by the Synod of the German Reformed Church as an exploring missionary to Ohio. In 1817 he settled permanently in Lancaster, O., extending his missionary labors over four counties. He laid the foundation of numerous flourishing churches, being in labors abundant to the end of his life. He died in peace, March 10, 1859. He has a son in the ministry.

Weitenauer, Ignatz, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany who lived in the last century, is the author of, Trifolium Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, per quod Possit intra Aliquot Horas cum Hierolexico Auctoris Explicare Canonem Biblicum, etc. (Augsburg, 1759):—Job, Psalmi, Prov. Salomon, et Siracidi, ex Hebraicis Græcisque Fontibus ad Mentem Vulgatæ et Lat. Sermonis Dilucide Explicans (ibid. 1757):—Hexaglotton, seu Modus Addiscendi intra Brevis, Tempus Linguam Gal., Ital., Hisp., Græc., Hebraicam et Chaldaicam, etc. (Frankfort, 1756):—Novæ Grammaticæ Biblicæ Methodus (Ulm, 1756):—Libri Machabeorum cum Commentario Literali, quibus Addita est Diss. de Doctrina Morum e Sacra Scriptura (ibid. 1773):—Lexicon Biblicum, etc. (Augsburg, 1758; Venice, 1860). He also translated into German the Old Testament, to which he added annotations. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 503; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Wejones were fortune-tellers of the barbarous Prussians, who foretold future events from the force of the wind and the direction of the clouds.

Weland, Jakob Christoph, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born July 18, 1752, at Bremen, and died March 10, 1813, as abbot, general superintendent, and first pastor at Holzminden. He wrote, Ueber Wunder nach den Bedürfnissen unserer Zeit (Göttingen, 1789):—Predigten über die Evangelien (Brunswick, 1813):—Einkleitung in die Bibel, nach den Bedürfnissen unserer Zeit (Hanover, 1812). Welapotren (or Velapotren), in Hindû mythology, is that giant who came into existence when Siva, in despair, because of his wife's death, pulled a hair from his head. The giant decapitated the father of this lovely wife, Shakti, as he had been the cause of her death.

Weleda, in German mythology, was one of the most famous fortune-tellers in the 1st century of the Christian æra. A maiden born of princely parents, she is said to have wielded a mighty political influence over her people. Having been brought to Rome as a prisoner, she was carried about in triumph, and received great distinction at the hands of the emperor Vespasian. After her death the Germans honored her as a goddess.

Weles, in Slavonic mythology, was the first of the deities after Perun, the supreme god of the Poles. He was also worshipped in Russia as a god of protection, especially of horses and cattle.

Well, Ecclesiastical. The most ancient examples of Christian baptismal wells are to be found in the Catacombs. Wells occur in crypts, some of which were regarded as possessing waters of miraculous powers, as at Pierrefonds; but very possibly they were made in imitation of the baptismal wells of the Catacombs. There was usually a well or fountain in the centre of a cloister garth. There is one highly enriched in the south nave aisle of Strasburg. Probably these wells, as in cathedrals, served to drain water and supply the baptismal font, as in St. Patrick's, Dublin, and at York, Carlisle, Glasgow, and Winchester. In many of the small Cornish oratories or baptisteries there is a well. St. Keyne's Well, in Cornwall, was an object of frequent visits, as was St. Winifred's, in North Wales, which was built in 1495, and contains a star-shaped basin, formerly surrounded with stone screens and contained within a vaulted ambulatory under an upper chapel. Wells are found also in many of the ancient Cornish churches of the 5th and 7th centuries, at Marden, Kirk Newton, and Ancient Baptismal Well. (From the Catacomb of St. Domitilla, Rome.)

Durham. Joubert's Well at Poitiers is a good mediæval specimen. At Ratisbon, in the south wing of the transept, there is a well with figures of the Saviour and the woman of Samaria. There is also an ancient well in the cloister of Arles. St. Aldhelm's Well at Shepton Mallet, St. Chad's at Lichfield, St. Julien's at Wellow, Somerset, St. Thomas's at Canterbury, and numerous others in Wales are still regarded as possessing medicinal virtues. Throughout all Christendom such wells exist, and rules concerning them have been made from time to time by canonical decrees, because of abuses which arose in past ages. They were forbidden to be worshipped without the bishop's authority in 960, 1018, and 1102. In 950 they were made sanctuaries. Round them were frith-guards, for sanctuary, which were reputed holy ground. They were determined as holy by the diocesan, by canons passed in 960 and 1102, and abuses were condemned by the Synod of Winchester in 1308. See Lee, Gloss. of Liturg. and Eccles. Terms, s. v.; Walcott, Sacred Archaeol. s. v.

Weller, Hieronymus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 5, 1499, at Freyburg. He studied at Wittenberg, where he became intimately acquainted with Luther. In 1535 he took the degree of doctor of divinity, and in 1539 was appointed superintendent at Freyburg, where he died, March 20, 1572. He wrote commentaries on the books of Samuel, Kings, Job; on the epistles to the Ephesians, Philipians, Thessalonians; of Peter and the first of John. He also wrote, Explicationes in Epistolas et Evangelia Dominicarum et Festorum:—De Passione Domini Nostri Jesu Christi:—besides homiletical, ascetical, and exegetical works in German. See Freher, Theatrum Eruditorum; Acta Eruditorum Latina; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. ii, 58. (B. P.)

Weller, Jakob, a Protestant divine of Germany, was born Dec. 5, 1602, at Neukirchen. In 1635 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at Wittenberg; in 1640 superintendent at Brunswick; and in 1646 first court preacher and church councillor at Dresden, where he died, July 6, 1664. He wrote, Annotationes in Epist. Pauli ad Romanos . . . Collectæ a J. Schindlero (Brunswick, 1654):—לקט הקציר, Spicilegium Questionum Ebræo-Syrarum (Wittenberg, 1673):—De Lingua Hebræica Ambiguitate contra Hunt-leum (ibid. 1631):—Disputatio an Puncta Hebr. Litera Coæra? (ibid.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 165, 255; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 504; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Wellesley. See WESLEY.

Wellesley, Gerald Valerian, an Anglican prelate, was born in 1809. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1830; held the rectory of Strathfieldsaye, Hanta, from 1836 till 1855; became domestic chaplain to the queen in 1849; dean of Windsor in 1854, and died Sept. 18, 1882.

Wellesley, Henry, D.D., an English clergyman, a natural son of Richard Colley Wellesley (marquis Wellesley) and Mlle. H. G. Roland, was born in 1792; graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1816; became rector of Woodmancote, Hurst Monceaux, in Sussex; was appointed principal of New Inn Hall, Oxford, in 1842; became preacher to the University of Oxford; curator of the Bodleian Library, University Galleries, and Taylor Institution; and died Jan. 11, 1866. He was the author of, Anthologia Polyglotta; or, A Selection of Versions in Various Languages, chiefly from the Greek Anthology (1849);—and Stray Notes on Shakespeare (1865). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Welliamen (or Velliamen), in Hindû mythology, was one of the two wives of Kartiavertshunen; the other's name is Devanei, who was the daughter of Indra. Statues of both are erected in the temple of this god.

Well-maids, in Norse mythology, were daughters of Aeger and Ran. They swim upon the stormy sea around their mother, and appear with white veils to assist the unfortunate out of the wild waves, and lay the drowned down in the lap of their mother. Their names are Himinglæffe, Dufa, Blodlughadda, Hefring, Udur, Raun, Bylgia, Drubna, and Kolga.

Wells or Pryr, "the five wounds of Christ, distilling his sacred blood—for grace, from the right foot; for ghostly comfort, from the left foot; for wisdom, from the right hand; for mercy, from the left hand; and from the heart, for everlasting life—each represented by a drop of blood in rich ruby glass, issuing from a gash which bears a golden crown, as in a pane of Perpendicular glass at Sidmouth."

Wells, Edward Livingston, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, began his regular ministry in 1860, as pastor of the Church of Our Saviour, Plainville, Conn.; the following year became rector of Calvary Church, Louisville, Ky.; in 1865 went to Pittsfield, Mass., as rector of St. Stephen's Church, and remained there until 1871, when he became rector of Trinity Church, Southport, Conn., and here he continued to reside until 1879, part of the time without charge, and afterwards as minister of St. John's Church, New Milford, where he died, Aug. 7, 1880, aged forty-six years. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881, p. 175.

Wells, Eleazer Mather Porter, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1793, being a descendant of Thomas Wells, who had come to Salem with Winthrop and Wilson in 1629. He entered the ministry in 1823, and preached at Plymouth, Calais, and Bangor, Me. In 1826 he was ordained a deacon by bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, and was professionally engaged for brief periods at more than a dozen places in New England. His special vocation, however, was found when he was placed in charge of the House of Reformation for Juvenile Offenders at Boston, and also became superintendent of St. Stephen's House. He was a most philanthropic city missionary, and up to the time of his death, which occurred in Boston, Dec. 1, 1878, he was "in labors more abundant." (W. P. S.) Wells, Henry, a distinguished philanthropist, was born in New Hampshire in 1805. He was brought by his parents when a child to Central New York. Without the advantages of an early education, but with a pushing spirit within him, he began his career as an expressman, his first route being from Albany to Buffalo, at which time he carried all the matter in a carpet-bag himself, and gave personal attention to its delivery. His business gradually prospered, and he increased it as circumstances required. Such was its wonderful progress that he organized a company, under the title of "The American Express Company," which subsequently bore the name of "Wells, Fargo & Co." Their business increased to such an extent that it embraced the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Canada to Mexico and across the ocean. The reward of his enterprise and prudence was a princely fortune. With its avails he purchased a beautiful property on the banks of the Cayuga Lake, at Aurora, N. Y., and there erected a palatial residence, which he filled with all the comforts and luxuries of art. In the retirement of his lovely rural home, he conceived the idea of erecting and furnishing at his own expense a seminary or college for the higher education of young women. By the side of his own mansion he laid off a park embracing woodland, hill, and plain, and in the middle of it he erected a splendid brick edifice, with all the appointments that skill, taste, and money could provide for the carrying-out of the great object he had in view. This magnificent edifice, with the entire property, was conveyed by deed as a free gift to a board of trustees, who gave it the name of "Wells College." A board of instruction was soon organized, and the college sprang rapidly into high repute. Its halls were soon filled, and students flocked to it from all parts, many of them the daughters of gentlemen with whom Mr. Wells had been associated in business. Its library and cabinets were made rich by contributions of his friends. The Hon. E. B. Morgan, of Aurora, added the munificent gift of $100,000 to the endowment of the institution, and is about to erect another important building for the college. On Nov. 9, 1878, Mr. Wells sailed for Glasgow, and reached there on the 19th. He was too far enfeebled to proceed farther, and after lingering for a few weeks, his active, eventful, and useful life closed, Dec. 10, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Wells, Horatio T., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was head master of the English department in Burlington College, N. J., in 1859, and the following year acting rector of the college; in 1862 was principal of a boys' school in Andalusia, Pa., which institution, in 1866, became known as Andalusia College. Mr. Wells was elected president and professor of English literature and commercial law, and remained at the head of the college until his death, in December, 1871. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 183.

Wells, William, D.D., an English Unitarian minister, who afterwards emigrated to America, was born at Biggleswade, Bedfordshire, in 1744. He was educated at the Academy of Daventry; became minister at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, in 1770; was a friend to the Americans during the Revolution; introduced inoculation for small-pox among his poor neighbors, attending some thirteen hundred cases; removed to America, arriving in Boston with his family, June 12, 1793; settled on a farm at Brattleborough, Vt., in 1794, residing there and preaching to the Society in the town until his death, which occurred Dec. 27, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 254 sq.

Wellwood. See MONCKIFF.

Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, a considerable body of Methodists, chiefly in Wales, which dates its origin from 1735, sprang from the labors of Mr. Howell Harris, of Trevecca, in Brecknockshire. This young man had gone to Oxford to prepare for the ministry of the Church of England; but, becoming disgusted with the immorality and gross carelessness of that place, he returned home and began to visit from house to house, warning people to flee from the wrath to come. He soon began to preach in public. Crowds flocked to hear him, and many were converted under his preaching. He appointed meetings for religious conversation in several places; hence arose those private societies which form a prominent part of the arrangements of this body. His labors were crowned with extraordinary success, notwithstanding the opposition of the regular clergy and the magistrates; and in 1739, after only four years of effort, he had established as many as three hundred societies in the south of Wales. Mr. Harris was greatly aided in his labors by the Rev. Daniel Rowland, of Llangethio, Cardiganshire, who attracted large crowds by his eloquence. Several pious ministers of the Establishment seceded and joined the Methodists: a considerable band of itinerant missionaries was formed; a most precious revival spread among the different denominations; and the new sect grew so popular that in seven years from its commencement no fewer than ten ministers of the Church of England had joined it. The first chapel built by the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists was erected at Bwlth, Brecknockshire, in 1747. In the following year two others were built in Carmarthenshire. The Church made rapid progress in the south of Wales, but was greatly hindered in the north. It was about this time that the Rev. Thomas Charles began his labors. He lived at Bala, Merionethshire, and it is to his exertions and influence that these societies are chiefly indebted for their prosperity. He was converted under the preaching of Mr. Rowland, and, after the usual preparation, entered the ministry of the Church of England. But in 1784 he decided to leave the Established Church and join the Methodists, where he could enjoy greater freedom in evangelical labors. He found the principality in a deplorable condition on account of the ignorance and degradation of the people. A Bible could scarcely be found in any of the cottages of the peasantry, and in some parishes very few were able to read it. He therefore decided to educate the people in the rudiments of learning and religion. He established for this purpose what he called circulating schools, that is, schools which might be removed from one place to another at the end of a definite period, say nine or twelve months. He induced "a few friends to set a subscription on foot to pay the wages of a teacher, who was to be moved circuitously from one place to another, to instruct the poor in reading, and in the first principles of Christianity by catechising them." This work was begun in 1785 with only one teacher. Others were added as the funds increased, until they numbered twenty. At first he instructed the teachers himself, and these in turn instructed others. In this manner many thousands were instructed, and the good seed thus sown produced abundant fruit, religious awakenings occurring in many places where the teachers had labored. In 1799 a religious periodical was started by Mr. Charles, entitled The Spiritual Treasury, the design of which was to supply the people thus instructed with religious reading. Hitherto, Bibles in the vernacular had been very scarce, and the want was met by the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804. By this organization, Welsh Bibles and Testaments were scattered throughout the principality, and eagerly received.

In the organization of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Society Mr. Charles took an active and prominent part. At an association held at Bala in 1790, he drew up a set of Rules for Conducting the Quarterly Meetings of the North Wales Association, consisting of the preachers and leaders; and these Rules form the basis of the present system of Church government of the whole society. In 1801 Rules of Discipline were first published, laying down the order and form of Church government and discipline. To these were added, in 1811, several regulations designed to render the organization, in its membership and ministry, permanently independent of the Established Church.

In 1823 they adopted and published a Confession of Faith, which was unanimously agreed upon at the associations of Aberystwith and Bala. The doctrines thus avowed are decidedly Calvinistic, and accord with the Thirty-nine Articles and the Westminster Confession in all essential points of doctrine and practice. Their Church government is neither Episcopal, on the one hand, nor Congregational, on the other, but approaches more nearly the Presbyterian form. The private societies are subordinate to the monthly meetings, and these again to the quarterly associations, at which the general business of the body is transacted. Their preachers itinerate from place to place, and, being men of limited education, they are generally dependent on some secular employment for their support. Of late years they have turned their attention towards the importance of an educated ministry. Accordingly, in 1837, a college for the purpose of training theological students was established at Bala, and in 1842 another at Trevecca.

The ministers of the Connection are selected by the private societies, and reported to the monthly meetings, which examine them as to their qualifications, and permit them to begin on trial. After they have preached for five years or more on trial, and are found properly qualified, they are ordained to administer the sacraments, and the ordination takes place at the quarterly associations. The preachers are expected each to itinerate in a particular county; but generally once in a year they undertake a missionary tour to different parts of Wales, when they preach twice every day, each time in a different chapel. Their remuneration is derived from the monthly pence contributed by the members of each congregation; out of which a small sum is given to them after every sermon; but some have a stated stipend.

The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists have about 1000 chapels and about 80,000 communicants, 60,000 of whom are in Wales and 4000 in America, the rest principally in England.

In 1840 they formed an association for sending missionaries to the heathen, and towards the end of the same year a mission was commenced among one of the hill tribes in the northeast part of Bengal. They have also a mission-station in Brittany, France, the language of that country being a sister dialect of the Welsh; and they have, besides, a mission to the Jews. The operations of the home mission of this denomination are carried on among the English population inhabiting the borders between England and Wales. There are several societies in England belonging to the Connection—for example, in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Chester, Shrewsbury, etc.—whose worship, public and private, is performed in the Welsh language. There is also a small congregation among the Welsh miners of Lanarkshire, Scotland, who have preaching in their own language. In some parts of Wales, and on the borders of England where the English language is most prevalent, worship is conducted in that tongue.

Welsh Version. The first edition of the New Test. was printed in London in 1567, in consequence of a law enacted by Parliament in 1562. The translation was made by William Salesbury, assisted by a certain Huet, a chanter of St. David's, and Dr. Richard Davies, bishop of the same place. In 1588 the entire Bible was given to the Welsh people, the Old Test. being translated by Dr. W. Morgan, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, with the aid of several eminent scholars, who also revised Salesbury's version of the New Test. A new and revised edition was prepared by Dr. R. Parry, successor to the see of St. Asaph, and published in 1620. This edition was held in such high estimation that it has been used as the text of all succeeding editions. Being in folio, a small and portable edition was published in 1630, which, besides the Old and New Testaments, contained the Apocrypha, the Book of Common Prayer, and a metrical version of the Psalms; the latter, which is still used in the Welsh churches, was prepared by Pryas, archdeacon of Merioneth. Of the editions of the whole Bible which have appeared from time to time we mention the following:

- 1654—sometimes called Cromwell's Bible.
- 1673—with corrections by the Rev. St. Hughes.
- 1690—published by the Rev. D. Jones.
- 1690—printed at Oxford for the use of churches, in Roman characters, sometimes called Bishop Lloyd's Bible.
- 1719—printed at Loudon, often called Moses Williams's Bible.

1737—printed at London; less valuable.

1746—printed at Cambridge; the third edition, published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and containing the same as published in the first, in 1718.

1752—reprint of that of 1746.

1769—by the same society.

1770—with notes by the Rev. P. Williams, and reprinted very often.

1789—printed for the use of churches by the same society.

1790—with Mr. John Canne's references.

1799—printed by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

These editions, with the exception of ten thousand copies of the New Test. printed in the year 1800 at Shrewsbury, were all that appeared before the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The great scarcity of the vernacular Scriptures prevailing in Wales was the cause of finally bringing about the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The first edition of the Scriptures issued by this society was the Welsh Bible, the text adopted being that of 1752. This edition left the press in 1806. Including this, their first edition, the number of copies issued at successive intervals by the British and Foreign Bible Society, from the year 1806 up to March 31, 1879, may be briefly stated as follows:

Bibles.....	813,466
Testaments.....	1,038,507
Diglots, Welsh and English.....	86,636
Total.....	1,938,609

Besides the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge and the American Bible Society have published the Scriptures in Welsh. See Bible of Every Land, p. 153 sq. (B. P.)

Welte, BENEDICT VON, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1805 at Ratzewied, and acted as professor of Old-Test. exegesis at Tübingen from 1838 to 1857. He died May 27, 1885, at Rottenburg, senior of the chapter, and doctor of theology. He published, Das Buch Job übersetzt und erklärt (Freiburg, 1849):—Nachmosaisches in Pentateuch beleuchtet (Carlsruhe, 1840):—Historisch-kritische Einleitung in die Schriften Alten Testaments (ed.); besides he was co-editor of the Freiburg Kirchenlexikon, which he published together with Wetzler (q. v.). (B. P.)

Welton, RICHARD, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, had been deprived of the rectorship of St. Mary's, Whitechapel, London, on account of his attachment to the non-jurors, and was consecrated in 1722 by Rev. Ralph Taylor. He arrived in America probably in 1723, was invited to take charge of Christ Church, Philadelphia, July 27, 1724, and entered immediately upon his duties. His anomalous relation to the Church as a non-juring bishop occasioned disquietude among the Episcopalians when it became known. Soon after an order came from England to governor Keith of Pennsylvania, enclosing a king's writ addressed to Welton, commanding him to return to England. Accordingly, in January, 1726, after a brief but acceptable ministry, he embarked for Lisbon, where he died shortly after his arrival. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 38.

Weltz, JUSTINIAN ERNST VON, a Hungarian nobleman of the 17th century. He is known on account of his connection with the mystics Breckling, Gichtel, and others. At Ratisbon he met with Gichtel, and both united in forming a fraternity of the pious ("Jesus-Gesellschaft") for the purpose of renewing the inner life of the Church. The members received their names from the society to which they belonged; thus, Weltz received Breckling in Holland under the name of "Der Brechende." Being very rich, Weltz gave $30,000 towards the objects of the fraternity. This was about 1660. The society also had in view a union between the Lutherans and the Calvinists. In 1664 Weltz and Gichtel presented to the Corpus Evangelicorum a plan of their tendencies, which Weltz had approved by the most famous theologians. He was also the first who, in two works, reminded the Church of the holy duty of missionary work; but the orthodox superintendent Ursinus, at Ratisbon, dismissed him mockingly. In the same year (1664) Weltz went to Surinam to preach the Gospel there, which he did until his death. This was the beginning of evangelical missions. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Plitt, Gesch. der lutherischen Mission (Erlangen, 1871), p. 22 sq.; Theolog. Universal-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Wen is the inaccurate rendering in the A. V. of gabbal (on Lev. xxii, 22), which means flowing with a running sore; spoken of a diseased flock.

Wenceslaus (Wenzel, or Venceslav), St., a prince of Bohemia, son of Vratislav and Drahomira, was born about the beginning of the 10th century. His education was intrusted to his grandmother Ludmila, a devoted Christian; and he thus received a training which led him to become a pious Christian, and follow the course of a clergyman more than that of a prince. His brother Boleslaus (or Boleslav) was a fierce pagan; and, in conjunction with his mother, also a pagan, secured a visit from him, and slew him at the foot of the altar while engaged in prayer, Sept. 28, 935. Wenceslaus has been the subject of many works of art. See Jameson, Legends of the Monastic Orders, p. 175 sq.; Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 322.

Wendelin (or Wandelin), a saint of the 7th century whose day is October 20, and who is said to have been of Scottish family. He established himself as a hermit in a forest in the neighborhood of Treves, and afterwards as a herdsman in the late principality of Lichtenberg. His fidelity in this service led the monks of Tholey on the Saar to elect him their prior. The circumstances of his life and career are to be found recorded solely in the Acta SS. Boll. Juli vi, 171, and similar legendary depositories. Comp. Vogt, Rhein. Gesch. u. Sagen, i, 283 sq.; Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands, i, 480; Berlepsch, Die Alpen in Natur u. Lebensbildern (Leipz. 1861), p. 386 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wendelin, MARCUS FRIEDRICH, a theologian of the Reformed scholastic school in the 17th century, was born near Heidelberg in 1584, and after graduation, presumably at the university of that town, became tutor of the princes of Anhalt-Dessau, and in 1611 rector of the gymnasium of Zerbst. He retained the latter position during a period of forty-one years, and died there Aug. 7, 1652. He composed a number of textbooks which bear witness to the breadth of his culture; but his most important works were of a theological character. Among them were, Compend. Christiana Theologia (Hanaa, 1634):—Christiana Theologia Systema Majus (posthumously published, Frankf. 1656 and 1677):—Exercitationes Theol. contr. Jo. Gerhard. et Danhauer:—and Collatio Doctr. Reformatorum et Lutheranorum (Cassel, 1660). He avoided abstruse discussions, assumed only simple and evident premises, and made only a formal use of dialectics. His method was to discuss the contents of the dogma itself instead of an extraneous addition of Aristotelian tenets to the doctrine. The arrangement of his material and the determination of the problems presented to his mind give evidence of great acuteness. His Christ. Theol. Systema was translated into Dutch and Hungarian. See Wendelin's Works; Becmann, Anhaltische Historie; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wendish Version. See SLAVONIC VERSIONS.

Wends (from wend, to "wander"), a Slavic people who as early as the 6th century occupied the north and east of Germany, from the Elbe along the coast of the Baltic to the Vistula, and as far south as Bohemia. They were divided into several tribes, which were successively subdued by the Germans, and either exterminated or Germanized. Charlemagne drove them back towards the Vistula, and by the close of the 13th century his successors in Germany had almost completed the work of extirpation. In the 16th century remnants of this Slavic population were still scattered over the whole region between Berlin and Frankfort-on-the-Oder; and there was a remnant of Wends in Hanover, where they kept up their language until the middle of the 18th century. They are now found in portions of Brandenburg, Silesia, and the kingdom of Saxony, and principally on the banks of the Spree. At present the number of Wends, or those speaking the Wendish language, exclusive of that portion of this people who have been Germanized, is placed at 140,000, of whom 88,000 are in Prussia and 52,000 in Saxony. It is worthy of remark that the Sloventzi of Austria, a Slavic people numbering 1,260,000, are called Věnds, and their language the Vindish. To these the name Southern Wends is frequently applied. Most of the Wends are Protestants, though a large portion of those living in Saxony are Catholics. Christianity was introduced among them about the middle of the 11th century by their zealous king Gottschalk, founder of the Wendish kingdom. But they lapsed again into paganism, and were subsequently restored to Christianity by missionaries from the south. The language of the Wends is similar to the other branches of the northwestern stem of the Slavic languages, the Polish and the Bohemian. It has several dialects—the Lower Lusatian, and the Upper Lusatian, which is subdivided into the Evangelical, near Bautzen; the Catholic, near Kamenz and in the northwest; and the Northeastern. The extent of the entire Wendish literature has been estimated at three hundred volumes. The oldest work in the language is a translation of the Epistle of St. James, dating from 1548, published at Leipsic (1867). There are grammars of the Wendish language by Ticinus (Prague, 1679), Matthäi (1721), Seiler (Bautzen, 1830), and Jordan (Prague, 1841). There are also some collections of Sorbenian-Wendish songs and ballads. See Giesebrecht, Wendische Geschichte (Berlin, 1843); Das hannöversche Wendland (Lüchow, 1863); and Obermüller, Die Urgeschichte Wenden (Leipsic, 1874).

Wengersk, ANDREAS, a Protestant minister of the Lublin diocese in Poland, where he died, Jan. 11, 1649, is the author of, Systema Hist.-chronol. Ecclesiar. Slavonicar., per Provincias Varias præcipue Poloniae, Bohemiae, Lituanicae, Russiae, Prussiae, Moraviae, etc., Distinctur. Libris IV Adornatum, Continens Histor. Ecclesiast. a Chr. et Apostolor. Tempore ad A.D. 1650 (Utrecht, 1652). This work he published under the name of Adr. Regenvols; but the new edition which was published at Amsterdam in 1679, with the title Slavoniae Reformatae, Continentes Hist. Ecclesiast. Ecclesiar. Slavonicarum, etc., gave his original name. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 834. (B. P.)

Wenig, JOHANN BAPTIST, a Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1826 at Neudorf, in Bohemia. In 1844 he entered the Society of Jesus, studied at Linz and Vals, and received holy orders in 1852. In 1854 he was appointed professor at the Episcopal gymnasium in Linz; and in 1857 professor of archæology and Oriental languages at Innsbruck, where he died, Oct. 25, 1875. He published, Ueber den Wesensbestand des Menschen (Innsbruck, 1863);—Ueber die Freiheit der Wissenschaft (ibid. 1868);—Schola Syriaca. Pars Prior: Chrestomathia cum Apparatu Grammatico (ibid. 1866). See Literarischer Handweiser, 1866, p. 154; 1875, p. 433. (B. P.)

Wenigk, JOHANN ERNST, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1701 at Gotha. In 1731 he was appointed pastor at Crobstadt and Grabsleben, and in 1734 he was called to Bischleben, where he died, Feb. 10, 1745. He is the author of Iliria Sacra, oder Heilige Sonntagslust der Kinder Gottes (Arnstadt, 1731), which contains sixty-eight hymns which he wrote. See Brückner, Kirchen- und Schulleben im Herzogthum Gotha (Gotha, 1758), ii, 29 sq.; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenlieder, iv, 536. (B. P.)

Wepler, JOHANN HEINRICH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Cassel, July 27, 1755.

XII.—29*

For a number of years he acted as professor of Oriental languages at the Carolinum and Lyceum of his native place. In 1786 was called as professor of theology to Marburg, where he died, Nov. 30, 1792. He is the author of, Philologische und kritische Fragmente (Cassel, 1781-86);—Diss. Inaug. de Cherubis Angelis Tonantibus Hebræorum (Marburg, 1777);—Nachrichten von den auf der Cassel'schen Bibliothek befindlichen morgenl. Handschriften (ibid. 1778);—Gedanken über die Ursachen, weswegen die Syrer den Hebräern und Arabern in der Dichtkunst so sehr nachstehen, in the Mémoires de la Soc. d'Ant. de Cassel, i, 307 sq. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 280; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 504. (B. P.)

Werdandi (Present), in Scandinavian mythology, was one of the three deities of fate. See URD.

Werder, PETER, a Baptist preacher, was born in 1728, and ordained in May, 1751, at Warwick, R. I. The first nineteen years of his ministry were spent in that vicinity. He removed in 1770 to a Rhode Island settlement, then known as New Providence Grant, within the present limits of Cheshire, Mass., where he labored for thirty-eight years, preaching his last sermon on the Sunday before his death, Feb. 21, 1808. He was an influential and successful preacher, and venerated as a father among the churches of his faith in Western Massachusetts. See Mass. Bapt. Mag. ii, 348.

Werembert, a learned Swiss monk of the 9th century, was born at Coira, studied at Fulda under Rabanus Maurus, and became teacher in the Monastery of St. Gall, where he died, May 24 (or 29), 884. He was the author of some musical treatises and commentaries, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Werenfels, SAMUEL, a Swiss theologian, was the son of the antiistes of Basle, Peter Werenfels, and was born March 1, 1657. He was educated at Basle, Zurich, Berne, Lausanne, and Geneva; became professor of Greek at Basle; and soon afterwards undertook an extended scientific tour through Holland and North Germany. On his return he received the chair of rhetoric at Basle. He was himself an orator, and sought to develop the oratorical faculty in his pupils, encouraging them to cultivate naturalness and simplicity of manner and style, together with elegance of diction. He regarded disputatiousness as a malady having its root in moral conditions, as pride, etc., and for its cure he recommended a universal lexicon containing exact definitions of all scientific conceptions. In 1696 Werenfels became a theological professor, receiving the chair of dogmatics and polemics, and in the same year received the doctor's degree. He interpreted his duty in the new position as having less to do with the antiquated heresies of bygone ages than with the perverse tendencies of the time in which he lived, and as involving the effort of restraining theological zeal within its proper limits. In these opinions he had the sympathy and co-operation of Friedrich Osterwald (q. v.) and Alphonse Turretin (q. v.), with whom he became acquainted at this time, and with whom he formed the so-called theological triumvirate of his day. He also entered into relations with the learned Parisian Benedictine Montfaucon, though by no means indifferent as respects the profound questions at issue between Romanism and Protestantism. In 1703 he was promoted to the chair of Old-Test. exegesis. In this office he devoted himself to an exposition of the Psalms, and introduced a new study into the curriculum of the school—that of hermeneutics. His principles of interpretation were altogether those which were subsequently brought to general recognition and acceptance, viz. the principles of the grammatico-historical method. In 1711 he served for a time as preacher to the French Church, and became very popular, though obliged to speak in an acquired tongue. His sermons were printed and translated into Dutch and German. In the same year he advanced to the foremost theological professorship in the university—that of New-Test. exegesis—and continued to hold that office until his death,

June 1, 1740. He rejected a call to the University of Franeker, secured for him through the intervention of Vitringa, but accepted the honor of membership in the "British Society for the Spread of the Gospel in Foreign Lands" and in the "Berlin Scientific Association."

No striking events occurred in the life of Werenfels by which he might secure a name, nor did he compose any important and epochal theological work. His Opuscula, however, contain a collection of treatises on different exegetical and doctrinal subjects which are still deserving of notice. His spirit was irenical, and his labors were put forth in constant endeavors to promote honorable fraternity among Christians. He felt assured that the root of evil is not in the head, but in the heart. As a teacher, he combined practical instruction with theoretical, that he might give a higher fitness to the young men who came under his care. In the evening of his life an effort was made to compel Werenfels to assist in the endeavor to degrade the learned and meritorious Wettstein from the ministry on account of alleged heterodoxy. He consequently absented himself from the sessions of the theological court, and ultimately withdrew from the academical life to privacy.

No suitable biography of Werenfels has yet been prepared, and the many grains of information scattered through his Opuscula have not been collected. See the Athen. Rour. p. 57 sq.; Hanhart, Erinnerungen an Sam. Werenfels, in Basler wissenschaft. Zeitschr. 1824, p. 22; and Hagenbach, Programme, 1860.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Worf, ADRIAAN VAN DER, an eminent Dutch painter, was born at Kralinger-Ambacht, near Rotterdam, in 1659. He studied under Cornelius Picolett for two years, and under Eglon van der Neer during the next four. At the age of eighteen he commenced his career as a painter at Rotterdam, and met with great encouragement. He was commissioned by the elector-palatine to paint a picture of the Judgment of Solomon and his own portrait. After finishing these works he went to Düsseldorf, where the elector desired to retain him in his service; but he agreed to paint for him six months of the year, and give the other six to his own engagements. He received a liberal pension from the elector and many valuable presents, and continued in his service until the death of his royal patron, in 1717. Among his pictures in the Düsseldorf Gallery is a life-size Magdalen, painted as a companion-piece to the St. John of Raphael, but considered, even by his friends and admirers, as inferior to that work. He carried his finishing to a very high pitch, and as a consequence his works are rare and command a high price. He died in 1722.

Werin, in Persian mythology, was an evil dev, placed by Ahriman against Ormuzd, and designed to hinder the falling of rain, and thus also the fruitfulness of the earth.

Werkmeister, BENEDICT MARIA VON, a Roman Catholic theologian and representative of the so-called Josephinism or reformatory tendency in his Church, was born at Füssen, in Upper Suabia, Oct. 22, 1745, and became a Benedictine monk in 1765. By direction of his abbot he studied theology at Benedictbeuren, making Oriental languages and exegesis his principal subjects, and finding in father Ægidius Bartscherer a teacher who developed in him the faculty for independent research which he naturally possessed. He soon discovered that ethics, which appeared to him to be of primary importance, was altogether overlooked by theologians in their eagerness to employ their wits upon the mysterious. He could not be satisfied with the schemes of probabilists or probabiliorists, of liberalists or rigorists, among the Romish teachers of ethics, and saw himself obliged to seek for what he wanted in the lectures of the Protestants Gellert and Mosheim, and in the Life of Jesus by Hess.

In 1769 Werkmeister became a priest and superintendent of novices at Neresheim, the latter post being associated with that of professor of philosophy. He filled a similar chair at Freysing from 1772 to 1774; then became secretary to the prelate of the empire; archivist and librarian at Neresheim; and afterwards resumed his duties as professor of philosophy at Freysing, and added to them those of a director of the curriculum, of a professor of canon law, and a librarian. Duke Charles of Württemberg made Werkmeister his court preacher in 1784, and, being a highly enlightened Roman Catholic, permitted him to both preach and administer the ritual of his Church as he might prefer. A fruit of this liberty is presented to view in the Gesangbuch nebst angehängten Gebeten, etc., for the ducal chapel (1784-86), which contains a large number of Protestant hymns and tunes, and is wholly in keeping with the general style of hymnology and liturgy in that time.

Physical ailments began to trouble Werkmeister seriously in 1787, and to make it difficult and ultimately impossible for him to preach; and as the presumptive heir to the throne, Louis Eugene, brother of Charles, was known to be a bigot, and likely to dismiss every liberal priest from his service whenever he should have the power, he applied for secularization and the canonry of Spire. The former was granted and the latter denied, and in 1794 Werkmeister and his colleagues were superseded by Franciscans and Capuchins. The duke even requested that Werkmeister should be banished; but the Monastery of Neresheim gave him asylum until another change in the succession of the duchy took place, when he was recalled to his former post at Stuttgart. He now applied for and received the parish of Steinbach (1796). In 1807 he became a member of the ecclesiastical council for the Romish Church in Württemberg, and in 1810 of the newly erected supervisory council. In 1816 he was appointed to the direction of education, and in 1817 he received the title of high councillor for ecclesiastical affairs and the knight's cross of the Order of the Württembergian Crown. He died July 16, 1823.

Werkmeister was a rationalist, though of the noble sort, and lacked profoundness of religious thought and feeling. He never penetrated into the spiritual depths of religion, but, on the other hand, he never sought to set aside the authority of Scripture and of the received doctrines of the evangelical faith. He had the boldness to attack various Romish teachings and institutions, e. g. the celibacy of priests, the worship of Mary, the indissolubility of marriage, etc. He did not regard his course in this respect as involving him in conflict with the Church, but only with what was impure and spurious that had fastened itself upon her in the progress of ages. It would seem, nevertheless, that he carried about with him the idea of a German National Church which should be independent of Rome, but none the less Roman Catholic. His works of a literary character possess only historical interest at this distance from his time. The most important is the Jahreschrift für Theologie und Kirchenrecht der Katholiken (1806-20, 5 vols., edited by him), in which he opposes many abuses of the Roman Catholic Church. Of his ascetical works, his Neues Gebetbuch für aufgeklärte katholische Christen (Heilbronn, 1801; 11th ed. 1818) is especially deserving of mention, as well as his Sermons (1812-15, 3 vols.). See Schmidt, Neuer Nekrolog der Deutschen, 1823, ii, 578; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wermelskirch, JOHANN GEORG, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Feb. 22, 1803, at Bremen. In 1820 he entered the missionary institution of father Jänicke at Berlin, and some time afterwards the seminary of the English missionary society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews at Henstead, near Portsmouth. From 1824 to 1835 he labored among the Jews, when he accepted a pastorate of a Lutheran congregation in Posen. Not being a Prussian, he was obliged to leave the country in 1836, and went to Dresden, where he connected himself with the Lutheran Missionary Society. In 1842 he again returned to Prussia, and in 1844 he became pastor of the Lutheran congregation at Erfurt, and died Dec. 20, 1872. Wermelskirch was very active in behalf of Christian missions, and the Lutheran Missionary Society in Thuringia is the fruit of his labors. (B. P.)

Wernems, ROLLWINCK DE LAER, a Westphalian, and Carthusian monk at Cologne, was born in 1425. He was the author of some works, among them Fusculus Temporum, embracing all the ancient chronicles, coming down to 1480, and continued by John Linturius to 1514. He died in 1502. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xv, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Werner, Andreas Konrad, a Protestant theologian of Germany in the first half of the 18th century, is the author of, Dissertationes Tres de Puritate Fontium Hebraeorum Specialim ex Libro Josue, etc. (Stade, 1720-26):—Diss. de Samaritanis eorumque Templo in Monte Garizim Edificato (Jena, 1728):—De Votis Veterum Israelitarum ex Antiquitate Judaica (Stade, 1737):—Diss. de Veritate Doctrinae Divinae de Christo, ex Judaeorum partim Testimoniis, partim Criminacionibus et Calumniis eorum Illustratu et Confirmatu (ibid. 1729):—Diss. de Bethlehemo apud Hieronymum (ibid. 1769). Werner, Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 28, 1659, at Flemingen, near Naumburg. He studied at Leipsic, where he died, April 21, 1741, having received the degree of D.D. in his eighty-second year. He wrote, Præcepta Homiletica:—Tract. Hermeneutico-homileticus in Evangelia Dominicalia et Festivalia:—Dicta Biblica ex V. et N. T. cum Scopo Evangeliorum Annuorum Consensientia:—De Vana Spe Insignis Judæorum Conversionis Simultanea ante Diem Extremum adhuc Expectanda. Wernsdorf, Ernst Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 18, 1718, at Wittenberg. He studied theology and philosophy at Leipsic, was made magister in 1742, and after presenting his dissertation De Septimia Zenobia, Palmyrenorum Augusta, was allowed to lecture at the university. In 1746 he was made professor extraordinary of philosophy, and opened his lectures with an oration De Nezu Historiarum Cognitionis cum Omni Philosophia Ambitu. In 1752 he was appointed to the chair of Christian antiquities, and presented on this occasion a dissertation, De Quingagesima Paschali. Four years later, in 1756, he was called to Wittenberg as professor of theology, where he died, May 7, 1782. Wernsdorf was a very learned man and quite at home in patristic literature, from which, especially from the writings of Ignatius, Eusebius, Tertullian, he explained the Christian antiquities and older ecclesiastical usages which, in the course of time, had either entirely disappeared or received another form. This subject he treated in dissertations like De Quingagesima Paschali (1752):—De Paschate Annotino (1760):—De Sacerdote Latina Lingua ad Altare Cantillante (1761):—De Veteris Ecclesie Diebus Festivis Anniversariis (1767), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 698 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 557, 617, 618, 619, 631, 638; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 505; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Wernsdorf, Gottlieb (1), professor of theology in the university, provost in the court church, general superintendent of the diocese of Wittenberg, and ecclesiastical councillor to the duke of Weissenfels, was born Feb. 25, 1668, of a noble but poor family. His theological position was that of strict Saxon orthodoxy, united with Spenerian earnestness as respects the practice of Christianity. His personal piety, and also his irenical disposition, are attested by Zinzendorf, who was at that time a student at Wittenberg (Spangenberg, Leben Zinzendorfs, I, iii). The only literary production of Wernsdorf which has come down to us is his Disputationes Academicæ (published by Zeiblich, 1786, 2 vols. 4to), whose subjects are the leading questions of his time, e. g. the controversies with Halle and the mystics, and with unbelief and indifferentism. He defends the idea of a mediate inspiration of the symbolical books, as well as their soundness throughout, not confining his argument to their doctrinal parts. The witness of the Spirit to our salvation is made by him to consist in a conclusion deduced from the Scriptures by the human mind, and the operation of the Spirit solely in the bringing to mind of all the passages of Scripture which can demonstrate that the judgment of the understanding with respect to our adoption as sons of God is well founded. Wernsdorf's book gives evidence of wide learning, a love of truth, an anxious holding-fast to the traditional views of Wittenbergian orthodoxy, and unflinching moderation. His students admired especially the elegance of his literary style. He died July 1, 1729. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Wernsdorf, Gottlieb (2), a Protestant theologian of Germany, son of the preceding, was born Aug. 8, 1717, at Wittenberg, and became doctor of philosophy and teacher of sacred literature, eloquence, and history in the gymnasium at Dantzig, of which he was eventually director. He died Jan. 24, 1774. He is the author of, Diss. Philologico-critica qua Sententia Jo. Clerici de Arte Poetica Hebraeorum Proponitur et Illustratur (Dantzig, 1744):—Oratio Auspicatoria de Cognatione Spartanorum et Judæorum ac præcipue de Epistola Arii Regis ad Oniam Pontificem, ad Elucidandum Locum 1 Macc. Cap. xii (ibid. eod.):—Diss. de Cultu Astrorum a Deo Gentibus Profanus olim Concesso, ad Deut. ix, 19, 20 (ibid. 1746):—Abhandlung von der allgemeinen Bekehrung der Juden zum Christenthum (ibid. 1748):—Diss. Fabularis Historia de Baccho ex Mosæico haud Conficta, contra Huetium Aliosque (ibid. 1753):—Commentatio de Fide Librorum Maccabæorum qua Frælichii Annales Syriae eorumque Prolegomena ex Instituto Examinantur, etc. (Breslau, 1747). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 9; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 505, where some works are mentioned which belong to Gottlieb Wernsdorf; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Wertheim Bible designates a German version of the Pentateuch, which excited great interest at the time of its first appearing (Easter, 1735), but has now lost whatever importance it may have heretofore possessed. It has not even the merit of being rare. It is, as its title indicates, the first volume of an intended issue of the whole Bible, and contains a preface of forty-eight pages, followed by ten hundred and forty pages of subject-matter, in small quarto. The preface sets forth the purpose of the author to show that the questionings of the human mind with respect to the divine authority of the Scriptures are to some extent warranted, and that the current conception of their authority rests largely upon prejudice and unscientific notions; and his further purpose to conform the statements of the Scriptures to the requirements of the human understanding, aided in this work by the light of history and the evidence of sound reason, and also to popularize the language of the Bible more than was done by Luther's version. The work is a simple product of vulgar rationalism, evincing in its features the marks of a half-educated mind and of zealous though private study on the part of its author, who was Johann Lorenz Schmidt, in 1725 and afterwards tutor in the family of Count Löwenstein, and a graduate of Jena. He spent years in the preparation of the book, and submitted it, with varying result, to different scholars. It was printed in secret and published anonymously, and on its appearance excited a controversy which led to the issue of an imperial mandate, Jan. 15, 1787, ordering its confiscation and the apprehension of its author. Schmidt was imprisoned a whole year before the authorities would admit him to bail, and was soon afterwards arrested again. His trial, however, does not appear to have been carried forward to a conclusion. Schmidt disappeared from view, though it was rumored that he had fled to Hamburg, assumed the name of Schroeder, and found employment as a translator from the English (Tindal), Spanish (Spinoza), and French (Cantimir), and afterwards as chamberlain at Wolfenbützel, where he died in 1750. Schmidt published in 1788 a collection of writings in support of or in opposition to the Wertheim Bible, which contains reviews, polemical pamphlets, and his own replies (528 pages, 4to). A similar collection, augmented with documents bearing on the trial, is that of Sinnhold (Erfurt, 1787 sq., 8 pamphlets containing 217 pages, 4to). See also Walch, Streitigkeiten in d. luth. Kirche, pt. v; Baumgarten, Nachrichten von einer Holl. Bibliothek, pt. viii; Schröckh, Neuere Kirchengesch. vii, 598 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wessalia, JOHN OF. See WESSEL.

Wessenburg, IGNATZ HEINRICH, Baron von, was a prominent liberal among the prelates in the Romish Church of Germany, and also a theological writer and a participant in civil affairs. He was born at Dresden, Nov. 4, 1774. His education, being largely under the direction of Jesuits, was defective to a degree that impaired his efficiency as a scholar while he lived. He visited the schools at Augsburg, Dillingen, Würzburg, and Vienna, nowhere finding the assistance which his active, questioning intellect demanded, and eventually confining his efforts to the use of the libraries and the study of art, for which latter employment the society of Vienna afforded opportunity. He had come into the possession of benefices as early as 1792, and to one of them, at Constance, he retired when the unpatriotic policy of the state in the closing years of the century drove him from the capital in disgust. In 1799 he published at Zurich a poetical epistle on the corruption of manners in Germany. In 1800, Dalberg (q. v.) called Wessenburg to be his vicar in the diocese of Constance, and he entered on the duties of the place with enthusiasm. He regulated the secular affairs of the diocese with a skill which elicited the commendation of the pope himself. He sought to help his clergy to a more systematic and thorough culture, and to stimulate it to greater activity, giving to the enterprise his personal efforts and reorganizing the seminary at Meersburg in its behalf. He also sent individual clergymen to Pestalozzi, that they might become more practically acquainted with the work of educating the young, and established teachers' seminaries within his own diocese. By such measures he not only contributed materially to the prosperity of his work, but also arrayed against himself the opposition of Rome, which was yet further intensified by his attempts to introduce the German language into the liturgy, and to place Ess's New Testament and Schmid's Biblische Geschichte in the schools as text-books. The nuncio in Luzerne, Testaferrate, succeeded in taking Switzerland from under the jurisdiction of Constance. In 1817 Wessenburg was unanimously chosen to succeed Dalberg as bishop of Constance, having previously been coadjutor to that prelate; but the election was set aside at Rome in the most unqualified manner, and when Wessenburg went to Rome to plead his own cause, he was not granted audience of the pope. The grand-duke Charles of Baden laid the matter before the German Diet, but without effect, and the next duke, Louis (1818), was not favorably disposed towards Wessenburg. On the erection of the archbishopric of Freiburg, the local clergy proposed Wessenburg as its head; but the government this time refused its assent as decidedly as the curia had done in the former instance. The king of Württemberg next desired him to fill the episcopal chair of Rottenburg, without being able to secure the assent of Rome. In 1819 a new career opened before Wessenburg through his election to the Chambers of Baden, in which he retained a seat during the next fourteen years, and in which he was a most zealous, eloquent, and influential representative of liberalism in its best and purest form. In 1833 he retired to private life, devoting his declining years to literary occupations and to the collection of works of art. His circle of friends was very wide, and his influence over them very strong. Queen Hortense, who resided near Constance, was among his friends, and it was her influence which induced Louis Napoleon in 1838 to voluntarily relieve Switzerland of the embarrassment occasioned by the demand of king Louis Philippe for his banishment by forsaking the country. He died Aug. 6, 1860. His leading ideas as a Churchman had occasioned the erection of a German National Catholic Church, and a revivification of Church councils. His principal work was written with an eye to the latter subject. It is entitled Die grossen Kirchenversamml. des 15. u. 16. Jahrhunderts (Constance, 1840, 4 vols.), and is considered of some value. His other works are of but little importance, because they lack an adequate basis in historical research. See Wessenburg's writings; Beck, Freiherr J. H. v. Wessenburg (Wagner, 1862); Baur, Kirchengesch. d. 19. Jahrhunderts, p. 147 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wessobrunn Prayer (Wessobrunner Gebet). Wessobrunn is a Bavarian village in which, according to documentary evidence, duke Thassilo established a monastery in 760; others say 740. Certain remnants of the studies of the monks there domiciled, upon geography, weights and measures, and also certain important glosses of the 8th century, have been preserved, and particularly this prayer, which exists in a codex now at Munich, and which antiquarians assign to the 8th century. The entire piece, as given in Wackernagel's Alteutsches Lesebuch, 3d ed. p. 61, reads:

Dat gefregin ih mit frabim frinuizû meistâ, dat ero ni uas noh afhinil, noh pain ni pereg ni uas, ni nohhelug, noh sunn ni sceln, noh mâno ni lîhta noh der mâreo sêo. Dô dâr niunil ni uas entes ni unntet enti dô uas der eino almahlico Cot, manno millisto; enti dâr unârûn sub ma- nnê mit iuan cootlîbbê geistâ.	This learned I among men As the greatest of wisdoms, That earth was not Neither the heaven above, Nor tree nor hill Was not, Neither was any [star], Nor the sun shone not, Nor the moon gave no light, Nor the high sea. When there was nothing Of ends and bounds And there was the one Almighty God, The mildest of men: And there were also with him Many godlike spirits.
Entl Cot hellac, Cot almah- lico, dû himil enti erda gauo- rahtê, enti dû mannûn sô manac coot, forgâp, forgip mir in dinô gnaâdâ rehia galaupa enti côtan unilleon, unistôm, enti spâ- hida, enti craft tluûn za unidar- stantanno enti arc za piunissanne enti dinau unilleon za gauurchanne.	And God holy, God Al- mighty, Who hast made heaven and earth, And who hast given to men so many a good: Give me true confidence in thy grace And good Will, wisdom, and judg- ment And hope to withstand devils And throw off the evil and thy Will to perform.

Rettberg argues (ii, 781) from the superscription to the first part of the piece (De Poeta) that it was taken from some other source by the author, who appended to it the second part containing his prayer for faith and strength. Part first seems to be designed for a hymn on the creation, which, however, is not carried beyond the stage of God's premundane existence. Part second is almost word for word the same as a prayer in St.

Emmerau's manuscript, with Latin translation, which was closed in 821. Grimm (Geschichte d. deutschen Sprache, p. 484 sq.) states that the dialect in which the entire piece is written is genuine old High-German.

Westminster, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Westmonasteriense). Westminster is a city of England, county of Middlesex, forming the west part of London, having on the south and west Chelsea and Kensington, on the north Marylebone, and on the east the Thames. In 1871 the population was 246,606. It contains numerous magnificent public buildings, and is the seat of many important historic events. Several ecclesiastic councils have been held there.

I. Was held about 1070, by archbishop Lanfranc, in the presence of William I, in which Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, who alone of the Saxon bishops had withstood William, was deprived, upon the plea of want of learning. When he found that he was to be stripped of his episcopal vestments, he boldly exclaimed to William, "These I owe to a better man than thee; to him will I restore them." Whereupon he went to the tomb of Edward the Confessor, who had advanced him to his see, and there taking off his vestments he laid them down, and struck his pastoral staff so deep into the stone that, as the legend states, no human force could draw it out. This miracle, or his deserved reputation for sanctity, produced a revision of the sentence of deprivation, and he retained his bishopric. See Johnson, Preface to Lanfranc's Canons at Winchester; Wilkins, Concil. i, 367; Wharton, Anglia Sacra, ii, 225.

II. Was held in 1102, "in St. Peter's Church, on the west side of London," i. e. at Westminster—Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and Gerard of York, being present, with eleven other bishops, and some abbots. In this synod, three great abbots were deposed for simony, three not yet consecrated were turned out of their abbeys, and three others deprived for other crimes. Roger the king's chancellor was consecrated to the see of Salisbury, and Roger the king's lord to Hereford. Twenty-nine canons were published.

1. Forbids bishops to keep secular courts of pleas, and to apparel themselves like laymen.
2. Forbids to let archdeacons to farm.
3. Enacts that archdeacons must be deacons.
4. Enacts that no archdeacon, priest, deacon, or canon shall marry, or retain his wife if married. Enacts the same with regard to subdeacons who have married after profession of chastity.
5. Declares that a priest guilty of fornication is not a lawful priest, and forbids him to celebrate mass.
6. Orders that no one be ordained subdeacon, or to any higher order, except he profess chastity.
7. Orders that the sons of priests be not heirs to their fathers' churches.
8. Orders that no clergyman be a judge in a case of blood.
9. Orders that priests go not to drinking-bouts, nor drink "to pegs."
10. Orders that their clothes be all of one color, and their shoes plain.
11. Orders monks or clerks who have forsaken their order to return, or be excommunicated.
12. Orders that the tonsure of clerks be visible.
13. Orders that tithes be paid to the Church only.
14. Forbids to buy churches or prebends.
15. Forbids to build new chapels without the bishop's consent.

16. Forbids to consecrate new churches until all things necessary for it, and the priest, have been provided.

17. Forbids abbots to create knights; orders them to eat and sleep in the same house with their monks.

18. Forbids monks to enjoy penance except in certain cases.

19. Forbids monks to be godfathers, or nuns godmothers.

20. Forbids monks to hire farms.

21. Forbids monks to accept of the impropriations of churches without the bishop's consent, and further forbids them to spoil and reduce to poverty those who minister in their parishes.

22. Declares promises of marriage made without witnesses to be null, if either party deny them.

23. Orders that those who have hair be clipped, so that their ears and eyes shall be visible.

24. Forbids those who are related within the seventh degree to marry.

25. Forbids to defraud the priest of his dues by carrying a corpse for burial to another parish.

26. Forbids to attribute reverence or sanctity to a dead body, or fountain, etc., without the bishop's authority.

27. Forbids to sell men like beasts, as had hitherto been done in England.

28. Anathematizes persons guilty of certain horrible sins of uncleanness.

29. Orders the publication of the above excommunication in all churches every Sunday.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, A.D. 1102; Wilkins, Conc. i, 382.

III. Was held Jan. 13, 1126. Otto, the pope's nuncio, was present, and read a bull of Honorius containing the same proposition which the legate had made to the French clergy assembled at Bourges in November, 1125, viz., that in every cathedral church the pope should nominate to two prebends and in every monastery to two places. The bishops separated without coming to any decision. See Mansi, Concil. xi, 303.

IV. Was held Sept. 9, 1126, by William Corbeil, archbishop of Canterbury—John de Cremona, legate from Honorius II, presiding. Thurstan, archbishop of York, and about twenty bishops, forty abbots, and an innumerable assembly of clergy and people, were present. Seventeen canons were published.

1. Forbids simony.
2. Forbids to charge anything for chrism, oil, baptism, visiting and anointing the sick, communion, and burial.
3. Forbids to demand cope, carpet, towel, or basin at the consecration of bishops, or churches, or blessing of abbots.
4. Forbids investiture at the hands of lay persons.
5. Forbids any one to challenge a church or benefice by inheritance, and to appoint a successor. Psa. lxxxiii, 13, is quoted.
6. Deprives beneficed clerks who refused to be ordained (priests or deacons) in order that they might live more at liberty.
7. Orders that none but priests be made deans or priors, nor any but deacons archdeacons.
8. Forbids to ordain any one a priest without a title.
9. Forbids, under pain of excommunication, to eject any one from a church to which he has been instituted without the bishop's sentence.
10. Forbids bishops to ordain or pass sentence upon any one belonging to the jurisdiction of another bishop.
11. Forbids, under pain of excommunication, to receive an excommunicated person to communion.
12. Forbids any one to hold two dignities in the Church.
13. Forbids priests, deacons, subdeacons, and canons to dwell in the same house with any woman, except a mother, sister, aunt, or unsuspected woman. Offenders to lose their order.
14. Forbids the practice of usury among clerks.
15. Excommunicates sorcerers, etc.
16. Forbids marriage within the seventh degree.
17. Declares that no regard is to be paid to husbands who implead their wives as too near akin to them.

See Wilkins, Conc. i, 406; Johnson, Eccles. Canons, A.D. 1126.

V. Was held in 1127, by William Corbeil, archbishop of Canterbury, the pope's legate; ten English bishops attended, and three Welsh. It is also said that the multitude of clergy and laity of all ranks who flocked to the council was immense, but no mention is made of abbots. The archbishop of York sent excuses, and the bishops of Durham and Worcester were also absent; the sees of London and Coventry were at that time vacant. This synod sat three several days, and ten canons were published.

1. Forbids, "by authority of Peter, prince of the apostles," ties," and that of the archbishop and bishops assembled, the buying and selling of churches and benefices.

2. Forbids any one to be ordained or preferred by means of money.

3. Forbids all demands of money for admitting monks, canons, or nuns.

4. Orders that priests only shall be made deans, and deacons archdeacons.

5. Forbids priests, deacons, subdeacons, and canons to live with women not allowed by law. Those that adhered to their concubines or wives to be deprived of their order, dignity, and benefice; if parish priests, to be cast out of the choir and declared infamous.

6. Requires archdeacons and others whom it concerned to use all their endeavors to root out this plague from the Church.

7. Orders the expulsion from the parish of the concubines of priests and canons, unless they are lawfully married there. If they be afterwards found faulty, directs that they shall be brought under ecclesiastical discipline, or servitude, at the discretion of the bishop.

8. Forbids, under anathema, any one to hold several archdeaconries in several bishoprics, and directs him to keep to that he first took: forbids priests, abbots, and monks to take anything to farm.

9. Orders the payment of tithes in full. Forbids churches or tithes or benefices to be given or taken without the consent of the bishop.

10. That no abbess or nun use more costly apparel than such as is made of lambs' or cats' skins.

Matthew of Paris declares that the king (Henry I) eluded all these provisions (to which he had given his consent) by obtaining from the archbishop a promise that he should be intrusted with their execution; whereas, in reality, he executed them only by taking money from the priests as a ransom for their concubines. See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, A.D. 1127; Wilkins, Conc. i, 410.

VI. Was held in 1138 by Alberic, bishop of Ostia, legate of pope Innocent II, during the vacancy of the see of Canterbury; eighteen bishops and about thirty abbots attended, who proceeded to the election of Theobald to the see of Canterbury. Seventeen canons were published.

1. Forbids to demand any price for chrism, oil, baptism, penance, visitation of the sick, espousals, unction, communion, or burial, under pain of excommunication.

2. Orders that the body of Christ be not reserved above eight days, and that it be ordinarily carried to the sick by a priest or deacon only; in case of extreme necessity by any one, but with the greatest reverence.

3. Forbids to demand a cope, ecclesiastical vestment, or anything else, upon the consecration of bishops and benediction of abbots; also forbids to require a carpet, towel, basin, or anything beyond the canonical procuration, upon the dedication of a church.

4. Forbids to demand any extra fees when a bishop not belonging to the diocese consecrates a church.

5. Forbids lay investitures; orders every one, upon investiture by the bishop, to swear on the gospels that he has not, directly or indirectly, given or promised anything for it, else the donation to be null.

6. Is identical with canon 5, A.D. 1126.

7. Forbids persons ordained by other than their own bishop without letters from him to exercise their office; reserves the restoration of them to their order to the pope, unless they take a religious habit.

8. Deprives concubinary clerks, and forbids any to hear their mass.

9. Deprives usurious clergymen.

10. Anathematizes him that kills, imprisons, or lays hands on a clerk, monk, nun, or other ecclesiastical person. Forbids any but the pope to grant him penance at the last, except in extreme danger of death; denies him burial if he die impenitent.

11. Excommunicates all persons violently taking away the goods of the Church.

12. Forbids any one to build a church or oratory upon his estate without the bishop's license.

13. Forbids the clergy to carry arms and fight in the wars.

14. Forbids monks after receiving orders to recede from their former way of living.

15. Forbids nuns, under anathema, to use parti-colored skins or golden rings, and to wreath their hair.

16. Commands, under anathema, all persons to pay the tithe of all their fruits.

17. Forbids schoolmasters to hire out their schools to be governed by others.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, A.D. 1138; Wilkins, Conc. i, 418.

VII. Was held in 1176 by cardinal Hugo or Huguen, who had been sent from Rome to endeavor to settle the dispute between the archbishops of Canterbury and York; the latter of whom claimed the right of having his cross borne before him in the province of Canterbury. Many prelates and clergy attended; but when Roger of York, upon entering the assembly, perceived that the seat on the right hand of the legate had been assigned to the archbishop of Canterbury, and that on the left kept for himself, he thrust himself into the lap of the archbishop of Canterbury; whereupon the servants of the latter and many of the bishops (as Hovenden writes) threw themselves upon the archbishop of York, and forced him down upon the ground, trampled upon him, and rent his cope; upon which the council broke up in confusion. Johnson, ut sup.; Wilkins, Conc. i, 485.

VIII. Was a national council held in 1200 by Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, in which fifteen canons were published.

1. Orders the priest to say the canon of the mass distinctly, and to rehearse the hours and all the offices plainly, and without clipping the words. Offenders to be suspended.

2. Forbids to celebrate two masses in one day except in case of necessity. When it is done, it directs that nothing be poured into the chalice after the first celebration, but that the least drop be diligently sucked out of the chalice, and the fingers sucked and washed; the washings to be drunk by the priest after the second celebration, except a deacon be present to do so at the time. Orders that the eucharist be kept in a decent pyx, and carried to the sick with cross and candle; care to be taken not to confuse the consecrated and unconsecrated hosts.

3. Orders that baptism and confirmation shall be conferred upon those concerning whom there exists a doubt whether or not they have received them. Forbids fathers, mothers-in-law, and parents to hold the child at the font. Forbids deacons to baptize and give penance, except in case of the priest's absence, or other necessity. Permits even a father or mother to baptize their child in case of necessity, and orders that all that follows after the immersion shall be completed subsequently by the priest.

4. Relates to the administration of penance.

5. Renews the decrees of the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1179, which restrict the expenses and retinue of prelates and other ordinaries when in visitation, and declares the design of visitations to be to see to what concerns the cure of souls, and that every church have a silver chalice, decent vestments, and necessary books, utensils, etc.

6. Orders that bishops ordaining any one without a title shall maintain him till he can make a clerical provision for him.

7. Renews the canon of Lateran, A.D. 1179, which forbids prelates to excommunicate their subjects without canonical warning. Orders the yearly pronouncement of a general excommunication against persons guilty of various specific crimes.

8. Renews canon 7, Lateran, A.D. 1179.

9. Orders the payment of tithes without abatement for wages, etc.; grants to priests the power of excommunicating, before harvest, all withholders of tithes. Orders the tithe of land newly cultivated to be paid to the parish church. Orders detainers of tithes to be anathematized.

10. Forbids to institute any persons to churches not worth more than three marks per annum who will not serve in person. Renews the 11th canon of Lateran, A.D. 1179. Forbids clerks to go to taverns and drinking-booths, and so put themselves in the way of being insulted by laymen. Orders all the clergy to use the canonical tonsure and clerical habit, and archdeacons and dignified clergymen copes with sleeves.

11. Forbids marriage under various circumstances; orders that the bans be thrice published; that marriage be celebrated openly in the face of the Church.

12. Orders those who, being suspected of crimes, deny them, to undergo a purgation.

13. Renews the 56d canon of Lateran, 1179, concerning churches and priests for lepers.

14. Renews canon 9 of Lateran, which forbids the Templars and other fraternities to accept of tithes, churches, etc., without the bishop's consent.

15. Renews canon 10 of Lateran, 1179, and contains various regulations relating to the dress, etc., of the religious.

See Wilkins, Conc. i, 505; Johnson, Eccles. Canons, ad ann.

IX. Was held about 1229 by Richard Wethershed, archbishop of Canterbury. Twelve constitutions were published, eleven of which are the same with those published in the Council of London, A.D. 1175. The last refers to the duties of physicians. See Johnson, Eccles. Canons.

X. Was held in 1229 under master Stephen, chaplain and nuncio of the pope, who, sorely to the discomfort of the assembly, demanded on the part of Rome the tenths of all movables belonging to clergy and laity in England, Ireland, and Wales, in order to enable the Roman pontiff to carry on war against the excommunicated emperor Frederick. The arguments by which, assuming Rome as the head of all churches, it was asserted that her fall would involve the ruin of the members, was met on the part of the laity by a plain refusal; and the clergy, after three or four days' deliberation and no small murmuring, were at length brought to consent from fear of excommunication or an interdiction being the consequence of disobedience to the demand. See Wilkins, Conc. i, 622.

Whalley, THOMAS SKIDWICK, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1745. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, graduating B.A. in 1767, and M.A. in 1774; was presented to the rectory of Hagworthingham, Lincolnshire, in 1772, and died at La Fleche, Nov. 30, 1828. He published his Edwy and Edilda, a tale (1778, 8vo):—The Fatal Kiss, a poem, written in the last stage of an atrophy, by a beautiful young lady (1781, 4to):—Verses addressed to Mrs. Siddons (1782, 4to):—Mount Blanc, a poem (1788, 4to):—The Castle of Montval, a tragedy (1781, 8vo):—Poems and Translations (8vo):—Kennet and Finella, a legendary tale (1809, 8vo). See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1828, p. 267.

Whedon, DANIEL DENISON, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Methodist Episcopal divine, was born at Onondaga, N. Y., March 20, 1808. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1828; studied law in Rochester for a year, and then became teacher in Cazenovia Seminary; in 1831 tutor in his alma mater; in 1833 professor of languages in Wesleyan University, Conn.; in 1834 joined the New York Conference; in 1842 was transferred to the Troy Conference, and stationed in 1843 at Pittsfield, Mass.; in 1845 became professor of rhetoric in the University of Michigan; in 1855 pastor at Jamaica, L. I.; in 1856 editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, a position which he retained until 1884. He died at Atlantic Highlands, N. J., June 8, 1885. Dr. Whedon was noted for his incisive, vigorous style, both as preacher and writer, and was remarkably powerful in controversy. He wrote very largely for the denominational press, and prominent among his works are a Treatise on the Will (New York, 1864), and a Commentary on the New Test. (1860-80, 5 vols. 12mo). See Alumni Record of Wesleyan University, 1882, p. xxix, 656.

Wheel. The vision of the wheels demands some remark (Ezek. i, 15, 16, 19-21):—"Now as I beheld the living creatures, behold one wheel upon the earth by the living creatures, with his four faces. The appearance of the wheels and their work was like unto the color of a beryl: and they four had one likeness: and their appearance and their work was as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel. And when the living creatures went, the wheels went by them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up. Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go; and the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. When those went, these went; and when those stood, these stood; and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels." This vision of Ezekiel has always been regarded both by Jews and Christians as very abstruse and difficult of interpretation, so much so, indeed, that the former anciently forbade it to be read by persons under thirty years of age. Bush observes, "From all that we can gather of the form of these wheels, they appear to have been spherical, or each composed of two of equal size, and inserted the rim of the one into that of the other at right angles, and so consisting of four equal parts or half-circles. They were accordingly adapted to run either forward or backward, to the right hand or to the left, without any lateral turning, and by this means their motion corresponded with that of the four faces of the living creatures to which they were attached. 'When they went upon their four sides, they turned not as they went,' Heb. 'When they went, they went upon the quarter-part of their fourfoldness,' i. e. upon or in the direction of one of the four vertical semicircles into which they were divided, and which looked towards the four points of the compass. When it is said 'they turned not,' it is not to be understood that they had not a revolving or rotary motion, but that they, like the faces, never forsook a straightforward course." A similar cruciform position of the wheels is adopted by most commentators. Of verses 19 and 20 the same author observes, "These circumstances are doubtless dwelt upon with peculiar emphasis in order to show the intimacy of relation and harmony of action subsisting between the living creatures and the wheels, or, more properly, between the things symbolically represented by them." Layard observes that the "wheel within wheel" mentioned in connection with the emblematical figures may refer to the winged circle or wheel representing at Nimrod the supreme deity (Nineveh, iii, 352). See CHERUBIM.

Ancient Assyrian Emblems of Deity.

Wheel of Bells, an instrument consisting of a broad wooden wheel to which from eight to twelve silver bells are affixed, rung by a rope at the elevation of the host in certain foreign churches, remarkable examples of which exist at Manresa and Gerona, Spain. The specimen at the former town, placed against the wall of the choir-aisle, is contained in an ornamental eight-sided wooden case with Gothic sound-holes; that at the latter, hung against the north wall, is all of wood, its frame being corbelled out from the wall.

Wheelock, ALONZO, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in 1801, in Vermont. Although the circumstances of his early life were of a somewhat depressing character, he secured for himself a good classical education, and had almost completed his studies preparatory to entering upon the practice of medicine, when he became a hopeful Christian. He now decided to fit himself for the ministry. He was a graduate of what is now the Theological Seminary of Madison (N. Y.) University, in the class of 1829. He had an honorable and successful ministry. His life as a minister was spent mostly with churches in the State of New York. For several years he had charge of a Church in the city of New York. He was recognised as an able scholar and an attractive preacher, and made hosts of friends wherever he lived. For two or three years before his death he was obliged to retire from the active duties of the ministry. His death occurred at Fredonia, in March, 1873. (J. C. S.)

Whipping was a punishment employed in the anclent Church for the discipline of junior monks and inferior clergy for insubordination. It was also applied to others in certain cases. Bingham (Christ. Antiq. bk. vii, ch. iii) quotes from Palladius as follows: "In the Church of Mount Nitria, there were three whips hanged upon three palm-trees—one for the offending monks, another for the correcting of thieves, and a third for the correcting of strangers, whom they entertained in a hospital adjoining." Again, in Bingham's Antiquities (bk. xvi, ch. iii), we find these statements: "Cyprian, in the Life of Casarius Avelatensis, says that bishop observed this method both with slaves and freemen; and that when they were to be scourged for their faults, they should suffer forty stripes save one, according as the law appointed. The Council of Agde orders the same punishment, not only for junior monks, but also for the inferior clergy. And the Council of Mascon particularly insists upon the number of forty stripes save one. . . . The Council of Epone speaks of stripes as the peculiar punishment of the minor clergy for the same crimes that were punished with excommunication for a whole year in the superior clergy." See SCOURGE.

Whirlwind (חֲרָפָה, suphâh, Job xxxvii, 9; Prov. i, 27; x, 25; Isa. v, 28; xvii, 13; xxi, 1; lxvi, 15; Jer. iv, 13; Hos. viii, 7; Amos i, 14; Neh. i, 8; elsewhere "storm," etc., denoting the sweeping force of the wind or hurricane; also חֲרָפָה, sdar Jer. xxiii, 19; xxv, 32; xxx, 23; elsewhere "tempest," or [fem.] חֲרָפָה, 2 Kings ii, 1, 11; Job xxxviii, 1, 6; Isa. xl, 24; xli, 16; Jer. xxiii, 19; xxx, 23; Ezek. i, 4; Zech. ix, 14; elsewhere "storm," etc., which denote rather the violent rain or tempest, although accompanied with wind, Psa. cvii, 25; Ezek. xiii, 11, 13). "The two Hebrew terms above noted convey the notion of a violent wind, but with a different radical import—the former, because such a wind sweeps away every object it encounters; the latter, because the objects so swept away are tossed about and destroyed. In addition to this, Gesenius gives a similar sense to galyâl, in Psa. lxxvii, 18 (A.V. 'heaven') and Ezek. x, 18 (A.V. 'wheel'). Generally, however, this last term expresses one of the effects of such a storm in rolling along chaff, stubble, or such light articles (Thesaur. p. 288). It does not appear that any of the above terms express the specific notion of a whirlwind, i. e. a gale moving violently round on its own axis, and there is no warrant for the use of the word in the A.V. of 2 Kings ii, 11. The most violent winds in Palestine come from the east; and the passage in Job xxxvii, 9, which in the A.V. reads 'Out of the south cometh the whirlwind,' should rather be rendered 'Out of his chamber,' etc. The whirlwind is frequently used as a metaphor for violent and sweeping destruction. Cyrus's invasion of Babylonia is compared to a southerly gale coming out of the wilderness of Arabia (Isa. xxi, 1; comp. Knobel, ad loc.), the effects of which are most prejudicial in that country. Similar allusions occur in Psa. lviii, 9; Prov. i, 27; x, 25; Isa. xl, 24; Dan. xi, 40" (Smith). In a large proportion of the passages the terms in question are employed in a figurative sense with reference to the resistless and sweeping destruction that is sure to overtake the wicked. But this of course implies that tempests of such a character were phenomena not unknown in some parts of Palestine. We have only to look into the accounts of travellers to see how much this is the case, especially in the South Country and the regions bordering on the Dead Sea. Prof. Robinson and party were exposed to a violent sirocco in the desert, in their route from Akabah to Jerusalem, which continued until towards evening.

"The wind had been all the morning N.E., but at eleven o'clock it suddenly changed to the south, and came upon us with violence and intense heat, until it blew a perfect tempest. The atmosphere was filled with fine particles of sand, forming a bluish haze; the sun was scarcely visible, his disk exhibiting only a dun and sickly hue; and the glow of the wind came upon our faces as from a burning oven. Often we could not see ten rods around us, and our eyes, ears, mouths, and clothes were filled with sand. The thermometer at twelve o'clock stood at 85° Fahr., and had apparently been higher; and at two o'clock it had fallen to 76°, although the wind still continued. Our Arabs called it shurkiyah, i. e. an east wind, although it blew from the south. The simoon, i. e. burning or poisonous wind, they said, differs from it only in its greater heat—the haze, and sand, and discoloration of the air being alike in both. Should it overtake a traveller without water, it may, in certain circumstances, prove fatal to him. He needs water, not only to drink, but it is well to wash the skin. The simoon, they said, prevails only during the season when the khamsin blows in Egypt."

Farther on he states, "The tempest had become a tornado. It was with the utmost difficulty that we could pitch our tent, or keep it upright after it was pitched. For a time the prospect was dreadful, and the storm in itself was probably as terrific as most of those which have given rise to the exaggerated accounts of travellers" (Researches, i, 287, 289). A similar tempest of hot wind, "the glow of the air being like the mouth of a furnace," and fully charged with dust and sand, overtook him in the Arabah, not very far from the Dead Sea, about the end of May (ibid. ii, 504). Lieut. Lynch describes, under April 26, a tempest which assailed him on the Dead Sea. It was with difficulty the boat was rowed ashore. He and his companions were nearly stifled with the wind. They sought relief in a ravine, where they found pools sufficient to bathe in; but the relief was only momentary. The wind increased to a tempest; the sun became red and rayless; the thermometer rose to 104°; and when "some endeavored to make a screen of one of the boat's awnings, the fierce wind swept it over in an instant. It was more like a blast of a furnace than living air" (Expedition, p. 314). Kitto remarks (Pict. Bible, note on Isa. xxxvii, 36):

"As we have ourselves only felt the mitigated effects of this wind on the skirts of deserts and in the shelter of towns, we cannot from experience speak of the more disastrous effects which it exhibits in the open deserts; but, judging from what we observed under the circumstances indicated, and from such information as we have collected, we have no doubt that the numerous accomplished travellers of the last century and the one before, as Chardin, Shaw, Niebuhr, Volney, Bruce, Ives, and others, are correct in their united testimony, supported as it is by the consenting evidence of natives accustomed to traverse the deserts. It is necessary to mention this, because some more recent travellers, who, on account of the season or direction of their journeys, had no occasion to experience any other than the milder effects of this wind, have seemed to doubt the destructive power which has been attributed to it."

The most complete account of the simoon and its effects is that given by Volney (Travels, i, 4). That part which describes its effects in the towns tourists can confirm from their own experience, and the rest is amply corroborated by the testimony of other travellers.

"Travellers have mentioned these winds under the name of poisonous winds, or, more correctly, hot winds of the desert. Such, in fact, is their quality; and their heat is sometimes so excessive that it is difficult to form an idea of their violence without having experienced it: but it may be compared to the heat of a large oven at the moment of drawing out the bread. When these winds begin to blow, the atmosphere assumes an alarming aspect. The sky, at other times so clear in this climate, becomes dark and heavy, and the sun loses its splendor and appears of a violet color. The air is not cloudy, but gray and thick, and is, in fact, filled with an extremely subtle dust that penetrates everywhere. This wind, always light and rapid, is not at first remarkably hot, but increases in heat in proportion as it continues. All animated bodies soon discover it by the change it produces in them. The lungs, which a too rarefied air no longer expands, are contracted and become painful. Respiration is short and difficult, the skin parched and dry, and the body consumed by an internal heat. In vain is recourse had to large draughts of water; nothing can restore perspiration. In vain is coolness sought for; all bodies in which it is usual to find it deceive the hand that touches them. Marble, iron, water—notwithstanding the sun no longer appears—are hot. The streets are deserted, and the dead silence of night reigns everywhere. The inhabitants of towns and villages shut themselves up in their houses—and those of the desert in their tents, or in pits they dig in the earth—where they wait the termination of the destructive heat. It usually lasts three days; but if it exceeds that time, it becomes insupportable. Woe to the traveller whom this wind surprises remote from shelter! he must suffer all its dreadful consequences, which sometimes are mortal. The danger is most imminent when it blows in squalls, for then the rapidity of the wind increases the heat to such a degree as to cause sudden death. This death is a real suffocation; the lungs, being empty, are convulsed, the circulation disordered, and the whole mass of blood driven by the heat towards the head and breast; whence that hemorrhage at the nose and mouth which happens after death. This wind is especially fatal to persons of a plethoric habit, and those in whom fatigue has destroyed the tone of the muscles and vessels. The corpse remains a long time warm, swells, turns blue, and is easily separated; all of which are signs of that putrid fermentation which takes place when the humors become stagnant. These accidents are to be avoided by stopping the nose and mouth with handkerchiefs. An efficacious method is also that practiced by the camels, who bury their noses in the sand, and keep them there till the squall is over. Another quality of this wind is its extreme aridity, which is such that water sprinkled upon the floor evaporates in a few minutes. By this extreme dryness it withers and stripes all the plants; and, by inhaling too suddenly the emanations from animal bodies, cramps the skin, closes the pores, and causes that feverish heat which is the invariable effect of suppressed perspiration."

The ninth plague with which the Lord afflicted the Egyptians was a thick darkness, which is generally identified with the tempest called khamsin, prevalent in Egypt in the months of April and May (Exod. x, 21-23). When the khamsin blows, the sun is pale yellow, its light is obscured, and the darkness is sometimes so great that one seems to be in the blackest night, even in the middle of the day. Sonini says, "The atmosphere was heated, and at the same time obscured by clouds of dust. Men and animals breathed only vapor, and that was mingled with a fine and hot sand. Plants drooped, and all living nature languished. The air was dark on account of a thick mist of fine dust as red as flame." Hartmann says, "The inhabitants of the cities and villages shut themselves up in the lowest apartments of their houses and cellars; but the inhabitants of the desert go into their tents, or into the holes which they have dug in the ground. There they await, full of anxiety, the termination of this kind of tempest, which generally lasts three days." The hot wind of the desert, called by the Italians sirocco, and by the Arabs shurkiyeh, i. e. an east wind, resembles the khamsin of Egypt. The sand-storms occur in the most awful form in deserts, when the fine sand is thrown into billows, and these are swept by furious winds, the sand of which they are formed being tossed on high, and whirled rapidly and densely through the air, until the storm has finally subsided. Under this most awful visitation of the sand-storm, it sometimes happens that travellers and their cattle are overwhelmed and suffocated. And even the more common and less dangerous forms of this phenomenon, which occur in regions less absolutely sandy, or where the sands are less extensive than in the great sandy deserts of Asia, are still very formidable and alarming. Mr. Buckingham has given a description of such a storm, of that kind which must have been familiar to the Israelites during their wanderings. It occurred in the desert of Suez, that is, on the western verge of that sandy desert which occupies a considerable portion of the country between Egypt and Palestine.

"The morning was delightful on our setting out, and promised us a fine day; but the light airs from the south soon increased to a gale, the sun became obscure, and as every hour brought us into a looser sand, it flew about us in such whirlwinds, with the sudden gusts that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted, therefore, for an hour, and took shelter under the lee of our beasts, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered in their wallings but a melancholy symphony. . . . Fifty gales of wind at sea appeared to me more easy to be encountered than one among these sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete. We could see neither sun, earth, nor sky: the plain at ten paces' distance was absolutely imperceptible. Our beasts, as well as ourselves, were so covered as to render breathing difficult; they hid their faces in the ground, and we could only uncover our own for a moment to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait patiently for its abatement."

Dr. Thomson states (Land and Book, ii, 811): "We have two kinds of sirocco—one accompanied by vehement wind, which fills the air with dust and fine sand. I have often seen the whole heavens veiled in gloom with this sort of sand-cloud, through which the sun, shorn of his beams, looked like a globe of dull, smouldering fire." See WIND.

Whirlwind in the Desert.

Whitby (or Strenechal), COUNCIL OF (Concilium Pharene). Whitby is a seaport town of England, County of York, North Riding, on the Esk, near its mouth in the North Sea. An ecclesiastical council was held there in 664. This was properly a conference between the English and Scotch bishops on the subject of the celebration of Easter. There were present on the English side Agilbert, a Frenchman, bishop of Dorchester, with his presbyter, Agatho; Wilfred, a young Northumbrian priest, who had studied at Rome; Romanus, who had before contended the point with Finan, late bishop of Lindisfarne; and an old deacon, James, whom Paulinus had left thirty years before. On the Scotch side were Colman, bishop of Lindisfarne; and Cedda, a bishop who acted as interpreter. Oswy, king of Northumbria, was also present, who opened the proceedings, and desired Colman to explain the nature and origin of the rites which his Church had so long practiced. The Scots alleged the example of St. John, Wilfred that of St. Peter, and the latter concluded his address in the following terms: "But for you (Colman) and your adherents, if, after having heard the decrees of the apostolic see, yea, of the whole Church, and these, too, confirmed by Scripture, you refuse to obey them, you certainly are guilty of sin. For, allowing your fathers to have been holy men, is their small handful in a corner of a remote island to be compared to the Church of Christ over the whole earth? And great as that Columba of yours may have been, is he to be preferred to the blessed prince of the apostles, to whom the Lord said, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and to thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven?' " This fortunate quotation from Holy Scripture determined the king in favor of the Roman custom; he, as he said, fearing to contradict one who held the keys of heaven, and might peradventure refuse to open to him when he knocked. In this council, moreover, the affair of the tonsure was discussed, the Roman fashion differing from that in use among the Scotch, which the former pretended had been derived from Simon Magus. See Mansi, Concil. vi, 491; Wilkins, Concil. i, 37.

White (prop. לָבָן, λευκός). In Canaan persons of distinction were anciently dressed in fine linen of Egypt, and, according to some authors, in silk and rich cloth shaded with the choicest colors. The beauty of these clothes consisted in the fineness and color of the stuffs; and it seems the color most in use among the Israelites, as well as among the Greeks and Romans, was white, not improved by the dyer's art, but the native color of the wool, being most suited to the nature of their laws, which enjoined so many washings and purifications. (Indeed, so early as the days of Hesiod the Greeks considered white as the color in which the celestials appeared: men went to heaven in white clothing [Opera et Dies, i, 198].) The general use of this color seems to be recognised by Solomon in his direction, "Let thy garments be always white" (Eccles. ix, 8). But garments in the native color of wool were not confined to the lower orders; they were also in great esteem among persons of superior station, and are particularly valued in Scripture as the emblem of knowledge and purity, gladness and victory, grace and glory. The priests of Baal were habited in black, a color which appears to have been peculiar to themselves, and which few others in those countries except mourners would choose to wear. In all countries and all ages white has been regarded as the emblem of purity. See WHITSUNDAY. Isaiah says, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool" (i, 15). See the monographs cited by Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 124. See COLOR.

WHITE OF AN EGG is the rendering adopted in the A. V. at Job vi, 6 for the Heb. רִיר חֲלָמֻת, rîr chalâmûth (Sept. iv ῥήμασι λευκός [v. r. καυτός], Vulg.

quod gustatum offert mortem). Most interpreters derive the Hebrew word from חֲלָמ, chalâm, to dream, and, guided by the context, explain it to denote somnolency, futility (comp. Eccles. v, 2, 9), and so insipidity (comp. μυρρός in Dioscorides, spoken of tasteless roots). The Syriac renders it by chalama, which signifies portulacca or purslain, an herb formerly eaten as a salad, but proverbial for its insipidity ("portulacca stultior," in Meidan. Proverb. No. 344, p. 219, ed. Schultens). The phrase will thus mean purslain-broth, i. e. silly discourse. See MALLOW. The rabbins, following the Targums, regard it as i. q. Chald. חֲלָמֻת, the coagulum of an egg or curd; and so explain the phrase, as the A. V., to mean the alime or white of an egg, put as an emblem of insipidity. This in itself is not ill; but the other seems more consonant with Oriental usage. See Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 480.

White (or Whyte), John (1), D.D., an English prelate, was born at Farnham, in Surrey, in 1511. He was educated at Winchester School and at New College, Oxford, of which he became perpetual fellow in 1527; soon after made warden of Winchester College; became rector of Cheynton in 1551; was imprisoned in the Tower for some months during the preceding year for his supposed correspondence with persons abroad who were opposed to Edward VI; was made bishop of Lincoln by queen Mary in 1554; translated to the see of Winchester in 1557; deprived, on the accession of queen Elizabeth, on account of his opposition to Protestantism; and imprisoned for a short time in the Tower in 1559 for his public attacks upon the queen. He died at South Warrimburgh, Jan. 11, 1560, and was buried in Winchester Cathedral. He was the author of certain Latin poems, and some of his sermons and orations have been published.

White, John (2), D.D., an English clergyman of the latter part of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century, was vicar of Eccles, and subsequently chaplain in ordinary to James I. He died in 1615. He published The Way to the True Church, and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

White, John (3), a Puritan divine, known as the Patriarch of Dorchester, was born at Stanton, St. John, Oxfordshire, England, in December, 1574. He was educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford, of which he became perpetual fellow in 1595; here he graduated, took holy orders, and became a frequent preacher at Oxford; became rector of Trinity Church, Dorchester, in 1606; was one of the projectors of the colony of Massachusetts in 1624; had his house plundered and his library carried away by the soldiers of Prince Rupert; escaped to London, and was made minister of the Savoy; was appointed one of the learned divines to assist in a committee of religion selected by the House of Lords in 1640; became a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1643; was chosen rector of Lambeth in 1645; and afterwards returned to Dorchester, where he died, July 21, 1648. He published, The Planter's Plea; or, The Grounds of Plantations Examined, and the Usual Objections Answered (1630);—A Way to the Tree of Life Discovered, etc. (1647);—Commentary on the First Three Chapters of Genesis (1656).

White, Nicholas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Middletown, Vt., June 8, 1786. He received a careful religious training; experienced religion in 1810; joined the New York Conference in 1813; and from that date to 1854, when he superannuated, he led an active, successful itinerant life. In 1854 he retired to Brooklyn, where he resided until his death, Feb. 14, 1861. Mr. White was earnest and fervent as a speaker, greatly beloved as a pastor, devoted and affectionate as a husband and father. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 76.

White (Whyte, or Vitus), Richard, an English historian, antiquary, and afterwards Catholic priest, was born at Basingstoke, Hampshire. He was educated at Winchester School; admitted fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1557; lost his fellowship on account of his attachment to Romanism in 1564; became regius professor of civil and canon law at Douay, in which relation he remained nearly twenty years; was appointed by that university the chancellor, or rector magnificus; was created count palatine by the emperor; after the loss of his second wife, was ordained priest and made a canon of St. Peter's Church in Douay. He died in 1612, and was buried in St. James's Church. Among his publications were, Ælia Lælia Crispis; Epitaphium Antiquum quod in Agro Bononiensi adhuc Videtur, etc. (1618);—Orationes Quinque (1596);—Nota ad Leges Decemvirorum in Duodecim Tabulis (1597);—and Historia Britannica Insula ab Origine Mundi ad Annum Domini Octingentesimum (1602).

White Brethren, a body of enthusiasts who appeared in Italy about the beginning of the 15th century, and were so called from being all clad in white linen robes reaching to their feet, with hoods of the same material that left only their eyes exposed. They were first collected together by a priest, whose name is unknown, among the villages on the southern side of the Alps. He led them down, a large multitude, into the Italian plains under the pretence that he was the prophet Elias. Bearing a cross at their head, he bade them follow him in a crusade against the Turks for the purpose of regaining the Holy Land; and so great was his influence that not only the peasantry, but some priests and even cardinals, are said to have enrolled themselves among his army of "penitents." They advanced in troops of ten, twenty, and forty thousand, marching from city to city, singing hymns and uttering loud prayers; and wherever they went multitudes were ready to give them alms and join in their pilgrimage. They were met at Viterbo by a body of papal troops, which had been ordered to march against them by Boniface IX under the impression that their leader intended to dethrone him and seize upon the papal dominions. The pilgrims were dispersed by the troops, and their leader taken captive to Rome and burned as a heretic, about the year 1408. Their history is very similar in many respects to that of the Apostolics, led by Segarelli and Dolcino a century earlier; hence some have supposed that both uprisings were by the same sect. See APOSTOLICI.

Whitefield, James, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Liverpool, England, Nov. 8, 1770. Having received a good education, he engaged for some time in mercantile pursuits, but abandoned this work for the study of divinity, which he prosecuted under Dr. Ambrose Maréchal. He was ordained a priest in 1809, settled in Baltimore, Md., in 1817 as minister of St. Peter's Church, and succeeded Dr. Maréchal as archbishop of Baltimore May 25, 1828. He died at Baltimore, Oct. 19, 1884.

Whitefield, J. G., D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Virginia, Sept. 10, 1810. He was converted when seventeen years of age; in August, 1829, was licensed to preach, and in the following September went to his first appointment. For nearly fifty years he was a faithful minister of the Gospel. He was elected to the General Conferences of 1842, '46, '50, '54, '58, '62, '66, and also of 1870, of which he was president. He was a member of the conventions of 1867 and 1877, when the dissevered Church was reunited. In 1874 he became a member of the North Carolina Conference, and represented that body in the union convention held in Baltimore in May, 1877. He died Aug. 28, 1879. See Founders of the M. P. Church, p. 378.

White Garments were worn by the clergy as early as the 4th century, and the use has been continued to the present time in the ritualistic churches. White garments were also worn by persons newly baptized. In the Latin Church this vesture came immediately before confirmation, but in the Greek Church immediately after. This ceremony was to represent the having put off the old man with his deeds, and having put on the new man Christ Jesus. Those who wore the garments were called, in the Greek, λευχιμοῦντες, and in the Latin, græz Christi candidus et niteus (the white flock of Christ). The garments were delivered to them with the following solemn charge: "Receive the white and immaculate garment, which thou mayest bring forth without spot before the tribunal of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thou mayest have eternal life. Amen." These garments were commonly worn eight days, and then laid up in the church. The Sunday after Easter is mentioned as the day appointed for this purpose. That was the conclusion of the Paschal festival, and then the neophytes changed their habit; whence that day is thought to have the name of Dominica in Albis; and Whitsunday (q. v.) is said to be so called from this custom of wearing white robes after baptism. These being laid aside, were carefully preserved in the vestries of the church as an evidence against men if they afterwards violated the baptismal covenant. See Bingham, Christ. Antig. bk. xiii, ch. viii; bk. xii, ch. iv; and bk. xx, ch. vi.

Whitehead, David, an eminent English divine of the 16th century, was born at Tuderley, in Hampshire. He was educated at Oxford; became chaplain to Anne Boleyn; retired to Frankfort, in Germany, during the reign of queen Mary, and there became pastor to the English congregation; returned to England on the accession of queen Elizabeth, and was one of the committee appointed to review king Edward's liturgy; was selected as one of the public disputants against the popish bishops in 1559; and declined the archbishopric of Canterbury and the mastership of the Savoy. He died in 1571. The only published works left by him are Lectures and Homilies on St. Paul's Epistles, and several of his discourses in Brief Discourse of the Troubles Begun at Frankfort (1575). Wood speaks of him as "a great light of learning and a most heavenly professor of divinity." See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Whitehead, George, an eminent public preacher of the Quakers, was born at Sunbigg, in the parish of Orton, Westmoreland, England, about 1686. He was educated at the free school of Blencoe, in Cumberland; taught school for a time; began to travel as a Quaker preacher before he was eighteen years old; was several times imprisoned, and sometimes whipped for his preaching; appeared at the bar of the House of Commons in defence of his sect; was very active in behalf of Dissenters, and exercised considerable influence with Charles II. He died in March, 1722. Among his numerous publications the following may be mentioned: Nature of Christianity in the True Light Asserted (1671);—The Christian Quaker, etc. (1824, 2 pts.), in which he was assisted by William Penn;—Enthusiasm above Atheism (1674);—The Way of Life and Perfection Lively Demonstrated (1676);—An Antidote against the Venom of a Snake in the Grass (1697);—Christian Progress of George Whitehead, in Four Parts, with a Supplement, being Memoirs of his Life (1726). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Catalogue of Friends' Books, ii, 884–908.

Whitehead, John, M.D., a biographer of Wesley, was born in 1740. He studied medicine, and became physician to the old Bethlehem Hospital, Moorfields, London. From 1764 to 1769 he travelled as a Methodist preacher, returning again to his professional duties. He was a Quaker for some years, but afterwards returned to the Methodists. He was chief physician to John and Charles Wesley during their last illnesses. At the request of the executors of John Wesley and the trustees of City Road Chapel, he preached the funeral sermon of Wesley to an audience "still and silent as night," to use Crowther's words, March 9, 1791. This sermon was pub-ished, went through several editions, and realized to the Book-room a profit of £200. With Coke and Moore, Wesley appointed him literary executor. A long and unfortunate dispute ensued between Whitehead and his two brethren concerning the papers of Wesley, the former refusing to give them up for examination and a possible cremation. For this he was expelled from membership and from his office as local preacher. Whitehead, having the advantage of the possession of Wesley's papers, at once wrote a plain and valuable account of the Lives of John and Charles Wesley, the first volume of which was issued in 1793. In the meantime, however (1792), Coke and Henry Moore published a hastily prepared Life, heavy editions of which were at once sold, thus supplanting to a large extent the more authoritative biography by the layman. In 1797, Whitehead restored the papers to his co-executors, and was reinstated in his position in the Church. Having served as physician to the Methodists for many years, he died in London, March 18, 1804.

Dr. Whitehead published the following: Essay on Liberty and Necessity (1775, 12mo), in which Mr. Wesley's Thoughts on Necessity are examined and defended:—Materialism Philosophically Examined, or the Immateriality of the Soul Asserted and Proved on Philosophical Principles, in an Answer to Dr. Priestley's Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit (Lond. 1778, 78 pp.):—A Discourse (ibid. 1791, 8vo) delivered at the New Chapel, City Road, March 9, 1791, at the funeral of Rev. John Wesley:—A True Narrative of the Origin and Progress of the Difference concerning the Publication of the Life of Rev. John Wesley (1792, 8vo):—A Defence (ibid. 8vo) of the same:—A Life of the Rev. John Wesley, M.A. (Lond. 1793-96, 2 vols. 8vo; reprinted in Dublin in 1806, with an Appendix by the Irish editor, and Whitehead's Sermon on Wesley; in Boston, Mass., with Preface by John McLeish, 1844, 8vo; in Auburn and Rochester, N. Y., 1854, 8vo), collected from his private papers and printed works, to which is prefixed some account of his ancestors and relations, with the Life of Rev. C. Wesley, M.A., collected from his private journal and never before published. See Stevenson, Hist. of City Road Chapel, p. 87, 377; Crowther, Declin. of Methodism (1815, 2d ed.), p. 105; Wesley, Works (Lond. 3d ed.), iv, 295, 351; xiii, 15; Tyerman, Life of John Wesley (see Index, vol. iii). For the dispute about Wesley's papers, see Myles, Chron. Hist. of Meth. Ann. 1792; Smith, Hist. of Wesley and Methodism (see Index, iii, 723); Advertisement in Whitehead's Life of Wesley, and Life of Henry Moore (1791).

Whitelamb, JOHN, one of the Oxford Methodists, was born in 1707, near Wroth, Lincolnshire. He was educated in the charity-school of that place, and while residing with Samuel Wesley at Epworth, was prepared for Lincoln College, Oxford, where he graduated about 1781. In 1783 he became S. Wesley's curate, and afterwards married his daughter. In 1784 he was promoted to the rectory of Wroth, a position which he retained until his death, in July, 1769. In 1742 John Wesley preached once in his pulpit, and friendly but not intimate relations existed between him and Whitelamb ever afterwards. See Tyerman, Oxford Methodists, p. 374 sq.

White Stone (ὄψις λευκή, a white pebble), referred to as given to the Christian conqueror (Rev. ii, 17), is supposed by many to refer to the usage among the Greeks of absolving those that were tried on the ground of any accusation, by the use of white balls or stones, and condemning by black ones. The balls were thrown together into an urn, whence they were drawn and counted. But the white stone is given to the victor himself. Hence others think reference is made to the tessera given to the victor at the Olympic games, on which was inscribed the reward to be received from his native city, the value of his prize. But in these cases the white stone is wanting, and the mystic inscription which no one but the recipient could read. The reference is undoubtedly to Hebrew sources. Christians are called kings and priests unto God (Rev. i, 6; v, 10: xx, 6; 1 Pet. ii, 5). On the front of the mitre or turban worn by the Hebrew high-priest was a plate of gold with the inscription "Sacred to Jehovah" (Exod. xxviii, 36). The name Jehovah was the incommunicable and secret name, which could be pronounced only by the high-priest, and was known, as the Jews say, only to him. Victors in the Christian struggle are to be exalted to the dignity of high-priests and kings. Instead of a plate of gold in their mitre they have a white stone, a pellucid or resplendent gem, with an inscription equivalent to "Sacred to Jehovah" (Rev. i, 4), a new name, doubtless some name of the Saviour, perhaps, "Sacred to the Logos or Word," that is, the incarnate Jehovah (John i, 1; xix, 13). The whole probably symbolizes the assurance of the faithful by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. This is the pellucid gem, the seal of the living God, having the inscription of divine acceptance which no one can read but he who possesses it. See SEAL; STONE.

Whitford (Whytford, or Whytforde), Richard, an English monk of the 16th century, was educated at Oxford; subsequently joined the Order of St. Bridget in the monastery called Sion, near Brentford, Middlesex, and styled himself "The Wretche of Syon;" afterwards became domestic chaplain to William Mountjoy. He was the author of several works, among which we note, The Fruyte of Redempcyon (1514):—A Boke Called the Pye or Towne of the Life of Perfection (1582):—and Dyvers Instruccions and Teachynges very Necessarye for the Helthe of Mannes Soule, etc. (1541).

Whitford, Walter, D.D., a Scotch prelate, was first minister at Monkland and sub-dean of Glasgow, then rector of Moffat. In 1634 he was consecrated bishop of Brechin, in which see he remained until deprived by the assembly in 1638, after which he fled to England, where he died in 1643. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 167.

Whitney, JOSIAH, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Plainfield, Conn., Aug. 11, 1731. He graduated at Yale College in 1752, and was ordained at Brooklyn, Conn., in 1756, which charge he retained for sixty-eight years, until his death, Sept. 13, 1824, though two colleagues successively settled with him. To extreme old age Dr. Whitney's mental faculties remained almost as keen as ever; he was social, witty, and yet had the dignity of a Christian old age. In theology Dr. Whitney was a moderate Calvinist. He published seven sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 351.

Whitsunday, a festival of the Christian Church commemorative of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles, as "they were all assembled together with one accord in one place," on the day of Pentecost (q. v.), from which fact the name Pentecost is sometimes used instead of Whitsunday. Blunt says (Dict. of Doct. and Hist. Theol.), "The etymology of the term has been strangely confused. It has been derived (a) from White Sunday, in supposed allusion to the white garments of the neophytes, as Whitsuntide was one of the two chief seasons for baptism; and (b) from Wytsunday, i. e. Wit, or Wisdom, Sunday, in reference to the outpouring of wisdom upon the apostles. But the real White Sunday is the octave of Easter, or Dominica in albis, and both of these derivations must be abandoned when the proper use of the title is considered. It is not Whit Sunday, but Whitsun Day, as Easter is Easter Day; and the week is Whitsun Week, not Whit Week; and the season Whitsuntide, not Whittide. In Yorkshire, and doubtless also in other parts of England, the feast is commonly called Whissun Day, the accent being strongly thrown on the first syllable; and the two days following, Whissun Monday and Whissun Tuesday. The name is thus derived, as Dr. Neale shows (Essays on Liturgiology, etc.), directly from Pentecost, passing, by various corruptions, Pingsten, Whingsten, into the German Pfingsten and the English Whitsun. The Germans have also their Pfingsten-Woche, in exact correspondence to our Whitsun Week."

Still other derivations of the term are given, Hamon L'Estrange thinking it is derived from the French huit, or eight; because there are eight Sundays between Easter and Pentecost. "Wheatley publishes a letter of the famous Gerard Langbain, written on Whitsun-eve, 1650, in reply to a friend who had asked of him the origin of the name, in which it is attempted to be shown that the festival was so called from a custom among our ancestors upon this day to give all the milk of their ewes and kine to the poor for the love of God, in order to qualify themselves to receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; which milk being then (as it is still in some countries) called white-milk, therefore the day from that custom took its name." It is also suggested that all persons were required to pay their tithe of young before that day or be liable to the white, or mulct.

Anciently the whole period of fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide was a sort of festival, and each was observed as a day of joy. We are told that Christians had solemn worship every day, and paid the same respect to these as they did to the Lord's day. All fasting was forbidden, and no one prayed kneeling, the standing posture being considered more in accordance with the joyous spirit of the season, which was the commemoration of our Saviour's resurrection and ascension. At these services the Acts of the Apostles were read, because they contained a history appropriate to the season; alms were freely distributed; slaves were liberated; places of worship were decorated with evergreens; and baptisms were frequently solemnized. At first all persons were baptized as opportunity served; but when the discipline of the Church began to be settled, baptism was confined, except in urgent cases, to Easter and Whitsuntide, including the fifty days' interval.

In countries where Romanism has prevailed, the greatest absurdities have been practiced on this day; fire has been thrown down from elevated places, to represent the cloven tongues of fire; flowers of various hues scattered abroad, in token of the various tongues and gifts of the Spirit; and doves let loose to flutter about the church as an emblem of the Spirit's presence. The following instances are cited from Walcott's Sacred Archeology (p. 612-613): "At Lichfield, 1197, 'on Pentecost and the three days ensuing, while the sequence was sung, clouds were by custom scattered.' A circular opening still exists in the centre of the vault of Norwich, and there are similar apertures at Exeter. Through it, on Whitsunday, a man, habited as an angel, was let down to cense the rood. At St. Paul's a white dove was let to fly out of it, and a long censer, reaching almost to the floor, was swung from the west door to the choir steps, 'breathing out over the whole church and company a most pleasant perfume.' At Dunkirk, in 1662, the ceremonial was always performed during the chanting of the Veni Creator, as in Spain. Balsamon alludes to the loosing of the dove in the East. At Orleans, on Whitsunday, during the singing of the prose, birds, lighted tow and resin, wildfire, and flowers were thrown into the cathedral. At St. Julien's, Caen, until the end of the 16th century, seven kinds of flowers were showered down. In Sweden churches are on this festival still decorated with the wind flower and Pentecost lily—the daffodil. . . . In most cathedrals the country folk came in procession on this day, and Sir Thomas More mourns over the unwomanly songs of the women who followed the cross; their offerings then made were called Whitsun-farthings or Pentecostals. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in Whitsun-week the famous Whitsun plays of Chester were acted from the 14th century until 1594 on Whitsun-Wednesday, 'Whitsonday, the making of the Creed,' being performed. Tilts and tourneys amused knights and fair dames; the morris-dancers delighted the common folks; and in many a rural parish the church ale, a sort of parochial picnic, was kept in an arbor, called Robin Hood's Bower, followed by dancing, bowls, and archery. . . . Whitsunday was also called the Easter of Roses.

Wichern, JOHANN HEINRICH, father of the Inner Mission in Germany, and one of the foremost Christian philanthropists of the century, was born at Hamburg, April 21, 1808. He studied theology at Göttingen and Berlin, and reached the degree of "candidate." On his return home, encouraged by his pious mother, he started a Sunday-school for the poorest and most wicked children in the city, and ultimately had five hundred children under his care. It was this school which gave him the idea of the institution which he opened on Nov. 1, 1833, at Horn, a suburb of Hamburg. He called it the "Rauhe Haus" (q. v.). In 1845 Wichern sent out his Fliegende Blätter aus dem Rauhen Haus, now the organ of the Inner Mission, in which he urged the duty of laying to heart the misery of our fellow-mortals, and at the same time told the story of his own institutions. In 1848, at the Church diet held at Wittenberg, Wichern presented with such extraordinary eloquence the claims of the sick, the suffering, and sinful, who were their countrymen, that from that hour a new movement on their behalf was begun. This was the so-called "Inner Mission" (q. v.), the very name of which is due to Wichern. Under Friedrich Wilhelm IV, Wichern found favor in court circles, and exerted great influence upon the aristocracy. In acknowledgment of the great services rendered to the cause of the Church, the University of Halle honored Wichern, in 1861, with the doctorate of theology, while Friedrich Wilhelm IV made him a member of the supreme consistory of Berlin. In his official capacity, Wichern was enabled to provide regular religious services in the prisons. In 1858 he founded the "Evangelische Johannisstift" in Berlin, a similar institution to the Rauhe Haus, and organized the Prussian military diaconate. In 1872 he had a stroke of paralysis, from which he never recovered, and died at Hamburg, April 7, 1881. Widow (אַלְמָנָה, chippa). The benevolent influence of the Bible is in nothing more apparent than in the superior treatment which woman has experienced among those nations where it has prevailed; especially in that most forlorn and helpless class of females who have been deprived of the support and protection of a husband. Among pagans, on the contrary, and conspicuously in Oriental lands, the condition of widows is most deplorable. They are generally regarded with suspicion and contempt, and, in many countries, with positive abhorrence, as if the cause of their husbands' death. In India this oppression seems to have reached its culmination of misery; and the atrocious custom of widow-burning or suttee (q. v.), was for ages the doom of this unfortunate class. See WOMAN.

1. Widows among the Hebrews.—Besides the general law against their hard treatment (Exod. xxii, 22-24), there was special legislation respecting them.

1. Their rights should always be respected (Deut. x, 18; xxvii, 19); nor should their clothing or cattle be pledged (xxiv, 17), nor their children be sold for debt (2 Kings iv, 1; Job xxiv, 9). According to Maimonides (Sanehr, 21, 6) their cases must be tried next after those of orphans.

2. They must be invited to the feasts accompanying sacrifices and tithes-offerings (Deut. xiv, 29; xvi, 11-14; xxvi, 12 sq.). Childless priest-widows living in their fathers' houses had a right to the priests' meat (Lev. xxii, 13). In later times it was the custom that the rich sent them wine for the passover meal; in the time of the Maccabees widows were also allowed to deposit their property in the temple treasury (2 Macc. iii, 10).

3. Gleanings were left for them (Deut. xxiv, 19-21), and they shared in the battle spoils (2 Macc. viii, 28-30). Their remarriage was contemplated (Lev. xxi, 14, but the high-priest was forbidden to marry one), and only on the childless widow did the Levirate law operate (Deut. xxv, 5; see LEVIRATE). The later Judaism greatly facilitated the remarriage of widows (Jebamoth, xv, 1 sq., 4 sq.; xvi, 4 sq.), but this was to be done not less than ninety days after the husband's demise. According to Kethuboth, xii, 2 sq.; Gittin, iv, 8, if the widow remained in her husband's house the heirs had to provide her with the necessary rooms and means for her support; but if she went to her father's home she forfeited her right to support more than was absolutely necessary, and neither she nor the heirs could lay claim to her dowry until the expiration of twenty-five years, provided she could prove by oath that she had not yet received anything of it. In order to get subsistence, widows were allowed to sell the property of their husbands, both real and personal (Kethuboth, viii, 8; ix, 9; Maim. Ishuth, xvi, 7 sq.). In case a man left two widows, the first wife had prior claims (ibid. Conj. xvii, 1). Betrothed women whose prospective husbands died were considered as widows, and such a one the high-priest was also forbidden to marry. In spite of these laws and regulations, complaints of the unjust treatment of the widows in Israel were heard at different times (Isa. i, 17, 23; x, 2; Jer. vii, 6; xxii, 8; Ezek. xxii, 7; Mal. iii, 3), and even in the New Test. period (Matt. xxiii, 14).

II. Widows among Christians.—1. In the early Church abundant and careful provision was made for them by special ministration appointed under the apostles themselves (Acts vi, 1-6); and Paul gives particular directions concerning them (1 Tim. v, 8-16) in terms which have been understood by some commentators as ranking them in a special class of Church officials, but which rather seem to indicate their general maintenance at the expense of the body of believers, after a careful discrimination, such as the nature of the times then dictated. The writers who immediately succeeded the apostles often refer to the duty and practice of caring for the poor widows of the Church (Hermas, Mand. viii, 10; Sim. i, 8; v, 8; Ignatius, Ad Smyrn. vi; Ad Polycarp. iv; Polycarp, Ad Philip. iv, etc.). In still later times the Apostolical Constitutions and other authorities speak of a distinct order by this name (τὸ χηρικόν), but these appear to have held an eleemosynary office, rather than to have been themselves beneficiaries. See ΔΕΚΑΧΟΡΑ. They eventually took vows like nuns, and, in fact, devoted themselves to a conventual, or, at least, continent and actively benevolent life. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v. At the same time this body formed a convenient refuge for the destitute widows of those days, and in the Roman Catholic Church nunneries have largely been recruited from the ranks of bereaved or disappointed women. But, aside from this, Christian churches have in all ages exerted themselves with a praiseworthy diligence and liberality to furnish shelter and maintenance for believing widows whose relatives have been found unable or unwilling to provide for them. In more recent times special retreats, called "Old Ladies' Homes," have been established, where, for a moderate charge or entirely gratuitously, indigent widows are comfortably and pleasantly taken care of, without compelling them to become objects of public charity. Wigand, JOHANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Mansfeld in 1523. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed pastor of his native city in 1546, superintendent of Magdeburg in 1553, professor of theology at Jena in 1560 (from which position he was discharged the next year), superintendent of Wismar in 1562, and again professor at Jena in 1569. In 1570 he accompanied the duke Johann Wilhelm to the diet at Spire, but after the death of the duke, in 1573, Wigand was expelled from Saxony. At the instance of Martin Chemnitz he was appointed professor at Königsberg, and in 1575 he was made bishop of Pomerania. Wigand died at Liebenühl, Prussia, Oct. 21, 1587. He was an ultra-Lutheran, an ardent champion of Flacius (q. v.), and took part with great vehemence in all controversies of the time, persecuting with blind fanaticism any one who differed from him in opinions. At last he fell out with his own master, with whom he at one time labored for the establishment of a Lutheran popedom, and wrote against him. Wigand's autobiography is found in Fortgesetzte Sammlung von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen (Leipzig, 1738), p. 601-620, where a complete list of all his writings is also found; comp. also Zeumer, Vita Professorum Jenensium, p. 43 sq.; Schlüsseler, *Oratio Funebris de Vita et Obitu J. Wigbert, Saint, the first abbot of Fritzlar, was a native of England. In 734, when Boniface had become bishop of Mayence, he invited Wigbert to come to Germany, and take charge of the Fritzlar abbey. Under the new abbot the school soon became famous. Wigbert died in 747. See Servatus Lupus, Vita S. Wigberti, Abbatis Fritzlarensis, in Mabillon, Acta Benedict. iii, 671 sq.; Miracula Wigberti, edited by Waitz in Pertz, *Monumenta Hist. Wighard, an archbishop of Canterbury, was an Englishman by birth. He had been chaplain to Deusedit, and had been educated in the Church of Canterbury. He was appointed to the see of Canterbury and metropolitan of all England some time between A.D. 664 and 668. He immediately went to Rome to be consecrated, where he died, soon after his arrival, of the plague. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 142.

Wight, HENRY, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., in 1753, and was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1782. His ordination took place at Bristol, R. I., Jan. 5, 1785, in connection with the dedication of a new house of worship. Of this church he continued to be the sole pastor for more than thirty years (from 1785 to 1815). On Nov. 18 of the latter year, the Rev. Joel Mason was ordained as his colleague. Dr. Wight was dismissed at his own request Nov. 11, 1828. His residence during the remainder of his life was among his own people in Bristol. He died Aug. 12, 1837. His ministry in Bristol was a prosperous one, two hundred and thirty-eight persons being received into the membership of the Church during his pastorate. Wightman, WILLIAM MAY, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Charleston, S. C., Jan. 8, 1808. He was converted at sixteen, graduated from Charleston College in 1827, entered the South Carolina Conference in 1828, and immediately sprang into position and popularity. After laboring successively on the Pedee, Orangeburg, Sumter, and Abbeville circuits, and in Charleston and Camden stations, he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College in 1834; in 1837 was made professor of English literature in that institution; two years later presiding elder of Cokesburg District; in 1840 editor of the Southern Christian Advocate; in 1854 president of Wofford College; in 1859 president of the Southern University at Greensboro', Ala.; and in 1866 bishop, an office which he filled with great ability until his death in Charleston, Feb. 15, 1882. He was singularly effective as a preacher, dignified and successful as an administrator, ardent as a friend, and modest and earnest as a Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 151.

Wigram, JOSEPH COTTON, D.D., a bishop of the Church of England, was born Dec. 26, 1798, being the son of sir Robert Wigram, bart. He graduated at Cambridge in 1820, and was ordained deacon in 1822, and priest the next year; in 1827 he was appointed secretary of the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor, and in the same year became assistant minister at St. James's, Westminster; in 1835 he was appointed rector of East Tisted, Hants; in 1847 was made archdeacon of Winchester, holding that position until his appointment as bishop of Rochester, to which he was consecrated in 1860; from 1851 until 1860 he was rector of St. Mary's, Southampton. He died suddenly at London, April 6, 1867. His literary remains consist of a large number of published sermons. See American Quar. Church Rev. July, 1867, p. 346.

Wigrdr, in Norse mythology, is the name of the large plain which serves the Asas and the Einheriars, the Muspelheimers, with Hel, Loke, Fenris, and Jörmungand, as a battle-field. It has an area of 10,000 square miles.

Wike, in the mythology of the Finns and Lapps, is a child which the moon with Bil, the daughter of the Asas, exalted to heaven, in order that both might be its constant companions. Some see in this a reference to the different phases of the moon.

Wikeford, ROBERT DE, D.C.L., an Irish prelate, was born in Essex, and was archdeacon of Winchester. For a time he was fellow of Merton College, and was advanced to the see of Dublin, Oct. 12, 1375, before the close of which year he was consecrated. In 1377 he was appointed chancellor of Ireland. In 1378 he had an exemplification and confirmation of the manor of Swords to him and his successors. About 1380 he had a grant to the see of all its possessions. In 1382 De Wikeford was ordered to attend a conference of the prelates, to be held at Naza. In 1385 he was again appointed lord chancellor. In 1390 he visited England, where he died, Aug. 29 of that year. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 142.

Wila, in Slavonic mythology, is one of the deities worshipped by the Bohemians and Moravians, and was ruler of night and death.

Wilbur, HERVEY, D.D., an American minister, was born at Wendell, Mass., in 1787. He was pastor of his native place from 1817 to 1823; subsequently presided over several female seminaries; and died at Newburyport in 1852. He was the author of, Discourse on the Religious Education of Youth (1814);—Reference Bible (1828);—Elements of Astronomy (1829);—Lexicon of Useful Knowledge (1830);—and Reference Testament for Bible Classes (1831).

Wilbur, JOHN, an American minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Hopkinton, R. I., in 1774. He opposed the introduction into the society of any new doctrines or practices. In 1888 he was accused by several members of the Rhode Island yearly meeting of publishing statements derogatory to the character of Joseph John Gurney, who was then visiting the United States. He was sustained in his course by his own monthly meeting, that of South Kingston; but that body having been superseded by the Greenwich meeting, he was disowned by the latter body, and its action confirmed by the higher powers. His supporters in various parts of New England united in forming a separate yearly meeting, whose members were known as "Wilburites." They maintain the strictest traditions of the sect, and claim that Quakers, as a body, are giving up their principles. Mr. Wilbur died in 1856. He was the author of, Narrative and Exposition of the Late Proceedings of the New England Yearly Meeting, etc. (1845):—A Few Remarks upon the Controversy between Good and Evil in the Society of Friends (1855):—and his Journal and Correspondence have appeared since his death (1859).

Wilcocks, JOSEPH, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1673. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; chosen demy of his college at the same time with Boulter and Addison, from which circumstance this was called "the golden election;" became chaplain to the English Factory at Lisbon; returned to England, where he became chaplain to George I, and preceptor to the children of George II; became prebendary of Westminster in March, 1720; was made bishop of Gloucester in 1721; translated to the see of Rochester in 1731, and at the same time held the deanery of Westminster; and died March 9, 1756. He published some single sermons.

Wild, Johann Christoph Friedrich, a Protestant theologian, was born at Plönsberg, June 18, 1808. He studied at Erlangen, was in 1830 preacher at Wassertrüdingen, and in 1839 pastor at Schönberg, where he labored for twenty-nine years. In 1868 he was called to Unterschwaningen, in Bavaria, and died April 5, 1882. He wrote, Ueber göttliche Strafe und Strafgerichte (Anspach, 1832):—Systematische Darstellung der Unterscheidungslehre der katholischen und protestantischen Kirche (Nördlingen, 1842):—Der Tod im Lichte der Offenbarung (Nuremberg, 1847). Wild, Robert, D.D., an English Nonconformist divine, poet, and wit, was born at St. Ives, Huntingdonshire, in 1609. He was educated at the University of Cambridge; received his first degree in divinity at Oxford in 1642; was appointed rector at Aynhoe, Northamptonshire, in 1646; ejected at the Restoration; and died at Oundle in 1679. He was the author of, Tragedy of Christopher Love at Tower Hill (1660):—Iter Boreale (eod.):—Poem on the Imprisonment of Mr. Edmund Calamy in Newgate (1662):—Poems (1668):—Rome Rhym'd to Death (1683), being a collection of choice poems, in two parts, written by the earl of Rochester, Dr. Wild, etc.:—The Benefice; a Comedy (1689). In 1870 appeared Poems by Robert Wild, D.D., one of the Ejected Ministers of 1662; with a Historical and Biographical Preface and Notes, by the Rev. John Hunt.

Wild Ass (פָּרִי, péri; once [Job xxxix, 5] אֲרֹד, aród; Chald. [Dan. v, 21] אָרָד, arád; Sept. ὄναγρος [ὄνος ἄγρος]; so the Eastern ὄνος ἄγρος, Photius, Cod. xlii, 91; Philostr. Apoll. iii, 2; Ælian, Anim. v, 52), a species inhabiting the desert (Job xxiv, 5; Isa. xxxii; Jer. ii, 2, 4), roaming free (Job xxxix, 5), living on herbs (vi, 5; Jer. xiv, 6), which is likewise mentioned in profane authors (Aristot. Anim. vi, 36; Oppian, Cyneg. iii, 184 sq.), and is especially made in Scripture the symbol of a nomadic life (Gen. xvi, 12). The following is a close translation of the poetical description of the wild ass given in the book of Job (xxxix, 5-8):

Who sent forth [the] wild-ass free;
Yea, the yoke-bands of the onager who opened?
Whom I have assigned the desert [as] his house,
Even his couching-places [the soil sterile as if] salt.
He will laugh at the crowd of the city;
The hootings of the driver he cannot hear.
The quest of the mountains [is] his feed;
Yea, after every green [thing] will he seek.

From the frequent and familiar allusions to the wild ass in Scripture, we may conclude it was much more numerous in the countries adjacent to Palestine in former times than it is at present. Though well known by name, the wild ass is rarely now found west of the Wild Ass.

Hauran (Bashan); nor do we find it in the Sinaitic wilderness. The species which is found east of Syria is the Asinus hemippus, or Syrian wild ass, which differs from the Asinus hemione, the wild ass of Central Asia, in sundry slight particulars of osteology and form. This species was undoubtedly known to the Jews, and is probably the père of Scripture. The Asinus vulgaris, or Onager of the ancients, the original of the tame ass, inhabits the Egyptian deserts, and must also have been known. If the species were distinguished from the Syrian one, it may probably be the aród of the Hebrew. Travellers have seen this ass wild in the deserts of North Africa, in small troops of four or five. When riding in the Sahara, they have detected what they took to be antelopes on a slightly elevated mound of sand; then, by their glasses, discovering they had no horns, they suspected they were the horses of Bedawin, who might be concealed behind them, till they allowed an approach sufficiently near to make them out more clearly, when, snuffing up the wind, they dashed off at a speed which the best of horses could not have approached. Tristram saw a wild ass in the oasis of Souf, which had been snared when a colt; but though it had been kept for three years in confinement, it was as untractable as when first caught, biting and kicking furiously at every one who approached it, and never enduring a saddle on its back. In appearance and color it could not have been distinguished from one of the finest specimens of the tame ass. The Syrian wild ass (Asinus hemippus) in no way differs from the African in habits. All the species of wild ass are more or less migratory, travelling north and south, according to the season, in large herds. The Asiatic (Asinus hemippus) proceed in summer as far north as Armenia, marking their course by grazing the herbage very closely on their march. In winter they descend as far as the shores of the Persian Gulf. In the same manner the African species is only in summer seen on the confines of Egypt, retiring in winter towards the interior. Their habit of congregating at watering-places, and of standing on the watch on any rising ground, are both alluded to in Scripture (Psa. civ, 11; Jer. xiv, 6). See Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 42. See ASS.

Wild Beast is the rendering of the A. V. at Psa. l, 11; lxxx, 13 [elsewhere "abundance," Isa. lxvi, 11], of יָיִל, ziz, a poetical word for any moving creature of the field. Another Heb. term, chayáh (חַיָּה, Sept. Θηρίον, ζῷον, θήρ, τετράπους, κτῆνος, ἑρπετόν, θηρία-λωτος, βρωτός; Vulg. fera, animantia, animal), also rendered "beast," "wild beast," is the feminine of the adjective חַי, "living," used to denote any animal. It is, however, very frequently used specially of "wild beast," when the meaning is often more fully expressed by the addition of the word חַיָּה, has-sadéh (wild beast) "of the field" (Exod. xxiii, 11; Lev. xxvi, 22; Deut. vii, 22; Hos. ii, 14; xiii, 8; Jer. xii, 9, etc.). Similar is the use of the Chaldee ܚܝܝܬ, chryáh (Dan. iv, vii). See BEAST.

WILD BEAST OF THE DESERT is the rendering of the A. V. at Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 14; Jer. l, 30 [elsewhere "dwelling in the wilderness," (Psa. lii, 9; lxxiv, 14; Isa. xxiii, 13) of the Heb. word found only in this sense in the plur. יַיִם, tsiyim, although the sing. יַיִם, tsi, occurs Numb. xxv, 24; Isa. xxxiii, 21; Ezek. xxx, 9; Dan. xi, 30, in the sense of "ship." It is thought to denote some (or perhaps any) species of animal living in the desert, such as jackals, ostriches, etc. The ancient versions are inconsistent (Sept. θήρια, ivóáμara; Vulg. bestie, dracones). The Targum understands apes, Michaelis (Suppl. p. 2086) serpents, Aurivillius (Dissert. p. 298) vampyres, Saadiah and Abulwalid wild bulls, and others wild cats. See Bochart, Hieroz. ii, 211.

WILD BEAST OF THE ISLANDS is the rendering of the A. V. at Isa. xiii, 22; xxxiv, 14; Jer. l, 39, of the Heb. word which occurs in this sense only in the plur. יַיִם, iyim, although it frequently occurs both in the sing. and plur. in the sense of "island." The ancient interpreters variously understand cats (Chald. and Kimchi) and spectres (Sept. ὄνοεντραίπος); but later writers generally agree that the jackal (q. v.) is meant, from its habit of howling (Bochart, Hieroz. i, 843).

Wild Bull is the rendering of the A. V. at Isa. li, 20, of בָּקָר, tó (Sept. σύντριον; Vulg. oryx), which is now generally thought to denote some of the larger species of antelope (q. v.), as the same word in a slightly longer form, בָּקָר, teb, occurs elsewhere (Deut. xiv, 3, A. V. "wild ox"), where the ancient interpreters (Sept. ὄρυξ; Vulg. oryx), as well as the context, agree in that sense. The particular kind is probably the oryx, although no exact species may have been intended. Others, however, are inclined to regard the creature intended as kindred rather with the reem, or "unicorn" of our version. It is a singular fact that various animals of the ox kind are figured on the monuments as tribute to the ancient Assyrians. See BUFFALO.

Wilderness is in the A. V. the most frequent rendering of מִדְבָּר (midbár, ἡ ἐρημος), which primarily denotes a region not regularly tilled or inhabited (Job xxxviii, 26; Isa. xxxii, 15; Jer. ii, 2), but used for pasturage (from דָּרַב, to track, referring to the cattle-paths) (Jer. ix, 9; Psa. lxx, 13; Joel ii, 22; Luke xv, 4); mostly treeless and dry, but not entirely destitute of vegetation or fertility, such as are of frequent occurrence in the East (Robinson ii, 656; occasionally cultivated in spots, Josephus, Ant. xii, 4, 6). Towers were sometimes erected in them for the protection of flocks (2 Chron. xxvi, 10; 2 Kings xvii, 9; comp. Isa. i, 8). The term is likewise in some instances applied to particular barren tracts of hard arid steppes (Isa. xxxv, 6; xli, 18; xliii, 20; Lam. iv, 3; Mal. i, 8) overrun with wild animals (see Rosenmüller, Morgenl. i, 88 sq.); although for such spots the words מִדְבָּר (Joel ii, 3; iv, 19), יַיִם, tsiyim (see Credner, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1833, iii, 788 sq.), etc., are usually employed. For a remarkable phenomenon of these dry wastes, see MIRAGE.

Although this kind of region is not particularly characteristic of Palestine, yet the term midbár is applied to the following localities in it or its immediate vicinity [see DESERT]:

1. The Wilderness of Judah, also called Jeshimon (1 Sam. xxiii, 19; xxvi, 1, 3), is a rocky district in the eastern part of that tribe adjoining the Dead Sea and including the town of Engedi (Josh. xv, 61; Judg. i, 16). It appears to have extended from the vicinity of the Kedron, a few miles east of Jerusalem, to the S.W. shore of the Dead Sea and to the hills of Judah. The convent of Mar Saba (q. v.) is a marked feature of one of its wild and barren dells. See JUDAH, WILDERNESS OF.

On the N.W. border of the wilderness of Judah lay the Wilderness of Tekoa (2 Chron. xx, 20; 1 Macc.

Bull, Rhinoceros, and Antelope. (From the Black Obelisk of Nimrod.)

ix, 33); as in its E. part appears to have lain the Wilderness of Engedi (1 Sam. xxiv, 2), and in its S. part the Wilderness of Ziph (xxiii, 14 sq.) or Maon (q. v.), otherwise called Jeruel (2 Chron. xx, 16). The Wilderness of St. John (Matt. iii, 1, 8; comp. xi, 7; Luke i, 80) is a part of the desert of Judah; although modern tradition gives that name to the neighborhood of Ain Karim west of Jerusalem. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

2. The Wilderness of Beersheba (Gen. xxi, 14) lay south of that town on the borders of the desert Et-Tih. See BEERSHEBA.

3. The Wilderness of Jericho (Josh. xvi, 1), between that city and the Mount of Olives, or rather Bethany, was an extension of the desert of Judah, a rough and stony tract full of precipices (see Josephus, Ant. x, 8, 2), which contains the so-called khan of the Samaritans (Luke x, 80). Its N. E. extremity is the wilderness of Quarantana (q. v.), and its N. W. extremity the wilderness of Beth-aven (Josh. xviii, 12).

4. The Wilderness of Gibeon, in the vicinity of that city, north of Jerusalem (2 Sam. ii, 24).

5. The Wilderness of Reuben (Deut. iv, 43), denotes the barren tract in the neighborhood of Bezer, on the border of the tribe towards the Arabian desert. See REUBEN.

6. The Wilderness of Bethsaida (Luke ix, 10), a pasture-ground adjoining that town, apparently extending on both sides of the mouth of the Upper Jordan. See BETHSAIDA.

For the Wilderness of Arabia Petræa or of Mt. Sinai, including those of Etham, Paran, Shur, and the Arabah, see WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERINGS.

WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING of the Children of Israel. This is a convenient popular designation of the wide region in which the people were led by the divine guidance under Moses, for forty years, from Egypt to Canaan. It was here, amid nature's grandest and wildest architecture, wrapped in nature's profoundest silence and solitude, far removed from the din and distraction of the world of life and action, that the people of Israel met with their God, and witnessed manifestations of his glory and majesty and power such as mortals never witnessed before, and never can witness again. There, as Stanley says, "they were brought into contact with a desolation which was forcibly contrasted with the green valley of the Nile. They were enclosed within a sanctuary of temples and pyramids not made with hands—the more awful from its total dissimilarity to anything which they or their fathers could have remembered in Egypt or Palestine. They were wrapped in a silence which gave full effect to the morning and the evening shout with which the encampment rose and pitched, and still more to the 'thunders, and the voice exceeding loud' on the top of Horeb" (Sin. and Pal. p. 20). The appropriateness of these natural features to the scenes recorded in the sacred narrative cannot safely be overlooked by the modern critic and commentator. They tend to demonstrate the perfect consistency of Bible history in its minutest details. In our treatment of it here we give in detail its geographical character and productions. See EXODUS.

I. General Configuration and Features.—1. Principal Divisions.—The country embraced in the "Wilderness of Wandering" extended from the borders of Egypt and the Mediterranean on the west, to the plateau of Arabia on the east. How much of the latter it included cannot be determined, because the eastern boundary of Edom is indefinite; and even were it minutely defined, it would be impossible to ascertain how close to or how far from it the Israelites travelled. There can be little doubt that their march was never conducted, like that of a modern army, in one dense column. It bore a far closer resemblance to the migration of an Arab tribe, whose flocks, herds, shepherds, and guards, with their families, spread over the country for many miles. Travellers in this region often pass through a moving tribe whose outer extremities are twenty miles apart. The southern limits of the wilderness were marked by the Red Sea and its gulfs; and the northern by Canaan, Moab, and Bashan.

This vast tract is divided by the Gulf of Akabah, and the deep valley of the Arabah, into two great sections.

The western section is triangular in form, the base being marked by the Mediterranean coast and the hills of Judah, and the apex by Ras Mohammed on the extreme south. The physical geography of this region is very remarkable, and as it formed the chief scene of the wanderings of the Israelites, it must be described with some minuteness. From the shore of the Mediterranean a great plain extends inland. At first it is very low, and studded with mounds and ridges of drifting sand. It rises gradually, and the sand gives place to a white, flinty soil, which scantily covers the limestone strata. As the elevation increases, long reaches of rolling table-land, and broad ridges with naked crowns and long gravelly slopes, stretch away far as the eye can see, while shallow, naked wadis, and bare, rocky gleus, seam its surface and wind away waterless to the sea. Towards the east the table-land becomes still more uneven. The ridges rise higher and are more rugged, and the valleys are deeper and wilder. Here, however, are some smooth expanses of upland plain, and broad beds of wadis, coated with a light but rich soil. Springs and wells also become more frequent, and occasionally a streamlet may be traced for a mile or two along its tamarisk-fringed bed. At length the plateau, having attained an altitude of about two thousand feet, breaks down abruptly, in a series of irregular terraces, or wall-like cliffs, to the great valley of the Arabah. Such are the general features of the desert of Et-Tih. Its name is remarkable. Et-Tih signifies "The Wandering," and is doubtless derived from the wanderings of the Israelites, the tradition of which has been handed down through a period of three thousand years. It was at the eastern border of the plateau, in the valley of the Arabah, that the camp was pitched so long around the sacred fountain of Kadesh; and it was up the wild passes that lead from the Arabah to the table-land that an infuriated and rebellious people attempted to force their way, against the divine command, into Canaan, when they were driven back with disgrace by the hardy Amalekites (Numb. xiv, 40-45).

On the north the plateau of Et-Tih rises gradually to meet the swelling hills and green vales of Palestine. On the south it also rises in long, bare, gravelly slopes to Jebel Et-Tih, which sweeps round like the arc of a bow, and regular as a colossal wall, from Suez to the head of the gulf of Akabah.

The Arabah is a deep, wide valley, running in a straight line from the gulf of Akabah to the Dead Sea. From the latter it rises in a series of terraces, supported by wall-like cliffs, until it attains an elevation of three or four hundred feet above the level of the ocean; then it declines gently to the shore of the gulf of Akabah. The greater portion of it is a bare and barren desert, covered in part with a light, flinty soil, and in part with loose sand. Low shrubberies of tamarisk appear here and there, and clumps of camel-thorn are met with, but these are its only products. Fountains are almost unknown in it. That of Kadesh is the only one of any note recorded in ancient or modern times. Along its western side runs a range of bare, rugged limestone hills, from two to three thousand feet in height. The range is deeply furrowed by long, dry ravines, like rents in the rocky strata; and there form the only approaches to the plateau of Et-Tih. Most of them are impassable to human feet; and as they cut far into the table-land, they effectually bar all passage along its eastern border. The Israelites, therefore, in their approach to Kadesh from Sinai, must have travelled along the Arabah, or else have treaded the interior of the plateau itself.

On the east side of the valley is a mountain-range of a different character. Its southern section is granite, showing the sharp peaks and deep colors of the Sinaitic group. The granite then gives place to sandstone, whose hues are still more gorgeous. This range formed the country of the Edomites, into which the Israelites never penetrated. They were compelled to turn back from Mount Hor, march down the Arabah, and pass round the southern and eastern sides of Edom. The desert of Arabia thus formed the scene of their last wanderings. It is a vast table-land, extending from the mountain-range of Edom eastward to the horizon, without tree or shrub, stream or fountain. The surface is either bare rock, or white gravel mixed with flints, or drifting sand. The very Bedawin dread the passage of this "great and terrible wilderness." For days together the daring traveller who ventures to cross it must hasten onward, and should the supply of water which he is obliged to carry with him fail, all hope is gone. Wallin, one of the very few who traversed it, says, "It is a tract the most desolate and sterile I ever saw. Its irregular surface is, instead of vegetation, covered with small stones, which, shining sometimes in a dark swarthy, sometimes in a bright, white color, reflect the rays of the sun in a manner most injurious to the eyes" (Journal of the Roy. Geog. Soc. xxiv, 185). Mr. Palgrave, who crossed it more recently, almost in the track of Wallin, also gives a frightful account of it (Travels in Arabia, i, 8 sq.). It is far more desolate and dreary and terrible than any part of the region west of the Arabah.

2. The Peninsula of Sinai.—The twin gulfs of Suez and Akabah, into which the Red Sea separates, embrace this triangle on its west and east sides respectively. One or other of them is in sight from almost all the summits of the Sinaitic cluster, and from the highest points both branches. The eastern coast of the gulf of Suez is strewn with shells, and with the forests of submarine vegetation, which possibly gave the whole sea its Hebrew appellation of the "Sea of Weeds." The "huge trunks" of its "trees of coral may be seen even on the dry shore," while at Tûr cabins are formed of madrepores gathered from it, and the débria of conchylia lie thickly heaped on the beach. Similar "coralline forests" are described (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 83) as marking the coast of the gulf of Akabah. The northern portion of the whole peninsula is a plateau bounded southwards by the range of et-Tih, which droops across it on the map with a curve somewhat like that of a slack chain, whose points of suspension are, westwards, Suez, and eastward, but farther south, some "sandstone cliffs," which shut off this region from the gulf of Akabah. The north-western member of this chain converges with the shore of the gulf of Suez, till the two run nearly parallel. Its eastern member throws off several fragments of long and short ridges towards the gulf of Akabah and the northern plateau called from it et-Tih. The Jebel Dillâl (Burckhardt, Dhélal) is the most southerly of the continuations of this eastern member (Seetzen, Reisen, III, iii, 418). The greatest elevation in the et-Tih range is attained a little west of the meridian 34°, near its most southerly point; it is here 4654 feet above the Mediterranean. From this point the watershed of the plateau runs obliquely between north and east towards Hebron; westward of which line, and northward from the westerly member of Jebel et-Tih, the whole wady-system is drained by the great Wady el-'Arish, along a gradual slope to the Mediterranean. The shorter and much steeper slope eastward partly converges into the large ducts of wadis Fikreh and el-Jelb, entering the Dead Sea's south-western angle through the southern wall of the Ghôr, and partly finds an outlet nearly parallel, but farther to the south, by the Wady Jerafeh into the Arabah. The great depression of the Dead Sea (1800 feet below the Mediterranean) explains the greater steepness of this eastern slope. In crossing this plateau, Seetzen found that rain and wind had worked depressions in parts of its flat, which contained a few shrubs or isolated bushes. This flat rose here and there in heights steep on one side, composed of white chalk with frequent lumps of flint embedded (ibid. III, 48). The plateau has a central point in the station Khan Nukhl, so named from the date-trees which once adorned its wady, but which have all disappeared. This point is nearly equidistant from Suez westward, Akabah eastward, el-'Arish northward, and the foot of Jebel Mûsa southward. It lies half a mile north of the "Haj-route," between Suez and Akabah, which traverses "a boundless flat, dreary and desolate" (ibid. p. 56), and is 1494 feet above the Mediterranean—nearly on the same meridian as the highest point before assigned to et-Tih. On this meridian also lies um-Shûmer, farther south, the highest point of the entire peninsula, having an elevation of 9300 feet, or nearly double that of et-Tih. A little to the west of the same meridian lies el-'Arish, and the southern cape, Râs Mohammed, is situated about 34° 17'. Thus the parallel 31° and the meridian 34° form important axes of the whole region of the peninsula. A full description of the wilderness of et-Tih is given by Robinson (Bibl. Res. I, 177, 178, 199), together with a memorandum of the travellers who explored it previously to himself.

On the eastern edge of the plateau to the north of the et-Tih range, which is raised terrace-wise by a step from the level of the Ghôr, rises a singular second, or, reckoning that level itself, a third plateau, superimposed on the general surface of the et-Tih region. These Russegger (Map) distinguishes as three terraces in the chalk ridges. Dr. Kruse, in his Anmerkungen on Seetzen's travels (Reisen, III, iii, 410), remarks that the Jebel et-Tih is the montes nigri, or melas of Ptolemy, in whose view that range descends to the extreme southern point of the peninsula, thus including, of course, the Sinaitic region. This confusion arose from a want of distinct conception of geographical details. The name seems to have been obtained from the dark, or even black, color which is observable in parts.

The Haj-route from Suez to Akabah, crossing the peninsula in a direction a little south of east, may stand for the chord of the arc of the et-Tih range, the length of which latter is about one hundred and twenty miles. This slope, descending northwards upon the Mediterranean, is of limestone (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 7), covered with coarse gravel interspersed with black flints and drift (Russegger, Map). But its desolation has not always been so extreme, oxen, asses, and sheep having once grazed in parts of it where now only the camel is found. Three passes through the et-Tih range are mentioned by Robinson (Bibl. Res. I, 123; comp. 561-563, App. xxii)—er-Râkineh, the western; el-Mureikhy, the eastern; and el-Wârsah, between the two. These all meet south of Rûhalbeh (Rehoboth, Gen. xxvi, 22?), in about north latitude 31° 5', east longitude 34° 49', and thence diverge towards Hebron and Gaza. The eastern is noted by Russegger as 4863 feet above sea-level. Seetzen took the et-Tih range for the "Mount Seir," passed on the way from Sinai (Horeb, Deut. i, 2) to Kadesh Barnea by the Israelites (Reisen, III, 28; comp. Kruse, Anmerkungen, III, 417). It would form a conspicuous object on the left to the Israelites, going south-eastwards near the coast of the gulf of Suez. Seetzen, proceeding towards Suez, i. e. in the opposite direction, mentions a high sandy plain (Reisen, III, 111), apparently near Wady Ghûrdûl, whence its steep southern face was visible in a white streak stretching westwards and eastwards. Dr. Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 7) says, "However much the other mountains of the Tih are always alike—always faithful to their tabular outline and blanched desolation." They appear like "a long limestone wall." This traveller saw them, however, only "from a distance" (ibid. and note 2). Seetzen, who crossed them, going from Hebron to Sinai, says of the view from the highest ridge of the lower mountain-line, "What a landscape was that I looked down upon! On all sides the most frightful wilderness extended out of sight in every direction, without tree, shrub, or speck of green. It was an alternation of flats and hills, for the most part black as night, only the baked rock-walls on the hummocks and heights showed patches of dazzling whiteness. . . a striking image of our globe, when, through Phaeton's carelessness, the sun came too near to it" (Reisen, III, 50). Similarly, describing the scenery of the Wady el-Bîrâ, by which he passed the et-Tih range, he says, "On the south side rose a considerable range, desolate, craggy, and naked. All was limestone, chalk, and flint. The chalk cliffs gave the steep offset of the Tih range on its south side the aspect of a snow mountain" (p. 62). The proper entrance to the interior of this line, although not the usual one for travellers, is by Wady Wutah, which lies at the head of Wady Ghûrdûl, and is a fair specimen of the passes of this entire region.

The other routes which traverse the peninsula are, that from Hebron to Suez along the maritime plain, at a distance of from ten to thirty miles from the sea, passing el-'Arish; that from Suez to Tûr, along the coast of the gulf of Suez through the Kân; and that from Akabah, near Ezlungeber, ascending the western wall of the Arabah through the Wady el-Jelb, by several passes, not far from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, towards Hebron, in a course here nearly north-west, then again north. A modern mountain road has been partially constructed by Abbas Pasha in the pass of the Wady Hebrân, leading from the coast of the gulf of Suez towards the convent commonly called St. Catherine's. The ascent from the trough of the Arabah (which is steeper-sided at its north-west extremity than elsewhere) towards the general plateau is by the pass el-Khûrâr, by which the level of that broad surface is attained. The smaller plateau rests obliquely upon the latter, abutting on the Dead Sea at Masada, where its side and that of the lower floor converge, and is reached by ascending through the higher Nukb es-Sîfîn. Its face, corresponding to the southern face of the Tîh plateau, looks considerably to the west of south, owing to this obliquity, and is delineated like a well-defined mountain-wall in Klepert's map, having at the south-east angle a bold buttress in the Jebel Mûkhrâh, and at the south-west another in the Jebel 'Arâif en-Nakah, which stands out apparently in the wilderness like a promontory at sea. From the former mountain, its most southerly point, at about 30° 30' north latitude, this plateau extends northward a little east, till it merges in the southern slope of Judea, but at about 30° 50' north latitude is cut nearly through by the Wady Fikreh, trenching its area eastward, and not quite meeting the Wady Mûrâh, which has its declivity apparently towards the Wady el-'Arîsh westward. The face of mountain-wall mentioned above may probably be "the mountain of the Amorites," or this whole higher plateau may be so (Dent, i, 7, 19, 20). A line drawn northwards from Râs Mohammed passes a little to the west of 'Arâif en-Nakah.

On the whole, except in the Debbet er-Ramleh, sand is rare in the peninsula. There is little or none on the seashore, and the plain el-Kâa on the south-west coast is gravelly rather than sandy. Of sandstone on the edges of the granitic central mass there is no lack. It is chiefly found between the chalk and limestone of et-Tîh and the southern rocky triangle of Sînal. Thus the Jebel Dîlâl is of sandstone, in tall vertical cliffs, forming the boundary of er-Ramleh on the east side, and similar steep sandstone cliffs are visible in the same plain, lying on its north and north-west sides (Seetzen, Reisen, iii, 66; comp. iii, 413). In the Wady Mokattab "the soft surface of these sandstone cliffs offered ready tablets" to the unknown wayfarers who wrote the "Sinaitic inscriptions." This stone gives in some parts a strong red hue to the nearer landscape, and softens into shades of the subtlest delicacy in the distance. Where the surface has been broken away, or fretted and eaten by the action of water, these hues are most vivid (Sinai and Palestine, p. 10-12). It has been supposed that the Egyptians worked the limestone of et-Tîh, and that that material, as found in the pyramids, was there quarried. The hardness of the granite in the Jebel et-Tûr has been emphatically noticed by travellers. Thus, in constructing recently the mountain road for Abbas Pasha, "the rocks" were found "obstinately to resist even the gunpowder's blast," and the sharp, glass-like edges of the granite soon wear away the workmen's shoes and cripple their feet (Hamilton, Sinai, the Hedjaz, and Soudan, p. 17). Similarly, Laborde says (Comm. on Numb. xxiii, 36): "In my journey across that country (from Egypt, through Sînal to the Ghôr), I had carried from Cairo two pairs of shoes; they were cut, and my feet came through; when I arrived at Akabah, luckily I found in the magazines of that fortress two other pairs to replace them. On my return to Sînal, I was barefoot again. Linséin then procured me sandals half an inch thick, which, on my arrival in Cairo, themselves were reduced to nothing, though they had well preserved my feet." Seetzen noticed on Mt. St. Catherine that the granite was "fine-grained and very firm" (iii, 90). The name Jebel et-Tûr includes the whole cluster of mountains from el-Fureîl, on the north, to am-Shômer, on the south, and from Mûsa and ed-Deir, on the east, to Hum'r and Serbâl, on the west, including St. Catherine, nearly south-west of Mûsa. By "Sînal" is generally understood the Mûsa plateau, between the Wady Lejâ (Stanley, Map) and the Wady Shueîb, on its western and north-eastern flanks, and bounded north-westward by the Wady er-Rahéh, and south-eastward by the Wady Sebâyeh. The Arabs give the name of Tûr—properly meaning a high mountain (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 8)—to the whole region south of the Haj-route from Suez to Akabah as far as Râs-Mohammed. The name of Tûr is also emphatically given to the cultivable region lying south-west of the Jebel et-Tûr. Its fine and rich date-palm plantation lies a good way southwards, down the gulf of Suez. Here opens on the sea the most fertile wady now to be found in the peninsula (Burckhardt, Arab. ii, 362; Wellsted, ii, 9), receiving all the waters which flow down the range of Sînal westward (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 19).

II. Interior Peaks.—Nearly in the centre of the peninsula lies a wedge of granite, grûnstein, and porphyry rocks, rising to between eight thousand and nine thousand feet above the sea. Its shape resembles a scalene triangle, with a crescent cut from its northern or longer side, on which border Ruessegger's map gives a broad, skirting tract of old red sandstone, reaching nearly from gulf to gulf, and traversed by a few ridges, chiefly of a tertiary formation, running nearly north-west and south-east. On the south-west side of this triangle a wide alluvial plain—narrowing, however, towards the north—lines the coast of the gulf of Suez, while that on the eastern or Akabah coast is so narrow as almost to disappear. Between these alluvial edges and the granitic mass a strip of the same sandstone is interposed, the two strips converging at Râs Mohammed, the southern promontory of the whole. This nucleus of plutonic rocks is said to bear no trace of volcanic action since the original upheaval of its masses (Stanley, 21, 22). Laborde (Travels, p. 106) thought he detected some, but does not affirm it. Its general configuration runs into neither ranges nor peaks, but is that of a plateau cut across with intersecting wadis, whence spring the cliffs and mountain peaks, beginning with a very gradual and terminating in a very steep ascent.

In the present day the name Sînal, as above stated, is given by Christians to the cluster of mountains to which we have referred; but the Arabs have no other name for this group than Jebel et-Tûr, sometimes adding the distinctive epithet Sînal. In a stricter sense the name Sînal is applied to a very lofty ridge which lies between the two parallel valleys of Sher and el-Leja. Of this ridge the northern end is sometimes termed Horeb, the southern Sînal, now called Jebel Mûsa, or Moses' Mount. The entire district is a heap of lofty granitic rocks, with steep gorges and deep valleys. The several mountains in the peninsula seem all to ascend gradually till they reach their highest point in the group of Sînal, which presents a wild aspect of broken, cleft, and irregular masses, with pointed tops and precipitous sides. The entire group is made up of four huge ranges, which run south and north, with an inclination eastward. The ranges are separated from each other by deep valleys or watercourses.

Certain vivid impressions left on the minds of travellers seem to bespeak remarkable features for the rocks of this cluster, and they are generally so replete with interest that a few leading details of the aspect of principal mountains may find place here. Approaching the granitic nucleus from the north side, Seetzen found himself "ever between two high wild and naked cliffs of granite." All possible forms of mountains blended in the view of the group, conical and pointed, truncated, serrated, and rounded (Reisen, iii, 67, 69). Immediately previous to this he had been upon the perpendicular sandstone cliffs, which in el-Dîlâl bounded the sandy plain er-Ramleh on the eastern side, while similar steep sandstone cliffs lay on the north and north-west. On a nearer view small bright quartz-grit (Quarz-kiesel), of whitish-yellow and reddish-brown, was observed in the coarse-grained sandstone. Dr. Stanley, approaching from the north-west, from Wady Sheîlâ, through wadis Sidri and Feirân, found the rocks of various orders more or less interchanged and intermixed. In the first, "red tops resting on dark-green bases closed the prospect in front," doubtless both of granite. Contrast with this the description of Jebel Mûsa, as seen from Mt. St. Catherine (ibid. p. 77): "the reddish granite of its lower mass, ending in the gray-green granite of the peak itself." Wady Sidri lies "between red granite mountains descending precipitously on the sands," but just in the midst of it the granite is exchanged for sandstone, which last forms the rock-tablets of the Wady Mokattab, lying in the way to Wady Feirân. This last is full of "endless windings," and here "began the curious sight of the mountains, streaked from head to foot, as if with boiling streams of dark red matter poured over them, the igneous fluid squirted upwards as they were heaved from the ground. . . . The colors tell their own story, of chalk and limestone and sandstone and granite." Besides these, "huge cones of white clay and sand are at intervals planted along these mighty watercourses (the now dry wadis), apparently the original alluvial deposit of some tremendous antediluvian torrent, left there to stiffen into sandstone" (p. 77). The Wady Feirân is bounded southwards by the Jebel Nedîyeh and the Jebel Serbâl, which extend westwards to the maritime plain, and eastwards to the Sinaitic group, and on whose farther or southern side lies the widest part of el-Kâa, previously noticed as "the Wilderness of Sîu." Seetzen remarks that Jebel Feirân is not an individual mountain, but, like Sînal, a conspicuous group (Reisen, iii, 107; comp. iii, 413).

1. Serbâl rises from a lower level than the Sinaitic group, and so stands out more fully. Dr. Stewart's account of its summit confirms that of Burckhardt. The former mounted from the northern side a narrow plateau at the top of the easternmost peak. A block of gray granite crowns it and several contiguous blocks form one or two grottoes, and a circle of loose stones rests in the narrow plateau at the top (Tent and the Khan, p. 117, 118). The "five peaks," to which "in most points of view it is reducible, at first sight appear inaccessible, but are divided by steep ravines filled with fragments of fallen granite." Dr. Stanley mounted "over smooth blocks of granite to the top of the third or central peak," amid which "innumerable shrubs, like sage or thyme, grew to the very summit." Here, too, his ascent was assisted by loose stones arranged by human hands. The peak divides into "two eminences," on "the highest of which, as on the back of some petrified tortoise, you stand, and overlook the whole peninsula" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 71, 72). Ruessegger says "the stone of the peak of Serbâl is porphyry" (Reisen, iii, 276). Dr. Stewart mentions the extensive view from its summit of the mountains "which arise from the western shore of the gulf of Akabah," seen in the north-east, and of the Sinaitic range, "closely packed" with the intermediate Jebel Watelâh, "forming the most confused mass of mountain-tops that can be imagined" (p. 114, 115). His description of the ascent of the eastern peak is formidable. He felt a rarity of the air, and often had to climb or crawl flat on the breast. It was like "the ascent of a glacier, only of smooth granite, instead of ice." At a quarter of an hour from the summit he also "found a stair of blocks of granite, laid one above another on the surface of the smooth, slippery rock" (p. 118). On the northern summit are visible the remains of a building, "granite fragments cemented with lime and mortar," and "close beside it three of those mysterious inscriptions," implying "that this summit was frequented by unknown pilgrims who used those characters" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 72).

2. The approach to Jebel Mûsa from the west is only practicable on foot. It lies through Wady Solam and the Nûbb Hâwy, "Pass of the Wind," whose stair of rock leads to the second or higher stage of the great mountain labyrinth. Elsewhere this pass would be a roaring torrent. It is amid masses of rock, a thread of a stream just visible, and here and there forming clear pools, shrouded in palms, or leaving its clew to be traced only by rushes. From the head of this pass the cliff-front of Sinai comes in sight through "a long-continued plain between two precipitous mountain-ranges of black and yellow granite." This is the often-mentioned plain er-Râheh. Deep gorges enter it on each side, and the convent and its gardens close the view. The ascent of Jebel Mûsa, which contains "high valleys with abundant springs," is by a long flight of rude steps winding through crags of granite. The cave and chapel "of Elias" are passed on the slope of the ascent, and the summit is marked by the ruins of a mosque and of a Christian church. But, Strauss adds, "the 'Mount of Moses' rose in the south higher and higher still," and the point of this Jebel Mûsa, eighty feet in diameter, is distant two hours and more from the plain below (Sinai and Golgotha, p. 116). The Râs Süsfâfeh seems a small, steep, and high mountain, which is interposed between the slope of Jebel Mûsa and the plain; and, from its position, surveys both the openings of es-Sheikh north-east and of er-Râheh north-west, which converge at its foot. Opposite to it, across the plain, is the Jebel Fureîl, whose peak is cloven asunder, and the taller summit is again shattered and rent, and strewn, as by an earthquake, with its own fragments. The aspect of the plain between Jebel Fureîl, which here forms a salient angle, wedging southwards, and the Râs Süsfâfeh, is described as being, in conjunction with these mountains, wonderfully suggestive, both by its grandeur and its sublimeness, for the giving and the receiving of the Law. "That such a plain should exist at all in front of such a cliff is so remarkable a coincidence with the sacred narrative, as to furnish a strong internal argument, not merely of its identity with the scene, but of the scene itself having been described by an eye-witness" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 42, 48). The character of the Sinaitic granite is described by Seetzen (Reisen, iii, 86) as being (1) flesh-red with glass-colored quartz and black mica, and (2) grayish-white with abundance of the same mica. He adds that the first kind is larger-grained and handsomer than the second. Hamilton speaks of "long ridges of arid rock surrounding him in chaotic confusion on every side," and "the sharp broken penks of granite far and near as all equally desolate" (Sinai, the Hedjaz, and Soudan, p. 31). This view of "granite peaks," so thickly and wildly set as to form "a labyrinth" to the eye, was what chiefly impressed Dr. Stanley in the view from the top of Jebel Mûsa (Sinai and Palestine, p. 77). There the weather-beaten rocks are full of curious fissures and holes (p. 46), the surface being "a granite mass cloven into deep gullies and basins" (p. 76). Over the whole mountain the imagination of votaries has stamped the rock with tokens of miracle. The dendrites were viewed as memorials of the burning bush. In one part of the mountain is shown the impress of Moses' back, as he hid himself from the presence of God (ibid. p. 80). In another the hoof-print of Mohammed's mule; in the plain below a rude hollow between contiguous blocks of stone passes for the mould of the head of the golden calf; while in the valley of the Leja, which runs, parallel to and overhanging by the Jebel Mûsa's greatest length, into er-Râheh, close to Râs Süsfâfeh, the famous "Stone of Moses" is shown—"a detached mass from ten to fifteen feet high, intersected with wide slits or cracks . . . with the stone between them worn away, as if by the dropping of water from the crack immediately above." This distinctness of the mass of the stone lends itself to the belief of the rabble, that this "rock followed" the Israelites through the wilderness, which would not be the case with the non-detached offset of some larger cliff. The Koran also contains reference to "the rock with the twelve months for the twelve tribes of Israel," i. e. the aforesaid cracks in the stone, into which the Bedawin thrust grass as they mutter their prayers before it. Bishop Clayton accepted it as genuine, so did Whiston, the translator of Josephus; but it is a mere lucus à natura; and there is another fragment, "less conspicuous," in the same valley, "with precisely similar marks." In the pass of the Wady es-Sheikh is another stone, called the "Seat of Moses," described by Laborde (Sinai and Palestine, p. 46-48, and notes). Seetzen adds, some paces beyond the "Stone of Moses" several springs, copious for a region so poor in water, have their source from under blocks of granite, one of which is as big as this "Stone of Moses." These springs gush into a very small dyke, and thence are conducted by a canal to supply water to a little fruit-garden. . . . Their water is pure and very good. On this canal, several paces below the basin, lies a considerably bigger block of granite than the "Stone of Moses," "and the canal runs round so close to its side as to be half-concealed by it" (Reisen, iii, 95). He seems to argue that this appearance and half-concealment may have been made use of by Moses to procure belief in his having produced the water miraculously, which existed before. But this is wholly inconsistent, as indeed is any view of this being the actual "rock in Horeb," with his view of Rephidim as situated at el-Hessneh, the western extremity of the Wady Feîrân. Equally at variance with the Scriptural narrative is the claim of a hole in er-Râheh, below Râs Süsfâfeh, to be the "Pit of Korah," whose story belongs to another and far later stage of the march.

3. On Mt. St. Catherine the principal interest lies in the panorama of the whole peninsula which it commands, embraced by the converging horns of the Red Sea, and the complete way in which it overlooks the Jebel Mûsa, which, as seen from it, is by no means conspicuous, being about a thousand feet lower. Seetzen mounted by a path strewn with stones and blocks, having nowhere any steps, like those mentioned as existing at Serbâl, and remarks that Jasper and porphyry chiefly constitute the mountain. He reached the highest point in three hours, including intervals of rest, by a hard, steep path, with toilsome clambering; but the actual time of ascending was only one hour and three quarters. The date-palm plantation of Tûr is said to be visible from the top; but the haze prevailing at the time prevented this traveller from verifying it (Reisen, iii, 89-93). "The rock of the highest point of this mountain swells into the form of a human body, its arms swathed like that of a mummy, but headless—the counterpart, as it is alleged, of the corpse of the beheaded Egyptian saint. . . . Not improbably this grotesque figure furnishes not merely the illustration, but the origin, of the story" of St. Catherine's body being transported to the spot, after martyrdom, from Egypt, by angelic hands (Sinai and Palestine, p. 45).

4. The remaining principal mountain of this central cluster is named variously ed-Deir, "the Convent;" "Beitûn," from St. Episteme, the first abbess of the nunnery; "Solab," from "the Cross," which stands on its summit; and the "Mount of the Burning Bush," from a legend that a sun-beam shoots down, supposed miraculously, on one day in the year, through the mountain into the chapel "of the Burning Bush" (so called) in the convent (ibid. p. 78). In the pass of the convent rocks arise on every side, in long succession, fantastically colored, gray, red, blue, bright yellow, and bronze, sometimes strangely marked with white lines of quartz or black bands of basalt; huge blocks worn into fantastic shapes. . . . Interrupt the narrow track, which successive ages have worn along the face of the precipice, or, hanging overhead, threaten to overwhelm the traveller in their fall. The wady which contains this pass is called by the name of Shu'eib—a corruption of Hobab, the name of the father-in-law of Moses (ibid. p. 32, 33). At the foot of a mountain near the convent Seetzen noticed "a range of rocks of black horn-porphry, of hornblende, and black Jasper, and between their scrolls or volutes white quartz." The gardens, as has been noticed, are in sight from the approach through er-Râheh. Seetzen enlarges on their beauty, enhanced, of course, by the savage wild about them: "Indeed, a blooming vegetation appears in this climate wherever there is water" (Reisen, iii, 70, 73, 87). These proved capabilities of the soil are of interest in reference to the Moabit and to every period. As regards the convent, the reader may be referred to Dr. Stanley's animated description of its character, the policy of its founder, and the quality of its inmates (Sinai and Palestine, p. 51-56). This traveller took three hours in the ascent. "In the recesses between the penks was a ruined Bedawin village. On the highest level was a small natural basin, thickly covered with shrubs of myrrh—of all the spots of the kind that I saw, the best suited for the feeding of Jethro's flocks in the seclusion of the mountain" (ibid. p. 78). He thought the prospect, however, from its summit inferior in various ways to any of the other views from the neighboring mountains, Serbâl, St. Catherine, Jebel Mûsa, or Râs Süsfâfeh.

5. Three or four days' journey south from Jebel Mûsa lies Jebel nm-Shômer, which, although not quite so high as Mt. St. Catherine (the summit being 8449 feet high), may yet be said to be the culminant peak of the entire group. It was ascended by an English party in 1862, and still later by captain Palmer, of the exploration engineers. This mountain is connected in Arab legend with a romantic story of a fairy maiden's abode there, in whose honor one of its cliffs has received the name of Hajr el-Bint. The ascent is extremely laborious, but the view from the summit is extremely fine, embracing the Red Sea, the gulfs of Akabah and Suez, and the peaks and ridges between them, while Mt. St. Catherine bounds the scene on the north (see Palmer's Desert of the Exodus, p. 203 sq.).

6. The rocks, on leaving Sinai on the east for Akabah, are curiously intermingled, somewhat as in the opposite margin of the wadys Sidri and Mokatteb. Wady Beyal contains "hills of a conical shape, curiously slanting across each other, and with an appearance of serpentine and basalt. The wady . . . then mounted a short rocky pass—of hills capped with sandstone—and entered on a plain of deep sand—the first we had encountered—over which were scattered isolated clumps of sandstone, with occasional chalk. . . . At the close of this plain an isolated rock, its high tiers rising out of lower tiers, like a castle." Here "the level ranges of et-Tih rose in front." Soon after, on striking down, apparently north-eastwards, "a sandy desert, amidst fantastic sandstone rocks, mixed with lilac and dull green, as if of tufa," succeeded. After this came a desert strewn with "fragments of the Tih," i.e. limestone, but "presently," in the "Wady Ghifzaleh," which turns at first nearly due northward, and then deflects westward, the "high granite rocks" reappeared; and in the Wady el-Ain "the rocks rise, red granite or black basalt, occasionally tipped as if with castles of sandstone to the height of about one thousand feet . . . and finally open on the sea. At the mouth of the pass are many traces of flood—trees torn down, and strewn along the sand (ibid. p. 80, 81).

III. Comparative Fertility.—A most important general question is the extent to which this "wilderness" is capable of supporting animal and human life, especially when taxed by the consumption of such flocks and herds as the Israelites took with them from Egypt, and probably—though we know not to what extent this last was supplied by the manna—by the demand made on its resources by a host of from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 souls. In answer to this question, "much," it has been observed (Sinai and Palestine, p. 24), "may be allowed for the spread of the tribes of Israel far and wide through the whole peninsula, and also for the constant means of support from their own flocks and herds." Something, too, might be elicited from the undoubted fact that a population nearly, if not quite, equal to the whole permanent population of the peninsula does actually pass through the desert, in the caravan of the five thousand African pilgrims, on their way to Mecca. But, among these considerations, it is important to observe what indications there may be of the mountains of Sinai having ever been able to furnish greater resources than at present. These indications are well summed up by Ritter (Sinai, p. 298, 297). There is no doubt that the vegetation of the wadys has considerably decreased. In part, this would be an inevitable effect of the violence of the winter torrents. The trunks of palm-trees washed up on the shore of the Dead Sea, from which the living tree has now for many centuries disappeared, show what may have been the devastation produced among those mountains where the floods, especially in earlier times, must have been violent to a degree unknown in Palestine; while the peculiar cause—the impregnation of salt—which has preserved the vestiges of the older vegetation there, has here, of course, no existence. The traces of such a destruction were pointed out to Burchardt (Arab. p. 538) on the eastern side of Mount Sinai, as having occurred within half a century before his visit; also to Wellsted (ibid. 15), as having occurred near Tûr, in 1832. In part, the same result has followed from the reckless waste of the Bedawin tribes—reckless in destroying and careless in replenishing. A fire, a pipe, lit under a grove of desert trees, may clear away the vegetation of a whole valley.

"The acacia-trees have been of late years ruthlessly destroyed by the Bedawin for the sake of charcoal," which forms "the chief, perhaps it might be said the only, traffic of the peninsula" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 24). Thus, the clearance of this tree in the mountains where it abounded once, and its decrease in the neighbor groups in which it exists still, is accounted for, since the monks appear to have aided the devastation. Vegetation, where maintained, nourishes water and keeps alive its own life, and no attempts to produce vegetation anywhere in this desert seem to have failed. "The gardens at the wells of Moses, under the French and English agents from Suez, and the gardens in the valleys of Jebel Mûsa, under the care of the Greek monks of the Convent of St. Catherine," are conspicuous examples (ibid. p. 26). Besides, a traveller in the 16th century calls the Wady er-Rahel, in front of the convent, now entirely bare, "a vast green plain" (Monconys). In this wilderness, too, abode Amalek, "the first of the nations," powerful enough seriously to imperil the passage of the Israelites through it, and importantly contributing to subsequent history under the monarchy. Besides them we have "king Arad the Canaanite, who dwelt in the south," i.e. apparently on the terrace of mountain overhanging the Ghôr near Masada, on the Dead Sea, in a region now wholly desolate. If his people were identical with the Amorites or Canaanites of Numb. xiv, 45; Dent. i, 44, then, besides the Amalekites of Exod. xvii, 8, we have one other host within the limits of what is now desert who fought with Israel on equal or superior terms; and, if they are not identical, we have two such (Numb. xiv, 40-45; xxi, 1; xxxiii, 40; Dent. i, 43, 44). These must have been "something more than a mere handful of Bedawin. The Egyptian copper-mines, monuments, and hieroglyphics in Sârah el-Khadim and the Wady Mûghârah imply a degree of intercourse between Egypt and the peninsula" in a period probably older than the Exodus, "of which all other traces have long ceased. The ruined cities of Edom, in the mountains east of the Arabah, and the remains and history of Petra itself, indicate a traffic and a population in these remote regions which now is almost inconceivable" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 26). Even the 6th and 7th centuries A.D. showed traces of habitation, some of which still remain in ruined cells and gardens, etc., far exceeding the tale told by present facts. Setzen, in what is perhaps as arid and desolate a region as any in the whole desert, asked his guide to mention all the neighboring places whose names he knew. He received a list of sixty-three places in the neighborhood of Madârah, Petra, and Akabah, and of twelve more in the Ghôr es-Saphia, of which total of seventy-five all save twelve are now abandoned to the desert, and have retained nothing save their names — "a proof," he remarks, "that in very early ages this region was extremely populous, and that the furious rage with which the Arabs, both before and after the age of Mohammed, assailed the Greek emperors, was able to convert into a waste this blooming region, extending from the limit of the Hedjaz to the neighborhood of Damascus" (Reisen, iii, 17, 18).

Thus the same traveller in the same journey (from Hebron to Madinah) entered a wady called el-Jemen, where was no trace of water save moist spots in the sand, but on making a hole with the hand it was quickly full of water, good and drinkable (ibid. p. 18). The same, if saved in a cistern, and served out by sllices, might probably have clothed the bare wady with verdure. This is confirmed by his remark (ibid. p. 88) that a blooming vegetation shows itself in this climate wherever there is water, as well as by the example of the tank system as practiced in Hindustan. He also notices that there are quicksands in many spots of the Debbet er-Ramleh, which it is difficult to understand, unless as caused by accumulations of water (ibid. p. 67). Similarly in the desert Wady el-Kudeis, between Hebron and Sinal, he found a spot of quicksand with sparse shrubs growing in it (ibid. p. 48).

Now the question is surely a pertinent one, as compared with that of the subsistence of the flocks and herds of the Israelites during their wanderings, how the sixty-three perished communities named by Setzen's guide can have supported themselves? It is pretty certain that fish cannot live in the Dead Sea, nor is there any reason for thinking that these extinct towns or villages were in any large proportion near enough to its waters to avail themselves of its resources, even if such existed. To suppose that the country could ever have supported extensive coverts for game is to assume the most difficult of all solutions of the question. The creatures that find shelter about the rocks, as hares, antelopes, gazelles, jerboas, and the lizards that burrow in the sand (el-deobb), alluded to by this traveller in several places (iii, 67; comp. iii, 415-442, and Laborde, Comm. on Numb. xxxiii, 42), are far too few, to judge from appearances, to do more than eke out a subsistence, the staple of which must have been otherwise supplied; and the same remark will apply to such casual windfalls as swarms of edible locusts, or flights of quails. Nor can the memory of these places be probably connected with the distant period when Petra, the commercial metropolis of the Nabatheans, enjoyed the carrying trade between the Levant and Egypt westwards, and the rich communities farther east. There is, least of all, reason for supposing that by the produce of mines, or by asphalt gathered from the Dead Sea, or by any other native commodities, they can ever have enjoyed a commerce of their own. We are thrown back, then, upon the supposition that they must in some way have supported themselves from the produce of the soil. And the produce for which it is most adapted is either that of the date-palm, or that to which earlier parallels point, as those of Jethro and the Kenites, and of the various communities in the southern border of Judah (Numb. xxxiv, 4, 5; Josh. xv, 8, 4; 1 Sam. xxx, 27-31), viz., that of pasturage for flocks and herds, a possibility which seems solely to depend on adequately husbanding the water supplied by the rains. This tallies with the use of the word מִדְבָּר, for "wilderness," i.e. "a wide open space, with or without actual pasture, the country of the nomads, as distinguished from that of the agricultural and settled people" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 486, App. § 9). There seems, however, to be implied in the name a capacity for pasturage, whether actually realized or not. This corresponds, too, with the "thin," or rather "transparent coating of vegetation," seen to clothe the greater part of the Sinaitic wilderness in the present day (ibid. p. 16, 22), and which furnishes an initial minimum from which human fostering hands might extend the prospect of possible resources up to a point as far in excess of present facts as were the numbers of the Israelitish host above the six thousand Bedawin computed now to form the population of the desert. As regards the date-palm, Has-elquist speaks as though it alone afforded the means of life to some existing Arab communities. Hamilton (Sinai, p. 17) says that in his path by the Wady Hebrán, towards the modern Sinal, "small clumps of uncultivated date-trees rise between the granite walls of the pass, wherever the winter torrents have left sufficient detritus for their nourishment." Again, after describing the pass of the Convent, he continues, "beneath lies a veritable chaos, through which now trickles a slender thread of water, where in winter rushes down a boiling torrent" (ibid. p. 19). It is hardly too much to affirm that the resources of the desert, under a careful economy of nature's bounty, might be, to its present means of subsistence, as that winter torrent's volume to that summer streamlet's slender thread. In the Wady Hebrán this traveller found "a natural bath," formed in the granite by the 'Ain Hebrán, called "the Christians' pool" (ibid. p. 17). Two thirds of the way up the Jebel Mûsa he came upon "a frozen streamlet" (ibid. p. 30); and Setzen, on April 14, found snow lying about in sheltered clefts of Mt. St. Catherine, where the rays of the sun could not penetrate (iii, 92). Hamilton encountered on the Jebel Mûsa a thunderstorm, with "heavy rain" (Sinai, p. 16). There seems on the whole no deficiency of precipitation. Indeed, the geographical situation would rather bespeak a copious supply. Any southerly wind must bring a fair amount of watery vapor from the Red Sea, or from one of its expanding arms, which embrace the peninsula on either side, like the blades of a forax; while at no greater distance than one hundred and forty miles northward roll the waters of the Mediterranean, supplying, we may suppose, their quota, which the much lower ranges of the Th and Ojme cannot effectually intercept. Nor is there any such shelter from rain-clouds on either of the gulfs of Suez and Akabah, as the long line of mountains on the eastern flank of Egypt, which screens the rain supply of the former from reaching the valley of the Nile. On the contrary, the conformation of the peninsula, with the high wedge of granitic mountains at its core, would rather receive and condense the vapors from either gulf, and precipitate their bounty over the lower faces of mountain and troughs of wady, interposed between it and the sea. It is much to be regretted that the low intellectual condition of the monks forbids any reasonable hope of adequate meteorological observations to check these merely probable arguments with trustworthy statements of fact; but in the absence of any such register, it seems only fair to take reasonable probabilities fully into view. Yet some significant facts are not wanting to redeem in some degree these probabilities from the ground of mere hypothesis. "In two of the great wadis," which break the wilderness on the coast of the gulf of Suez, "Ghüründel, and Ueilt, with its continuation of the Wady Tayibeh, tracts of vegetation are to be found in considerable luxuriance." The wadis leading down from the Sinal range to the gulf of Akabah "furnish the same testimony, in a still greater degree," as stated by Rüppell, Miss Martineau, Dr. Robinson, and Burckhardt. "In three spots, however, in the desert . . . this vegetation is brought, by the concurrence of the general configuration of the country, to a still higher pitch. By far the most remarkable collection of springs is that which renders the clusters of the Jebel Mûsa the chief resort of the Bedawin tribes during the summer heats. Four abundant sources in the mountains immediately above the convent of St. Catherine must always have made that region one of the most frequented of the desert. . . . Oases (analogous to that of Ammon in the western desert of the Nile) are to be found wherever the waters from the different wadis or hills, whether from winter streams or from such living springs as have just been described, converge to a common reservoir. One such oasis in the Sinaitic desert seems to be the palm-grove of el-Wady at Tûr, described by Burckhardt as so thick that he could hardly find his way through it (Sinai and Palestine, p. 19, note 1; see Burckhardt, Arab. ii, 302). The other and the more important is the wady Feirán, high up in the table-land of Sinal itself" (ibid. p. 18, 19). Now, what nature has done in these favored spots might surely be seconded in others by an ample population, familiarized, to some extent, by their sojourn in Egypt with the most advanced agriculturists of the then world, and guided by an able leader who knew the country, and found in his wife's family others who knew it even better than he (Numb. x, 31). It is thus supposable that the language of Pea. civ. 35-38, is based on no mere pious imagery, but on actual fact: "He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water-springs. And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation; and sow the fields and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase. He bletheth them so that they are multiplied greatly; and suffereth not their cattle to decrease." Thus we may find an approximate basis of reality for the enhanced poetic images of Isaiah (xli, 19; lv, 13). Palestine itself affords abundant tokens of the resources of nature so husbanded, as in the artificial "terraces of which there are still traces to the very summits" of the mountains, and some of which still, in the Jordan valley, "are occupied by masses of vegetation" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 138, 297). In favored spots wild luxuriance testifies to the extent of the natural resources, as in the wady of the coast, and in the plain of Jericho, where "far and wide extends the green circle of tangled thickets, in the midst of which are the hovels of the modern village, beside which stood, in ancient times, the great city of Jericho" (ibid. p. 306). From this plain alone, a correspondent of the British consul at Jaffa asserts that he could feed the whole population of modern Syria (Cotton Supply Reporter, June 14, 1862). But a plantation redeemed from the wilderness is ever in the position of a besieged city; when once the defence of the human garrison is withdrawn, the fertility stimulated by its agency must obviously perish by the invasion of the wild. So we may probably suppose that, from numberless tracts, thus temporarily rescued from barrenness, in situations only moderately favorable, the traces of verdure have vanished, and the desert has reclaimed its own; or that there the soil only betrays its latent capacity by an unprofitable dampness of the sand.

Seetzen, on the route from Hebron to Sinai, after describing an "immense flinty plain," the "dearest and most desolate solitude," observes that, "as soon as the rainy season is over and the warm weather sets in, the pits (of rain-water) dry up, and it becomes uninhabitable," as "there are no brooks or springs here" (iii, 65, 66). Dr. Stewart (Tent and the Khan, p. 14, 15) says of the Wady Athli, which he would identify with Esham (Exod. xlii, 20; Num. xxxiii, 6), "sand-hills of considerable height separate it from the sea, and prevent the winter rains from running off rapidly. A considerable deposit of rich alluvial loam is the result, averaging from two to four inches in thickness, by sowing upon which immediately after the rains the Bedawin could certainly reap a rich harvest; but they affect to despise all agricultural labor. . . . Yet," he adds, "the region never could have supplied food by its own natural vegetation for so great a multitude of flocks and herds as followed in the train of the Israelites." This seems rather a precipitate sentence; for one can hardly tell what its improved condition under ancient civilization may have yielded, from merely seeing what it now is, after being overrun for centuries by hordes of contemptuous Bedawin. Still, as regards the general question, we are not informed what numbers of cattle followed the Israelites out of Egypt. We only know that "flocks and herds" went with them, were forbidden to graze "before the mount" (Sinai), and shared the fortunes of the desert with their owners. It further appears that, at the end of the forty years' wandering, two tribes and a half were the chief, perhaps the only, cattle-masters. And, when we consider how greatly the long and sore bondage of Egypt must have interfered with their favorite pursuit during the eighty years of Moses' life before the Exode, it seems reasonable to think that in the other tribes only a few would have possessed cattle on leaving Egypt. The notion of a people "scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt" (Exod. v. 12), in pursuit of wholly different and absorbing labor, being able generally to maintain their wealth as sheep-masters is obviously absurd. It is therefore supposable that Reuben, Gad, and a portion of Manasseh had, by remoteness of local position, or other favorable circumstances to us unknown, escaped the oppressive consequences to their flocks and herds which must have generally prevailed. We are not told that the lambs at the first passover were obtained from the flock of each family, but only that they were bidden to "draw out and take a lamb for an house"—a direction quite consistent in many, perhaps in most cases, with purchase. Hence it is probable that these two tribes and a half may have been the chief cattle-masters first as well as last. If they had enough cattle to find their pursuit in tending them, and the others had not, economy would dictate a transfer; and the whole multitude of cattle would probably fare better by such an arrangement than by one which left a few head scattered up and down in the families of different tribes. Nor is there any reason to think that the whole of the forty years' sojourn was spent in such locomotion as marks the more continuous portion of the narrative. The great gap in the record of events left by the statement of Deut. i, 46, "Ye abode in Kadesh many days," may be filled up by the supposition of quarters established in a favorable site, and the great bulk of the whole time may have been really passed in such stationary encampments. And here, if two tribes and a half only were occupied in tending cattle, some resource of labor, to avoid the embarrassing temptations of idleness in a host so large and so disposed to murmur, would be, in a human sense, necessary. Nor can any so probable an occupation be assigned to the remaining nine and a half tribes, as that of drawing from the wilderness whatever contributions it might be made to afford. From what they had seen in Egypt, the work of irrigation would be familiar to them, and from the prospect before them in Palestine the practice would at some time become necessary: thus there were on the whole the soundest reasons for not allowing their experience, if possible, to lapse. Irrigation being supposed, there is little, if any, difficulty in supposing its results: to the spontaneity of which ample testimony, from various travellers, has been cited above. At any rate it is unwise to decide the question of the possible resources of the desert from the condition to which the apathy and fastidiousness of the Bedawin have reduced it in modern times. On this view, while the purely pastoral tribes would retain their habits unimpaired, the remainder would acquire some slight probation in those works of the field which were to form the staple industry of their future country. But, if any one still insists that the produce of the desert, however suppositively improved, could never have yielded support for all "the flocks and herds"—utterly indefinite as their number is—which were carried thither; this need not invalidate the present argument, much less be deemed inconsistent with the Scriptural narrative. There is nothing in the latter to forbid our supposing that the cattle perished in the wilderness by hundreds or by thousands. Even if the words of Ps. civ, 38, be taken in a sense literally historical, they need mean no more than that, by the time they reached the borders of Palestine, the number so lost had, by a change of favorable circumstances, been replaced, perhaps even by capture from the enemy, over whom God, and not their own sword, had given them the victory. All that is contended for is that the resources of the wilderness were doubtless utilized to the utmost, and that the flocks and herds, so far as they survived, were so kept alive. What those resources might amount to, is perhaps nearly as indefinite an inquiry as what was the number of the cattle. The difficulty would "and its level" by the diminution of the latter till it fell within the limits of the former; and in this balanced state we must be content to leave the question.

Nor ought it to be left out of view, in considering any arguments regarding the possible change in the character of the wilderness, that Egyptian policy certainly lay, on the whole, in favor of extending the desolation to their own frontier on the Suez side; for thus they would gain the surest protection against invasion on their most exposed border; and as Egypt rather aimed at the development of a high internal civilization than an extension of influence by foreign conquest, such a desert frontier would be to Egypt a cheap defence. Thus we may assume that the Pharaohs, at any rate after the rise of the Assyrian empire, would discern their interest and would act upon it, and that the felling of wood and stopping of wells, and the obliteration, wherever possible, of oases, would systematically make the peninsula untenable to a hostile army descending from the north-east or the north.

IV. Natural History.—The domestic cattle of the Bedawin will of course be found here, but camels more numerous in the drier tracts of et-Tih. Schubert (Reisen, ii, 354) speaks of Sinai as not being frequented by any of the larger beasts of prey, nor even by jackals. The lion has become very rare, but is not absolutely unknown in the region (Neged, p. 46, 47). Foxes and hyenas, Ritter (xiv, 323) says, are rare, but Mr. Tyrwhitt mentions hyenas as common in the Wady Maghara; and Ritter (ibid.), on the authority of Burckhardt, ascribes to the region a creature which appears to be a cross between a leopard and a wolf, both of which are rare in the peninsula, but by which probably a hyena is to be understood. A leopard-skin was obtained by Burckhardt on Sinai, and a fine leopard is stated by Mr. Tyrwhitt to have been seen by some of his party in their ascent of un-Shomer in 1862. Schubert continues his list in the Hyraz Syriacus, the ibex—seen at Tufleh in flocks of forty or fifty together, and a pair of whose horns, seen by Burckhardt (Arab. p. 405, 406) at Kerek, measured three and a half feet in length—the webr, the shrew-mouse, and a creature which he calls the "spring-mouse" (mus jaculus or jerboa?), also a canis famelicus, or desert-fox, and a lizard known as the Agama Sinaitica, which may possibly be identical with one of those described below. Hares and jerboas are found in Wady Feiran. Schubert quotes (ibid. note) Rüppell as having found specimens of Helix and of Coccinella in this wilderness; for the former, comp. Forskål, Icones Rerum Natur. Tab. xvi. Schubert saw a fine eagle in the same region, besides catching specimens of thrush, with stonechat and other song-birds, and speaks of the warbling of the birds as being audible from the Mimosa bush. Clouds of birds of passage were visible in the Wady Murrah. Near the same tract of wilderness Dr. Stanley saw "the sky darkened by the flights of innumerable birds, which proved to be large red-legged cranes, three feet in height, with black and white wings measuring seven feet from tip to tip" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 82). At Tufleh crows abound. On Serbal Dr. Stewart saw the red-legged partridge (Tent and Khan, p. 117; comp. Burckhardt, Syria, p. 534); and the bird "katia," in some parts of the peninsula, comes in such numbers that boys sometimes knock over three or four at a single throw of a stick. Hasselquist, who saw it here and in Egypt, calls it a partridge, smaller than ours, and of a grayish color (p. 204). Ritter (xiv, 335) adds linnets(?), ducks, prairie-birds, beech-cocks, larks, a specimen of Finch, besides another small bird, probably redbreast or chaffinch, the varieties of falcon known as the Brachyactylus and the Niger, and, of course, on the coast, sea-swallows and mews. Flocks of blue rock pigeons were repeatedly seen by Mr. Tyrwhitt.

Seetzen, going from Hebron to Madra, makes mention of the following animals, whose names were mentioned by his guides, though he does not say that any of them were seen by himself: wolf, porcupine, wild-cat, ounce, mole, wild-weasel, and three not easily to be identified, the Sellek, dog-shaped, the Anasch, which devours the gazelle, and the Ikajib, said to be small and in shape like a hedgehog. Seetzen's list in this locality also includes certain reptiles, of which such as can be identified are explained in the notes: el-Melladsha, Um el-Zeimani, el-Lidsha or Leja, el-Harraba or Hirba, Jerrar or Jarrareh, el-Dab, otherwise Dide, el-Hanne or Hanan, el-Lefed; and among birds the partridge, duck, stork, eagle, vulture (er-Rakham), crow (el-Grab), kite (Hidayeh), and an unknown bird called by him Um-Said. His guides told him of ostriches as seen near Baidha on the way from Hebron to Sinai, and he saw a nightingale, but it seems at no great distance to the south of Hebron. The same writer also mentions the edible lizard, el-Doob, as frequently found in most parts of the wilderness, and his third volume has an appendix on zoology, particularly describing, and often with illustrations, many reptiles and serpents of Egypt and Arabia, without, however, pointing out such as are peculiar to the wilderness. Among these are thirteen varieties of lizard, twenty-one of serpent, and seven of frog, besides fifteen of Nile-fish. Laborde speaks of serpent-, scorpions, and black-scaled lizards, which perforate the sand, as found on the eastern border of Edom near Tufleth (Comm. on Numb. xxxiii, 42). The MS. of Mr. Tyrwhitt speaks of starting "a large sand-colored lizard, about three feet long, exactly like a crocodile, with the same bandy look about his fore-legs, the elbows turning out enormously." He is described as covered not only "in scales, but in a regular armor, which rattled quite loudly as he ran." He "got up before the dromedary, and vanished into a hole among some retem." This occurred at the head of the Wady Mokatteb. Hasselquist (p. 220) gives a Lacerta Scincus, "the Scinc," as found in Arabia Petraea, near the Red Sea, as well as in Upper Egypt, which he says is much used by the inhabitants of the East as an aphrodisiac, the flesh of the animal being given in powder, and in broth. He also mentions the edible locust, Gryllus Arabicus, which appears to be common in the wilderness, as in other parts of Arabia, giving an account of the preparation of it for food (p. 230-233). Burckhardt names a cape not far from Akabah, Räs Um Haye, from the number of serpents which abound there, and accordingly applied to this region the description of the "fiery serpents" in Numb. xxi, 4-9. Schubert (ii, 362) remarked the first serpents in going from Suez and Sinai to Petra, near el-Hudherah; he describes them as speckled. Burckhardt (Syria, p. 499, 502) saw tracks of serpents, two inches thick, in the sand. According to Rüppell, serpents elsewhere in the peninsula are rare. He names two poisonous kinds, Cerastes and Scytalis (Ritter, xiv, 329). The scorpion has given his name to the "Ascent of Scorpions," which was part of the boundary of Judah on the side of the southern desert. Wady es-Zuweirah, in that region, swarmed with them; and De Saucy says "you cannot turn over a single pebble in the Nejd (a branch wady) without finding one under it" (De Saucy, i, 529, quoted in Negeb, p. 51).

The reader who is curious about the fish, mollusca, etc., of the gulf of Suez should consult Schubert (ii, 263 note; 298 note; and for the plants of the same coast, 294 note). For a description of the coral-banks of the Red Sea, see Ritter (xiv, 476 sq.), who remarks that these formations rise from the coast-edge always in longitudinal extension parallel to its line, bespeaking a fundamental connection with the upheaval of the whole stretch of shore from south-east to north-west. A fish which Seetzen calls the Atlan may be mentioned as furnishing to the Bedawin the fish-skin sandals of which they are fond. Ritter (xiv, 327) thinks that fish may have contributed materially to the sustenance of the Israelites in the desert (Numb. xi, 22), as they are now dried and salted for sale in Cairo or at the Convent of St. Catherine. In a brook near the foot of Serbal, Schubert saw some varieties of Blaphrus, Dytiscus, Colymbetes, Gyrinus, and other water insects (Reisen, ii, 302 note).

As regards the flora of the desert, the most frequently found trees are the date-palm (Phoenix dactylifera), the desert acacia, and the tamarisk. The palms are almost always dwarf, as described in Sinai and Palestine, p. 20, but sometimes the "dôm" palm is seen, as on the shore of the gulf of Akabah (Schubert, ii, 370; comp. Robinson, i, 161). Hasselquist, speaking of the date-palm's powers of enervation, says that some of the poorer families in Upper Egypt live on nothing else, the very stones being ground into a provender for the dromedary. This tree is often found in tufts of a dozen or more together, the dead and living boughs interlacing overhead, the dead and living roots intertwining below, and thus forming a canopy in the desert. The date-palms in Wady Tûr are said to be all numbered and registered. The acacia is the Mimosa Nilotica, and this forms the most common vegetation of the wilderness. Its Arabic name is es-Seyâl, and it is generally supposed to have furnished the "Shittim wood" for the Tabernacle (Forskâll, Descr. Plant. Cent. vi, No. 90; Celsius, Hierobot. i, 498 sq.; Ritter, xiv, 336 sq.). See SHITTIM-TREE. It is armed with fearful thorns, which sometimes tear the packages on the camels' backs, and of course would severely lacerate man or beast. The gum arabic is gathered from this tree, on which account it is also called the Acacia gummiifera. Other tamarisks, beside the mannifera, mentioned above, are found in the desert. Grass is comparatively rare, but its quantity varies with the season. Robinson, on finding some in Wady Samghy, north-east from Sinai, near the gulf of Akabah, remarks that it was the first his party had seen since leaving the Nile. The terebinth (Pistachia terebinthus, Arab. Batm) is well known in the wadis about Beersheba, but in the actual wilderness it hardly occurs. For a full description of it see Robinson, ii, 222, 223, and notes, also i, 208, and comp. Celsius, Hierobot. i, 34. The "broom," of the variety known as retem (Heb. and Arab.), rendered in the authorized version by "juniper," is a genuine desert plant; it is described (Robinson, i, 203 and note) as the largest and most conspicuous shrub therein, having very bitter roots, and yielding a quantity of excellent charcoal, which is the staple, if one may so say, of the desert. The following are mentioned by Schubert (ii, 352-354) as found within the limits of the wilderness: Mespilus Aaronia, Colutea halepica, Atraphaxis spinosa, Ephedra alaba, Cytisus uniflorus, and a Cynomorium, a highly interesting variety, compared by Schubert to a well-known Maltese one. To these he adds in a note (ibid.): Dactylis nemphitica, Gagea reticulata, Rumex vesicarius, Artemisia Judaica, Leyssera discoides, Santolina fragrantissima, Seriola, Lindenbergia Sinaica, Lamium amplexicaule, Stachys affinis, Sisymbrium iris, Anchusa Milleri, Asperugo procumbens, Omphalodes intermedia, Dœmia cordata, Reseda canescens and pruinosa, Reaumuria vermiculata, Fumaria parviflora, Hypericum pendulum, Cleome trinervis, Eruca tomentosa, Malva Honbezey, Fagonia, Zygophyllum coccineum, Astragalus Fresenii, Genista monosperma. Schubert (ii, 357) also mentions, as found near Abu Suweir, north-east of Sinai, a kind of sage, and of what is probably goats-rue, also (note, ibid.) a fine variety of Astragalus, together with Linaria, Lotus, Cynosurus echinatus, Bromus tectorum, and (p. 365) two varieties of Pergularia, the Procera and the Tomentosa.

In the south-west region of the Dead Sea grows the singular tree of the apples of Sodom, the Asclepias gigantea of botanists. Dr. Robinson, who gives a full description of it (i, 522, 523), says it might be taken for a gigantic species of the milk-weed or silk-weed found in the northern regions of the United States. He condemns the notion of Hasselquist (p. 285, 287, 288) as an error, that the fruit of the Solanum melongena, when punctured by a tentredo, resulted in the Sodom apple, retaining the skin uninjured, but wholly changed to dust within (ibid. p. 524). It is the Osher of the Arabs. Robinson also mentions willows, hollyhocks, and hawthorns in the Sinaitic region, from the first of which the Räs Sufsafef, "willow-head," takes its name (i, 106, 109; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 17). He saw hyssop (Judea) in abundance, and thyme (Za'ter), and in the Wady Feiran the colocynth, the Kirdhy or Kirdi, a green thorny plant with a yellow flower; and in or near the Arabah, the juniper (Arar), the oleander (Difeh), and another shrub like it, the Zaknim, as also the plant el-Ghidah, resembling the Retem, but larger (i, 110, 83; ii, 124, 126, 119 and note). He also describes the Gharkûd, which has been suggested as possibly the "tree" cast by Moses into the waters of Marah (Exod. xv, 25). It grows in saline regions of intense heat, bearing a small red berry, very juicy, and slightly acidulous. Being constantly found among brackish pools, the "bane and antidote" would thus, on the above supposition, be side by side, but as the fruit ripens in June, it could not have been ready for its supposed use in the early days of the Exodus (Robinson, i, 66-69). He adds in a note that Forskâll gives it (Flor. Egypt. Arab. p. lxi), as the Peganum retumum, but that it is more correctly the Nitaria tridentata of Desfontaines (Flora Atlant. i, 372). The mountain Um Shomer takes its name from the fennel found upon it, as perhaps may Serbal from the Sermyrrh, which "creeps over its ledges up to the very summit"—a plant noticed by Dr. Stanley as "thickly covering" with its "shrubs" the "natural basin" which surmounts ed-Deir, and as seen in the Wady Seyâl, north-east from Sinai (Sinai and Palestine, p. 17, 78-80). Dr. Stanley also notices the wild thorn, from which the Wady Sidri takes its name, the fig-tree which entitles another wady the "Father of Fig-trees" (Abi Hamadi), and in the Wady Seyâl, "a yellow flowering shrub called Abethiran, and a blue, thorny plant called Silleh." Again, north-eastwards, in Wady el-'Ain were seen "rushes, the large-leaved plant called Esher," and farther down the "Lasa," or caper plant, springing from the clefts. "Seetzen's mesembryanthemum is noticed by Forskâll, who adds that no herb is more common in sandy desert localities than the second, the nodiflorum, called in Arabic the ghasâl. Hasselquist speaks of a mesemb which he calls the "fig-marigold," as found in the ruins of Alexandria; its agreeable saltish-aromatic flavor, and its use by the Egyptians in salads, accord closely with Seetzen's description. Seetzen gives also Arabic names of two plants, one called Ikedum by the guides, described as the size of heath, with blue flowers; the other named Subbh-el-dich, found to the north of Wady el-'Ain, which had a club-shaped sappy root, ranged a foot high above the earth, having scales instead of leaves, and covered, when he saw it, with large, golden flowers, clinging close together, till it seemed like a little nupinep (Kegel). Somewhat to the south of this he observed the "rose of Jericho" growing in the dreariest and most desolate solitude, and which appears always to be dead (Reisen, iii, 46, 54). In the region about Madura he also found what he calls "Christ's-thorn," Arab. el-Awasith, and an anonymous plant with leaves broader than a tulip, perhaps the Esher mentioned above. The following list of plants between Hebron and Madura is also given by Seetzen, having probably been written down by him from hearing them pronounced by his Bedawin guides, and some accordingly it has not been possible to identify with any known names—el-Khârdy, el-Bureid, a hyacinth, whose small pear-shaped bulb is eaten raw by the Bedawin, el-Arta, el-Ducherra, el-Sphâra (or Zafra), el-Erbân, el-Gdime, Schekera (or Shakoreeyeh), el-Metnân, described as a small shrub, el-Hmim, el-Schilueh, possibly the same as that called Silleh, as above, by Dr. Stanley, el-Khâta (or Khal), el-Handegúk (or Handakook), el-Liddemma, el-Haddád, Kalt, Addan el-Hammár (or 'Adán el-Himár'). Some more rare plants, precious on account of their products, are the following: Balsamum Aaronia, or nuz behen, called by the Arabs Peetuck el-Ilan, from which an oil is extracted having no perfume of its own, but scented at pleasure with jasmine or other odoriferous leaf, etc., to make a choice unguent. It is found in Mount Sial and Upper Egypt—Cucurbita Lágenaria, Arab. Charrah, found in Egypt and the deserts of Arabia, wherever the mountains are covered with rich soil. The tree producing the famous balsam called "of Mecca," is found many days' journey from that place, in Arabia Petrea. Linnæus, after some hesitation, decided that it was a species of Amyris. The olibanum frankincense is mentioned by Hasselquist as a product of the desert; but the producing tree appears to be the same as that which yields the gum arabic, viz., the Mimosa nilotica, mentioned above. The same writer mentions the Schænanthus officinalis, "camel's hay," as growing plentifully in the deserts of both the Arabias, and regards it as undoubtedly one of the precious aromatic and sweet plants which the queen of Sheba gave to Solomon (Hasselquist, p. 256, 288, 296, 297; comp. p. 250, 251, 300). Fuller details on the facts of natural history of the region will be found in the writers referred to, and some additional authorities may be found in Sprengel, Historia rei Herb. vol. II.

Besides these, the cultivation of the ground by the Sinitic monks has enriched their domain with the choicest fruit-trees, and with a variety of other trees. The produce of the former is famed in the markets of Calro. The cyresses of the convent are visible far away among the mountains, and there is a single conspicuous one near the "cave of Elias" on Jebel Mûsa. Besides, they have the silver and the common poplar, with other trees, for timber or ornament. The apricot, apple, pear, quince, almond, walnut, pomegranate, olive, vine, citron, orange, cornelian cherry, and two fruits named in the Arabic Shellúk and Bargúk, have been successfully naturalized there (Robinson, i, 94; Seetzen, iii, 70, etc.; Hasselquist, p. 426; Sinai and Palestine, p. 52). Dr. Stanley views these as mostly introduced from Europe; Hasselquist, on the contrary, views them as being the originals whence the finest varieties we have in Europe were first brought. Certainly, nearly all the above trees are common enough in the gardens of Palestine and Damascus. See SINAI.

Wild Goat is the rendering in the A. V. of two Heb. words which seem to refer to cognate species of the caprid tribe. See GOAT.

1. The more frequent term is always found in the plur. יְעִלִים, yēlīm (Sept. τραγέλαφοι or ἐλάφοι, Vulg. ibices), which occurs 1 Sam. xxiv, 2; Job xxxix, 1; Psa. civ, 18; besides the fem. sing. יְעִלָה, yauláh ("roe,"

Wild Goat of Sial.

Prov. v, 19), it is not at all improbable, as the Vulg. interprets the word, that some species of ibex is denoted, perhaps the Capra Sinaitica (Ehrenb.), the beden or jaela of Egypt and Arabia. This ibex was noticed at Sinai by Ehrenberg and Hemprich (Sym. Phys. t. 18), and by Burckhardt (Trav. p. 526), who (p. 405) thus speaks of these animals: "In all the valleys south of the Mojeb, and particularly in those of Mojeb and El-Ahsa, large herds of mountain goats, called by the Arabs beden, are met with. This is the steinbock or bouquetin of the Swiss and Tyrol Alps. They pasture in flocks of forty and fifty together. Great numbers of them are killed by the people of Kerek and Tafyle, who hold their flesh in high estimation. They sell the large knotty horns to the Hebrew merchants, who carry them to Jerusalem, where they are worked into handles for knives and daggers. . . . The Arabs told me that it is difficult to get a shot at them, and that the hunters hide themselves among the reeds on the banks of streams where the animals resort in the evening to drink. They also asserted that, when pursued, they will throw themselves from a height of fifty feet and more upon their heads without receiving any injury." Hasselquist (Trav. p. 190) speaks of rock goats (Capra cerriacpra, Linn.) which he saw hunted with falcons near Nazareth. But the C. cerriacpra of Linnæus is an antelope (Antelope cervicapra, Pall.). The Capra Sinaitica, however, is not identical with the Swiss ibex or steinbock (C. ibex), though it is a closely allied species. The wild goat of Arabia and Palestine differs only from the European in the shape and marking of the horns and in its lighter color. It is still occasionally found in the neighborhood of Engedi, its old resort, which thence took the name (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 96). See IBEX.

2. The other word rendered "wild goat" is יְעִלָה, akbô, which occurs only in Deut. xiv, 5. as a clean animal, and which the Sept. and Vulg. understand to be a kind of deer (τραγίλαφος, tragelaphus), and the Targums and Syriac a wild goat (ܐܢܬܝܐ). Gesenius concludes in favor of the roe buck; while others prefer the chamois, and others the gazelle. Gesenius derives it from Arab. anah, while Fürst says it is to be traced to a radix nominalis, common to both the Sanscrit and Shemitic tongues. Schultens (Origines Hebraicae) conjectures that the name arose ob fugacitatem, from its shyness and consequent readiness to flee; and Dr. Harris points out what he takes to be a confirmation of this conjecture in Shaw's Travels, which, from the translations of the Sept. and Vulg., makes it a goat-deer, or Tragelaphus, such as the lerci or fishal, by mistake referred to Capra mambria of Linnæus; whereas that naturalist (System. Nat. 13th ed. by Gmelin) places lerci among the synonyms of Ant. cervicapra, which does not suit Shaw's notice, and is not known in Western Asia. The fishal is, however, a ruminant of the African desert, possibly one of the larger Antilopidae, with long mane, but not as yet scientifically described. Some have referred the akkô to the ahu of the Persians, i. e. the Capreolus pygargus, or the "tailless roe" (Shaw, Zool. ii, 287), of Central Asia. If we could satisfactorily establish the identity of the Persian word with the Hebrew, the animal in question might represent the akkô of the Pentateuch, which might formerly have inhabited the Lebanon, though it is not now found in Palestine. Perhaps the paseng (Cup. agagrus, Cuv.), which some have taken to be the parent stock of the common goat, and which at present inhabits the mountains of Persia and Caucasus, may have in Biblical times been found in Palestine, and may be the akkô of Scripture. It is, on the whole, as likely to have been the beden, or wild goat of Mt. Sinai, as any other. See DEER; ROE.

Wild Grape is the rendering of the A. V. at Isa. v, 2, 4 of the Heb. word which occurs only in the plur. be'ushim, בְּעֻשִׁים, and indicates a noxious species of plant or kind of fruit. In form the word is a pass. participle of עָשָׂה, which means to smell offensively, as many poisonous vegetables do; and this connects it radically with עֲשָׂה, boshdh ("cockles," Job xxxi, 40), although the two seem to denote different plants, but both useless. The Sept. gives ἀκρίδας as the Greek equivalent; which is certainly a mistake, unless they had some other reading of the original text. The rendering of Aquila is σαρπίαι, that of Symmachus ἀτελή; both of which give rather the etymological meaning or force of the original word than translate it into its Greek equivalent as a significative appellation. The rendering of Jerome is labrusce; and this has been followed by Luther (Herlinge) and the A. V. (wild grapes). The species of plant intended has been supposed by some to be the Vitis labrusca, a plant which produces small berries of a dark-red color when ripe, but sour to the taste; Hasselquist suggests the Solanum incanum, or gray nightshade; and Celsius contends for the Aconitum napellus, wolfsbane. It seems more probable, however, that no specific plant is referred to in the passage of the prophet; but that the word is simply used as an adjective with its substantive understood, as a designation of bad or worthless grapes. The Lord expected that his vineyard should produce grapes, but it produced only be'ushim, vile, uneatable grapes. See Rosenmüller, Bibl. Bot. (Eng. transl.), p. 111; and Comment. ad loc.; Gesenius, Henderson, Knobel, ad loc. See GRAPE.

Wiley, ISAAC WILLIAM, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Lewiston, Pa., March 29, 1825. He was converted when ten years old, at eighteen began to preach, and in 1846 graduated from the medical department of the University of the City of New York. After three years of practice as a physician in Pennsylvania, he joined the Philadelphia Conference, and in 1851 went as a missionary to China. Three years afterwards he returned to America, and was engaged in pastoral work in New Jersey, including an agency for Pennington Seminary. In 1864 he was elected editor of The Ladies' Repository, at Cincinnati, and in 1872 bishop, an office which he held until his death, Nov. 22, 1884, at Foo-Chow, China. He was distinguished for a calm but impressive manner, deep cordiality of disposition, and great tact and method in labor. See Meth. Review, Jan. 1886; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1884, p. 318.

Wilhelm, LUDWIG WILHELM, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Neuenhain, Nov. 19, 1796. He studied at Marburg and Heidelberg, was in 1816 assistant preacher at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, in 1818 third preacher, in 1828 second, and in 1836 first preacher at Wiesbaden. In 1858 he was made bishop of Nassau, and died May 11, 1882, doctor of theology. (B. P.)

Wilhelmina, a fanatical woman of Milan, who died in 1281, pretended to be the daughter of Constantia, queen of Primislaus, king of Bohemia. She spent the last twenty or thirty years of her life in Milan in pious labors, especially in works of active charity. She had organized a band of followers (afterwards known as Wilhelminians), who revered her as a saint, and began in her lifetime to make her the object of extravagant and fanatical veneration. This increased after her death to an undue extreme. She had claimed that her birth was announced to her mother by the angel Raphael, just as the birth of Christ was announced to Mary by the angel Gabriel, and that the Holy Spirit became incarnate in her for the purpose of working out the salvation of Jews, Saracens, and false Christians, as that of true Christians had been wrought by Christ. She deluded her followers into the expectation, first, of her repeating in her own person the sufferings of Christ, and, secondly, of her resurrection and return to them after her death. But, with no indications of any fulfillment of such promises, a number of her followers, headed by Andrew Saramita, disinterred the recently buried body, arrayed it in costly robes, erected a magnificent monument over the grave, and proclaimed the worship of the Holy Ghost incarnate in Wilhelmina, as of equal importance with the worship of the incarnate Son of God. She had appointed a nun named Mayfreda, of Tirovano, as her vicegerent under the new dispensation of the Holy Ghost—a female pontiff to represent her as the Roman pontiffs represent St. Peter. The sect was entirely rooted out about the year 1300, the remnant of her followers having perished at the stake, and her tomb and dead body having been destroyed. See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, v, 95 sq.; Palacky, Literary Tour to Italy (Prague, 1838), p. 72 sq.; Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. v.

Wilken, FRIEDRICH, a famous historian, was born May 23, 1777, at Ratzeburg, in the duchy of Lauenburg. He studied at Göttingen, at first theology, but afterwards classic and Oriental philology and history. In 1798 he received the prize for an essay, De Bellorum Cruciatorum ex Abulfeda Historia; in 1805 he was appointed professor of history at Heidelberg, and in 1807 director of the university library. In 1817 he was called to Berlin as first librarian and professor in the university, and in 1819 he was made a member of the Academy of Sciences. He undertook a literary journey to Italy in 1826; in 1829 he went in behalf of the government to France and England, and in 1838 to Wiesbaden and Munich. He died Dec. 24, 1840. His main work is the Gesch. der Kreuzzüge nach morgenländischen und abendländischen Berichten (Leips. 1807–32, 7 vols.). He also wrote, Gesch. der Bildung, Erziehung und Vernichtung der alten Heidelberger Büchersammlung (Heidelb. 1817); — Gesch. der königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin (Berlin, 1828). (B. P.)

Wilkie, Sir DAVID, a British painter of great

celebrity, was born at the manse of the parish of Culta, on the banks of Edenwater, in Fifeshire, Scotland, Nov. 18, 1785. He received a limited education at the grammar-school of Kettle, when he was sent to the Trustees' Academy of Edinburgh for the Encouragement of Manufactures. Here, in 1803, he won the prize of ten guineas for painting Callisto in the Bath of Diana. In 1804 he returned home, and spent some time in painting portraits and scenes of common life. He then went to London, and entered the Royal Academy as a student. His picture of the Village Politicians, exhibited in 1806, gained for the young artist great notoriety, and, indeed, established his fame. He now settled in London, and was busily employed in the execution of his commissions for several years. In 1811 he became a member of the Royal Academy. In 1823 he was appointed limner to the king in Scotland. Two years later he made a tour of the Continent, spending the greater portion of the time in Italy. In 1830 he became painter in ordinary to his majesty. In 1832 he exhibited his celebrated picture of John Knox Preaching the Reformation in St. Andrew's, painted for Sir Robert Peel for twelve hundred guineas. It is claimed that his greatest historical work is the picture of Sir David Baird Discovering the Body of the Sultan Tipoo Saib, after Storming Seringapatam. In 1840 he started for the East, making an extended tour through Holland, Southern Germany, Constantinople, the Holy Land, and Egypt. He died, on his return to England, on board the "Oriental," then off Gibraltar, June 1, 1841. His works have been made known to the world by the engravings of Raimbach, Burnet, Cousins, Doo, and C. Fox.

Wilkins, Ann, an eminent Methodist Episcopal missionary, was born in the state of New York, June 30, 1806. She was converted in 1836, and sailed as a missionary for Africa, June 15, 1837. She labored there until 1841, when she returned to America to recruit her health; went out again in 1842, returned with broken health in 1853; sailed again in 1854, but was once more obliged to return, in 1857. She was preparing for active service in a juvenile asylum, when she suddenly died, Nov. 13 of the last-named year.

Wilkinson, Henry, eldest of those thus named, was born in the vicarage of Halifax, Yorkshire, Oct. 9, 1566. He went to Oxford in 1581, was elected fellow of Merton College, and graduated in 1586, in 1601 became rector at Waddesdon, in Buckinghamshire, and died there, March 19, 1647. He was one of the Puritan divines of the Westminster Assembly, and wrote, A Catechism:—Debt-book, etc.

Wilkinson, Jemima, a fanatical Quakeress, was born at Cumberland, R. I., in 1753. In October, 1776, on recovering from an attack of sickness, in which she had fallen into a kind of trance, she announced that she had been raised from the dead, and had received a divine commission as a religious teacher. She gathered around her a few proselytes, who styled themselves "Universal Friends" (q. v.), and formed a settlement between Seneca and Crooked lakes, N. Y., which she called New Jerusalem. Here she secured the belief of her followers in the most absurd pretensions. She claimed to be inspired and to have reached absolute perfection. She pretended to foretell future events, to discern the secrets of the heart, and to have the power of healing diseases. She declared that those who refused to believe in her claims rejected the counsel of God to their own hurt. She even claimed to be Christ in his second coming. On one occasion she declared her intention of walking across Seneca Lake; but when all the preparations were made, she inquired of her followers whether they had faith in her power to do so, and on their replying in the affirmative, said that as they believed in her power it was unnecessary to display it. She claimed to be the one by whom the millennium was to be established, and two of her disciples declared themselves to be the "two witnesses" mentioned in the book of Revelation. She lived in a luxurious style in an elegant house, having amassed a large fortune by the donations made by her followers. She died in 1819. See Hudson, History of Jemima Wilkinson (Geneva, N. Y., 1821); and Memoirs of Bath.

Wilkinson, John, a Puritan divine, brother of the Henry foregoing, was born in Halifax, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Magdalen College; in 1605 principal of Magdalen Hall, and in 1648 president of Magdalen College. He died Jan. 2, 1649.

Willard, SAMUEL, D.D., a Congregational minister, nephew of president Joseph Willard, was born at Petersham, Mass., in 1775. He graduated from Harvard College in 1803, was tutor at Bowdoin College in 1804 and 1805, became pastor of the Church at Deerfield in 1807, and resigned his pastorate, on account of the total loss of sight, in 1829, but preached occasionally until within a month of his death, which occurred Oct. 8, 1859. He was the author of, The Deerfield Collection of Sacred Music (1808):—Original Hymns (1823):—An Index of the Bible (1826):—An Improved Reader (1827):—The General Class-book (1828):—Sacred Poetry and Music Reconciled: a Collection of Hymns (1830):—An Introduction to the Latin Language (1835), and other school-books (some anonymous), several sermons, papers in periodicals, and left hymns and other works in MS.

William of Conches, a philosopher of the 12th century, was a native of Conches, Normandy, and instructed at the cathedral-school of Chartres. William was famous as a grammarian, but took part in theological questions. His work, entitled Philosophia, in which he espoused Abelard's doctrine of the Trinity, was attacked after his master's condemnation by William of St. Thierry, and the author did not hesitate to recant his errors. William of Conches died in 1154. His Philosophia was published three times, with different titles, and under the name of three different authors: 1. Philosophicarum et Astronomicarum Institutionum Guilielmi, Hirsangiensis Olim Abbatis, Libri Tres (Basle, 1531); 2. Περί ἐκείνων σive Elementorum Philosophiæ Libri IV, in Beda's Opera, ii, 311-343 (Basle 1563); 3. De Philosophia Mundi, by Honorius of Autun, in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xx (Lyons, 1667). Another work of William is Drugmaticon, in which he rejects the errors expressed in his Philosophia. The Drugmaticon, too, is extant under at least six different titles. William also wrote a commentary on Boethius's De Consolatione Philosophiæ. William III of England (William Henry of Nassau), prince of Orange, stadtholder of Holland, was born at the Hague, Nov. 4, 1650. He was the son of William II of Orange, by Mary, daughter of Charles I of England, and was born to a large inheritance, though his party was kept in check for some time by the influence of Cromwell. The house of Orange had long sought to obtain supreme power in Holland, a country which its greatest member had freed from the Spanish yoke. The death of William II eight days before the birth of his son put a stop to the projects for the establishment of a despotism over the republic, and threw the power into the hands of the opposite party. For years the Orange party was depressed for want of a representative of sufficient influence to maintain its policy and secure the stadtholdership. The republic was governed by Jan de Witt, the grand pensionary. The attack upon Holland by France and England combined, in 1672, made a great change in the fortunes of the young prince of Orange. He was immediately chosen captain and admiral-general of the United Provinces. The contest was at first unfavorable to the Provinces, but by the wisdom and determination of the young stadtholder, the struggle, which lasted for nearly seven years, was, in 1678, terminated by the treaty of Nimeguen, in a manner highly advantageous and honorable to Holland. This was brought about more especially by the diplomatic abilities of William, who detached England from the alliance and brought her over to the side of the Dutch. A few years before their ruin had seemed inevitable, and the fame of William became great over Europe. In November, 1677, William had married his cousin Mary, eldest daughter of James, duke of York, afterwards James II. This marriage was entered into chiefly for political purposes, and proved very popular in both countries, the prince being regarded as the natural head of the Protestant party, and his wife being expected to succeed to the English throne. James II came to the throne in 1685, and determined to establish the Catholic religion; but William was still the champion of Protestantism, and in 1686 became the head of a league formed among the Protestant princes of Germany, the kings of Spain, Sweden, and others, having for its object the crushing of the power of Louis XIV of France, whose influence was the dread of all Europe, and who was the most dreaded foe of Protestantism. The treaty by which the alliance was constituted was signed at Augsburg in July, 1686. The oppressions of James II drove many of the Protestants into exile, and Holland became the place of refuge for the discontented English. The national dissatisfaction became so great that on June 30, 1688, a number of prominent English statesmen invited the prince of Orange to enter England with an army. William conducted his operations with great secrecy and skill, and on Nov. 15 of the same year he landed at Torbay with an army of fifteen thousand men, composed of English and Dutch. Soon the whole country was at his side, and James was an exile in France. Men of influence of all parties gave him their presence and support; and on Dec. 18 following he entered London triumphantly as a national deliverer. The adherents of James held out for some time in Scotland and Ireland, but the death of Dundee ended the resistance of the Highlanders; while in Ireland it was quelled after a vigorous contest in 1691. In spite of his sterling qualities and of the debt which they owed him, the English nation never really liked William III. In 1695 the death of queen Mary diminished her husband's influence, and leaving factious opposition at home, he had to maintain unequal strife with Louis, until the treaty of Ryswick was brought about by sheer exhaustion on both sides, in September, 1697. During the whole war William had been disturbed by Jacobite plots, some of them against his life. A partition treaty regarding Spain was violated by Louis, who took the throne of that country for his grandson, the duke of Anjou, and the French king, on the death of James II, acknowledged his son as successor. The English, enraged at this, were making preparations for a powerful invasion, when William was thrown from his horse while hunting, and died March 8, 1702. His career was one of incessant and strenuous activity, and he carried himself victoriously amidst immense difficulties and numerous discomfitures. The predominant motive of his foreign policy from the beginning of his career as stadtholder of Holland until the close of it as king of England was resistance to the aggressive and tyrannous policy of Louis XIV. There is little room for doubt that he accepted the English throne for the sole purpose of enhancing his power against French despotism. While it is true that his policy dragged England more thoroughly than before into the circle of European politics, yet it brought to the English a free constitution, with political institutions capable of receiving indefinite improvement without danger of destruction. The sacred principle of toleration, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, was firmly established, though its full bearings and application were not yet developed or even clearly apprehended. Covenants, in the North, and high-churchmen, in the South, hated him, but the great mass of moderate and reasonable Protestants felt that he was a thoroughly practical and inflexibly just sovereign. He loved his own countrymen, and advanced them to positions of trust and honor; but no discredit is to be attached to him on this account, for they were loyal to him and not disloyal to England. While his temper was cold, the nobler passions of man were in him deep and strong, and he possessed that stern love of truth, honor, and right that distinguishes a moral hero. Few greater kings have ever ruled in England, but the massacre of the Macdonalds of Glencoe, and his conduct towards the promoters of the Darien scheme are two blots on his reputation which his most thorough-going apologists have been unable to efface. In addition to the above-mentioned services to the English nation it may be mentioned that during his reign the Bank of England was founded, the modern system of finance introduced, ministerial responsibility recognised, and the liberty of the press secured. His manner was wholly Dutch, and even among his own countrymen he was thought blunt. In his theological opinions he was decided but not illiberal. See Trevor, Life and Times of William III (Lond. 1835-36, 2 vols.); Vernon, Court and Times of William III (ibid. 1841, 2 vols.); Macaulay, History of England (1849-55); Ranke, Englische Geschichte vornehmlich im 17. Jahrhundert (1859-67, 6 vols.; Engl. transl. 1875).

WILLIAM OF TYRE, a prominent ecclesiastic and judicious historian, lived in the time of the Crusades. He was born in Syria about A.D. 1130, and reared at Antioch or Jerusalem. About 1160 he visited Italy and France as a student of the liberal arts, and on his return to Jerusalem, after an absence of several years, he became the friend and instructor of king Amalric (reigned 1162-1173). In 1167 he became archdeacon of Tyre, and in the same year was employed by Amalric to negotiate a league with the emperor Manuel I at Constantinople, with a view to the invasion of Egypt. Soon afterwards some unpleasantness arose between his archbishop, Frederic of Tyre, and himself, in consequence of which he visited Rome; and immediately after this Amalric gave him charge of the education and training of his son, the prince Baldwin. In the summer of 1170 a terrible earthquake convulsed the East, destroying many ancient towns and numerous lives, and overthrowing several strong towers in Tyre. King Amalric died July 11, 1173, and his successor, Baldwin, called William to the post of chancellor; about the same time the archbishop Frederic died, and William was given the vacant see, being the sixth incumbent of that diocese since the founding of the kingdom of Jerusalem. In this capacity he was present, in 1178, at the third Lateran synod at Rome, and on his return wrote out the decisions of the synod, together with a list of the names and titles of all participants in its business, in a work which he deposited in the archives of the principal church at Tyre. He spent seven months in Constantinople in the transaction of business for his see, then visited Antioch on a mission from the emperor Manuel, and, after an absence from home of one year and ten months, returned to Tyre. So much may be gathered from his own writings, which form the almost exclusive source for his life. An ancient French writer adds the statement that William was poisoned through the agency of the patriarch of Jerusalem, Heraclius, at Rome, whither he had gone to effect the deposition of that prelate. Another tradition states instead that William acted as a commissioner to the West after the taking of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1188, and was appointed legate in matters pertaining to crusades by pope Gregory VIII, being present as such at a meeting of Philip Augustus of France and Richard of England, which took place between Gisors and Trie.

William of Tyre composed two historical works, one of which contained the history of Eastern princes from Mohammed to his own time, a period of five hundred and seventy years (Gesta Principum Orientalium). It was based upon Arabic sources which were placed at his disposal by the liberality of king Amalric. This work is no longer extant. The other work contains the history of the Crusades, from A.D. 1100 to 1184, in twenty-three books, the last of which is unfinished (Historia Rerum in Partibus Transmarinis Gestarum a Tempore Mahumeth usque ad A.D. 1184). It was drawn from documentary sources and from his personal observations and carefully managed inquiries among his contemporaries. Its learning is very great as respects natural, political, and ecclesiastical conditions in both the East and West, and the literatures of the Arabic, Syriac, Greek, and Latin languages. Its matter also is very full, and its tone, upon the whole, impartial, and little affected by the credulous belief of his age in wonders. Its style, finally, is that of animated description, such as best harmonizes with the portrayal of events in which the military element plays a principal part. It earned for its author the reputation of being one of the foremost historical writers of the Middle Ages. The oldest edition of this work extant is that of Baale (1549 fol.; 2d ed. 1560). Other editions are by Bongarsius (1564), in Gesta Dei per Francos, i, 625 sq.; G. du Préau (in French, Paris, 1573 fol.). The continuation of the work to 1285, by an unknown writer, is given in Martene, Thesaur. v, 581. An abridgment is given in Bernhard, Thesaurus, with continuation, in French, to 1284; in Latin, by the Dominican Pippin (1820), in Muratori, Thesaurus, vii, 657 sq. A German edition was issued in 1844 at Stuttgart, by Kausler, with the title, Gesch. d. Kreuzzüge u. d. Königreichs Jerusalem. Comp. Bongarsius, Præf.; Vossius, De Hist. Lat. p. 53; Fabricius, Bibl. Lat. Medii ævi, h. v.; Wähler, Handbuch d. Gesch. d. Literatur (2d ed. Leipsic, 1823), ii, 222; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v.

Williamites, an order of monks deriving their name from a hermit, who, after conversion from a licentious life, had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem by the advice of hermits and pope Eugenius III, and had then, in 1153, established a hermitage in a desert of Tuscany, near Pisa. Disorderly followers destroyed all prospect of retirement here, and he sought a new refuge in the depths of a forest on Monte Pruno. New disciples gathered about him, who, in time, became offended with him and expelled him from their society. He returned to his original retreat on the island of Lupocavia, but found the community unimproved, and therefore journeyed until he discovered a stony vale containing a cave, in the bishopric of Grosseto, in Siena. Here he settled in 1155 and began an ascetical life, whose rigor was somewhat relieved by the lord of Buriano, who built him a cell. In the following year Albert became his associate, and a year later Rainald arrived, though only in time to assist at the burial of William, who had died Feb. 10, 1157. These two men remained at the place, which was at first called Stabulum Rhodis, and afterwards Malavalle, and which became the original of all the congregations of hermits which adopted the name of Williamites. Such congregations extended over the whole of Italy and beyond, to Germany, the Netherlands, and France. The institutions of their founder, together with a description of his life, had been transmitted from Albert. They maintained a perpetual fast. Gregory IX gave them the rule of Benedict, and permitted them to wear shoes. Innocent IV issued a bull in 1248 touching the election of a general prior, and conferring privileges on the order. Alexander IV ordered its incorporation with an order of Augustinian hermits, but recalled his bull of April 18, 1256, in view of the violent protest raised against the scheme, though matters had progressed so far as to occasion serious difficulties in the order, which involved the loss of a number of monasteries in 1266. In 1435 the Council of Basle confirmed the privileges possessed by the order, which then covered the three provinces of Tuscany, Germany, and Flanders and France. At the beginning of the 18th century only twelve convents remained to the order, all of which were in Flanders, and by the end of the century they too were extinct. An order of knights of St. William has been spoken of, but is entirely apocryphal. See Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 10, with Henschen's Diss.; and Helyot, Hist. d. Ordres Monast. Relig. et Militaires, i, 250; iii, 18; vi, 142-152; also Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Williams, Aaron, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Leetsdale, Pa., Nov. 20, 1807. He graduated from Jefferson College, and in the first class at the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny. He served with eminent ability as professor of languages in the Ohio University, and subsequently filled the same chair in his alma mater at Cannonsburg, Pa., being at the time a member of the Presbytery of Allegheny. He died at Leetsdale, Dec. 31, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Williams, Alvin P., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in St. Louis County, Mo., March 13, 1813. At the age of seventeen he was publicly set apart as his father's assistant in the ministry, and afterwards labored as an evangelist. Among his pastorates were Lexington, Miami, Bethel, St. Joseph, and Glasgow, in Missouri. He died at Glasgow, Nov. 9, 1868. He was conspicuous among the most able ministers of his denomination in the South-west. "His sermons, expositions, and essays before the association for twenty-five years mark him as a man of extraordinary ability, a second Andrew Fuller." See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1247. (J. C. S.)

Williams, Charles P., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a teacher for many years in a classical school in Philadelphia, Pa., and died in that city, June 12, 1859, aged sixty-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1860, p. 93.

Williams, Isaac, an English clergyman, was born in Wales in 1802. He graduated from Trinity College, Oxford, in 1826, and became a fellow there in 1832; entered into holy orders in 1831, and was curate of Windrush, St. Mary the Virgin's, Oxford, and Bisley, in succession; wrote tracts Nos. 80, 86, and 87 of the Pusey Tractarian series; contributed to the Lyra Apostolica, and spent his later years in retirement at Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, where he died, May 1, 1865. He was a voluminous writer, and we name the following among his numerous works: The Cathedral; or, The Catholic and Apostolic Church of England (1838):—Hymns, translated from the Parisian Breviary (1839):—Thoughts in Past Years (1842):—Harmony and Commentary on the Whole Gospel Narrative (1842-45; new ed. 1869-70):—The Baptistery; or, The Way to Eternal Life (1842-44):—Christian Scholar (1849):—The Altar; or, Meditations in Verse on the Great Christian Sacrifice (ed.).—The Seven Days; or, The Old and the New Creation (1850):—The Apocalypse, with Notes and Reflections (1852):—The Characters of the Old Testament (1856):—Female Characters of the Holy Scriptures, in a series of sermons (1859):—Beginning of the Book of Genesis (1861):—The Psalms Interpreted of Christ (1864-65).

Williams, John (1), an English missionary, called "the Apostle of Polynesia" and "the Martyr of Erromanga," was born at Tottenham, near London, June 29, 1796. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to an ironmonger, and acquired a knowledge of mechanism which was afterwards of great service to him. He was ordained in 1816, and sent by the London Missionary Society to Eimeo, one of the Society Islands, where he learned the language and began to preach to the natives in two months. From Eimeo he soon removed to Huahine, and afterwards to Raiatea, where he was eminently successful in introducing Christianity and, at the same time, the arts of civilization. In 1823 he removed to Raratonga, the chief of the Hervey Islands, where he established a mission that was remarkably successful, the population of the entire group having embraced Christianity under his influence. He employed native teachers, and prepared the New Test. and other books in the Raratongan language. Being in want of a vessel to journey from island to island, he resolved to build one. He made all the necessary tools, and completed the vessel, which was sixty feet long by eighteen wide, in about fifteen weeks. The sails were of native matting, the cordage of the bark of the hibiscus, the oakum of cocoa-nut husks and banana stumps. With the aid of this vessel he extended his labors during the next four years as far as the Samoa Islands. In 1834 he returned to England, and remained nearly four years, employing himself in the publication of his Raratongan New Test. (by the Bible Society) and in raising £4000 for the purchase and outfit of a missionary ship for the South Sea Islands. In 1838 he returned to the scene of his labors, and in the following year visited the New Hebrides for the purpose of planting a mission, but was killed on the shore of the island of Erromanga, and most of his body eaten by the savage natives, Nov. 20, 1839. Besides his New Test., above mentioned, he was the author of, A Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands (1837):—Missionary's Farewell (1838). See Prout, Life of the Rev. John Williams, Missionary to Polynesia; Compiled from his Journals, Correspondence, and other Authentic Sources (1843).

Williams, John (2) (called Ab Ithel), a Welsh clergyman, was born at Llanyghafel, Denbighshire, North Wales, in 1811. He graduated from Jesus College, Oxford, in 1834; was ordained in the Established Church, and stationed successively at Llanfor, Nerguis, and Llanymowddwyn; and preferred by the bishop of Bangor to the rectory of Llanenddwyn, Merionethshire, a few months before his death, which occurred Aug. 27, 1861. He published, The Church of England Independent of the Church of Rome in All Ages:—Ecclesiastical Antiquities of the Cymry (1844):—Glossary of Terms Used for Articles of British Dress and Armor (1851):—Ancient Welsh Grammar (1856):—Hrut y Twysogion; or, The Chronicle of the Princes (1860):—Barddas, or Bardism: a Collection of Original Documents Illustrative of the Theology, Discipline, and Usages of the Bardic-Druidic System of the Isle of Britain; with Translation and Notes (1862).

Williams, Samuel, LL.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Warham Williams, of Waltham, Mass., was born there, April 23, 1743. He graduated from Harvard College in 1761; was selected by professor Winthrop to accompany him, the same year, to Newfoundland, to observe the transit of Venus; taught school at Waltham, and pursued his theological studies; was licensed to preach Oct. 11, 1763; preached at Concord and Bradford, Mass., and was ordained in the latter place Nov. 20, 1765. In May, 1780, he was installed in the Hollis professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard College. He was a member of the Meteorological Society of Mannheim, Germany, and of the Philosophical Society of Philadelphia; also of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in Massachusetts. In 1786 he went to Penobscot Bay to observe a total eclipse of the sun, in a galley fitted out by the General Court of Massachusetts. The same year the government of Massachusetts appointed him to assist in running the line of jurisdiction between that state and New York. He resigned his professorship in 1788, and removed to Rutland, Vt., preaching there as a stated supply from January, 1789, to October, 1795. Subsequently he preached at Burlington more than two years. He died at Rutland, Jan. 2, 1817. In 1794 he published The Natural and Civil History of Vermont (8vo), which was republished in two volumes in 1809. In 1805 governor Tichenor appointed him to ascertain the boundary of the state of Vermont. A course of lectures was delivered by him in the University of Vermont soon after its establishment. Many MSS. on astronomical, philosophical, and mathematical subjects of great value are among his literary remains. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 595.

Williams, Samuel Wells, LL.D., a distinguished Chinese scholar, was born at Utica, N. Y., Sept. 22, 1812. He graduated from the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, learned printing, and in 1833 went to Canton, China, as printer for the American mission, where he assisted in editing The Chinese Repository. In 1837 he visited Japan, learned the language, and translated Matthew and Luke into Japanese. Returning to China, he edited many works; became interpreter to commodore Perry's Japan expedition in 1853, and in 1855 to the United States legation. In 1860 he revisited the United States, and in 1875, after various public services in China, permanently settled in New Haven, Conn., where he acted as lecturer on Chinese, until his death, Feb. 16, 1884, at which time he was president of the American Bible Society. He is the author of many works on China, especially The Middle Kingdom (N. Y. 1848, 1857).

Williams, William, D.D., LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Eatonton, Putnam Co., Ga., March 15, 1821. He united with the Church in 1837; graduated from the University of Georgia in 1840, and from the law-school of Harvard University in 1847; became pastor at Auburn, Ala., in 1851; professor of theology in Mercer University in 1856; professor of ecclesiastical history, etc., in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in 1859, and in 1872 of systematic theology, which office he held until his death, at Aiken, S. C., Feb. 20, 1879. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1255. (J. C. S.)

Williams, William Frederick, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Utica, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1818. For a time he studied at Yale College; graduated in 1847 from Auburn Theological Seminary; in 1848 was licensed, and ordained by the Presbytery of Utica; the same year commissioned by the American Board, and sailed for Syria, his first station being at Beyrout. Thence he was transferred to Mosul, and next was called to Mardin, East Turkey, where he died, Feb. 14, 1871. For some years he was especially engaged in training native helpers and preachers.

Williams, William R., D.D., LL.D., an eminent Baptist divine, was born in New York city, Oct. 14, 1804, being the son of Rev. John Williams (1767-1825), pastor of the Oliver Street Baptist Church for twenty-seven years. He graduated from Columbia College in 1823, studied law and practiced it one year, entered the ministry in 1831, and the ensuing year became pastor of the Amity Street Church, a relation which continued until his death, April 1, 1885. Dr. Williams was an elegant writer, and the author of several valuable works on Baptist history and literature, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, &c.

Willigis, archbishop of Mayence, was a statesman and primate of the German Church in the period of the Saxon emperors. His origin is unknown and was probably obscure. His birthplace was, it may be assumed, the town of Schöningen, in Saxony. He was a canon at Hildesheim, when Volcoid, tutor of the young Otto II, whose friendship he had been fortunate enough to gain, recommended him to notice, with the result that he was transferred, about A.D. 970, to the imperial chapel and received into the number of imperial councillors. On Jan. 13, 975, he became archbishop of Mayence and archchancellor and metropolitan of Germany, by the appointment of emperor Otto II and the confirmation of the pope, Benedict VII. The papal bull provided that he should have pre-eminence over all prelates in Germany and Gaul in ecclesiastical matters, and particularly on the occasion of royal coronations and in respect to the holding of synods at places to be chosen by himself. He took part in all the important affairs of the empire until other favorites temporarily usurped his place, but was not a participant in Otto's Italian campaign, A.D. 980. When Otto suffered defeat in Calabria, July 13, 982, Willigis accompanied other German princes to the imperial camp, and at the diet of Verona, where the infant son of Otto was chosen king and successor to his father, he appeared invested in all his former honors. Otto II died Dec. 7, 983, at Aix-la-Chapelle. Willigis officiated at the coronation of the new king as the representative of the transalpine peoples, and in the dispute respecting the guardianship of the young emperor he was the head of the Saxon party and the most terrible opponent of duke Henry of Bavaria, who had seized the prince and had attempted to secure the throne. During this dispute, which closed in 985, Willigis was the constant companion of the empress. When the empress-mother died, June 15, 991, a commission was appointed to assist the grandmother, Adelheid, in exercising care over the prince, and of this commission Willigis was a member. Later authorities even confer upon him a regency of the empire during a period of three years. The education of young Otto was also the peculiar charge of Willigis, and was by him intrusted to his protégé, Bernward, a later bishop of Hildesheim. Willigis prepared the first Roman expedition of his pupil and guided him over the Alps. Easter, 996, was celebrated at Pavia, and a delegation announcing the death of John XV and asking the king to choose a new pope was received in the same place. Willigis, more than any other person, determined Otto to choose his own cousin, Bruno, the son of the duke of Carinthia; and, in connection with Hildebald, chancellor and bishop of Worms, he escorted Bruno to Rome, and was present at his election by the clergy and people, and his enthronement as Gregory V, May 3, 996. Before leaving Rome he induced the pope to convoke a synod, through which he secured the return of Adalbert, bishop of Prague, to the diocese which that prelate had twice abandoned, though the return was not desired by the emperor, the pope, or Adalbert himself.

The next important affair in the life of Willigis was his dispute with bishop Bernward, of Hildesheim, respecting the right to exercise jurisdiction over the nunnery of Gandersheim, where Sophia, the emperor's sister, was about to take the veil. The emperor sided with Bernward, and Sophia with Willigis. The dispute was finally brought before a synod at Rome, which sent a legate to Gandersheim to forward the interests of Bernward. Willigis refused to obey this authority, and was accordingly suspended from his offices by the legate, and cited to appear before the pope. He nevertheless persisted in the exercise of his episcopal functions, and found numerous supporters among the German clergy, as is evident from the large attendance of bishops at a synod convoked by him at Frankfurt, Aug. 20, 1002. Bernward's entrance at Gandersheim, on the other hand, was resisted by its inmates with force of arms. The opposition against both pope and emperor was everywhere, whether in Rome or Germany, so strong as to make it possible for Willigis to despise the wrath of either. The emperor's death, followed by the accession of Henry II, occasioned a truce, during which Willigis consecrated Sophia as abbess of Gandersheim; and in 1007 a peace was negotiated, by the renunciation, on the part of Willigis, of jurisdiction in the disputed territory. Otto's idea of establishing a universal empire, in which Bernward and his coadjutors were his principal supporters and Willigis his principal opponent, had, however, been defeated, and papal intervention in the affairs of the German Church had been effectually rebuked, in the course of a quarrel which seemed to concern local matters only, but which, because of the prominence of the persons engaged, involved issues of the gravest importance for the entire Western Church.

On the accession of Henry II, he found in Willigis the most prominent supporter of his claims as against those of margrave Eckard of Meissen and of duke Hermann of Suabia. Willigis, assisted by his suffragans, anointed and crowned the emperor, June 6 or 7, 1002, at Mayence, and the empress Kunigunde, Aug. 10, at Paderborn. He accompanied the emperor to Aix-la-

Chapelle, where the latter was recognised as sovereign by the assembled princes, and to Bruchsal, where the duke of Suabia made a voluntary surrender of his claims. He was present also at a synod held at Theonville, and was the influential personage who caused the punishment of death, denounced upon count Ernest of Austria, for rebellion, to be changed into the imposition of a fine.

Everything in the records thus reveals Willigis as the counsellor and influential friend of the emperor. His power is evidenced in numerous documents, and in many ecclesiastical provisions and arrangements of the time. He was incessantly, energetically active in the affairs of both Church and State. Several churches in the city of Mayence, a number of bridges and other public works, and various works of art, were among the permanent relics of his administration. He died Feb. 23, 1011.

Willison (or Willisone), JOHN, a divine of the Church of Scotland, was born in 1680; became minister at Brechin in 1703, and in 1716 at Dundee, where he remained until his death, May 8, 1750. He was the author of, Examples of Plain Catechising (1737):—Sacramental Directory; or, a Treatise Concerning the Sanctification of a Communion Sabbath (1745):—Afflicted Man's Companion (1755):—Sacramental Meditations and Adverses (1769):—Sacramental Catechism:—Christian Scripture Directory:—Free and Impartial Testimony to the Church of Scotland, and other works. An edition of his Works was published in Aberdeen in 1769, and other editions have since appeared, including his later publications. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 693, 813; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Williston, PAYSON, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Haven, Conn., in 1763; graduated at Yale College in 1783; studied theology at New Haven; became pastor at Easthampton, Mass., in 1789, where he remained until 1833. He died there Jan. 30, 1856. He published a Sermon in 1799, a Half-century Sermon in 1839, and contributed several articles to Sprague's Annals of the Amer. Pulpit (vols. i and ii).

Willm, JOSEPH, a Protestant pedagogue and philosopher, was born at Heiligenstein in 1792. In 1821 he was professor at the gymnasium in Strasburg, in 1826 professor of philosophy at the seminary, and died in 1853. He published, De l'Éducation du Peuple (1843):—Histoire de la Philosophie Allemande Depuis Kant (1844), which received the prize from the French Academy of Sciences. From 1844 to 1850 he was one of the contributors to the Dictionnaire des Sciences Philosophiques, published by Hachette. Willows, BROOK OF (נַחַל הַתְּרִיבִּים, Náchal ha-Arabim; Sept. ἡ φάραγξ Ἀραβᾶς; Vulg. torrens silicis), a wady mentioned by Isaiah (xv, 7) in his dirge over Moab. Over this name Jerome takes a singular flight in his Commentary on Isa. xv, 7, connecting it with the Orebim (A. V. "ravens") who fed Elijah during his seclusion. The prophet's language implies that this brook was one of the boundaries of the country—probably, as Gesenius (Jesaja, i, 532) observes, the southern one. It is possibly identical with a wady mentioned by Amos (vi, 14) as the then recognised southern limit of the northern kingdom (Fürst, Handb.; Ewald, Propheten).

This latter appears in the A. V. as "the river of the wilderness" (נַחַל הַתְּרִיבִּים, Náchal ha-Arabah; Sept. ὁ χειμάρρος τῶν ὄσμων; Vulg. torrens deserti). Widely as they differ in the A. V., it will be observed that the names are all but identical in the original, the only difference being that it is plural in Isaiah and singular in Amos. In the latter it is ha-Arabah, the same name which is elsewhere almost exclusively used either for the valley of the Jordan, the ghôr of modern Arabs, or for its continuation, the great Arabah, extending to the gulf of Akabah. If the two are regarded as identical, and the latter as the accurate form of the name, then it is probable that the Wady el-Ahry is intended, which breaks down through the southern part of the mountains of Moab into the so-called Ghôr es-Safieh, at the lower end of the lake, and appears to form a natural barrier between the districts of Kerak and Jebel (Burckhardt, Syria, Aug. 7). This is not improbably also the brook Zered (nachal-Zered) of the earlier history. The Targum Pseudojonathan translates the name Zered by "osiers," or "baskets."

Should, however, the Nachal ha-Arabim be rendered "the Willow-torrent"—which has the support of Gesenius (Jesaja) and Pusey (Comm. on Amos, vi, 14)—then it is worthy of remark that the name Wady Sufsaf, "Willow Wady," is still attached to a part of the main branch of the ravine which descends from Kerak to the north end of the peninsula of the Dead Sea (Irby, May 9). Burckhardt (Syria, p. 644) mentions a fountain called 'Ain Sufsaf, "the Willow Fountain" (Catfago, Arabic Dictionary, p. 1051).

The Rev. Mr. Wilton, in his work on The Negeb, or South Country of Scripture, endeavors to identify the Nachal ha-Arabah of Amos with the Wady el-Jeib, which forms the main drain by which the waters of the present Wady Arabah (the great tract between Jebel Sherah and the mountains of et-Tih) are discharged into the Ghôr es-Safieh at the southern end of the Dead Sea. This is certainly ingenious, but cannot be accepted as more than a mere conjecture, without a single consideration in its favor beyond the magnitude of the Wady el-Jeib, and the consequent probability that it would be mentioned by the prophet.

Willow-Sunday is a local term to designate Palm-Sunday in some parts of England; so called because boughs of the willow-tree are used instead of palms.

Wills, JOHN, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born at Seaborough, Somersetshire, in 1740. He graduated M.A. in 1765 at Wadham College, Oxford; succeeded to the wardenship of that college in 1783; served the office of vice-chancellor from 1792 to 1796, and held the rectorships of Seaborough, and of Tydd St. Mary, Lincoln, in the gift of the crown. Dr. Wills died May 16, 1806, very rich, leaving numerous benevolent bequests. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1806, p. 535.

Wills, SAMUEL, D.D., an English Baptist minister, youngest son of Rev. Alexander Wills, of Ashley, was born at Salisbury in April, 1808. He united with the John Street Church, London, at seventeen. In early manhood he was engaged for several years in preaching in the neighborhood of London; in 1833 opened a boys' boarding-school in Dorking, Surrey, preaching on the Sabbath, chiefly at Mortlake; in 1840 became pastor of a Church in Gosport, remaining till 1846, and then returned to London; in 1847 emigrated to the United States, and in New York established an open-communion church, of which he was the pastor for a time. Besides his ministerial work, he prepared several volumes for the press, which had a large circulation in this country. Among these were, Daily Meditations (4 vols.):—The Seven Churches in Asia:—Christian Ordinances:—A Commentary on the Prophet Daniel. In 1853 he returned to Eng'land, and was pastor at Upper Norwood.

then at Vernon Chapel, King's Cross, and of West Row, Suffolk. His last settlements, which was of brief duration, were at Winchester and Milford, Hants. Resigning his pastoral work, he retired to Thornton Heath, Surrey, where he died, April 12, 1878. See (Lond.) Bapt. Hand-book, 1874, p. 296. (J. C. S.)

Willstädtter, ELIAS, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born in the year 1796, at Carlsruhe. In 1821 he attended the lectures at the Würzburg University, and in 1824, after due examination, was enrolled among the rabbinical candidates of Baden. In 1837 he was appointed to fill the vacancy of the rabbinate at Carlsruhe, and died Nov. 14, 1842. He published, Abriß der gesammten jüdischen Theologie (Carlsruhe):—Predigten bei verschiedenen Gelegenheiten (ibid. 1829). Together with some other rabbis he edited an edition of the Old Test. for the use of schools (ibid. 1836-38). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 516; Kayserling, Bibliothek jüdischer Kanzelredner, i, 851 sq. (B. P.)

Wilmeid, in Norse mythology, is the progenitor of all the magicians. He is the originator of the sciences of medicine, magic, and fortune-telling.

Wilmer, JOSEPH PERK BELL, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was for a number of years rector of St. Mark's Church in Philadelphia, Pa., after which, about 1864, he removed to Virginia, residing in Scottsville. In 1866 he was consecrated bishop of Louisiana, in Christ Church, New Orleans, and died Dec. 2, 1878, aged about sixty-five years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Wilmsen, Friedrich Eduard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 29, 1736, at Halle. In 1777 he was called as pastor of the Parochial Church to Berlin, where he died, May 23, 1798. He is the author of, De Sapientia Christi in Seligendo ad Apost. Genit. Munus Paullo Conspicua (Halle, 1756):—Beachtungen über Weisheit und Thorheit im gemeinen Leben der Menschen (Berlin, 1786):—Moralische Predigten (ibid. 1798; edited by F. Ph. Wilmsen):—Predigten für Hausväter und Hausmütter (Leipzig, 1776). He also translated into German S. Clarke's Paraphrase of the Four Evangelists (Berlin, 1763, 3 vols.). See Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 243, 569; ii, 204, 207. (B. P.)

Wilmsen, Friedrich Philipp, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 28, 1770, at Magdeburg, and died at Berlin, May 4, 1831. He is the author of, Briefe zur Beförderung des katech. Studiums (Berlin, 1794-98):—Die biblischen Geschichten des Alten und Neuen Testaments (ibid. 1809):—Das Leben Jesu Christi beschrieben (ibid. 1816):—Luther der Reformator (ibid. 1817):—Eusebius, Andachtsübungen in Gesängen, etc. (ibid. 1827):—Eugenia oder das Leben des Glaubens und der Liebe (ibid. 1820):—Herzenserhebungen für stille Abendstunden (Hanover, 1830). Wilson, Harry Bristow, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in London in 1774; educated at Merchant-Taylors' School, and at Lincoln College, Oxford; was appointed third undermaster of Merchant-Taylors' School in 1798, and second undermaster in 1805, in which office he continued until 1824, when he resigned, became curate and lecturer of St. Michael's, Bassishaw, in 1807; and was rector of St. Mary Aldermary and St. Thomas the Apostle from Aug. 2, 1816, until his death, Nov. 21, 1853. He published a volume of Sermons on Several Subjects (1807):—History of Merchant-Taylors' School (1812-14):—Index to the Bible (1818), and other works. See (Lond.) Gentleman's Magazine, 1854, i, 536.

Wilson, N. W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Pendleton County, Va., Oct. 20, 1824. He was ordained in 1858, and after having been a pastor of country churches for several years, was invited to the pastorate of the Church at Chapel Hill, N. C., and subsequently to Farmdale, Va., where he remained two years.

In 1870 he was called to the Grace Street Church, Richmond; in 1875 he removed to New Orleans, and became pastor of the Colosseum Church. He died of the yellow fever in 1878. He is spoken of as having been "one of the most eloquent ministers in the South." See Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclop. p. 1260. (J. C. S.)

Wilson, Thomas (1), an English Puritan divine of the 16th century, preached at St. George's Church in Canterbury thirty-six years, was chaplain to lord Wotton, and died in January, 1621. He was the author of a Dialogue Concerning Justification by Faith (1610):—God's Eternal Purpose (1611):—Complete Christian Dictionary (1612):—Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1614):—Receipt against Heresies:—Christ's Farewell to Jerusalem (eod.):—Theological Rules (1615), and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wilson, Thomas (2), an English clergyman and school-master, was born in 1748. He was master of the grammar school at Clitheroe, Lancashire, for about forty years, and died in 1813. He was the author of An Archaeological Dictionary; or, Classical Antiquities of the Jews, Greeks, and Romans, Alphabetically Arranged, and a volume of Miscellanies.

Wimmer, GABRIEL, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Sagan, in Silesia, Oct. 29, 1671, and died at Alten-Mörsitz, in the diocese of Borna, March 14, 1745, in his first and only parish, to which he was appointed in 1697. He is the author of Ausführliche Liedererklärung (Altenburg, 1749, 4 parts, published by his son). He also wrote some hymns, which are still in use. See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenlieder, v, 497 sq. (B. P.)

Wimpheling, JAKOB, a German humanist, was born July 26, 1450. At Freiburg he was the pupil of Geiler von Kaiserberg (q. v.). An epidemic drove him to Erfurt, but he eventually completed his university course at Heidelberg. He became master in philosophy in 1471, and began the study of canon law, exchanging it, however, ere long for that of theology. In 1479 he was made dean of the philosophical faculty, in 1481 superintendent of the Artist College and rector, in 1483 bachelor of theology and licentiate. Soon afterwards he was consecrated to the priesthood, and made preacher and canon at the cathedral of Spire. He was, however, rather suited to be an educator than a preacher, by reason of physical debility and a weak voice, and the natural bias of his mind. He was incessantly busy with his pen, and constantly had charge of a number of young men, whom he inspired with a love of learning and of truth, which made them, as a rule, the ready, and, in some instances, effective supporters of the Reformation, when that movement began. In this period (1497) he wrote the Idiomata Germanica, one of his most important works, and one of the first to direct the course of education into a new channel. Fourteen years were spent at Spire, when he resolved upon retiring with Christoph von Utenheim (q. v.), Geiler von Kaiserberg, and others, to a hermitage in the depths of the Black Forest, but was hindered from the execution of the plan by a transfer to the faculty of arts at Heidelberg, Sept. 13, 1498. It was characteristic of his spirit that while concerned to introduce a purer Latin, and engaged in the delivery of lectures on rhetoric and poetry, he should confine himself chiefly to the teaching of Christian authors like Jerome and Prudentius, and that he should reject the study of heathen authors as being injurious to youth. From this judgment he excepted Cicero, Virgil, and a few others only; but slight as was this concession, it obliged him to deliver two apologetic discourses to prove, against the assaults of monastic adversaries, the utility of humanistic studies. In 1500 he resigned his professorship on the invitation of Utenheim, to resume the project of a hermit life, but while tarrying at Strasburg, Utenheim was made administrator of the diocese of Basle, and Wimpheling accordingly remained with Kaiserberg, and completed

(1502) the edition of Gerson's works, upon which the latter had been employed since 1488. At this time he came into conflict with the notorious barefoot monk Thomas Murner (q. v.), through the publication of a work intended to promote the loyalty of Strasburg towards Germany, and basing its plea on the false statement that the Gaul of Cæsar's time had never extended to the Rhine, but only to the borders of Austrasia, subsequently a German province; and as he was victorious in the dispute, he retained his erroneous opinion while he lived. In December, 1502, Utenheim succeeded to the see of Basle, and invited Wimpfeling to collect and examine existing synodal statutes, with a view to reforming the clergy of the diocese. After completing this work Wimpfeling returned to Strasburg to take possession of a summissariat, to which he was appointed, but which was given to another person. He was therefore obliged to resume the training of young men as a means of earning a livelihood, and accepted a tutorship over the sons of his friends, Sturm and Paulus. A tract written at this time for one of these young men, in which he proved that Augustine had never been a monk, and that the boast of monasticism, that all wisdom takes refuge in a cowl, was false, since neither the ancient philosophers nor Moses, nor yet Christ and the apostles, the early fathers of the Church, and later venerable men, such as Gregory the Great, Bede, Alcuin, etc., were in any wise identified with monasticism, brought upon him the full weight of monkish fury, and made him the earliest of humanists to experience its rage. His books enraged many of the secular clergy also, as they contained frequent exposures of the abuses tolerated in the Church, and of vices existing among her ministers, and persisted in demanding a reform of these evils. He was accused at Rome, by pope Julius II commanded the ignorant monks to be silent. Wimpfeling now undertook the work of improving the current methods of educating the young, but with indifferent success, as he received no encouragement from persons in authority. He also wrote a history of the diocese of Strasburg, which is still a source of some value. After the death of Geiler von Kaiserberg he wrote an appreciative characterization of the great preacher who had so long been his friend. His next important occupation was the drawing up of the list of complaints laid to the charge of the papacy by the German people, by direction of the emperor Maximilian I. To the list he added a number of recommendations, touching, e. g., the plurality of benefices, and an adaptation of the French Pragmatic Sanction to German conditions, which were favorably received, as was a supplementary work entitled Medulla Sanctionis Pragmaticæ. A nunnery in the diocese of Basle was placed in his charge by his friend, bishop Utenheim, and in this place he spent several years. In 1512 he wrote a valuable pedagogical work, entitled De Proba Institutione Puerorum in Trivialis et Adolescentium in Universilibus Gymnasiis; but he felt himself to be too old to put his theories into practice at the head of a school, and therefore declined a call to teach theology at Strasburg. The warfare with the monks was continued steadily, and drew forth from him a number of exposures of their conduct, and ultimately a broadside from the authors of the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum. Towards the close of 1515 he retired to his native town of Schlettstadt, and thenceforward made that place his home. He surrounded himself with a company of ambitious young men, and organized a literary society which included Bucer and Phrygio among its members, and for a time commended the Wittenberg scholars as promoters of improved methods of study. Wimpfeling himself greeted the rise of the Reformation, and approved of Luther's course. In 1518 he submitted an opinion to the emperor at the diet of Worms, which, though guarded, was certainly not adverse to Luther's interests. He soon found, however, that the new movement was taking on more extensive proportions, and assuming a more radical character than he had expected, and, with the timidity which characterized the class to which he belonged, he not only withdrew from its support, but even wrote to Luther to persuade him that the canon of the mass contained nothing contrary to the doctrines and usages of the early Church. He saw with pain that the Reformation was the fruitage of a seed which he had himself helped to sow.

Wimpfeling's life and character were full of contradictions, growing out of the fact that while he saw clearly the corruption and danger of the Church and the age, he yet failed to understand the methods through which alone a reform could be secured. He trembled at the idea of lay hands attempting an improvement, even though they might be the hands of emperor or king, and shrank in terror from the idea of assailing the pope and existing institutions in the Church. With scholarly bias he thought that the study of theology would alone elevate the clergy and reform the Church. His pedagogical writings contained many ideas which were reduced to practice by Protestant teachers in the next generation, though he was still too much a schoolman to intend more than a reform in grammatical and rhetorical instruction with his proposals. He cared more for a return to the elegant and correct style of classical writers than for the study of the teachings of antiquity as a means of culture for the mind. He studied the hymnology of the Church, and attempted its improvement. He also wrote an Epitome Rerum Germanicarum, which is interesting as the first essay towards the writing of German history. Wimpfeling's style was easy and perspicuous, precise, often elegant, lively, and witty, though verbose. He wrote poetry which lacked inspiration and fancy, and which may be characterized as mere practice in Latin versification. He was, in brief, rather practical than speculative, and was devoid of originality. His writings were generally brief tracts, filled with citations from other books, and the influence they exerted was largely due to the elevated sentiments they expressed. His personal bearing was amiable, modest, and yet helpful. Reuchlin honored him as a sturdy supporter of religion, and, after his death, Nov. 17, 1528, Erasmus wrote a very beautiful letter in his praise to Vlaten. For material towards his biography, consult Riegg, Amanitates Literariæ Friburgenses (Ulm, 1775; Fasc. 2), and see, generally, Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Winchell, JAMES MANNING, a Baptist minister, was born at North East, Dutchess Co., N.Y., Sept. 8, 1791; was converted about 1807; entered Union College in 1808; graduated from Brown University in 1812; was licensed by the Baptist Church at North East, Oct. 4 of the same year; supplied the Baptist Church at Bristol, R. I., during 1813; was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church in Boston, Mass., March 30, 1814; and died Feb. 22, 1820. He published an edition of Watts's Psalms and Hymns, with a Supplement, and Two Discourses, Exhibiting an Historical Sketch of the First Baptist Church in Boston from 1665 to 1818 (1819). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 595.

Winchester, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Wintoniense). Winchester is a city of England, capital of Hampshire, situated on the right bank of the Itchen, twelve miles north-north-east of Southampton and sixty-two miles west-south-west of London. Several ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

I. Was held in 856, in the presence of three kings. It was enacted that in future the tenth part of all lands should belong to the Church, free of all burdens, as an indemnification for the losses sustained by the incursion of the Normans who had ravaged England. See Mansi, Concil. viii, 243; Wilkins, Concil. i, 184.

II. Was held in 975, by St. Dunstan, in consequence of the disturbances raised by certain clerks, whom he had deprived of their churches on account of marriage and scandalous life. The well-known incident of the image of our crucified Saviour having decided in favor of the monks, is said to have occurred in this council. The clerks were condemned, and implored the intercession of the young king Edward, who entreated Dunstan to re-establish them, but in vain. See Mansi, Concil. ix, 721; Wilkins, Concil. i, 261.

III. Was held in 1021, under king Canute, to confirm the exemption of the abbey of St. Edmund. See Mansi, Concil. ix, 848; Wilkins, Concil. i, 297.

IV. Was held on the octave of Easter, 1070, in the presence of William the Conqueror. The three legates of Rome, Hermenfride, bishop of Syon, and the cardinals John and Peter, presided. Stigand of Canterbury was deposed, (1) for having retained the bishopric of Winchester together with the archbishopric of Canterbury; (2) for having worn the pall of his predecessor Robert until the pope sent him a new one; and (3) for having received the pall from the anti-pope, Benedict X. Agelmar, bishop of the East Angles, and several abbots were also deposed. Walfred, bishop of Worcester, claimed from William certain lands belonging to his bishopric which the latter had withheld, and the claim was allowed. Thirteen canons were published.

1. Concerning the coming-in of bishops and abbots by simoniacal heresy.
2. Of ordaining men promiscuously, and by means of money.
3. Of the life and conversation of such men.
4. That bishops should celebrate councils twice a year.
5. That bishops ordain archdeacons and other ministers of the sacred order in their own churches.
6. That bishops have free power in their dioceses over the clergy and laity.
7. That bishops and priests invite laymen to penance.
8. Of apostatizing clerks and monks.
9. That bishops have their sees ascertained, and that none conspire against the prince.
10. That laymen pay tithes, as it is written.
11. That none invade the goods of the Church.
12. That no clerk shall bear secular arms.
13. That clerks and monks be duly revered, let him that does otherwise be anathema.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, sub ann.; Mansi, Concil. ix, 1202; Wilkins, Concil. i, 822.

V. Was held probably in 1071, by archbishop Lanfranc. Sixteen canons were published, the heads only of which remain to us.

1. That no one be allowed to preside over two bishoprics.
2. That no one be ordained by means of simoniacal heresy.
3. That foreign clergymen be not received without letters commendatory.
4. That ordinations be performed at the certain seasons.
5. Of altars, that they be of stone.
6. That the sacrifice be not of beer, or water alone, but of wines mixed with water only.
7. Of baptism, that it be celebrated at Easter or Whitsuntide only, except there be danger of death.
8. That masses be not celebrated in churches before they have been consecrated.
9. That the corpses of the dead be not buried in churches.
10. That the bells be not tolled at celebrating in the time of the Secret (Secretum Misse).
11. That bishops only give penance for gross sins.
12. That monks who have thrown off their habit be admitted neither into the army, nor into any convent of clerks, but be esteemed excommunicated.
13. That every bishop celebrate a synod once a year.
14. That tithes be paid by all.
15. That clergymen observe continence, or desist from their office.
16. That chalices be not of wax or wood.

It was probably resolved in this council that an institution of penance for the soldiers of William of Normandy, left by the legate Hermenfride, should be executed. It is in thirteen heads. See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, 1078; Wilkins, Concil. i, 365.

VI. Was convoked by William the Conqueror, and held in 1072; fifteen bishops were present, with Hubert, the Roman legate, and many abbots and barons. The dispute between the archbishops of Canterbury and York was examined with care, and it was established, both from ecclesiastical history and by popular tradition, that, from the time of St. Austin till the last one hundred and forty years, the primacy of the see of Canterbury over the whole of Great Britain had been recognised; that the archbishop of Canterbury had often held ordinations and synods in the very city of York itself. At the following Whitsuntide it was also decided, in a synod held at Windsor, that the see of York was subject to that of Canterbury. See Mansi, Concil. ix, 1211; Wilkins, Concil. i, 824.

VII. Was held in 1076, by archbishop Lanfranc. Six canons were published.

1. Forbids canons to have wives. Enacts that such priests as live in castles and villages be not forced to dismiss their wives if they have them. Forbids such as have no wives to marry, and bishops to ordain in future any who do not declare that they have no wife.
2. Forbids to receive a clerk or monk without letters from his bishop.
3. Forbids the clergy to pay any service for his benefice but what he paid in the time of king Edward.
4. Laymen accused of any crime to be excommunicated after the third summons to appear before the bishop, if they refuse.
5. Declares a marriage made without the priest's benediction to be a state of fornication.
6. Forbids all annatiation of churches.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canons; Mansi, Concil. x, 351; Wilkins, Concil. i, 367.

VIII. Was held Aug. 29, 1139, under archbishop Theodore, against king Stephen, who had seized upon certain houses belonging to the churches of Salisbury and Lincoln, and thrown the two prelates into prison. Stephen himself was cited to appear before the council. Henry, bishop of Winchester, the pope's legate, complained of the injury done to the cause of religion by those who plundered the property of the Church upon the plea of the ill-conduct of the bishops. He required that the king should begin by re-establishing the injured bishops, who, by the common law, were incapacitated from pleading on account of their seizure. The king sent a warning to the bishops, that none of them should have the boldness to make complaint to Rome against him. Upon this the council broke up without settling anything, for the king refused to submit to the judgment of the prelates, and the latter did not think it advisable to employ ecclesiastical censures against him upon their own responsibility, and surrounded as they were by his power. See Wilkins, Concil. i, 419; Mansi, Concil. x, 1014.

IX. Was held in 1143, on the Monday after the octave of Easter, by Henry, bishop of Winchester, legate a latere. Two constitutions were published.

1. Declares that none who violated a church or churchyard, or laid violent hands upon a clerk or religious person, should be absolved by any person but the pope.
2. Declares that the plough and husbandman in the field should enjoy the same peace as if they were in the churchyard.

All who opposed these decrees were excommunicated with candles lighted. See Wilkins, Concil. i, 421; Johnson, sub ann.; Mansi, Concil. x, 1024.

Wind (רוח, ruach; Sept. πνεῦμα, ánēmos; Vulg. spiritus, ventus). This Hebrew word signifies air in motion generally, as breath, wind, etc. Both the Septuagint words occur in the following definition of wind by Aristotle (De Mundo, c. 4): "Wind (ánēmos) is nothing else but a large quantity of air flowing, which is called πνεῦμα." So also Plato has μεγάλη τινὶ πνεύματι for a high wind (Phædon, § 24, edit. Forster). Josephus also uses πνεῦμα βλαίων for a violent wind (Ant. xiv, 2, 2), as Lucian also does, βλαίφ πνεύματι (Ver. Hist. i, 714). The Vulgate word spiritus, from spiro, "to breathe," "blow," is applied in like manner in Latin, as by Virgil (Æneid, xii, 865): "Boreæ cum spiritus alto insonat Ægeæ," "When the northern blast roars in the Ægean."

1. The wind as a natural phenomenon (Gen. iii, 8; Job xxi, 18; xxx, 15, 22; xxxvii, 21; Psa. i, 4; ciii, 16; Prov. xxx, 4; Eccles. i, 6; xi, 4; Isa. vii, 2; xvii, 13; xl, 7; Jer. x, 13; li, 16; Amos xiv, 13). It is poetically ascribed to the immediate agency of God (Psa. cxxxv,

7; cxlvii, 18; comp. Baruch vi, 61). In the New Test. it occurs in Matt. xi, 7; xiv, 24; Mark iv, 39; John iii, 8; Acts xxvii, 4; Eph. iv, 14; James i, 6; Rev. vi, 18; vii, 1). Throughout the New Test. the word is ἀνεμος, except in our Lord's illustration, John iii, 8. In the Apocrypha ἀνεμος occurs in Wisdom v, 14; xiii, 2, etc.; but πνεῦμα in xvii, 18; Ecclus. v, 9; xxii, 18; Song of the Children, xxvi, 42). We might perhaps attribute the exclusion of the word πνεῦμα, for "the wind," from the New Test., to its having become almost entirely appropriated to "heavenly things." In Acts ii, 2, we have πνοή, translated "wind;" Vulg. spiritus. It means the same in Homer (Iliad, v, 697), πνοή for πνοή βορρᾶς, "the breath or blast of Boreas;" comp. Job xxxvii, 10, Sept. In Gen. iii, 8, "the cool of the day," or rather "wind of the day," indicates the evening, since in the East a refreshing breeze arises some hours before sunset; Vulg. ad auram post meridiem. Comp. Cant. ii, 17; iv, 6; where the words "until the day break and the shadows flee away" should be rendered "until the day breathe or blow" (i. e. till evening); Heb. שִׁפְפוּרָה; Sept. διαπνύσας; Vulg. aspirat. The evening breeze is still called, among the Persians, "the breeze of the day" (Chardin, Voyage, iv, 48). In Amos iv, 13, God is said to "create the wind." Although this idea is very conformable to the Hebrew theory of causation, which does not recognise second causes, but attributes every natural phenomenon immediately to the divine agency, yet the passage may perhaps be directed against the worship of the winds, which was common among ancient nations. Comp. Wisdom xiii, 2. Herodotus relates the same of the Persians (i, 181). The words of our Saviour, "a reed shaken with the wind" (Matt. xi, 7), are taken by some in the natural, and by others in a metaphorical sense. The former view is adopted by Grotius, Beza, Campbell, Rosenmüller, Schleusner, and Wetstein; and is confirmed, as Rosenmüller observes, by the antithesis of the rich man, whose magnificence all gladly survey. The comparison is adopted to reprove the fickleness of the multitude (comp. ver. 15, and Eph. iv, 14).

2. The wind occurs as the medium of the divine interposition, or agency (Gen. i, 2; viii, 1, Exod. xv, 10; Numb. xi, 31; 1 Kings xviii, 45; xix, 11; Job i, 19, Isa. xi, 5; Jonah i, 4). In the New Test., the wind was supernaturally employed at the day of Pentecost, like the "sound" and "fire" (Acts ii, 3). Indeed, our Lord's illustration (John iii, 8), and the identity of the Hebrew and Greek words signifying breath, wind, and spirit, lead to the inference that the air in motion bears the nearest resemblance of any created object to divine influence, and is therefore the most appropriate medium of it. See SPIRIT. To this class of instances we refer Gen. i, 2, "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Along with Patrick and Rosenmüller, we construe the phrase, "a wind of God," a wind employed as the medium of divine agency. Rosenmüller compares Psa. civ, 30; cxlvii, 8; Isa. xl, 7. Dr. Lee refers to 1 Kings xviii, 12; 2 Kings ii, 16, and Psa. xxxiii, 6; Isa. xi, 4. In the two latter passages, he observes that the word is equivalent to power, etc. The commotions of the elements, etc., through means of which the petulance of Elijah was reproved (1 Kings xix, 11), are best understood as having occurred in vision (comp. Dan. ii, 35; Zech. v, 9).

3. The wind is used metaphorically in the following instances: "The wings of the wind" denote the most rapid motion (2 Sam. xxii, 11), where the phrase may be a poetical representation also of the incident recorded (2 Sam. v, 24; Psa. civ, 8). The onomatopœia in the two former passages, in Hebrew, is remarkable. Anything light or trifling is called wind (Job vii, 7; Isa. xli, 29; Psa. lxxviii, 39; comp. Eph. iv, 14; Ecclus. v, 9). Violent yet empty speech is called "a strong wind," or a mere tempest of words (Job vii, 2). "Vain knowledge" is called דָּבָר רֵיקָן, knowledge of wind (Job xv, 2); "vain words," words of wind (xvi, 8). Many expressive phrases are formed with this word. "To inherit the wind," denotes extreme disappointment (Prov. xi, 29); "to hide the wind," impossibility (xxvii, 16); to "labor for the wind," to labor in vain (Ecclus. v, 16); "to bring forth wind," great patience and pains for no purpose (Isa. xxvi, 18; comp. Hos. viii, 7; xii, 1); "to become wind," to result in nothingness (Jer. v, 13). "The four winds" denote the four quarters of the globe (Ezek. xxxvii, 9); "to scatter to all winds," to disperse completely (v, 10; xii, 11; xvii, 21); "to cause to come from all winds," to restore completely (xxxvii, 9). "The wind hath bound her upon her wings," means deportation into a far country (Hos. iv, 19); "to sow the wind and reap the whirlwind," unwise labor and a fruitless result (viii, 7); "to feed on the wind," to pursue delusory schemes (xii, 1); "to walk in wind," to live and act in vain (Micah ii, 11); "to observe the wind," to be over-cautious (Ecclus. xi, 4); to "winnow with every wind," to be credulous, apt to receive impressions (v, 9).

Comparisons.—Disappointment, after high promise or pretension, is "as wind without rain" (Prov. xxv, 14); the desperate speeches of an afflicted person are compared to wind (Job vi, 26).

Symbolically.—Empires are represented as having wings, and "the wind in their wings" denotes the rapidity of their conquests (Zech. v, 9). The wind is often used as the symbol or emblem of calamities (Isa. xxxii, 2; xli, 16; lvii, 18; lxiv, 6); destruction by the Chaldean army (Jer. iv, 11, 12; comp. Wisd. iv, 4; v, 23; xi, 20). "The windy storm" (Psa. lv, 8) denotes Absalom and his party. The wind is the frequent emblem of the divine chastisements (Isa. xxvii, 8; Jer. xxii, 22; li, 1, etc.).

Beautiful expressions occur, as in Isa. xxvii, 2, "He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind;" that is, God doth not aggravate the misfortunes of mankind by his chastisements; to "make a weight for the winds" (Job xxviii, 25).

Mistranslations.—In Psa. lxxviii, 39, "He remembered that they were but flesh, a wind that passeth away and cometh not again," should probably be rendered, "a spirit going away and not returning." All the versions make the words relate to the soul of man. Homer has a very similar description of death (Iliad, ix, 408). In Eccles. i, 5, 6, the translation is faulty, and the sense further obscured by a wrong division of verses. The passage should be read: "The sun also ariseth and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he ariseth, going to the south and circulating to the north. The wind is continually whirling about, and the wind returneth upon its whirlings." All the versions give this rendering; our version alone mistakes the meaning. The phrase "brought forth wind," is understood by Michaelis as an allusion to the female disorder called emphysematosis, or windy inflation of the womb (Synagma, Comment. ii, 165). The Syriac translator also understood the passage in this way: "Enixi sumus ut illæ quæ ventos pariant."

4. The east wind (רוּחַ קֶרֶבֶת, ἀνέμος νότος, ἀνεμος καύσων, νότος, ventus urens, spiritus celeremens, ventus auster, קָרִיב, καύσων, ardor, æstus, ventus urens). Both forms denote the natural phenomenon (Gen. xli, 6, 23; Job xxxviii, 24; Psa. xlviii, 7; lxxviii, 26; Jonah iv, 8). Considerable indefiniteness attends the use of these words. Dr. Shaw remarks that every wind is called by the Orientals קָרִיב, an east wind, which blows from any point of the compass between the east and north, and between the east and south (Travels, p. 285). Accordingly, the Sept. often understands this word to mean the south, as in Exod. x, 13; xiv, 21 (see Bochart, Hierozyicon, II, i, 15). If the east wind happens to blow a few days in Palestine during the months of May, June, July, and August, it occasions great destruction to the vines and harvests on the land, and also to the vessels at sea on the Mediterranean (Hos. xiii, 15; Jonah iv, 8; Job xiv, 2; xv, 2; Isa. xl, 7; Gen. xli, 6, 23; Ezek. xvii, 10; xix, 12; xxvii, 26; Psa. xlviii, 7; ciii, 5). In Jonah iv, 8, the phrase occurs, רִיחַ חַרְרִית קָדִים, a still or sultry east wind. For testimonies to the destructiveness of this wind in Egypt and Arabia, see Niebuhr, Beschreib. von Arabien, p. 8; Thevenot, Voyages, I, ii, 84; Hackett, Illustrations of Scripture, p. 135.

The east wind crosses the sandy wastes of Arabia Deserta before reaching Palestine, and was hence termed "the wind of the wilderness" (Job i, 19; Jer. xiii, 24). It is remarkably dry and penetrating, and has all the effects of the sirocco on vegetation (Ezek. xvii, 10; xix, 12; Hos. xiii, 15; Jonah iv, 8). It also blows with violence, and is hence supposed to be used generally for any violent wind (Job xxvii, 21; xxxviii, 24; Psa. xlviii, 7; Isa. xxvii, 8; Ezek. xxvii, 26). It is probably in this sense that it is used in Exod. xiv, 21, though the east, or at all events the north-east, wind would be the one adapted to effect the phenomenon described, viz. the partition of the waters towards the north and south, so that they stood as a wall on the right hand and on the left (Robinson, Researches, i, 57). In this, as in many other passages, the Sept. gives the "south" wind (νότος) as the equivalent for the Greek kudim. Nor is this wholly incorrect, for in Egypt, where the Sept. was composed, the south wind has the same characteristics that the east has in Palestine. The Greek translators appear to have felt the difficulty of rendering kudim in Gen. xli, 6, 23, 27, because the parching effects of the east wind, with which the inhabitants of Palestine are familiar, are not attributable to that wind in Egypt, but either to the south wind, called in that country the khamis, or to that known as the sumum, which comes from the south-east or south-south-east (Lane's Modern Egypt, i, 22, 23). It is certainly possible that in Lower Egypt the east wind may be more parching than elsewhere in that country, but there is no more difficulty in assigning to the term kudim the secondary sense of parching, in this passage, than that of violent in the others before quoted. As such, at all events, the Sept. treated the term both here and in several other passages, where it is rendered kuasōn (καύσων, lit. the burner). In James i, 11, the A. V. erroneously understands this expression of the burning heat of the sun. In Palestine the east wind prevails from February to June (Raumer, p. 79).

It is used metaphorically for pernicious speech, a storm of words (Job xv, 2); calamities, especially by war (Isa. xxvii, 8; Jer. xlviii, 17; Ezek. xvii, 10; xix, 12; xxvii, 26; Hos. xiii, 15). In this latter passage the east wind denotes Shalmaneser, king of Assyria; in Ezek. xxvii, 26, it denotes the Chaldeans. Tyre is there represented under the beautiful allegory of a ship towed into deep waters, and then destroyed by an east wind. A very similar representation is given by Horace (Carm. i, 14). The east wind denotes divine judgment (Job xxvii, 21). "To follow the east wind," is to pursue a delusory and fatal course (Hos. xii, 1).

5. West wind (רִיחַ אֲנֵמוֹס ἀπὸ θαλάσσης, ventus ab occidente). The west and south-west winds reach Palestine loaded with moisture gathered from the Mediterranean (Robinson, i, 429), and are hence expressively termed by the Arabs "the fathers of the rain" (Raumer, p. 79). The little cloud "like a man's hand" that rose out of the west, was recognised by Elijah as a presage of the coming downfall (1 Kings xviii, 44), and the same token is adduced by our Lord as one of the ordinary signs of the weather (Luke xii, 54). Westerly winds prevail in Palestine from November to February. See West.

6. North wind (רִיחַ צֶפֶן, Prov. xxv, 23, ἀνέμος βορρᾶς, ventus Aquilo). The north wind, or, as it was usually called, "the north," was naturally the coldest of the four (Ecclus. xliii, 20), and its presence is hence invoked as favorable to vegetation, in Cant. iv, 16. It is further described in Prov. xxv, 23, as bringing (A. V. "driveth away" in text; "bringeth forth" in marg.) rain; in this case we must understand the north-west wind, which may bring rain, but was certainly not regarded as decidedly rainy. The difficulty connected with this passage has led to the proposal of a wholly different sense for the term tzaphon, viz. hidden place. The north-west wind prevails from the autumnal equinox to the beginning of November, and the north wind from June to the equinox (Raumer, Paläst. p. 79). See North.

7. South wind (רִיחַ דָּרִי, Job xxxvii, 17; דָּרִי, Psa. lxxviii, 26; λίχ, ventus Africus, Luke xii, 55; νότος [Sirocco]. Acts xxvii, 13). The south wind, which traverses the Arabian peninsula before reaching Palestine, must necessarily be extremely hot (Job xxxvii, 17; Luke xii, 55); but the rarity of the notices leads to the inference that it seldom blew from that quarter (Psa. lxxviii, 26; Cant. iv, 16; Ecclus. xliii, 16); and even when it does blow, it does not carry the sumum into Palestine itself, although Robinson experienced the effects of this scourge not far south of Beersheba (Researches, i, 196). In Egypt the south wind (khamis) prevails in the spring, a portion of which, in the months of April and May, is termed el-khamis from that circumstance (Lane, i, 22). See South.

8. The four winds (אַרְבַּע רוּחוֹת, ta tessara anemata, oi tessares anemoi, quatuor venti). The Hebrews speak only of four winds; and so Josephus (Ant. viii, 3, 5). This phrase is equivalent to the four quarters of the world (Ezek. xxxvii, 9; 2 Esdras xiii, 5), the several points of the compass, as we should say (Dan. viii, 8). See Tristram, Not. Hist. of the Bible, p. 23.

Phrases.—"Striving of the four winds" is great political commotions (Dan. vii, 2; comp. Jer. iv, 11, 12; li, 1); to "hold the four winds" is by contrary to secure peace (Rev. vii, 1); "to be divided to the four winds" implies utter dispersion (Dan. xi, 4; Jer. xlix, 32; Ezek. v, 10, 12; xvii, 2). So also the phrase ἐκ τῶν τεσσάρων ἀνέμων (Matt. xxiv, 81) means from all parts of the world (Mark xiii, 27).

9. The Hebrews, like other ancient nations, had but few names of winds. Homer mentions only βορρᾶς, νότος, ζέφυρος, and εὖρος. Aul. Gellius, indeed, complains of the infrequency of names of winds in ancient writers (Noct. Att. ii, 22). The same indefiniteness appears in Herodotus (see Larcher's notes on, i, 188). In the course of time the Greeks and Romans added eight other winds to the original four, but that appearing too minute a division, they reduced the additional ones to four, thus making only eight in all. The names of these may be seen in Larcher (ut supra), or Pliny (Hist. Nat. xviii, 34). Further information may be found in Coray's Translation of Hippocrates, De Aëribus, Aquis et Locis (Paris, 1800); Discours Préliminaire, and see index. For a comparative table of the English, Latin, and Greek divisions of the winds, and their names, amounting to more than thirty, see Beloe's Herodotus (Polymerus, notes, iii, 293, Lond. 1791).

One Greek name of a wind occurs in Acts xxvii, 14, Εὐροκλύδων, Euroclydon, a tempestuous wind in the Mediterranean, now called a Levanter. The Alexandrian MS. has Εὐρακλύδων; Vulg. Euroaquilo; Syriac, אֲנֵמוֹס לֵוָנְטִי. The common reading, Εὐροκλύδων, seems derived from Εὖρος, Eurus, "east wind," and ἐλύδων, "a wave," quasi an eastern tempest. Other MSS. read Εὐρεκλύδων, Euryclydon, from εὐρύς, "broad," and ἐλύδων, "a wave," or rough wavy sea; and then the word would mean the wind which peculiarly excites the waves. Shaw defends the common reading, and describes the wind as blowing in all directions from the north-east round by the north to the south-east (Travels, p. 330, 4to; see Bowyer's conjectures, and Doddridge, in loc.).

The Hebrews had no single terms indicating the relative velocity of the air in motion, like our words breeze, gale, etc. Such gradations they expressed by some additional word, as "great," רוח-גדול, "a great wind" (Jonah i, 4), "rough," ריש, etc. Nor have we any single word indicating the destructive effects of the wind, like their verbs סצר and שצר, as וסצרם (Zech. vii, 14, etc.), and answering to the Greek word ἀνεμόφορος (see Sept. of Gen. xli, 6, 23). Our metaphorical use of the word storm comes nearest. The term zûlphâh (זִלְפָּה), in Psa. xi, 6 (A. V. "horrible"), has been occasionally understood as referring to the simûm (Olshausen, in loc.; Gesen, Thesaur. p. 418); but it may equally well be rendered "wrathful," or "avenging" (Hengstenberg, in loc.). The phrase סצר רוח, "stormy wind," πνεῦμα καταγίδος, spirûs procellæ, occurs in Psa. cvii, 25, cxlviii, 8. It is metaphorically used for the divine judgments (Ezek. xiii, 11, 13). The word סצר is usually translated "whirlwind;" it means, however, more properly a storm (2 Kings ii, 1, 11; Job xxxviii, 1, xl, 6; Zech. ix, 14; Sept. συσσειμός, λαίλαψ, ὄψος; Vulg. turbo; Ecclesi. xliii, 17; συστροφή πνύματος, xlviii, 9; λαίλαπι πύρις). We have noticed in the Bible of the local squalls (λαίλαψ—Mark iv, 37; Luke viii, 23), to which the sea of Gennesareth was liable in consequence of its proximity to high ground, and which were sufficiently violent to endanger boats (Matt. viii, 24; John vi, 18).

The Hebrew word is used metaphorically for the divine judgments (Isa. xl, 24; xli, 16); and to describe them as sudden and irresistible (Jer. xxiii, 19; xxv, 32; xxx, 23). "A whirlwind out of the north" (Ezek. i, 4) denotes the invasion from Babylon. Another word, סופס, is also translated "whirlwind," and properly so. It occurs in Job xxxvii, 9, Isa. xxi, 1. It is used as a simile for complete and sudden destruction (Prov. i, 27); and for the most rapid motion, "wheels of war-chariots like a whirlwind" (Isa. v, 28; Jer. iv, 13). Total defeat is often compared to "chaff scattered by a whirlwind" (Isa. xlvii, 13). It denotes the rapidity and irresistibility of the divine judgments (Isa. lxvi, 5). The phrase "to reap the whirlwind" denotes useless labor (Hos. viii, 7); "the day of the whirlwind," destruction by war (Amos i, 14). "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind," is probably an allusion to Sinai (Nahum i, 3). A beautiful comparison occurs in Prov. x, 25: "As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more: but the righteous is an everlasting foundation." See WHIRLWIND.

Windesheim (or Windesen), a Dutch monastery of the order of Regular Canons, celebrated as the centre of a somewhat extensive congregation of reformed convents, flourished in the former half of the 15th century. It was intimately connected with the association of Brethren of the Common Life, having been established by Radewin, the pupil and successor of Gerhard Groot, to serve as a rallying-point for its members. Berthold ten Have, a citizen of Zwoll, in Zealand, and one of Groot's converts, donated his homestead property of Windesen, worth above three thousand florins, to the prospective monastery on the inception of the plan, and other donations followed, so that the convent became an accomplished fact in 1386. Six brothers constituted its original congregation. The church was dedicated, and the investing of the brothers with the robes of their order was performed Oct. 16, 1387, Henry of Huxaria being made temporary superior, with the title of rector. Vos von Huesden, who succeeded to the government of the convent as prior, four years afterwards, became the real founder of its importance. During thirty-three years he was zealous in the promotion of its internal prosperity, as well as in the erection of its buildings and the extension of its influence. Its riches became immense under his administration, and the number of monasteries, and also of nunneries, connected with it, increased remarkably. Among these the monastery of St. Agnes, near Zwoll, became chiefly famous, through Thomas à Kempis and Johann Wessel, who were its inmates. In 1402 the first convocation of the general chapter was held at Windesheim. In 1435 the Council of Basle directed Windesheim to undertake the reformation of the convents of Regular Canons in Germany. This reformatory work extended in time even to the convents of other orders, and continued until the general reformation of the 16th century brought it to a close. The convent of Windesheim itself continued to exist until the end of the 16th century, and a chapter of Windesheim even until the 18th century. Its members were bound only by the three substantialia of monasticism, the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and they employed themselves, particularly during the earlier period, with the copying of manuscripts and industrial pursuits. Their reformatory labors aimed merely at a re-establishment of the earlier monastic discipline by reducing ascetical requirements to a tolerable degree. Windheim, CHRISTIAN ERNST VON, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Wernigerode, Oct. 29, 1722. He studied at Halle, and after completing his course went to Helmstädt, where he commenced his philosophical lectures. In 1746 he publicly defended a dissertation, De Intellectu Divino, quo Socianismus Philosophicus Argumentis suis Privatur, and was appointed adjunct to the philosophical faculty. In 1747 he went to Göttingen as professor of philosophy, and in 1750 to Erlangen, where he also lectured on theology. He died Nov. 5, 1766. He wrote, Commentatio Philologico-critica de Hebraeorum Vav Conversio Futurorum (Halle, 1744):—Diss. de Paulo, Gentium Apostolo (ibid. 1745):—Sylloge i-x, Thesum Philosophicarum Miscellaneorum (Helmstädt, 1746-47):—Conspectus Thesum Philosophicarum (ibid. 1749):—Diss. in Danzianam Grammaticam Hebraicam (Erlangen, 1751):—*Diss. Windischmann, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH HUGO, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Aschaffenburg, Dec. 13, 1811. In 1836 he received holy orders, went to Munich in 1838 as professor of canon law and New-Test. exegesis, and was made canon of St. Cajetan in 1839; in 1842 he became a member of the Munich Academy of Sciences, in 1846 general vicar, and died Aug. 24, 1861. He wrote, Sancara Sacra de Theologemien Vedanticorum (Bonn, 1833):—Ueber den Somacultus der Arier (Munich, 1846):—Ursagen der arischen Völker (ibid. 1853):—Die persische Anahita (ibid. 1856).—Anahita (ibid. eod.):—Mithra (Leipzig, 1857):—Vindictæ Petrinæ (Regensburg, 1836):—Erklärung des Briefes an die Galater (Mayence, 1843). Windsor, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Windoriense, or Windleshorense). Windsor is a town in Berkshire, England, on the right bank of the Thames, twenty-three miles south-west of London. Its castle is the residence of the queen of England. Old Windsor is a mile and a half east-south-east of this, and was the royal residence during the Saxon dynasty. The present location was chosen by William the Conqueror. Two ecclesiastical councils have been held at Windsor, as follows:

I. Was held on Whit-Sunday, 1070, in which Agelric, bishop of the South Saxons, was deprived, and committed to prison at Marlborough; no crime was imputed to him, and the sole object of the proceeding seems to have been to make room for a Norman. Several abbots were in like manner deposed at the same time. See Johnson, Ecc. Canons, sub ann.; Mansi, Concil. ix, 1203.

II. Was held April 26, 1114, in which Ralph, bishop of Rochester, was elected to the see of Canterbury, vacant during the five preceding years. See Mansi, Concil. x, 793; Landon, Municipal of Councils, p. 696.

Wine, ECCLESIASTICAL USE OF. In the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the common wine was ordinarily used. Such was probably that which our Saviour used at the last supper. The ancients mixed water with the wine; and this practice seems at one period to have been general, and is abundantly authorized by canons of the Church. The proportion of water varied at different times. Sometimes it was one fourth, at others, one third. The Western Church mixed cold water only; the Greek Church first cold, and then warm water. This was said to be emblematical at once of the fire of the Holy Spirit and of the water which flowed from our Saviour's side. Various idle questions respecting the sacred elements were agitated at different times. With some there was a question of what grain the bread should be made. Others mingled salt and oil with the bread. Some substituted water for the wine. Red wine was preferred in order to avoid mistakes by the use of white wine, and also more sensibly to represent the mystery. The Roman Church now uses white wine. In the 17th century claret and in the 18th century sack was employed in England. See EUCHARIST.

Wine, SACRAMENTAL. The Rev. Dunlop Moore, D.D., shows most conclusively, in the Presbyterian Review for January, 1882, in opposition to the statements of Dr. Samson (Divine Law as to Wine, p. 199 sq.), that the early Christian fathers knew only of fermented wine in this connection; and likewise, by the testimony of the most eminent rabbis of modern times, that the Jews to-day use fermented wine for Passover purposes. The use of steeped raisins is only resorted to where pure wine (i. e. wine free from ceremonial impurity by Gentile contact) cannot be procured; but even in that case the Jews are utterly indifferent as to whether it has fermented or not. They also freely use vinegar during the Passover, although this is, of course, the product of fermentation.

Wine-cup (כִּיּוֹן הַיַּיִן, cup of the wine). Wine, or the cup in which it is contained, often represents in Scripture the anger of God: "Thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment" (Psa. lx, 8). "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same. But the dregs thereof all the wicked shall wring them out and drink them" (lxxv, 8). The Lord says to Jeremiah (Jer. xxv, 15), "Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it." Elegant forms of drinking-cups are represented on the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments. See CUP.

Wine-press is the rendering in the A. V. of three Hebrew and one Greek words: פַּדֵּשׁ, gath ("wine-press," Judg. vi, 11; Neh. xiii, 15; Lam. i, 15; "wine-fat," Isa. lxiii, 2; "press," Joel iii, 18), which denotes the whole apparatus (see GETH-SHEMONE), or (as Gesenius prefers) simply the large vat (אֶפְרוֹס) in which the grapes were trodden, the latter being a meaning specifically borne by פַּדֵּשׁ, purál ("wine-press," Isa. lxiii, 8; "press," Hagg. ii, 16); while יֶקֶבֶט, yekéb ("wine-press," Numb. xviii, 27, 30; Deut. xv, 14; Judg. vii, 25; 2 Kings vi, 27; Job xxiv, 11; Isa. v, 2; Jer. xlviii, 33; Hos. ix, 2; Zech. xiv, 10; "press," Prov. iii, 10; Isa. xvi, 10; "fat," Joel ii, 24; iii, 18; "press-fat," Hagg. ii, 16; "wine," Deut. xvi, 13) is thought to denote the lower trough or receptacle into which the expressed juice flows, the ὑπολήνιον of Mark xii, 1. The last Hebrew word is derived by Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 619 b) from a root signifying to hollow or dig out; and in accordance with this is the practice in Palestine, where the "wine-press" and "vat" appear to have been excavated out of the native rock of the hills on which the vineyards lay. From these scanty notices contained in the Bible we gather that the wine-presses of the Jews consisted of two receptacles or vats placed at different elevations, in the upper one of which the grapes were trodden, while the lower one received the expressed juice. The two vats are mentioned together only in Joel iii, 18: "The press (gath) is full; the fats (yekébim) overflow"—the upper vat being full of fruit, the lower one overflowing with the must. Yekéb is similarly applied in Joel ii, 24, and probably in Prov. iii, 10, where the verb rendered "burst out" in the A. V. may bear the more general sense of "abound" (Gesen. Thesaur. p. 1180). Gath is also strictly applied to the upper vat in Neh. xiii, 15; Lam. i, 15, and Isa. lxiii, 2, with purál in a parallel sense in the following verse. Elsewhere yekéb is not strictly applied; for in Job xxiv, 11, and Jer. xlviii, 33, it refers to the upper vat, just as in Matt. xxi, 33, ὑπολήνιον (properly the vat under the press) is substituted for ἀπὸς, as given in Mark xii, 1. It would, moreover, appear natural to describe the whole arrangement by the term gath, as denoting the most important portion of it; but, with the exception of proper names in which the word appears, such as Gath, Gath-rimmon, Gath-hepher, and Gittaim, the term yekéb is applied to it (Judg. vii, 25; Zech. xiv, 10). The same term is also applied to the produce of the wine-press (Numb. xviii, 27, 30; Deut. xv, 14; 2 Kings vi, 27; Hos. ix, 2). The term puráh, as used in Hagg. ii, 16, perhaps refers to the contents of a wine-vat, rather than to the press or vat itself. The two vats were usually dug or hewn out of the solid rock (Isa. v, 2, marg.; Matt. xxi, 33). Ancient wine-presses, so constructed, are still to be seen in Palestine (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii, 137; comp. p. 603).

Dr. Tristram examined several of these on Mount Carmel, which he describes as being exactly like others observed in the south of Judah. "In all cases a flat or gently sloping rock is made use of for their construction. At the upper end a trough is cut about three feet deep and four and a half by three and a half feet in length and breadth. Just below this, in the same rock, is hewn a second trough, fourteen inches deep and four feet by three in size. The two are connected by two or three small holes bored through the rock close to the bottom of the upper trough, so that, on the grapes being put in and pressed down, the juice streamed into the lower vat. Every vineyard seems to have had one of these presses" (Land of Israel, p. 106). The wine-presses were thus permanent, and were sufficiently well known to serve as indications of certain localities (Judg. vii, 25; Zech. xiv, 10). The upper receptacle (gath) was large enough to admit of threshing being carried on in (not "by," as in the A. V.) it, as was done by Gideon for the sake of concealment (Judg. vi, 11). See PRESS; VINEYARD.

In Palestine the vintage takes place in September, and is celebrated with great rejoicings (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 431; ii, 81). The ripe fruit was gathered in baskets (Jer. vi, 9), as represented in Egyptian paintings (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 41-45), and was carried to the wine-press. It was then placed in the upper one of the two vats or receptacles of which the wine-press was formed, and was subjected to the process of "treading," which has prevailed in all ages in Oriental and South-European countries (Neh. xiii, 15; Job xxiv, 11; Isa. xvi, 10; Jer. xxv, 30; xlviii, 33; Amos ix, 13; Rev. xix, 15). A certain amount of juice exuded from the ripe fruit from its own pressure before the treading commenced. This appears to have been kept separate from the rest of the juice, and to have formed the gleukos, or "sweet wine," noticed in Acts ii, 13. The first drops of juice that reached the lower vat were termed the dema, or "tear," and formed the first-fruits of the vintage (Sept. ἀπαρχὰς ληνοῖ) which were to be presented to Jehovah (Exod. xxii, 29). The "treading" was effected by one or more men, according to the size of the vat, and, if the Jews adopted the same arrangements as the Egyptians, the treaders were assisted in the operation by ropes fixed to the roof of the wine-press (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 46). They encouraged one another by shouts and cries (Isa. xvi, 9, 10; Jer. xxv, 30; xlviii, 33). Their legs and garments were dyed red with the juice (Gen. xlix, 11; Isa. lxiii, 2, 3). The expressed juice escaped by an aperture into the lower vat, or was at once collected in vessels. A hand-press was occasionally used in Egypt (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 45), but we have no notice of such an instrument in the Bible. As to the subsequent treatment of the wine, we have but little information. Sometimes it was drunk as must, but more generally it was bottled off after fermentation, and, if it were designed to be kept for some time, a certain amount of lees was added to give it body (Isa. xxv, 6). The wine consequently required to be "refined," or strained, previously to being brought to table (ibid.). For further elucidation of the subject, see Hackett, Illustr. of Script. p. 156 sq.; Van Lennep, Bibl. Lands, p. 117 sq. See WINE.

Wingate, W. M., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Darlington, S. C., July 28, 1828. He graduated from Wake Forest College, N. C., in 1849; for two years was a student of theology at Furman Institute, S. C.; from 1852 to 1854 agent of Wake Forest College, and in the latter year was chosen president, which office he held for twenty-five years. He died Feb. 27, 1879. (J. C. S.)

Winklers, a sect existing in Strasburg towards the end of the 14th century. Their teachings and usages resembled those of the contemporary Waldenses, though with some divergences; but it is probable that the sect was of native growth, and originated in the increasing sense of need for an improvement in religious teaching, which existed in the consciousness of the people. Its members sustained communication with those of other similar associations in different cities along the Rhine and in Württemberg and Switzerland. They rejected, on the authority of the Bible, all mariolatry and saints'-worship, the use of images, the priesthood, and the doctrines of meritorious works and purgatory. They wished to restore the worship of God in spirit and truth. They made use of lay teachers, who were required to be unmarried and unencumbered with property, and who itinerated continuously. The teachers were supported by the members of the sect, whose confessions they also received and upon whom they imposed penances. In their assemblies it was customary to offer prayer, read from books, and preach. They attended mass and confessed minor offences to the Romish priests for the sake of peace. In Strasburg laborers and artisans composed the sect, master Johann von Blumstein—later, after he had renounced their errors, syndic of the city—being its most prominent member. A number of Beguins were also among its members. They were not disposed to deal aggressively with the Church, and were content to meet in the secrecy of private houses, but the fear of being discovered sometimes led them into crime. In 1874 a Winkeler, who had returned to the Church, was murdered by direction of the sect, which paid a certain sum for the deed and submitted to undergo the penance imposed by its rulers. At another time the inquisitor, Johann Arnoldi, was so emphatically threatened with death in the confessional that he fled the city. In 1400, however, thirty-two members, both men and women, were arrested and tortured. Twenty-six of them acknowledged their connection with the sect, and were banished from the city and diocese, under the penalty of death by fire if they should return. The documents belonging to the trial are yet in existence, and are given in Kobrich's Mittheilungen aus der Geschichte der erung. Kirche des Elsasses (Strasburg, 1855), i, 3 sq. Neither Winkeler nor Waldense was ever found in Strasburg after this trial. See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Winkelhofer, Sebastian, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born Jan. 18, 1743, at Munzing, in the Lower-Danube department. When sixteen years of age he joined the order of the Jesuits. Two years later he went to Ingolstadt, where he studied philosophy, Greek, and Hebrew. In 1768 he betook himself to the study of theology, especially of Church history and canon law. In 1772 he received holy orders, and in the year following was made head of the congregation of St. Maria de Victoria. In 1775 he was appointed preacher of St. Maurice, and in 1789 delivered his first sermon as dean in Neuburg, on the Danube. Here he labored till 1794, when he was called as court-preacher to Munich, where he died, Nov. 16, 1806. He wrote, Reden über die Bergpredigt unseres Herrn Jesu Christi (edited by S. M. Sailer, Munich, 1809; 2d ed. 1812); the same editor published his Vermischte Predigten (ibid. 1814-17, 4 vols.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 781 sq. (B. P.)

Winkler, Hermann Erich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born April 11, 1738, at Hildesheim. He studied at Göttingen under Walch, Michaelis, and Heilmann. In 1763 he was appointed pastor in his native place; in 1772 accepted a call to Hamburg, where he labored for twenty years; in 1798 was called to Lüneburg as superintendent, and while he was delivering his first sermon, on March 18, he was paralyzed, and died a few hours later. Winkler was very well versed in Greek history, philosophy, and literature; Pindar he knew almost by heart. His published writings are of no importance. See Döring, Die deutschen Kunztredner, p. 570 sq. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Dietrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Hamburg, Dec. 27, 1711. He studied at Leipzig from 1732 to 1736, and in the latter year was made magister, on account of his dissertation, De Luca, Evangelista Medico. In the same year he was called as professor to Hamburg, to occupy the chair made vacant by Fabricius. He entered upon his duties by delivering an oration, De Felici Puriter ac Necessario Nexu Scientiarum Philosophicarum cum Arte Bene et Ornate Dicendi. In 1744 he accepted a call to Hildesheim as superintendent and member of consistory. The University of Rinteln conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity on presenting a dissertation, De Philosophia Platonico-Pythagorea Frustrata. Many professorships offered to him he declined. In 1758 he was called as first pastor of St. Nicolai to his native city, where he died, April 4, 1784. Of his many works we mention, Disquisitiones Philologicae, etc. (1741):—Hypomnemata Philologica et Critica (1745):—Ani- madversus Philologica et Critica (1750-52, 3 parts). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 736 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 523; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 191, 279, 545, 570, 796, 909. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Friedrich (1), father of Johann Dietrich, was born Dec. 13, 1679, at Wertheim, in Franconia. He studied at Greifswalde, and, after completing his course, travelled extensively through Holland and England. With the large material which he had collected in England he went to Frankfurt, with the view of preparing a new edition of the Ethiopic grammar, published by Ludolph, his former teacher, in 1702. In 1704 he accepted a call to Hamburg as professor of Oriental languages, and in 1712 was made first pastor of St. Nicolai. He died Oct. 24, 1738. Besides his Ethiopic grammar, which he edited in a second edition, he published a number of sermons, for which see Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 742. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Friedrich (2), a Lutheran theologian, was born Aug. 17, 1809, at Hohen-Priessnitz, in Saxony. He studied theology at Halle, and in 1834 came to America. In 1835 he was called to Newark, N. J., where he labored for seven years. In 1842 he was called as professor to the theological seminary at Columbus, O., where he taught for three years. In 1845 he went to Detroit, Mich., and labored there for twelve years. In the meantime he had become acquainted with pastor Grabau, the head of the Lutheran Buffalo Synod, which he joined, and which appointed him, in 1856, professor of the Martin Luther College. Here he labored until his death, June 9, 1877. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Joseph, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Luckau, in Saxony, Dec. 23, 1670. He was at first pastor in Magdeburg, afterwards a chaplain in the army, and accompanied the troops to Holland and Italy. Subsequently he returned to Magdeburg, and became chief minister of the cathedral and member of consistory. He died Aug. 11, 1722. Winkler left some hymns which are still sung in the German Church. Thus, Soll' ich aus Furcht vor Menschenkindern (Engl. transl. in the Moravian Hymn-Book, p. 718, "Shall I, thro' fear of feeble man?")—Rings recht, wenn Gottes Gnade (Engl. transl. Lyra Germ. i, 46, "Strive, when thou art call'd of God?")—Meine Seele senket sich (ibid. i, 198, "Yea, my spirit fain would sink"). See Koch, Gesch. des deutschen Kirchenliedes, iv, 383 sq. (B. P.)

Winner, Isaac, a Methodist Episcopal minister. Scarcely any data of his life are obtainable. He was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1822, and some time later joined the New Jersey Conference. He died July 4, 1868. He was a remarkable man every way; original, strong in his convictions, peerless in self-respect and self-possession. He was one of the founders and fosterers of Pennington Seminary, and took large interest in all educational matters, except theological schools, which he opposed bitterly, on the ground that they were prolific of theological errors. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 62.

Winnowing (וִּירוּת, lit. to scatter). Among the Hebrews, as still in Palestine, when the grain had been threshed, or, rather, crushed and trodden, in the open threshing-floor, it was thrown out, altogether, into the middle of the floor; it was then tossed up into the wind, which removed the broken straw and the chaff, while the grain, the unthreshed ears, and clods of earth, with grain adhering to them, fell in a separate heap. The earth and other impurities were then removed from the grain by means of a sieve; and the winnowed heap containing many ears that were broken, but not fully crushed out, was exposed again to the threshing operation. This was again thrown across the wind by a shovel (סִוִּרָה, misrah, rendered "fan" in our version of Isa. xxx, 24), when the pure grain fell to the ground and the light chaff was borne away by the wind, as the psalmist describes. The scattered straw, so far as required for the fodder of cattle and the making of bricks, was collected for use, but the light chaff of the second winnowing was left in the ground entangled with the stubble (the threshing-floor being in the harvest-field), with which it was burned on the ground to help to manure the soil. It therefore furnished a fit symbol of the destruction of the wicked. These winnowing processes are still followed in the East; and, as far as appears by their paintings, are much the same as were practiced by the ancient Egyptians.—Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Psa. i, 4. See AGRICULTURE.

Winram, JOHN, a Scotch reformer of the 16th century, was superintendent of Fife and Strathern, and died in 1582. He was the author of a Catechism, of which all copies are thought to have perished.

Winter, VIKT ANTON, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born May 22, 1754, at Hoheneggelskoben, near Landshut. He studied at Ingolstadt, and in 1778 received holy orders. For two years he continued his studies at Rome, and after his return was appointed pastor at Laichling, near Eggmühl. Some years he spent in travelling with the son of a count, whose tutor he was. After returning home, he was called to Ingolstadt as preacher and professor of Church history. In 1795 he commenced his lectures. When the University of Ingolstadt was removed to Landshut, in 1801, he went there, and died Feb. 27, 1814. He wrote, Versuch zur Verbesserung der katholischen Liturgie (Munich, 1804):—Sammlung kleiner liturgischer Schriften (ibid. 1811):—Geschichte der bayerischen Wiedertäufer im xvi. Jahrhundert (ibid. 1808):—Kirchengeschichte von Altbaiern, Oesterreich und Tyrol (Landshut, 1814):—Patrologie (Munich, eod.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 748 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 767, 781, 785, 854; ii, 70, 78, 285, 286. (B. P.)

Winterfeld, GEORG AUGUST VIVIGENS CARL VON, a German scholar, was born in 1794, and died at Berlin, Feb. 19, 1852, during the morning prayer. He is well known in the department of Church music, and as editor of the following works: Der evangelische Kirchengesang und sein Verhältnis zur Kunst des Tonsatzes (Leipzig, 1843–47, in 3 parts): the first is entitled, Der evangelische Kirchengesang im 1. Jahrhundert der Kirchenverbesserung; the second, Das siebenzehnte Jahrhundert; the third, Das achtzehnte Jahrhundert:—Dr. Mart. Luther's deutsche geistl. Lieder nebst den während seines Lebens dazu gebrauchten Singweisen (ibid. 1840):—Ueber Herstellung des Gemeinde- und Chorgesangs in der evang. Kirche (ibid. 1848):—Zur Geschichte heiliger Tonkunst (ibid. 1850, 1852, 2 parts). It must be remarked that Winterfeld was by profession a jurist. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1456; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenlieder, vii, 425, 446, 459, 488. (B. P.)

Winterthur (Vitoduranus, or Ortus de Oppido Winterthur, "Fratrum Minorum Minimus," as he describes himself), JOHANNES VON, was a Minorite monk of the 14th century, and the author of a chronicle which is preserved in the town library of Zurich, and is a source for the history of South Germany and Switzerland. He was born in the period 1292–1300, at Winterthur, in the present canton of Zurich, and became a Minorite about 1320. He probably died at Zurich after 1348.

The original manuscript of the chronicle was doubtless that owned by Antistes Bullinger of Zurich, a historiographer of the 16th century, and now in the Zurich library. All other manuscripts and editions are derived from that, though an additional codex is mentioned by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Bibl. Manuscript. Nova, i, 21, Paris, 1739) as having been transferred from the library of queen Christina of Sweden to that of the Vatican. The period covered by the chronicle extends from the death of the emperor Frederic II to 1348. It is based in part upon more ancient chronicles, in part upon the oral and written statements of contemporary witnesses, and to some extent on personal observations made by the author. The writer was acquainted with the ecclesiastical and profane literature of his time, with the Scriptures, with the works of the masters in his order, Lyra, Occam, etc., and the decretals of the popes. He mentions Aristotle, Æsop, Horace, Isidore, etc. The contents of the book are, however, made up of disconnected notices and illustrations, strung together in chronological order. It is important as a portrayal of the conflicts of the emperor Louis, the Bavarian, with the papacy, and of the consequent disturbances in the life of the Church. It is the earliest report, for Swiss history, of the battle of Morgarten, of the vengeance visited by the dukes of Austria upon the assassin of king Albert, of the history of Zurich, etc. It is also of special importance to the study of the life and conditions of the time in which it originated. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wintle, THOMAS, a learned English divine, was born at Gloucester, April 28, 1737; received the rudiments of learning in his native city, became scholar, fellow, and tutor of Pembroke College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1759. He was appointed rector of Wittrisham, in Kent, and domestic chaplain to archbishop Secker in 1767, obtained the living of St. Peter's in Wallingford; became rector of Brightwell, in Berkshire, in 1774, where he remained until his death, July 29, 1814. He published, Daniel, an Improved Version Attempted, etc. (1792).—The Expediency, Prediction, and Accomplishment of the Christian Redemption, Illustrated in Eight Sermons (Bampton lecture, Oxford, 1794).—Letter to the Lord Bishop of Worcester.—Dissertation on the Vision Contained in the Second Chapter of Zechariah (1797):—Christian Ethics, or Discourses on the Beatitudes, etc. (1812).

Winzer, JULIUS FRIEDRICH, a German doctor and professor of theology, was born July 30, 1780, at Chemnitz. In 1802 he was appointed teacher at the famous school in Meissen, in 1809 he was called to Wittenberg as ordinary professor of morals, and in 1812 became ordinary professor of theology. In 1814 he was called to Leipzig, where he died in the year 1845. He wrote, Adnotationes ad Loca Quædam Epistolæ Pauli ad Romanos (Leipzig, 1835):—Commentatio in Locum Pauli ad Ephesios Epistola Cap. i, 15 sq. (ibid. eod.):—Commentatio in Locum, etc., Cap. iv, 1 sq. (ibid. 1839):—Annotatio ad Locum Ephes. vi, 10-17, Cui Subiuncta sunt Vita Doctorem Theologiae a Lipsiensi Theologorum Ordine Recens Creatorum (ibid. 1840):—Annotationes ad Locum Prioris Epistolae Petri Cap. i, 8-12 (ibid. 1843):—Annotationes, etc., Cap. iii, 18-22 et iv, 6 (ibid. 1844). In connection with H. A. Schott he published Commentarii in Epistolas Novi Testamenti. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 29, 164, 213, 249, 252, 257, 263, 268, 294, 429, 484, 440, 476; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1456. (B. P.)

Winzet (or Winget), NINIAN, a Scotch clergyman, is supposed to have been born in Renfrewshire in 1518, and to have been educated at the University of Glasgow; was master of the grammar-school of Linlithgow in 1551, and soon afterwards entered into holy orders; was cited before the superintendent of the Lothians in 1561 to answer for his religious opinions, when he gave in his adherence to the Roman Church, in opposition to the Reformation, and was deposed from his office; defended his position, and endeavored to accomplish reform within the Roman Church; was compelled to escape to Flanders in 1563; appointed abbot of the Scottish monastery of St. James at Ratisbon in 1576; and died Sept. 21, 1592. He published, Certaine Tractatis for Reformatoun of Doctryne and Maneris (1562):—The Last Blast of the Trumpet of Godis Worde against the Usurpt Auctoritie of Johne Knox and his Calvinian Brether, Intrudit Precheouris (1592), suppressed by the Protestants in the hands of the printer:—An Exhortation to Mary Queen of Scottis, etc. (1562):—The Buke of Fourscore and Thre Questions touching Doctrine, Ordour, and Maneris Proposit, etc. (1563). Wire (בֶּרֶךְ, pathil, Exod. xxxix, 3, a line or thread, as rendered in Judg. xvi, 9; Ezek. xl, 8).

Wiros, Saint, an Irish prelate, was born in the county of Clare, and was at an early period of life elected bishop of Dublin. He went to Rome and was consecrated by the pope. He governed this see some time, and gained a high reputation on account of his sanctity. He finally resigned his bishopric and went to Gaul. He built an oratory at Mons Petri, which he dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and called it St. Peter's Monastery. He died May 8, on which day his festival is observed. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 18.

Wirth, MICHAEL, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 1, 1788, at Lauingen, and died as professor of hermeneutics, exegesis, and paedagogics at Dillingen, July 17, 1832. He is the author of Altes und Neues über den 1. Brief an die Korinther (Ulm, 1825). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 307. (B. P.)

Wirts, JOHANN, a Swiss theologian, who died at Zurich, Sept. 6, 1658, is the author of, De Munere Ecclesiastico ex 1 Cor. iv:—De Ecclesia ex 1 Tim. iii, 15:—Emblema Theologicum ex Apocalypsi:—De Communionis Sanctorum:—De Christo Unico Novi Testamenti Pontifice:—De Apostolo Petro:—De Bonis Operibus:—De Natura Philosophiae:—De Testimonio Divino:—De Calo, etc. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Wirz, LUDWIG, a Protestant theologian, was born at Zurich in 1756, and died at Münch-Aldorf, in Switzerland, May 29, 1816. He is the author of, Helvetische Kirchengeschichte aus Hottinger's älterem Werke und andern Quellen neu bearbeitet (Zurich, 1808-14, 4 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 809. (B. P.)

Wisdom or God is that grand attribute of his nature by which he knows and orders all things for the promotion of his glory and the good of his creatures. It is that perfection of God, by virtue of which he realizes the highest designs by the use of best means.

The assertion of Spinoza and Strauss, that no design at all can be ascribed to God, is connected with the pantheistic idea of the impersonality of God. Certainly there does not exist for the infinite understanding the opposition, nor even the great disparity, between means and ends, which so frequently hinder us. The exclusion here of the idea of design is the exclusion of the idea that God is a Spirit who thinks and wills. As such he must not only be the All-wise, but also the Only-wise One, in comparison with whom all human wisdom is as nothing. Holy Scripture also presents him to us precisely in this light (1 Tim. i, 17). He is a God who not only possesses in himself wisdom in perfection (Prov. viii, 22), but communicates it to others (James i, 5), and possesses a manifold wisdom manifest for the eye of angels, although for that of man unsearchable (Ephes. iii, 10; Rom. xi, 33).

This wisdom appears in all the works of God's hands (Psa. civ, 24); in the dispensations of his providence (xcvii, 1, 2); in the work of redemption (Eph. iii, 10); in the government and preservation of his Church in all ages (Psa. cvii, 7). This doctrine should teach us admiration (Rev. xv, 3, 4); trust and confidence (Pa. ix, 10); prayer (Prov. iii, 5, 6); submission (Heb. xii, 9); praise (Psa. ciii, 1, 4). See Charnock, Works, vol. i; Saurin, Sermons, i, 157, Engl. transl.; Gill, Divinity, i, 98; Abernethy, Sermons, vol. i, ser. 10; Ray, Wisdom of God in Creation; Paley, Natural Theology.

In Prov. viii, 12-36, we have a beautiful and poetic personification of divine wisdom. Some understand wisdom here to be the same as the Logos (q. v.) or Word, mentioned in John i, 1, 14. We only need observe here that wisdom, in the passage mentioned, is spoken of as an attribute and not a person; a virtue, and not a concrete being. See the article following. The term wisdom is used of the divine wisdom as revealed in and by Christ (Matt. xi, 19; Luke vii, 37; xi, 49; Mark vi, 2); also of Christ himself, as the author and source of wisdom (1 Cor. i, 30). See Bibliotheca Sacra, April, 1858; July, 1856.

Wisdom PERSONIFIED. The foundation of this view is to be found in the book of Proverbs, where (viii) wisdom (Chokmah) is represented as present with God before (viii, 22) and during the creation of the world. So far it appears only as a principle regulating the action of the Creator, though even in this way it establishes a close connection between the world, as the outward expression of wisdom, and God. Moreover, by the personification of wisdom, and the relation of wisdom to men (viii, 31), a preparation is made for the extension of the doctrine. This appears, after a long interval, in Ecclesiasticus. In the great description of wisdom given in that book (xxiv), wisdom is represented as a creation of God (xxiv, 9), penetrating the whole universe (4-6), and taking up her special abode with the chosen people (8-12). Her personal existence and providential function are thus distinctly brought out. In the book of Wisdom the conception gains yet further completeness. In this, wisdom is identified with the Spirit of God (ix, 17)—an identification half implied in Eccles. xxiv, 8—which brooded over the elements of the unformed world (ix, 9), and inspired the prophets (vii, 27). She is the power which unites (i, 7) and directs all things (viii, 1). By her, in especial, men have fellowship with God (xii, 1); and her action is not confined to any period, for "in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God and prophets" (vii, 27). So also her working, in the providential history of God's people, is traced at length (x); and her power is declared to reach beyond the world of man into that of spirits (vii, 23). See ECCLESIASTICUS.

The conception of wisdom, however boldly personified, yet leaves a wide chasm between the world and the Creator. Wisdom answers to the idea of a spirit vivifying and uniting all things in all time, as distinguished from any special outward revelation of the divine person. Thus, at the same time that the doctrine of wisdom was gradually constructed, the correlative doctrine of the divine utterance was also reduced to a definite shape. The word (Memra), the divine expression, as it was understood in Palestine, furnished the exact complement to wisdom, the divine thought; but the ambiguity of the Greek Logos (sermo, ratio) introduced considerable confusion into the later treatment of the two ideas. Broadly, however, it may be said that the Word properly represented the mediative element in the action of God, Wisdom the mediative element of his omnipresence. Thus, according to the later distinction of Philo, wisdom corresponds to the immanent word (Λόγος ἑνδιάθετος), while the word, strictly speaking, was defined as enunciative (Λόγος προφορικός). Both ideas are included in the language of the prophets, and both found a natural development in Palestine and Egypt. The one prepared men for the revelation of the Son of God, the other for the revelation of the Holy Spirit. See LOGOS.

The book of the Pseudo-Solomon, which gives the most complete view of divine wisdom, contains only two passages in which the word is invested with the attributes of personal action (Wisd. of Sol. xvi, 12; xviii, 15; ix, 1 is of different character). These, however, are sufficient to indicate that the two powers were distinguished by the writer; and it has been commonly argued that the superior prominence given in the book to the conception of wisdom is an indication of a date anterior to Philo. Nor is this conclusion unreasonable, if it is probably established on independent grounds that the book is of Alexandrian origin. But it is no less important to observe that the doctrine of wisdom in itself is no proof of this. There is nothing in the direct teaching on this subject which might not have arisen in Palestine, and it is necessary that we should recur to the more special traits of Alexandrian thought in the book which have been noticed before (§ 6) for the primary evidence of its Alexandrian origin; and starting from this there appears to be, so far as can be judged from the imperfect materials at our command, a greater affinity in the form of the doctrine on wisdom to the teaching of Alexandria than to that of Palestine (comp. Ewald, Geschichte, iv, 548 fol.; Welte, Einführung, p. 161 sq., has some good criticisms on many supposed traces of Alexandrian doctrine in the book, but errs in denying all). See WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

The doctrine of the divine wisdom passes by a transition, often imperceptible, to that of human wisdom, which is derived from it. This embraces not only the whole range of moral and spiritual virtues, but also the various branches of physical knowledge. In this aspect the enumeration of the great forms of natural science in Wisdom of Solomon, vii, 17-20 (viii, 8), offers a most instructive subject of comparison with the corresponding passages in 1 Kings iv, 32-34. In addition to the subjects on which Solomon wrote (Songs, Proverbs: plants, beasts, fowls, creeping things, fishes), cosmology, meteorology, astronomy, psychology, and even the elements of the philosophy of history (Wisd. viii, 8), are included among the gifts of wisdom. So far, then, the thoughtful Jew had already at the Christian era penetrated into the domain of speculation and inquiry, into each province, it would seem, which was then recognised, without abandoning the simple faith of his nation. The fact itself is most significant; and the whole book may be quoted as furnishing an important corrective to the later Roman descriptions of the Jews, which were drawn from the people when they had been almost uncivilized by the excitement of the last desperate struggle for national existence. See Bruch, Die Weisheitslehre der Hebräer (1851). Comp. PHILOSOPHY.

Wise (חָכָם, chakām, sóphos). The Hebrew word, חָכָמִים, chakamim, rendered "wise men" (Gen. xli, 8; Exod. vii, 11; Eccles. ix, 17; Jer. i, 85; Esth. i, 18) not only signifies men celebrated for wisdom, magi, but also magicians or enchanterers. See MAGIC. The feminine of the same term, חָכָמָה, chakmáh, is used for a "wise woman," one noted for cunning or skill (2 Sam. xiv, 2; xx, 16). See WITCH. The Hebrew word חָכָמִים, chakamim, rendered "magicians" (Gen. xli, 8, 24; Exod. vii, 11, 22; viii, 7, 18, 19; ix, 11; Dan. i, 20; ii, 21), properly signifies sacred scribes, skilled in the sacred writing or hieroglyphics; and is applied to a class of Egyptian priests; and also to the magi of Babylon and Persia. See MAGI. In Matt. ii, 1-16, the Greek term is μάγος, having the same significance. See STAR IN THE EAST.

Wise, Francis, an English clergyman, was born at Oxford in 1695. He was educated at Trinity College, of which he became a fellow in 1718; was assistant to the Bodleian librarian in 1717; afterwards presented to the living of Ellesfield, near Oxford; custos archivorum in 1726; became rector of Rotherfield Greys in 1745; Radcliffe librarian in 1748; and died Oct. 6, 1767. He published, Annales Rerum Gestarum Ælfrédi Magni (1722):—Epistola ad Joannem Masson de Nummo Abguri Regis (1736):—A Letter to Dr. Mead Concerning some Antiquities in Berkshire, etc. (1738):—History and Chronology of the Fabulous Ages, Considered Particularly with Regard to the Two Ancient Deities, Bacchus and Hercules (1764), and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wise, Michael, one of the most eminent of English Church-music composers, was born in Wiltshire about the middle of the 17th century. He was among the first set of children chosen at the Chapel Royal after the Restoration; became organist and master of the choristers in the cathedral of Salisbury in 1668; was appointed gentleman of the Chapel Royal in 1675; and was made almoner of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1686. Quitting his house at night in a state of great irritation, he was stopped by the watchman, with whom he entered into a quarrel, and was killed in the affray, in August, 1687. His anthems, "Awake up, My Glory," "Prepare ye the Way of the Lord," and "The Ways of Zion do Mourn," are still listened to with admiration.

Wiseheart, the family name of several Scotch prelates.

1. GEORGE, was minister at North Leith, and deposed in 1638 for refusing to take the covenant. He went to England in 1660, and soon after had the rectory of Newcastle-upon-Tyne conferred upon him. Upon the restoration of episcopacy in Scotland, he was preferred to the see of Edinburgh, into which he was consecrated, June 1, 1662, at St. Andrews. He died in 1671. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 62.

2. JOHN, came into the see of Glasgow in 1819. He was an enemy to the English interest in Scotland. He was taken prisoner and confined in the Tower of London, April 6, 1820, but was probably released in 1822. He died in 1825. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 248.

3. ROBERT, was consecrated bishop of Glasgow in 1272. In 1296 he swore fealty to king Edward I of England. He was appointed one of the lords of the regency in 1286, and died Nov. 1, 1316. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 241.

4. WILLIAM, was archdeacon of St. Andrews and lord high-chancellor. He was elected to the see of Glasgow in 1270, and afterwards to that of St. Andrews. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 241.

Wislicenus, Adolf Timotheus, formerly a leader of the free-religious movement in Germany, and speaker of the society at Berlin, who died at Dresden, March 27, 1883, is the author of Beitrag zur Beantwortung der Frage: Ob Schrift? Ob Geist? (Leipzig, 1845):—Christus in der Kirche: tot, erstehend und erstanden (eod.):—Zur Vertheidigung der freien Gemeinde (Halberstadt, 1852), etc. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Wislicenus, Gustav Adolf, a liberal Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 20, 1803, at Battaune, near Eilenburg. He studied at Halle, and while yet a student was sentenced, in 1824, to prison for twelve years on account of demagogical intrigues. Having been pardoned after five years' imprisonment, he resumed his studies at Berlin in 1829, in 1834 was appointed pastor near Querfurt, and in 1841 was called to Halle. Having become a member of the "friends of light," he lectured in their behalf on May 29, 1844, at Köthen. Professor Guericke, then at Halle, denounced him before the ecclesiastical authorities, in consequence of which Wislicenus published his Ob Schrift? Ob Geist? (Leipzig, 4th ed. 1845). In 1846 Wislicenus was deposed of his office, and wrote Die Amtsentsetzung (ibid. 1846). He now preached to a congregation of so-called "free members" at Halle, and after the publication of Die Bibel im Lichte der Bildung unserer Zeit (Magdeburg and Lübeck, 1853), he left for America, and lectured in New York in 1854. At Hoboken he founded an academy, which he left, in 1856, for Switzerland, where he also founded an academy at Zurich. He soon retired for literary pursuits to Fluntern, where he died, Oct. 14, 1875. Besides the publications mentioned already, he wrote, Nachrichten über die freie Gemeinde in Halle (Halle, 1847); Beiträge zur Förderung der Religion der Menschlichkeit (ibid. 1850); Aus Amerika (Leipzig, 1854); Die Bibel für denkende Leser (ibid. 1863-64, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1866); Entweder — Oder (Zurich, 1868); Gegensatz und Zukunft der Religion (Leipzig, 1873). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1459 sq.; Theologisches Universitätslexikon, s. v.; Literarischer Handwörterbuch, 1875, p. 483. (B. P.)

Wisowatius, ANDREAS, one of the most prominent Socinians, and grandson of F. Socinus, was born in 1608 at Philippovien, in Lithuania. For many years he was pastor of different Socinian congregations in Poland. He died in Holland in 1678. Of his sixty-two writings we mention, Religio Rationalis (1685); Stimuli Virtutum Freni Peccator (Amsterdam, 1682). He edited the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, and the Raccorvian Catechism. Leibnitz wrote against him a treatise on the Trinity. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 808, 874, 485; Theologisches Universitätslexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Witch of ENDOR (Heb. אִשָּׁת עֵזְרָאֵל בְּנֵי־דָוִד, 1 Sam. xxviii, 7; lit. a woman, mistress of an Ob in En-Dor; Sept. ἡ γυνὴ ἑγγαστριμυδος in 'Ενδῶρ; Vulg. mulier pythomem habens in Endor; A.V. "a woman that hath a familiar spirit in Endor"). The story of "the witch of Endor," as she is commonly but improperly called, is usually referred to magical power. She, however, belongs to another class of pretenders to supernatural powers. See DIVINATION. She was a necromancer, or one of those persons who pretended to call up the spirits of the dead to converse with the living (Isa. viii, 19; xxix, 4; lxx, 8). A full account is given of such persons by Lucan (vi, 591, etc.), and by Tibullus (i, 2; v, 45), where the pretensions of the sorceress are thus described—

"Hæc cantu auditque solum, Manesque sepulchris Elicit, et tepido devocat ossa rugo."

Of much the same character is the sibyl in the sixth book of Virgil's Aeneid. For the pretended modern instances of such intercourse, see SPIRITUALISM.

It is related as the last and crowning act of Saul's rebellion against God, that he consulted such a person, an act forbidden by the divine law (Lev. xx, 6), which sentenced the pretenders to such a power to death (ver. 27), and which law Saul himself had recently enforced (1 Sam. xxviii, 3, 9), because, it is supposed, they had freely predicted his approaching ruin; although, after the well-known prophecies of Samuel to that effect, the disasters Saul had already encountered, and the growing influence of David, there "needed no ghost to come from the grave to tell them this." Various explanations of this story have been offered. See NECROMANCER.

1. It has been attempted to resolve the whole into imposture and collusion. Saul, who was naturally a weak and excitable man, had become, through a long series of vexations and anxieties, absolutely "delirious," as Patrick observes: "he was afraid and his heart greatly trembled," says the sacred writer. In this state of mind, and upon the very eve of his last battle, he commissions his own servants to seek him a woman possessing a familiar spirit, and, attended by two of them, he comes to her "by night," the most favorable time for imposition. He converses with her alone, his two attendants, whether his secret enemies or real friends, being absent, somewhere, yet, however, close at hand. Might not one of these, or some one else, have agreed with the woman to personate Samuel in another room?—for it appears that Saul, though he spoke with, did not see the ghost (ver. 13, 14): who, it should be observed, told him nothing but what his own attendants could have told him, with the exception of these words, "to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me" (ver. 19); to which, however, it is replied, that Saul's death did not occur upon the morrow, and that the word so translated is sufficiently ambiguous, for though מָחָר means "to-morrow" in some passages, it means the future, indefinitely, in others (Exod. xiii, 14, and see the margin; Josh. iv, 6, 21; comp. Matt. vi, 34). It is further urged that her "crying with a loud voice," and her telling Saul, at the same time, that she knew him, were the well-timed arts of the sorceress, intended to magnify her pretended skill.

It is, however, objected against this, or any other hypothesis of collusion, that the sacred writer not only represents the pythoness as affirming, but also himself affirms, that she saw Samuel, and that Samuel spoke to Saul, nor does he drop the least hint that it was not the real Samuel of whom he was speaking.

2. The same objections apply equally to the theory of ventriloquism, which has been grounded upon the word used by the Sept., ἑγγαστριμυδος.

3. Others have given a literal interpretation of the story, and have maintained that Samuel actually appeared to Saul. Justin Martyr advocates this theory, and, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, urges this incident in proof of the immortality of the soul (p. 333). The same view is taken in the additions to the Sept. in 1 Chron. x, 18, καὶ ἀπεκρίνατο αὐτῷ Σαμουὴλ ὁ προφήτης; and in Eccles. xli, 9, 20, it is said, "and after his death Samuel prophesied, and showed the king his end," etc. Such also is the view Josephus takes (Antig. vi, 14, 3, 4), where he bestows a labored eulogium upon the woman.

It is, however, objected that the actual appearance of Samuel is inconsistent with all we are taught by revelation concerning the state of the dead; involves the possibility of a spirit or soul assuming a corporeal shape, conversing audibly, etc.; and, further, that it is incredible that God would submit the departed souls of his servants to be summoned back to earth, by rites either utterly futile, or else deriving their efficacy from the co-operation of Satan. So Tertullian argues (De Animæ, cap. lvii), and many others of the ancients.

4. Others have supposed that the woman induced Satan or some evil spirit to personate Samuel. But this theory, besides other difficulties, attributes nothing less than miraculous power to the devil; for it supposes the apparition of a spiritual and incorporeal being, and that Satan can assume the appearance of any one he pleases. Again, the historian (ver. 14) calls this appearance to Saul, שְׂמוּאֵל הָרִאשִׁון, "Samuel himself" (the latter word is entirely omitted by our translators); which he could not with truth have done if it were no other than the devil; who, besides, is here represented as the severe reprover of Saul's impiety and wickedness. The admission that Satan or an evil spirit could thus personate an individual at pleasure, would endanger the strongest evidences of Christianity.

5. Others have maintained another interpretation, which appears to us at once tenable, and countenanced by similar narratives in Scripture; namely, that the whole account is the narrative of a miracle, a divine representation or impression, partly upon the senses of Saul, and partly upon those of the woman, and intended for the rebuke and punishment of Saul. It is urged, from the air of the narrative in verses 11, 12, that Samuel appeared before the woman had any time for jugglery, fumigations, etc.; for although the word "when" (ver. 12) is speciously printed in Roman characters, it has nothing to answer to it in the original, which reads simply thus, beginning at verse 11: "Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel. And the woman saw Samuel, and cried with a loud voice." No sooner then had Saul said, "Bring me up Samuel," than Samuel himself was presented to her mind—an event so contrary to her expectation that she cried out with terror. At the same time, and by the same miraculous means, she was made aware of the royal dignity of her visitant. The vision then continues in the mind of Saul, who thereby receives his last reproof from heaven, and hears the sentence of his approaching doom. Thus God interposed with a miracle previously to the use of any magical formulae, as he did when the king of Moab had recourse to sorceries to overrule the mind of Balaam, so that he was compelled to bless those whom Balak wanted him to curse (Numb. xxiii); and as God also interposed when Ahaziah sent to consult Baal-zebub his god, about his recovery, when by his prophet Elijah he stopped the messengers, reproved their master, and foretold his death (2 Kings i, 2, 16). It may also be observed that Saul was on this occasion simply sentenced to the death he had justly incurred by having recourse to those means which he knew to be unlawful. This theory concerning the narrative of Samuel's appearance to Saul is maintained with much learning and ingenuity by Hugh Farmer (Dissertation on Miracles, Lond. 1771, p. 472, etc.). It is adopted by Dr. Waterland (Sermons, ii, 267), and Dr. Delaney, in his Life of David; but is combated by Dr. Chandler with objections, which are, however, answered or obviated by Farmer. This last-named writer is of opinion that the suppression of the word "himself" (ver. 14), and the introduction of the word "when" (ver. 12), are to be ascribed to the prejudices of our translators. If they do not betray a bias on their minds, these instances support the general remark of Bishop Lowth, upon the English translation, "that in respect of the sense, and accuracy of interpretation, the improvements of which it is capable are great and numberless" (Preliminary Dissertation to Isaiah, ad finem). See SAUL.

Witchcraft, BIBLICAL MENTION OF. 1. The word "witchcraft" occurs in the A. V. as a translation of קִשְׁפֵּי, kishph (but only in the plur.), in 2 Kings ix, 22; Isa. xlvi, 9, 12; Mic. v, 12, Nah. iii, 4 (Sept. φάρμακία, pharmaka; Vulg. veneficium, maleficium). In the Apocrypha "witchcraft," "sorcery," occur as renderings of φάρμακία (Wisd. xii, 4; xviii, 13), and in the New Test. (Gal. v, 20; Rev. ix, 21; xviii, 23). As a verb קִשְׁפָה, kishshéph, "he used witchcraft," occurs in 2 Chron. xxxiii, 6 (Sept. ἐφάρμακένυτο; Vulg. maleficus artibus inserviebat). This verb, in Arabic, signifies "to reveal" or "discover;" in Syriac ethpaal, according to Gesenius, "to pray;" but this word, he observes, like many other sacred terms of the Syrians, as בָּרַךְ, etc., is restricted by the Hebrews to idolatrous services; hence בָּרַךְ means "to practice magic," literally "to pronounce or mutter spells." The word φάρμακός is connected with φάρμακένω, to administer or apply medicines as remedies or poisons, to use magical herbs, drugs, or substances, supposed to derive their efficacy from magical spells, and thence to use spells, conjurations, or enchantments; hence φάρμακός means, in the classical writers, a preparer of drugs, but generally of poisons, or drugs that operate by the force of magical charms, and thence a magician, an enchanter, of either sex. It occurs in the latter sense in Josephus (Ant. xvii, 4, 1), and is applied by him to a female, τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ φαρμακὸν καὶ πόρνην ἀποκαλέσαι (ibid. ix, 6, 8). This word also answers in the Sept. to מַכְשֵׁפִים, "magicians" (Exod. ix, 11), φαρμακοί, malefici. The received text of Rev. xxi, 8 reads φαρμακείας; but the Alexandrian, and sixteen later MSS., with several printed editions, have φάρμακός, a reading embraced by Wetstein, and by Griesbach received into the text. Φαρμακείας occurs in the same sense as φάρμακός in Lucian (Dial. Deor. xiii, 1; Joseph. Life, § 31). The word φάρμακία is used of Circe by Aristophanes (Plut. p. 302), and in the same sense of enchantment, etc., by Polybius (vi, 13, 4; xl, 8, 7). It corresponds in the Sept. to מַכְשֵׁפִים, "enchantments" (Exod. vii, 11, 22). The verb φαρμακένω is employed in the sense of using enchantments by Herodotus (vii, 114), saying that when Xerxes came to the river Strymon, the magi sacrificed white horses to it.

Some other mis-translations occur in reference to this subject. In 1 Sam. xv, 23, "rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft," should be of "divination." In Deut. xviii, 10, the word מְכַשֵּׁף, mekishshéph, does not mean "witch," but, being masculine, "a sorcerer." In Acts viii, 9, the translation is exceedingly apt to mislead the mere English reader: "Simon used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria"—Σίμων προῦπηρχεν ἐν τῇ πόλει μαγείων καὶ ἐξιστῶν τὸ ἔθνος τῆς Σαμαρείας—i. e. "Simon had been pursuing magic, and perplexing (or astonishing) the people," etc. See also ver. 11, and comp. the use of the word ἐξιστῆμι, Matt. xii, 23. In Gal. iii, 1, "Foolish Galatians," τίς ὑμᾶς ἰβάσκατε, "who hath fascinated you?" (For the use of the words βασκανία and φάρμακία in magic, among the Greeks, see Potter, Archæologia Græci [Lond. 1775], vol. i, ch. xviii, p. 356, etc.). It is considered by some that the word "witchcraft" is used metaphorically, for the allurements of pleasure (Nah. iii, 4; Rev. xviii, 23), and that the "sorcerers" mentioned in xxi, 8 may mean sophisticators of the truth. The kindred word φάρμασσω is used by metonymy, as signifying "to charm," "to persuade by flattery," etc. (Plato, Sympos. § 17), "to give a temper to metals" (Odys. ix, 893).

2. The precise idea, if any, now associated with the word "witch," but, however, devoutly entertained by nearly the whole nation in the time of our translators, is that of a female, who, by the agency of Satan, or, rather, of a familiar spirit or gnome appointed by Satan to attend on her, performs operations beyond the powers of humanity, in consequence of her compact with Satan, written in her own blood, by which she resigns herself to him forever. Among other advantages resulting to her from this engagement is the power of transforming herself into any shape she pleases, which was, however, generally that of a hare, transporting herself through the air on a broomstick, sailing "on the sea in a sieve," gliding through a keyhole, inflicting diseases, etc., upon mankind or cattle. The belief in the existence of such persons cannot be traced higher than the Middle Ages, and was probably derived from the wild and gloomy mythology of the Northern nations, among whom the "Fatal Sisters," and other impersonations of destructive agency in a female form, were prominent articles of the popular creed. This comparatively modern delusion was strengthened and confirmed by the translators of the Bible into the Western languages—a popular version of the original text having led people to suppose that there was positive evidence for the existence of such beings in Scripture. Bishop Hutchinson declares that our translators accommodated their version to the terminology of king James's Treatise on Demonologie (Encyclop. Metropolitana, art. "Witch," etc.).

8. A very different idea was conveyed by the Hebrew word, which probably denotes a sorceress or magician, who pretended to discover, and even to direct, the effects ascribed to the operation of the elements, conjunctions of the stars, the influence of lucky and unlucky days, the power of invisible spirits, and of the inferior deities (Graves, Lectures on the Pentateuch [Dublin, 1829], p. 109, 110). Sir Walter Scott well observes that "the sorcery or witchcraft of the Old Test. resolves itself into a trafficking with idols and asking counsel of false deities, or, in other words, into idolatry" (Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft [Lond. 1830], let. 2). Accordingly, sorcery is in Scripture uniformly associated with idolatry (Deut. xviii, 9-14; 2 Kings ix, 22; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 5, 6, etc.; Gal. v, 20; Rev. xxi, 8). The modern idea of witchcraft, as involving the assistance of Satan, is inconsistent with Scripture, where, as in the instance of Job, Satan is represented as powerless till God gave him a limited commission; and when "Satan desired to sift Peter as wheat," no reference is made to the intervention of a witch. Nor do the actual references to magic in Scripture involve its reality. The mischiefs resulting from the pretension, under the theocracy, to an art which involved idolatry, justified the statute which denounced it with death; though instead of the unexampled phrase לֹא תִחְיֶה, "thou shalt not suffer to live," Michaelis conjectures לֹא תִחְיֶה, "shall not be" (Exod. xxii, 18), which also better suits the parallel, "There shall not be found among you, etc., a witch" (Deut. xviii, 10). Indeed, as "we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one" (1 Cor. viii, 4), we must believe all pretensions to traffic with the one, or ask counsel of the other, to be equally vain. Upon the same principle of suppressing idolatry, however, the prophets of Baal also were destroyed, and not because Baal had any real existence, or because they could avail anything by their invocations.

It is highly probable that the more intelligent portion of the Jewish community, especially in later times, understood the emptiness of pretensions to magic (see Isa. xlii, 26; xlvii, 11-15; Jer. xiv, 14; Jonah ii, 8). Plato evidently considered the mischief of magic to consist in the tendency of the pretension to it, and not in the reality (De Leg. lib. 11). Divination of all kinds had fallen into contempt in the time of Cicero: "Dubium non est quin hæc disciplina et ars augurum evanuerit jam et vetustate et negligentia" (De Leg. ii, 18). Josephus declares that he laughed at the very idea of witchcraft (Vit. § 31). For the very early writers who maintained that the wonders of the magicians were not supernatural, see Universal Hist. (8vo ed.), iii, 874.

It seems safe to conclude from the Septuagint renderings, and their identity with the terms used by classical writers, that the pretended exercise of this art in ancient times was accompanied with the use of drugs, or fumigations made of them. No doubt the skilful use of certain chemicals, if restricted to the knowledge of a few persons, might, in ages unenlightened by science, along with other resources of natural magic, be made the means of extensive imposture. The natural gases, exhalations, etc., would contribute their share, as appears from the ancient account of the origin of the oracle at Delphi. See PYTHON. The real mischiefs ever effected by the professors of magic on mankind, etc., may be safely ascribed to the actual administration of poison. Josephus states a case of poisoning under the form of a philtre or love-potion, and says that the Arabian women were reported to be skilful in making such potions (Ant. xvii, 4, 1). Such means doubtless constitute the real perniciousness of the African species of witchcraft called Obi, the similarity of which word to the Hebrew נִסָּא, inflation, is remarkable. Among the Sandwich-Islanders, some, who had professed witchcraft, confessed, after their conversion to Christianity, that they had poisoned their victims. The death of sir Thomas Overbury is cited as an instance in England, by sir Walter Scott (ut sup.). There was, indeed, a wide scope for the production of very fantastic effects, short of death, by such means. See MAGIC.

WITCHCRAFT, in POPULAR ESTIMATION, is the practice and powers of a person supposed to have formed a compact with Satan. The powers deemed to be possessed by the witches, and the rites and incantations by which they acquired those powers, were substantially the same as belonged to the devotees of the Greek Hecate, the Striga and Venefica of the ancient Romans, and the Vala or Wise Woman of the Teutonic pagans. But when, along with the knowledge of the one true God, the idea of a purely wicked spirit, the enemy of God and man, was introduced, it was natural that all supernatural powers not proceeding directly from the true God should be attributed to Satan. This gave an entirely new aspect to such arts; they became associated with heresy; those who practiced them must be in compact with the devil, and have renounced God and the true faith. Previous to the development of this doctrine, if a witch was punished, it was because she had been guilty, or, at least, was believed to have been guilty, of poisoning or some other actual mischief. Now, however, such power was only the power to work evil; and merely to be a witch was in itself a sin and crime that filled the pious mind with horror. This feeling, zealously fostered, first by the Catholic clergy, and then no less by the Protestant, rose to a frenzy that for four centuries filled Europe with the most shocking bloodshed and cruelty.

1. The crisis of witchcraft, in its full development, involved almost all the notions and practices previously connected with magic and sorcery. What was new and distinctive in the witchcraft of Christendom was the theory of magical arts which it involved. The doctrine of Satan, as finally elaborated in the Middle Ages, established in the world a rival dominion to that of the Almighty. The arch-fiend and his legions of subordinate demons exercised a sway, doubtless only permitted, but still vast and indefinite, not only over the elements of nature, but over the minds and bodies of men, except those who had been admitted to the number of the faithful, and were guarded by the faith and rites of the Church. But even they were not altogether exempt from diabolical annoyance, for the protection does not seem to have extended to their belongings. All persons in possession of these supernatural powers (and there was no doubt of their existence in all ages) must, therefore, have derived them from the prince of darkness, and be acting under his agency—excepting, of course, those miraculous powers which had been bestowed upon the Church directly by Heaven. But Satan, bestowing these powers, was supposed to demand an equivalent; hence it came to be the established belief that, in order to acquire the powers of witchcraft, the person must formally sell his or her soul to the devil. This, however, was not the early view. Magicians had been diligent students of their art. Alchemists, astronomers, and astrologers had searched into the hidden things of nature as deeply as circumstances would permit. The higher kind of European magic in the Middle Ages was mixed up with what physical science there then was; and the most noted men of the time were addicted to the pursuit, or were, at least, reputed to be so. So far from deriving their power from the kingdom of darkness, the scientific magician, by the mere force of his art, could compel the occasional services of Satan himself, and make inferior demons the involuntary slaves of his will. A belief, however, had early existed that individuals in desperate circumstances had been tempted to purchase, at the price of their own souls, the help of the devil to extricate them from their difficulties; and hence the suspicion began to gain adherence that many magicians, instead of seeking to acquire their power by the laborious studies of the regular art, had acquired it in this illegitimate way. The chief cause of the prominent part in this matter assigned to females, particularly old, wrinkled, and deformed women, is the natural dislike of ugliness. It may also be noted that their more excitable temperament renders them peculiarly liable to those ecstasies which have been associated with the gift of divination from the priestess of the ancient heathen oracle down to the medium of modern spiritualism. And when witchcraft came to be prosecuted for heresy, the part assigned to woman in the Scripture account of the fall led to her being looked upon as specially suited to be the tool of the devil. Upon this circumstance was founded the doctrine in the creed of witchcraft which alleged carnal intercourse between witches and evil spirits.

The bargain by which the soul was sold to the devil was usually in writing, and signed with the witch's own blood. She was rebaptized, receiving a new name, and had to trample on the cross and renounce God and Christ (among the Roman Catholics also the Virgin Mary) in forms parodying the renunciation of the devil in Christian baptism. She received a "witch mark," which remained, and the location of it was known by that part becoming callous and dead—a matter of great interest to witch-finders. The powers conferred by Satan upon these servants were essentially the same as those ascribed to sorcerers, and the mode of exercising them was the same, viz. by charms, incantations, concoctions, etc. The only change was in the theory, that is, that instead of any power inherent in the sorcerer or derived from any other source, the results were all wrought by the devil through the witch as his servant. The power was also exerted exclusively to work evil—to raise storms, blast crops, render men and beasts barren, inflict racking pain on an enemy, or make him pine away in sickness. If a witch attempted to do good, the devil was enraged and punished her, and whatever she did she was powerless to serve her own interests, for witches always remained poor and miserable.

A prominent feature of witchcraft was the belief in stated meetings of witches and devils by night, called Witches' Sabbaths. The places of meeting were always such as had feelings of solemnity and awe connected with them, such as old ruins, neglected churchyards, and places of heathen sacrifices. First anointing her feet and shoulders with a salve made of the fat of murdered and unbaptized children, the witch mounted a broomstick, rake, or similar article, and making her exit through the chimney, rode through the air to the place of rendezvous. If her own particular demon-lover came to fetch her, he sat on the staff before, and she behind him; or he came in the shape of a goat, and carried her off on his back. At the place of assembly the arch-dæmon, in the shape of a large goat with a black human countenance, sat on a high chair and received the homage of the witches and demons. The feast was lighted up with torches, all kindled at a light burning between the horns of the great goat. Among the viands there was no bread or salt, and they drank out of ox-hoofs and horses' skulls, but the meal neither satisfied the appetite nor nourished. After eating and drinking they danced. In dancing they turned their backs to each other; and in the intervals they related to one another what mischief they had done, and planned more. The revel concluded with obscene debauchery, after which the great goat burned himself to ashes, which he divided among the witches to raise storms. Then they returned as they came. (For a vivid and entertaining description of one of these revels, see the Tam O'Shanter of Robert Burns.)

2. The prosecutions for witchcraft form a sad episode in human history. Thousands of lives of innocent persons were sacrificed to the silly superstition, and thousands more were tortured in various ways because they were suspected of having some connection with the black art. In the Twelve Tables of Rome there were penal enactments against him who should bewitch the fruits of the earth, or conjure away his neighbor's corn into his own field. A century and a half later one hundred and seventy Roman ladies were convicted of poisoning under the pretence of charms and incantations, and new laws were added. But in these and in all other heathen laws there was no penalty attached, except in the case of positive injury done. Magical or supernatural power was looked upon rather with favor than otherwise, only it was feared that it might be abused by its possessor.

The early Church was severe in its judgments against magic, astrology, augury, charms, and all kinds of divination. The civil law condemned the Mathematici, or men that formed calculations for the prediction of fortunes. Veneficium, or Maleficium, poisoning and mischief-making, was the name given to sorcery. The Church would not, by a law of Constantine, baptize astrologers, nor a special class of them called Genethliaci, or those who calculated what stars had been in the ascendant at a man's nativity. The twenty-fourth canon of Ancyra says: "Let those who use soothsaying after the manner of the heathen, or entertain men to teach them pharmacy or lustration, fall under the canon of five years' (penance), viz. three years of prostration, two years of communion in prayer without the oblation." Those who consulted or followed such soothsayers as were supposed to be in compact with Satan were to be cast out of communion. Constantine, however, made such divination a capital crime, as well on the part of those who practiced it as of those who sought information from it. Amulets, or spells to cure disease, were reckoned a species of idolatry, and the makers of such phylacteries shared in the same condemnation. The abraxas or abracadabra (q. v.) of the Basilidians came under similar censure. But the prosecutions against witchcraft as such were of minor importance comparatively until as late as the 11th century, when the prosecutions against heresy were systematically organized. Hitherto magic had been distinguished as white or black; now no distinction was made, and all magic was reckoned black. Almost all heretics were accused of magical practices, and their secret meetings were looked upon as a kind of devil-worship. Fostered by the proceedings against heresy, the popular dread of witchcraft had been on the increase for centuries, and numerous executions had taken place in various parts of Europe. At last Innocent VIII, by his celebrated bull, Summis Desiderantes, issued in 1484, gave the full sanction of the Church to these notions concerning sorcery, and charged the inquisitors and others to discover and put to death all guilty of these arts. He appointed two special inquisitors for Germany, Heinrich Institor and Jacob Sprenger, who, with the aid of a clergyman of Constance, Johannes Gremper, drew up the famous Malleus Maleficarum, or Hammer for Witches, in which the whole doctrine of witchcraft was elaborated, a form of trial laid down, and a course of examination appointed by which the inquisitors could discover the guilty parties. This was the beginning of the witch-mania proper. The edict of Innocent was reinforced by a bull of Alexander VI in 1494, of Leo X in 1521, and of Adrian VI in 1522, each adding strength to its predecessor, and calculated to increase the popular agitation. The results were deplorable. Armed with the Malleus Maleficarum, the judge had no difficulty in convicting the most innocent persons. If the accused did not confess at once, they were ordered to be shaved and examined for "witch-marks." If any strange mark was discovered on the person, no further evidence was required. But failing in this, the accused was put to the torture, which in almost all instances elicited confession. Many, in order to avoid this ordeal, confessed at once, and were forthwith led to execution. Others seem to have become insane because of the prevalent excitement, and fancied themselves witches. The extent of the prosecutions in Germany is appalling to consider. In the bishopric of Bamberg 600 victims fell within four years, and in Würzburg 900. In the district of Lindheim a twentieth part of the population perished in the same time. And during this inquisition 7000 lives were sacrificed at Trier. Such atrocities were rivalled by 1000 executions in the Italian province of Como within a single year, 400 at Toulouse in one day, and 500 at Geneva in three months. It is said that in France, about the year 1520, fires for the execution of witches blazed in every town. The madness seized upon all nations and all estates of men, alike on Catholics and Protestants, and often on the accused as firmly as on their accusers, so that the trials represented pure and unmingled delusions. Even Luther looked on his earache as "peculiarly diabolical," and exclaimed of witches, "I could burn them all."

England, by its insular position and intense political life, was kept longest from the witch mania; but when it came, it was no less violent than it had been on the Continent. The statute of Elizabeth, in 1562, first made witchcraft in itself a crime of the first magnitude, whether directed to the injury of others or not. The act of James I (VI of Scotland), in the first year of his reign in England, defines the crime still more minutely. It is as follows: "Any one that shall use, practice, or exercise invocation of any evil or wicked spirit, to or for any purpose, or take up any dead man, etc., such offenders, duly and lawfully convicted and attainted, shall suffer death." Soon the delusion spread throughout all England, and increased to a frenzy. Witch-finders passed through the country from town to town, professing to rid the community of all witches, and receiving therefor a stipulated sum. Their methods were most inhuman. They stripped the accused, shaved them, and thrust pins into their bodies to discover witches' marks; they wrapped them in sheets with the great toes and thumbs tied together, and dragged them through ponds or rivers, and if they sank they were accounted innocent; but if they floated, which they were sure to do for a time, they were set down as guilty, and executed. Many times the poor creatures were kept fasting and awake, and sometimes walking incessantly, for twenty-four or forty-eight hours. Indeed, such cruelties were practiced as an inducement to confession, that the unhappy victims were glad to confess and end their miseries at once. During the sittings of the Long Parliament, three thousand persons are said to have been executed on legal convictions, besides the vast number that perished at the hands of the mob. Even so wise and learned a judge as Sir Matthew Hale condemned two women for witchcraft in 1664. Chief justices North and Holt were the first to set their faces steadily against the continuance of this delusion. This was in 1694, but summary executions continued as far down as 1716, when the last victim was hanged at Huntingdon. The English laws against witchcraft were repealed in 1786.

The burning of witches forms a dark chapter in the history of Scotland, and the penal laws are said to have been first inflicted in the reign of James III. In that reign twelve women are said to have suffered, but their witchcraft was associated with treason and murder. James VI was a notorious witch-finder, but his well-known statute was only in accordance with the spirit of the times. The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland and its presbyteries, from convictions of duty, had often taken the matter up, for the Old Test. had expressly said, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." The number of victims in Scotland from first to last is estimated at over four thousand. When the penal laws were at length repealed, the early seceders mourned over the repeal as a sad dereliction of national duty to God. The principal scenes of witchcraft were in the lowlands, the fairies of the highlands being harmless and ingenious sprites, rather than dark, ugly, and impious fiends. Many of the Scottish witches, as appears from their trial, were the victims of miserable hallucination; others seem to have gloried in a fancied power to torment others, and to have profited by it;

others, when some sudden calamity happened, or some individual was afflicted with any mysterious malady, malignantly took credit as having had a hand in producing it; and others made the implied compact with Satan a knavish cover for crimes of various kinds, both against families and against the state.

New England was settled at a time when the excitement over witchcraft was very general and intense, and several persons were executed in Massachusetts prior to the extraordinary outburst at Salem. As in Scotland and elsewhere, the clergy were the prime movers. Two clergymen have obtained an unenviable notoriety for the part they had in it. The one was Cotton Mather, a man who was considered a prodigy in learning and piety, but whose writings and proceedings in regard to the trial and punishment of witches display an amount of bigotry almost incredible. The other was Samuel Parris, of Salem Village (now Danvers Centre), who seems to have made use of the delusion to gratify his own personal dislikes. Previous to the outbreak the last instance had been the hanging of an Irish woman in Boston, in 1688, accused of bewitching four children belonging to the family of a Mr. Goodwin. During the winter of 1691 and 1692 a company, consisting mostly of young girls, was accustomed to meet at the house of Mr. Parris for the purpose of practicing magic, necromancy, etc. They soon began to exhibit nervous disorders, contortions, spasms, sometimes dropping insensible to the floor. The children were declared to be bewitched, and, being pressed to reveal the perpetrator of the mischief, they accused an Indian woman, named Tituba, a servant in the family of Mr. Parris; Sarah Good, a woman of ill-repute, and Sarah Osburn, who was bedridden. These were tried before the magistrates March 1, 1692. From this time the excitement became intense. The clergy were zealous in the prosecution, being urged by the belief that Satan was making a special effort to overthrow the kingdom of God in that locality, and all classes were subject, more or less, to the delusion. The special court appointed to try these cases met the first week in June, and continued its sessions until Sept. 9. Nineteen victims were hanged, as a result of the investigation, some of them pious and respectable citizens. An old man, more than eighty years of age, was pressed to death for refusing to plead to a charge of witchcraft. A reaction now set in, and subsequent sentences were not executed. In May following the governor discharged all then in prison, about one hundred and fifty in number.

Witchcraft still remained, in the minds of the people of many countries, a reality for almost a century after the general excitement had abated. The last judicial execution did not occur in Germany until 1756, in Spain until 1780, and in Switzerland until 1782. And from the cessation of executions many think that belief in witchcraft has entirely passed away, but facts are contrary to such a supposition. Some occurrences in England in very recent times point to the fact that the popular mind is still infected with the belief in witchcraft as a thing of the present. In 1865 a poor old paralyzed Frenchman died in consequence of having been dragged through the water as a wizard at Castle Hedingham, in Essex, in 1875 the trial at Warwick Assizes of the murderer of a reputed witch brought out the fact that over one third of the villagers of Long Compton are firm believers in witchcraft; and in April, 1879, at East Dereham, Norfolk, a man was fined for assaulting the daughter of an old woman who was alleged to have charmed him by means of a walking toad. With very rare exceptions educated people do not believe in witchcraft, but among the ignorant and illiterate of all countries the belief still retains a firm hold. To the mass of the adherents of Buddhism, in Central Asia, the lama, or priest, is merely a wizard who knows how to protect them from the malignity of evil spirits; and, according to modern travellers, trials and executions for witchcraft are at this day common throughout Africa, as they were in Europe in the 17th century, and under very similar forms.

Witenagemot (or Witan) (Anglo-Saxon, witena, of wise men, from witan, to know, and gemot, assembly), the great national council of the Saxons, by which the king was guided in all his main acts of government. Each kingdom had its own witan before the union of the heptarchy, in 827, after which there was a general one for the whole country. Its members are all spoken of as men of rank, and most probably included bishops, abbots, ealdormen of shires, and thanes. In 984 there were present at one of these assemblies king Athelstane, four Welsh princes, two archbishops, seventeen bishops, four abbots, twelve dukes, and fifty-two thanes. Every measure of national importance was debated here, the laws received its sanction, and the succession of the crown depended upon its approval. It could make new laws and treaties; it regulated military and ecclesiastical affairs, and levied taxes; without its consent the king had no power to raise forces by sea or land; and it was the supreme court of justice, civil and criminal. The voice of the Church was never absent from its deliberations, so that the right of British prelates to sit and vote in the national assembly was one of the principles of the earliest regular form of government, not derived from Norman laws, but from that time, long before, when the Saxon archbishop, bishop, and abbot took their seats three times a year (at Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas) in the Saxon witan. The witenagemot was abolished by William the Conqueror and its powers only in part transmitted to parliament. With (וִּית, yether, Judg. xvi, 7-9, a rope; "cord," Job xxx, 11; "string," Psa. xi, 2). In the passage of Judges cited we read that Delilah bound Samson with "seven green withs which had not been dried." "Green ropes," as distinguished from "dry ropes," is the proper meaning, the peculiarity being in the greenness, not in the material. It may imply any kind of crude vegetable, commonly used for ropes, without restricting it to withs, or tough and pliable rods, twisted into a rope. Such ropes are used in the East, and while they remain green are stronger than any other. In India the legs of wild elephants and buffaloes newly caught are commonly bound with ropes of this sort. Josephus says (Ant. v, 9, 11) that the ropes which bound Samson were made with the tendrils of the vine. At the present day ropes in the East are rarely made of hemp or flax. Except some that are made with hair or leather, they are generally formed with the tough fibres of trees (particularly the palm-tree) and roots, with grasses, and with reeds and rushes. These ropes are, in general, tolerably strong, but are in no degree comparable to our hempen ropes. They are very light in comparison, and, wanting compactness, in most cases they are also rough and coarse to the eye. The praises which travellers bestow on ropes of this kind must not be understood as putting them in comparison with those in use among ourselves, but with the bands of hay which our peasants twist, and with reference to the simple and crude materials of which they are composed (Kitto, Pictorial Bible, note ad loc.). Withington, LEONARD, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Dorchester, Mass., in 1789. He graduated from Yale College in 1814, studied for some time in Andover Theological Seminary, became pastor of the First Church at Newburyport, Mass., in 1816, and died there, April 22, 1885, a colleague having been appointed in 1858. He wrote, The Puritans (1836):—Solomon's Song Explained (1861), etc.

Witness (עֵד, fem. עֵדָה; Sept. and New Test. μάρτυς; Vulg. testis) is used in the English Bible both of persons and things.

1. Leading Significations.—This frequent term occurs, 1. In the sense of a person who deposes to the occurrence of any fact, a witness of any event. The Hebrew word is from עָדָה, to repeat. The Greek word is usually derived from μαίρω, to "divide," "decide," etc., because a witness decides controversies (Heb. vi, 16); but Damm (Lex. Hom. col. 1495) deduces it from the old word μᾶρῃ, "the hand," because witnesses anciently held up their hands in giving evidence. This custom, among the ancient Hebrews, is referred to in Gen. xiv, 22; among the heathens, by Homer (Iliad, x, 321), and by Virgil (Æneid, xii, 196). God himself is represented as swearing in this manner (Deut. xxxii, 40; Ezek. xx, 5, 6, 15; comp. Numb. xiv, 30). So also the heathen gods (Pindar, Olymp. vii, 119, 120). These Hebrew and Greek words, with their various derivations, pervade the entire subject. They are applied to a judicial witness in Exod. xxiii, 1; Lev. v, 1; Numb. v, 13; xxxv, 30 (comp. Deut. xvii, 6; xix, 15; Matt. xxvii, 16; 2 Cor. xiii, 1); Prov. xiv, 5; xxiv, 28; Matt. xxvi, 65; Acts vi, 13; 1 Tim. v, 19; Heb. x, 28. They are applied, generally, to a person who certifies, or is able to certify, to any fact which has come under his cognizance (Josh. xxiv, 22; Isa. viii, 2; Luke xxiv, 48; Acts i, 8, 22; 1 Thess. ii, 10; 1 Tim. vi, 12; 2 Tim. ii, 2; 1 Pet. i, 5). So in allusion to those who witness the public games (Heb. xii, 1). They are also applied to any one who testifies to the world what God reveals through him (Rev. xi, 3). In the latter sense the Greek word is applied to our Lord (Rev. i, 5; iii, 14). Both the Hebrew and Greek words are also applied to God (Gen. xxxi, 50; 1 Sam. xii, 5; Jer. xlii, 5; Rom. i, 9; Phil. i, 8; 1 Thess. ii, 5); to inanimate things (Gen. xxxi, 52; Psa. lxxxix, 37). The supernatural means whereby the deficiency of witnesses was compensated under the theocracy, have been already considered under the articles ADULTERY, TRIAL OF; URIM AND THUMMIM. For the punishment of false witness and the suppression of evidence, see PUNISHMENT. For the forms of adjuration (2 Chron. xviii, 15), see ADJURATION. Opinions differ as to what is meant by "the faithful witness in heaven" (Psa. lxxxix, 37). Some suppose it to mean the moon (comp. Psa. lxxii, 5, 7; Jer. xxxi, 35, 36; xxxiii, 20, 21; Eccles. xliii, 6); others, the rainbow (Gen. ix, 12-17).

2. The witness or testimony itself borne to any fact is expressed by עֵד; μαρτυρία (testimonium). They are used of judicial testimony (Prov. xxv, 18; Mark xiv, 56, 59). In verse 55, Schleusner takes the word μαρτυρία for μάρτυρ, the abstract for the concrete (Luke xxii, 71; John viii, 17; Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 15). It denotes the testimony to the truth of anything generally (John i, 7, 19; xix, 35); that of a poet (Tit. i, 13). It occurs in Josephus (Cont. Apion. i, 21). In John iii, 11, 32, Schleusner understands the doctrine, the thing professed; in v, 32, 36, the proofs given by God of our Saviour's mission; comp. v, 9. In viii, 13, 14, both he and Bretschneider assign to the word the sense of praise.

In Acts xxii, 18, the former translates it teaching or instruction. In Rev. i, 9, it denotes the constant profession of Christianity, or testimony to the truth of the gospel (comp. i, 2; vi, 9). In 1 Tim. iii, 7, μαρτυρία καλή means a good character (comp. 3 John 12; Eccles. xxxi, 84; Josephus, Ant. vi, 10, 1). In 1sa. xix, 7, "The testimony of the Lord is sure" probably signifies the ordinances, institutions, etc. (comp. cxix, 22, 24, etc.). Those ambiguous words, "He that believeth in the Son of God hath the witness in himself" (1 John v, 10), which have given rise to a variety of fanatical meanings, are easily understood, by explaining the word ἔχει, "receives," "retains," etc., i. e. the foregoing testimony which God hath given of his Son, whereas the unbeliever rejects it. The whole passage is obscured in the English translation by neglecting the uniformity of the Greek, and introducing the word "record," contrary to the profession of our translators in their Preface to the Reader (ad finem). The Hebrew word, with μαρτυριον, occurs in the sense of monument, evidence, etc. (Gen. xxi, 30; xxxi, 44; Deut. iv, 45; xxxi, 26; Josh. xxii, 27; Ruth iv, 7; Matt. viii, 4; Mark vi, 11; Luke xxi, 13; James v, 3). In 2 Cor. i, 12, Schleusner explains μαρτυριον, commendation. In Prov. xxix, 14, and Amos i, 11, לִבֵּר is pointed to mean perpetually, forever, but the Septuagint gives εἰς μαρτυριον; Aquila, εἰς ἔτι; Symmachus, εἰς αἰ; Vulg. in eternum. In Acts vii, 44, and Rev. xv, 5, we find ἡ σκηνη τοῦ μαρτυριον, and this is the Sept. rendering for אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד (which really means "the tabernacle of the congregation") in Exod. xxix, 42, 44; xl, 22, 24—deriving מוֹעֵד from וָעַד, "to testify," instead of from וָעַד, "to assemble." On 1 Tim. ii, 6, see Bowyer, Conjectures. In Heb. iii, 5, Schleusner interprets εἰς μαρτυριον τῶν λαληθησομένων, "the promulgation of those things about to be delivered to the Jews."

3. To be or become a witness, by testifying the truth of what one knows. Thus the Sept. translates וְעֵד (Gen. xliii, 3), μαρτυρίω, to bear witness, and Amos iii, 13: see also 1 Kings xxi, 10, 13. In John i, 7; xv, 26; xviii, 23, Schleusner gives as its meaning, to teach or explain; in John iv, 44; vii, 7; 1 Tim. vi, 13, to declare; in Acts x, 43; Rom. iii, 21, to declare prophetically. With a dative case following, the word sometimes means to approve (Luke iv, 22). So Schleusner understands Luke xi, 48, "Ye approve the deeds of your fathers," and he gives this sense also to Rom. x, 2. In like manner the passive μαρτυρόμαι, "to be approved," "beloved," "have a good character," etc. (Acts vi, 3; 1 Tim. v, 10; comp. 3 John 6, 12). "The witness of the Spirit," alluded to by St. Paul (Rom. viii, 16), is explained by Macknight and all the best commentators, as the extraordinary operation of the Holy Spirit concurring with the filial disposition of converted Gentiles, to prove that they are "the children of God," as well as the Jews. (See below.)

4. "To call or take to witness," "to invoke as witness," μαρτύρομαι (Acts xx, 26; Gal. v, 3; Josephus, War. iii, 8, 3). A still stronger word is ἐμαρτύρομαι, which corresponds to וְעֵד (Deut. iv, 26). It means "to admonish solemnly," "to charge earnestly," "to urge upon" (Psa. lxxxi, 8; Neh. ix, 26; Luke xvi, 28; Acts ii, 40). In other passages the same words mean to teach earnestly. In Job xxix, 11, a beautiful phrase occurs, "When the eye saw me it gave witness to me." The admiring expression of the eye upon beholding a man of eminent virtue and benevolence, is here admirably illustrated. The description of the mischief occasioned by a false witness, in Prov. xxv, 18, deserves notice: "A man that beareth false witness against his neighbor, is a maul, and a sword, and a sharp arrow." Few words afford more exercise to discrimination, in consequence of the various shades of meaning in which the context requires they should be understood.

II. Hebrew Usages.—1. Among people with whom writing is not common, the evidence of a transaction is given by some tangible memorial or significant ceremony. Abraham gave seven ewe-lambs to Abimelech as an evidence of his property in the well of Beersheba. Jacob raised a heap of stones, "the heap of witness," as a boundary-mark between himself and Laban (Gen. xxi, 30; xxxi, 47, 52). The tribes of Reuben and Gad raised an "altar," designed expressly not for sacrifice, but as a witness to the covenant between themselves and the rest of the nation; Joshua set up a stone as an evidence of the allegiance promised by Israel to God: "for," he said, "it hath heard all the words of the Lord" (Josh. xxii, 10, 26, 34; xxiv, 26, 27). So also a pillar is mentioned by Isaiah as "a witness to the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt" (Isa. xix, 19, 20). Thus also the sacred ark and its contents are called "the testimony" (Exod. xvi, 33, 34; xxv, 16; xxxviii, 21; Numb. i, 50, 53; ix, 15; x, 11; xvii, 7, 8; xviii, 2; Heb. ix, 4).

Thus also symbolical usages, in ratification of contracts or completed arrangements, as the ceremony of shoe-loosing (Deut. xxv, 9, 10; Ruth iv, 7, 8), the ordeal prescribed in the case of a suspected wife (Numb. v, 17-31), with which may be compared the ordeal of the Styx (Class. Mus. vi, 386). The Bedawin Arabs practice a fiery ordeal in certain cases by way of compurgation (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 121; Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 305). The ceremony also appointed at the oblation of first-fruits (q. v.) may be mentioned as partaking of the same character (Deut. xxvi, 4).

But written evidence was by no means unknown to the Jews. Divorce was to be proved by a written document (Deut. xxiv, 1, 3), whereas among Bedawin and Mussulmans in general a spoken sentence is sufficient (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 110; Sale, Koran, c. 33, p. 348; Lane, Mod. Egypt, i, 186, 236). In civil contracts, at least in later times, documentary evidence was required and carefully preserved (Isa. viii, 16; Jer. xxxii, 10-16).

On the whole Moses was very careful to provide and enforce evidence for all infractions of law and all transactions bearing on it: e. g. the memorial stones of Jordan and of Ebal (Deut. xxvii, 2-4; Josh. iv, 9; viii, 30); the fringes on garments (Numb. xv, 39, 40); the boundary-stones of property (Deut. xix, 14; xxvii, 17; Prov. xxii, 28); the "broad plates" made from the censers of the Korahites (Numb. xvi, 38); above all, the ark of testimony itself—all these are instances of the care taken by the legislator to perpetuate evidence of the facts on which the legislation was founded, and by which it was supported (Deut. vi, 20-25). Appeal to the same principle is also repeatedly made in the case of prophecies as a test of their authenticity (Deut. xviii, 22; Jer. xxviii, 9, 16, 17; John iii, 11; v, 36; x, 38; xiv, 11; Luke xxiv, 48; Acts i, 3; ii, 32; iii, 15, etc.).

2. Among special provisions of the law with respect to evidence are the following:

(1) Two witnesses at least are required to establish any charge (Numb. xxxv, 30; Deut. xvi, 6; xix, 15; 1 Kings xxi, 13; John viii, 17; 2 Cor. xiii, 1; Heb. x, 28); and a like principle is laid down by Paul as a rule of procedure in certain cases in the Christian Church (1 Tim. v, 19).

(2) In the case of the suspected wife, evidence besides the husband's was desired, though not demanded (Numb. v, 13).

(3) The witness who withheld the truth was censured (Lev. v, 1).

(4) False witness was punished with the punishment due to the offence which it sought to establish. See OATH.

(5) Slandorous reports and officious witness are discouraged (Exod. xx, 16; xxiii, 1; Lev. xix, 16, 18; Deut. xix, 16-21; Prov. xxiv, 28).

(6) The witnesses were the first executioners (Deut. xiii, 9; xvi, 7; Acts vii, 58).

(7) In case of an animal left in charge and torn by wild beasts, the keeper was to bring the carcass in proof of the fact and disproof of his own criminality (Exod. xxii, 13).

(8) According to Josephus, women and slaves were not admitted to bear testimony (Ant. iv, 8, 15). To these exceptions the Mishna adds idiots, deaf, blind, and dumb persons, persons of infamous character, and some others, ten in all (Selden, De Synedr. ii, 13, 11; Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 653). The high-priest was not bound to give evidence in any case except one affecting the king (ibid.). Various refinements on the quality of evidence and the manner of taking it are given in the Mishna (Sanhedr. iv, 5; v, 2, 3; Maccoth, i, 1, 9; Sheb. iii, 10; iv, 1; v, 1). In criminal cases evidence was required to be oral; in pecuniary, written evidence was allowed (Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 653).

3. In the New Test. the original notion of a witness is exhibited in the special form of one who attests his belief in the gospel by personal suffering. So Stephen is styled by Paul (Acts xxii, 20), and the "faithful Antipas" (Rev. ii, 13). John also speaks of himself and of others as witnesses in this sense (Rev. i, 9; vi, 9; xi, 3; xx, 4). See also Heb. xi and xii, 1, in which passage a number of persons are mentioned, belonging both to Old Test. and New Test., who bore witness to the truth by personal endurance; and to this passage may be added, as bearing on the same view of the term "witness," Dan. iii, 21; vi, 16; 1 Macc. i, 60, 63; 2 Macc. vi, 18, 19. Hence it is that the use of the ecclesiastical term "martyr" has arisen, of which copious illustration may be seen in Suicer, Thes. ii, 310, etc. See MARTYR.

WITNESS, FALSE. The early civil and ecclesiastical laws were very severe in their denunciation and punishment of this crime. We learn from Aulus Gellius that the punishment of false witness among the old Romans, by the law of the twelve tables, was to cast the criminal headlong from the top of the Tarpeian rock. Afterwards, by the law called Lex Remmia, false witnesses were burned in the face and stigmatized with the letter k, denoting that they were calumniators. In opposition to these the law designates honest men as homines integræ frontis, or men without such mark. And, though the Christian law abolished it, as it did other laws of undue severity, still false accusation and calumny were corrected with suitable punishments, such as infamy, banishment, and suffering the same evil, by the law of retaliation, which the accuser intended to draw upon others. The substance of the law is as follows: If any one called another man's credit, or fortune, or life, or blood into question in judgment, and could not make out the crime alleged against him, he should suffer the same penalty that he intended to bring upon the other. And no one could formally implead another at law till he had bound himself to this condition, which the law terms vinculum inscriptionis, the bond of inscription. While the civil laws were thus severe, the ecclesiastical laws did all that fell within their province to effect the same results. By a canon of the council of Eliberis the false witness in any case was to do penance five years, and in case the false accusation was of murder, the criminal was to be debarred from communion to the very last, as in the case of actual murder. The councils of Agde and Vannes impose a general penance upon such offenders, without naming the term or duration of their penance, which was left to the discretion of the bishop, who was to judge of the sincerity of their repentance. But the first council of Arles obliges them to do penance all their lives, and the second only moderates their punishment so far as to leave it to the bishop to determine of their repentance and satisfaction. See Bingham, Christ. Antig. bk. xvi, ch. x, § ix, and ch. xiii, § i.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT is a phrase common with many Christians, especially the Methodists, to denote the inward assurance which every believer has of his filial relation to God, namely, that the Holy Ghost immediately and directly witnesses to and with (συμμαρτυρεῖ) his spirit that he is a child of God, involving the collateral assurance that through faith in Jesus Christ, who died and rose again for him, all his sins are blotted out, and he is reconciled to God (Rom. viii, 14-17; Gal. iv, 5-7; John i, 12; 1 John v, 9-13). Mr. Wesley observes, "I do not mean hereby that the Spirit of God testifies this by any outward voice; no, nor always by an inward voice, although he may do this sometimes. Neither do I suppose that he always applies to the heart, though he often may, one or more texts of Scripture. But he so works upon the soul by his immediate influence, and by a strong though inexplicable operation, that the stormy wind and troubled waves subside, and there is a sweet calm—the heart resting as in the arms of Jesus, and the sinner being clearly satisfied that all his 'iniquities are forgiven and his sins covered.' The immediate result of this testimony is 'the fruit of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance' (Gal. v, 22, 23). Without these the testimony itself cannot continue; for it is inevitably destroyed, not only by the commission of any outward sin, or the omission of known duty, but by giving way to any inward sin—in a word, by whatever grieves the Holy Spirit of God." Some claim a similar testimony for special states of grace, and even peculiar experiences or prognostications, but such an extension of the privilege is not authorized by Scripture. See ADOPTION; ASSURANCE.

Witnesses, THE THREE HEAVENLY, is a convenient designation of the famous controversy respecting the genuineness of the clause in the first epistle of John (v, 7), "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one."

1. History of its Introduction into the Text.—In all the first printed Bibles, which were those of the Latin Vulgate, as amended by Jerome, the clause appeared substantially as at present (Ed. Princeps, 1462), being found in the great majority of manuscripts of the Vulgate. It may therefore be considered as the generally received form at that period. But when the first edition of the Greek Test. appeared, which was that of Erasmus, published at Basle in 1516, the clause in question ["in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one; and there are three which bear witness in earth"] was wanting. Erasmus was attacked by Stunica, one of the editors of the Complutensian Polyglot, of which the New Test. in Greek and Latin had been printed in 1514 (and consequently before the appearance of Erasmus's edition), although not published until 1522. Erasmus replied to Stunica by observing that he had faithfully followed the Greek manuscripts from which he had edited his text, but professed his readiness to insert the clause in another edition, provided but a single Greek manuscript was found to contain it. Such a manuscript was found in England, upon which Erasmus, although entertaining strong suspicions respecting this manuscript, yet, faithful to his word, inserted the clause in his third edition, which was published in 1522, as it now stands in the common Greek text.

Nevertheless, the absence of the definite article from the six nouns in the disputed passage in this pretended manuscript is of itself sufficient to excite suspicions of, if not completely to overthrow, its genuineness. What has become of the manuscript is not known, but it is generally believed to have been the same with that now possessed by the library of Trinity College, Dublin, called the Codex Montfortianus, or Dublinensis, in which the disputed clause appears, but without the conclusion, "and these three are one." Erasmus also speaks of a Codex Britannicus as containing the entire clause, with some minute variations (Annot. 4th ed. p. 697). See MONTFORT MANUSCRIPTS. The Dublin manuscript is generally ascribed to the 15th or 16th century, and cannot possibly be older than the 13th; it likewise varies from the received Greek text in several lesser particulars. The clause has been also found, although in a form still more corrupt, in a manuscript in the Vatican (Cod. Ottobon. 298), of the 15th century, first collated by Dr. Scholz, of Bonn.

The above is the amount of Greek manuscript authority for this celebrated clause, for although all the libraries in existence have been examined (containing above one hundred and eighty Greek MSS., written between the 5th and 15th centuries), no other copy has been found which contains a vestige of it. Nor has it been once cited by a single Greek father, although abundant opportunities presented themselves for introducing it, which they could not have failed to avail themselves of, had it existed in their copies; but they have invariably cited the passage as it has been preserved in all the ancient manuscripts. It found its way, however, into the received text of the Greek Test., having been copied from Erasmus's third, fourth, and fifth editions (1522, 1527, and 1535), with more or less of variation, into all Stephens's editions, from the third or folio edition of which it was adopted by Beza in all his editions, the first of which was published in 1565, and again by Elzevir, in his edition of 1624, to which his anonymous editor gave the name of Textus undique receptus. The best critical editions since have left out the words as spurious. They are wanting in those of Aldus, Gerbelius, Cephelæus, Colinaeus, Mace, Harwood, Matthæi, Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and others. Bowyer enclosed them in brackets, and Knapp in double brackets, indicating their spuriousness. The clause appears in the principal printed editions of the New Test. before the time of Griesbach. These were the editions of Mill (1707), Bengel (1734), and Wetstein (1751), the two former of whom held it to be genuine.

Luther uniformly rejected this clause from all his translations. It is absent from his last edition (1546), published after his death, and was first inserted in the Frankfort edition of 1574, but again omitted in 1588, and in subsequent editions. Since the beginning of the 17th century, with the exception of the Wittenberg edition of 1607, its insertion has been general. This was, however, in opposition to Luther's injunction.

It is inserted in all the early English printed versions, commencing with Coverdale's in 1536, but is generally printed either in brackets or in smaller letters. It was, however, printed in the editions of 1536, 1552, and in the Geneva Bible (1557), without any marks of doubt. It found its way, perhaps, from Beza's Greek Test. into the then authorized English version.

II. External Evidence.—The earliest Greek form in which the disputed clause is found is contained in the Latin translation of the acts of the council of Lateran, held in 1215, and the first Greek writer who absolutely cites any part of it is Manuel Calecas, a Dominican monk of the 14th century, while in the next century it is cited by Joseph Bryennius, a Greek monk.

The clause of the three heavenly witnesses is also absent from all existing manuscripts of the Latin Vulgate, written between the 8th and 10th centuries, anterior to which date there is no manuscript of this version now in existence, containing the Catholic epistles. Nor has any writer of the Western Church cited the passage before Cassiodorus, at the close of the 6th century, although even the fact of his having done so is doubted by Porson. There is, indeed, a preface to the canonical epistles, bearing the name of Jerome, in which the omission of this clause is ascribed to "false translators;" but this is a forgery. The clause is also wanting in all the manuscripts of the Syriac, Armenian, and other ancient versions.

From the circumstance, however, of the clause in question having been cited by two north-west African writers of the 5th century—Vigilius, bishop of Thapsus (the supposed author of the Athanasian Creed), and Victor Vitensis, the historian of the Vandal persecution—it has been fairly presumed that it existed in their time in some of the African copies of the old Latin version, from whence, or from the citations of these writers, it may have found its way into the later manuscripts of the Vulgate. It is cited by Victor, as contained in the Confession of Faith drawn up by Eugenius, bishop of Carthage. Vigilius, however, cites it in so many various ways, that little reliance can be placed on his authority. After this it is cited by Fulgentius, bishop of Rusopa, in the beginning of the 6th century, but is omitted in the same century by Facundus, bishop of Hermione, from which it is at least evident that the copies in that age and country varied. But, at a much earlier period, the whole clause is cited by Augustine of Hippo. Tertullian and Cyprian have been supposed, indeed, to have referred to the clause, but the proof of this depends on the proof of the previous fact, whether the clause existed or not in their copies.

III. Internal Evidence.—Various have been the opinions on this point for and against the genuineness of the passage. The advocates of the clause have generally maintained that the context requires its insertion, while its adversaries maintain that the whole force of the argument is destroyed by it. Lücke, one of the ablest modern commentators on John's writings, maintains that internal evidence alone would be sufficient to reject the passage, inasmuch (besides other reasons) as John never uses ὁ πατήρ and ὁ λόγος as correlatives, but ordinarily, like Paul, and every other writer of the New Test., associates ὁ υἱός with ὁ πατήρ (ii, 22, 23: iv, 14: v, 9, 11, 20, etc.), and always refers the λόγος in Christ to ὁ θεός, and not to ὁ πατήρ. He unites with those critics who look upon the rejected passage as an allegorical gloss, which found its way into the Latin text, where it has, "ever since the 4th century, firmly maintained its place as a welcome and protective passage," etc. He adds, however, that exegetical conscience will, in our age, forbid the most orthodox to apply this passage, even if it were genuine, for such a purpose, as ἐν εἰς has quite a different sense from that which is required by the doctrine of the trinity. Here Lücke fully coincides with the late bishop Middleton (Greek Article). Lücke's conclusion is a strong one. "Either these words are genuine, and the epistle, in this case, a production of the 3d or 4th century, or the epistle is a genuine work of John's, and then these words spurious."

Among the latest attempts to vindicate the genuineness of the passage is that of M. Gausson, of Geneva, in his Theopneustia (1839). But his reasonings are founded on a palpable error—the interpolation of the words ἐν τῇ γῇ (in the earth) in the eighth verse, which he absolutely cites upon the authority of Griesbach's text, where they do not exist! The corresponding words in terra are, indeed, found in the present text of some MSS. of the Vulgate, and of some ancient writers, although wanting in the seventh verse.

IV. Literature.—The following are some of the principal controversies to which this famous clause has given rise, of which a more complete account will be found in Mr. Charles Butler's Horæ Biblicæ; and most fully in Orme's Memoir (1830) on the subject (under the pseudonym of "Criticus"), especially the American edition by Abbot (N. Y. 1866).

The earliest was the dispute between Erasmus and Lee, afterwards archbishop of York, and between Erasmus and Stunica, one of the Complutensian editors. Erasmus was the first to suspect the genuineness of the preface to the canonical epistles above referred to, which ascribes the omission of the clause to false translators or transcribers. The genuineness of this preface, which led Sir Isaac Newton to charge Jerome with being the fabricator of the disputed clause (whereas it is certain that that learned father was totally unacquainted with its existence) of the text, is now given up. It is considered in the Benedictine edition of Jerome's works to be a forgery of the 9th century (Burigni, Vie d'Erasmus, Paris, 1757, i, 372-381; ii, 163-175; Crit. Soc. vii, 1229).

It was afterwards attacked by Sandius the Arian (Nucleus Hist. Ecclesiast. Amsterdam, 1669; and Interpret. Paradox. in Johan.). It was defended by Selden (De Synedris Ebraeor.) and ably attacked by the Roman Catholic father Simon (Hist. Critique du Texte, 1680, etc.). It was defended again by Martin (pastor of the Reformed Church in Utrecht, 1717), who was replied to by Thomas Emlyn, the celebrated and much-persecuted English Presbyterian (A Full Inquiry, etc., 1715-20), and by Cæsar de Missy, French preacher in the Savoy. There are other able treatises on the same side by Dr. Benson, Sir Isaac Newton, and the learned printer, Mr. Bowyer; and in its favor by Smith (1690), Kettner, Calamy (1722), as well as by Bossuet, and by Calmet (1720) in France, and Semler in Germany (1751). In Germany it was also attacked by Schmidt (Hist. Antiqua, 1774), and Michaelis, in his Introduction; but found an able defender in the excellent Bengel (Gnomon, 1773), who conceived that the passage contained a divine internal evidence, but at the same time maintained that its genuineness depended on the transposition of the two verses so as to make the earthly witnesses precede the heavenly, according to the citation (supra) of Vigilius of Thapsus. (See Christian Remembrancer, iv, 43, note.)

The third and most important stage of the controversy may be said to commence with the time of Gibbon, and was attacked by archdeacon Travis in three letters (1784-86). This publication gave rise to the most celebrated work which had yet appeared on the subject, professor Porson's Letters (1788): "an eternal monument of his uncommon erudition, sagacity, and tact" (Horæ Biblicæ). Mr. Butler concludes his enumeration with the Observations of Dr. Adam Clarke on the text of the heavenly witnesses (1805).

Griesbach's Diatribe, at the close of the second volume of his celebrated critical edition of the Greek Test. (1806), contains a complete and masterly view of the evidence on both sides; but as this eminent critic had completely rejected the passage from the text, he met with an indefatigable adversary in the late bishop Burgess (Vindication, 1821, and Introduction, 1833). The writings of this prelate drew down many learned replies, but his most able and successful opponent was Dr. Turton, regius professor at Cambridge (Vindication of the Literary Character of Professor Porson from the Animadversions of the Right Rev. Thomas Burgess, D.D., etc., published under the name of Crito-Cantabrigiensis, 1827). A temperate vindication of the genuineness of the passage had been published by the late bishop Middleton (1808), in his work on the Greek article, which was also replied to by Dr. Turton (ut sup.).

In the year 1834, Dr. Wiseman renewed the controversy in favor of the clause, in two letters in the Catholic Magazine, vol. ii and iii, reprinted at Rome in 1835. Dr. Wiseman's principal arguments are founded on the citations in African writers. Wright's Appendix to his Translation of Seiler's Hermeneutics contains some account of the state of the controversy respecting this clause to the year 1835, also Horne's Introduction, 8th ed. ii, 185, iv, 448-471. Since the time of Griesbach it has been generally omitted in all critical editions, and its spuriousness was especially shown in that of the learned Roman Catholic professor Scholz, of Bonn (1836), who was replied to by bishop Burgess (ed.). The whole ground of the controversy has more lately been reviewed by Dr. Davidson (Lectures on Biblical Criticism, 1853, ii, 403-426), who proves conclusively that the clause is indefensible either on its external or internal evidence.

For the exposition of the passage as containing the words in question, see bishop Horsley's Sermons (i, 193). For the same passage interpreted without the disputed words, see Sir Isaac Newton's Hist. of Two Texts (Works [Lond. 1779], v, 528).

Witschel, JOHANN HEINRICH WILHELM, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 9, 1769, at Hensenfeld, near Nürnberg. In 1801 he was appointed pastor at Igensdorf, in 1811 dean at Gräfenberg, in 1819 pastor and dean at Katzenhochstadt, in Bavaria, and died April 24, 1847. He is the author of an ascetical work entitled, Morgen- und Abendopfer (Nürnberg, 1806; 13th ed. 1854):—Moralische Blätter (ibid. 1801; 3d ed. with the title, Stimmen religiöser Erhebung, 1852):—Hermolaus (ibid. 1796):—Auswahl von Gesängen und Liedern zur häuslichen Erbauung (Hanover, 1817). Witstack, a citizen of Stettin, Pomerania, of some note, flourished in the early part of the 12th century. He was converted and baptized during the first visit of bishop Otto to Stettin, and endeavored to show his zeal for Christianity by fighting against the pagans. He was taken prisoner on a piratical expedition, and for some time kept in chains. Resorting to prayer for consolation in his confinement, he was, as he thought, providentially released, and made his way back to his home. This deliverance, and some other events of like character, he regarded as the divine call to him to proclaim Christianity to his perishing countrymen. Through his aid Otto was enabled to overcome paganism in Stettin, and place Christianity on a firm footing. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iv, 26.

Witt, DANIEL, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Bedford County, Va., Nov. 8, 1801. He united with the Church in December, 1821, was licensed April 13, 1822, and itinerated through several counties in his native state for two or three years. About 1825 he became pastor of a Church which he had organized at Sandy River, and for forty-five years occupied that position. During a part of this long ministry he had the pastoral oversight of several churches. He died Nov. 15, 1871. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1267. (J. C. S.)

Wittenberg, THE CONCORD OF, signed May 29, 1536, denotes one of the most interesting, as also one of the most important, stages in that series of negotiations which, during the first period of the Reformation, was carried on in order to bring about an agreement between the Swiss and Saxon reformers. Politically, landgrave Philip of Hesse was the motive power of these negotiations; theologically, Bucer; and the personal meeting which the former brought about, in 1534, between the latter and Melancthon, at Cassel, formed the introduction to the larger assembly at Wittenberg, held in 1536. The hard words which Luther let drop in his letter to Albrecht of Brandenburg, immediately after Zwingli's death, showed the aversion he nourished to him; and it was well known how anxiously he watched that no one inclined to the Zwinglian doctrine of the Lord's Supper should be allowed to keep up community with the Saxon camp, as his letters to Brunswick, Münster, and Augsburg show (De Wette, iv, 472; vi, 143). With Melancthon, however, a change had taken place. He learned from Ecolampadius's Dialogus that many of those passages from the fathers which he had quoted in his Sententiæ Veterum Aliquot Scriptorum de Cæna Domini (Corpus Reformatorum, vol. xxvi) were mere interpolations, and that Augustine never taught a "manducatio oralis," etc. Thus he wrote to Bucer, in April, 1531: "Aliquando inter nos veram et solidam concordiam coitutum esse, idque ut fiat, deum oro, certe quantum possum ad hoc annitar. Nunquam plucuit mihi hæc violentiæ et hostiliæ digladiatio inter Lutherum et Cinglium. Melius illi causæ consultum fuerit, si sinamus paulatim consiliscere hæc tragicas contentiones" (ibid. ii, 498). Under the influence of Bucer's expositions he gradually lost all interest in Luther's peculiar conception of the Lord's Supper, and became more and more anxious for the elimination of all elements of discord between the two evangelical churches.

In March, 1533, he wrote to Bucer concerning the moderation which both had hitherto shown, and begs of him as instantly as possible "ut det operam, magis ut contentiones istæ sedentur atque consulescant, quam ut excitentur et inflammentur" (ibid. ii, 641); and in a letter written Oct. 10, 1533, Melancthon even goes so far as to write to Bucer, "Utinam saltem nos aliquando possemus una commentari atque communicare de doctrina" (ibid. ii, 675). The Swiss had also become more susceptible to the idea of concord. Bucer had succeeded in gaining over to the side of reconciliation Myconius in Basel, Bullinger in Zurich, his colleague Capito, etc., and in the summer of 1534 an attempt at practical union was made, and proved successful, in Württemberg, and on July 31 a colloquy was held at Stuttgart, in the presence of duke Ulrich, between Simon Grynaeus of Basel and Ambrosius Blaurer of Constance, who represented the Swiss, and Erhard Schnepf, the Lutheran representative. In the same year, Dec. 27, Bucer and Melancthon met at Cassel, and in spite of the very stringent instructions which Luther had given Melancthon, they succeeded in drawing up a formula of concord which satisfied both. Copies of the formula were sent to Urbanus Rhegius, Brenz, Amsdorf, and Agricola, with the request, "an its sentientes tolerandi sint, ne damnentur" (ibid. ii, 826). On October 5, 1535, Luther wrote to Strasburg, Augsburg, Ulm, Esslingen, to Gerion Seiler and Huberinus, etc., inviting them to a general discussion of the formula of concord.

Eisenach was decided upon as the place of rendezvous. In April Bucer left Constance, accompanied by nine preachers. As they progressed they were joined by Capito, Musculus, Bonifacius Wulphard of Augsburg, Gervasius Schuler of Memmingen, and Martin Frecht of Ulm. At Esslingen they were joined by others. Meanwhile Luther had fallen sick, and requested the visitors to come to Grimma; they determined, however, to go directly to Wittenberg. On May 22, at seven o'clock in the morning, Bucer and Capito went to Luther's study. At three o'clock in the afternoon they again went to Luther, accompanied by Bugenhagen, Jonas, Cruciger, Menius, Mecum, Weller, and magister Georg Rovarius. Luther was suffering, irritable, harsh; Bucer became confused. The subject of the debate was the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Luther demanded that the Swiss should make a formal recantation of what they had hitherto believed and taught; this they refused, on the ground that they could not recant anything which they had never taught or believed. The next day, however, everything was changed. Bucer was clear and adroit, Luther was mild and kind. After some debate the Saxon theologians retired to another room to deliberate in private, and the result was the formula proposed by the Swiss was substantially accepted. May 24 the assembly met in Melancthon's house. The subjects of the discussion were baptism, absolution, the school, etc., and the agreement which was arrived at was chiefly due to the tact and resolution of Bugenhagen. On Sunday Bucer preached in the forenoon, Luther in the afternoon; and all the members of the assembly took the Lord's Supper together. Lutherans, like Osiander and Amsdorf, were not satisfied with the result; they continued to demand that Bucer should recant. But Luther himself spoke for a long time with great contentment and confidence of the affair. In Switzerland, too, there were some difficulties to overcome; but Bucer succeeded. Wittesa (or Vittesa), in Hindû mythology, is the god of wealth, one of the eight protectors of the world, or of the ten patriarchs, Rishis, masters of created beings. He always appears upon a magnificent wagon, overlaid with precious stones, or on a white feather-covered horse.

Wittich, CHRISTOPH, a Reformed theologian of Holland, was born Oct. 7, 1625, at Brieg, in Silesia.

He studied at Gröningen and Leyden, was in 1655 appointed professor of theology at Nimeguen, where he lectured for sixteen years. In 1671 he was called to Leyden, where his lectures were received with great favor, and died May 19, 1687. He wrote, Consensus Veritatis in Scriptura Divina et Infallibili Revelata cum Veritate Philosophica a Cartesio Delecta:—Comment. in Epist. ad Romanos:—Investigatio Epistolæ ad Hebræos:—Dissertatio de Natura Dei. Wittichen, FERDINAND KARL, a Protestant theologian, was born April 7, 1832, and died March 30, 1882, at Eschweiler, in Prussia. He is the author of, Die Lehre Gottes als des Vaters (Göttingen, 1865):—Die Idee des Menschen (ibid. 1868):—Die Idee des Reiches Gottes (ibid. 1872):—Die christliche Lehre, ein Leitfaden für den höheren Religionsunterricht (ibid. 1874):—Das Leben Jesu in urkundlicher Darstellung (ibid. 1876). Witting, JOHANN CARL FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 30, 1760, at Alfeld, in Hanover. He studied theology and philosophy at Göttingen, and after completing his curriculum he acted for ten years as private tutor in the house of a nobleman. In 1783 he received the pastorate in Ellensen, near Eimbeck. Here he wrote his Stoff zu Unterhaltungen am Krankenbette (Göttingen, 1788; 2d ed. 1789):—Gedanken über Kanzelorträge und deren zweckmässige Einrichtung (ibid. 1791). In 1799 he went to Brunswick as second preacher of St. Magnus, and advanced in 1805 to be first preacher. He died Jan. 24, 1824. Belonging to the strict orthodox party, he published, Ueber Rationalismus und Rationaltrie (Brunswick, 1822):—Biblicher Beseits von der Himmelfahrt Jesu (ibid. 1820):—Practisches Handbuch für Prediger (1791–98, 6 vols.):—Grundriss der Tugend- und Religionslehre (1802). Wittmann, GEORG MICHAEL, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born at Finkenhammer, near Pleistein, in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 23, 1760. He studied at Amberg and Heidelberg, and received holy orders in 1782. In 1803 he became head of the episcopal clerical seminary at Ratisbon, in 1804 was appointed cathedral-preacher, in 1821 made suffragan and general vicar to bishop Sailer, and at the same time, cathedral-provost there. When Sailer died he was appointed his successor, but before the confirmation reached him from Rome, he died, March 8, 1833. He wrote, Principia Cathol. de Sacra Scriptura (Ratisbon, 1793):—Principia Catholica de Matrimonio Catholicorum cum Altera Parte Protestantica (ibid. 1831; Germ. transl. eod.):—Annotaciones in Pentateuchum Moysis (ibid. 1796):—Ein Wort über die Denk- und Glaubensfreiheit der Protestanten (Sulzbach, 1817):—Confessorius pro Etate Juvenili (ibid. 1832; 3d ed. Witzel (Lat. Wicius), GEORG, a German theologian, was born at Vach, Hesse, in 1504. He studied theology at Erfurt, and in 1520 went to Wittenberg to attend the lectures of Luther and Melancthon, but was nevertheless ordained as priest by bishop Adolph of Merseburg. Appointed vicar in his native town, he preached the doctrines of the reformation, married, and was expelled in 1526. Driven away by the peasants' war from Lützen, in Thuringia, where he had settled, he was, on the recommendation of Luther, appointed pastor of Niemeck, but relapsed into Romanism, began to write with great violence against Luther and Melancthon, and was expelled in 1530. After some years of uncertain endeavors, he entered the service of abbot John of Fulda, in 1540, published his principal book, Typus Ecclesie Prioris, and presented his Querela Pacis to Charles V at the Diet of Spire (1544), who appointed him to draw up, together with Agricola, the Augsburg Interim. The troubles of the war induced Witzel to leave Fulda in 1554 and to settle at Mayence, where he published, in 1564, Via Regia seu de Controuersis Religionis Cupiūbus Reconciliandis Sententia. He died in 1573. See Strubel, *Beiträge zur Literatur des xvi. Witzstadt, HANS, an Anabaptist hymn-writer of the 16th century, is known by some hymns which he probably wrote in the first half of that century, because he speaks of the inroad of the sultan, Soleiman II, in 1521, and of the preparations of the emperor Charles V against the Smalkald League, in 1546. One of his hymns, Kompt her zu mir, spricht Gottes Son, has been translated into English, "Come hither," says the Son of God," by the late Dr. Mills, in his Flora Germanica, p. 47. See Schade, in the Weimarsches Jahrbuch für deutsche Sprache, Literatur und Kunst (Hanover, 1836), vol. iv; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, ii, 141 sq. (B. P.)

Wizenmann, THOMAS, a German champion of orthodoxy, was born at Ludwigsburg, in Wirtemberg, Nov. 2, 1759, of pietistic parents. After having passed through preliminary studies, he was received into the training-school and orphanage of his native town, as famulus, Oct. 28, 1775. In the spring of 1777 he resigned that position, however. He received the master's degree in October of that year, and in 1780 passed the theological examination and became vicar at Essingen. He had previously studied deeply the writings of Bengel, Oetinger, and Fricker, and continued to employ his leisure in the examination of standard authors, e. g. Locke, Leibnitz, Wolff, Mendelssohn, Jacob Böhme, Herder. He was also accustomed to commit the results of his thinking to writing, and on many occasions to give them to the public. Pfenninger's Christliches Magazin (1780-83) contains an extended series of articles contributed by him; but many papers on theological and psychological subjects were never published, and were found, usually in an unfinished state, among his literary remains after he died. In 1783 Wizenmann exchanged his vicariate for a tutor's place in a private family at Barmen, and, while journeying thither, made the acquaintance of the philosopher Jacobi, which was not without influence over his mental life. Jacobi subsequently made him acquainted with Spinoza's Ethics and Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. In April, 1784, Wizenmann began a work on the gospel according to Matthew, in which he attempted to make the gospel narrative demonstrate its own genuineness. He died before the work was completed, but it was published as a fragment by Kleuker in 1789. In 1785 he resigned his tutorship and took up his abode in the house of Jacobi. In 1786 he published Resultate der Jacobischen u. Mendelssohn. Philosophie, kritisch untersucht, etc., in which he denied the possibility of proving the existence or non-existence of God by the method of demonstration, but asserted the reasonableness of a belief in a revelation whenever trustworthy historical proofs in its support can be adduced. The work excited considerable interest, and was favorably reviewed by many influential scholars, among them Jacobi, but Kant published an unfavorable criticism in the Berliner Monatschrift, alleging that Wizenmann had convicted himself of enthusiasm in the positions assumed in the Resultate. Wizenmann felt obliged to reply to the charge of fanaticism emanating from so high a source, and made so masterly an exposure of the weak spots in Kant's argument as gained him friends among those who had not previously approved his book, among them Hamann. The strain upon his delicate constitution had, however, been too severe. His strength gave way, and he lay down to die. The end came Feb. 22, 1787, when he had scarcely begun a course of what promised to be important labors for the cause of truth. A memoir was published by von der Goltz, under the title Th. Wizenmann, der Freund Jacobi's, etc. (Gotha, 1859, 2 vols.). See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v.

Wjetkars, a small branch of Russian dissenters, who, about A.D. 1730, during a time of persecution, took refuge in the islands of Wjetka, in a small river between Russia and Poland, from which circumstance they derive their name. Here they formed a separate community and built two monasteries, from which some of them migrated, fifty years later, to Poland, and built a church and convent at Tschernoboltz. They belonged originally to the Popostschins, and their chief peculiarity is that they will not take oaths nor offer prayer for the emperor.

Wo (usually וָאֵי or וָאֵי, o'vai, all onomatopoeic) is often used in the English version where a softer expression would be at least equally proper. "Wo to such an one!" is in our language a threat, or imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicial, to befall a person; but this is not always the meaning of the word in Scripture. We have the expression "Wo is me," that is, Alas, for my sufferings! and "Wo to the women with child, and those who give suck," etc., that is, Alas, for their redoubled sufferings, in time of distress! It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether person or city, than as imprecating, or even as denouncing them, since his character of judge formed no part of his mission. If, then, we should read, "Alas, for thee, Chorazin! alas, for thee, Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiments of the place or to the character of the person speaking. This, however, is not the sense in which wo is always to be taken, as when we read, "Wo to those who build houses by unrighteousness, and cities by blood;" wo to those who are "rebellious against God," etc., in numerous passages, especially of the Old Test. The import of this word, then, is in some degree qualified by the application of it; where it is directed against transgression, crime, or any enormity, it may be taken as a threatening, a malediction; but in the words of our Lord, and where the subject is suffering under misfortunes, though not extremely wicked, a kind of lamentatory application of it would seem to be most proper. See IMPRECATION.

Wodin, the principal deity of the old German nations, to whom, as the god of battles, the captives taken in war were sacrificed. He was the analogue of the great Scandinavian god Odin (q. v.).

Wodrow, ROBERT, a Scotch minister, antiquary, and ecclesiastical historian, was born in Glasgow in 1679. He entered the university in his native city in 1691, and became librarian of the college while studying divinity; was licensed to preach in March, 1703; ordained in the summer of the same year, minister of Eastwood, in Renfrewshire, where he prosecuted his literary labors during the remainder of his life; was active in the interests of a free church, opposing the act of 1712 for re-establishing patronage, and becoming the most prominent member of a committee of five clergymen deputed by the General Assembly to proceed to London, on the accession of George I., to urge its repeal. He died March 21, 1734. He published, History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution (1721-22; republished with Memoir, etc., 1828-30).—Life of Professor (James) Wodrow, A.M., Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow from 1692 to 1707 (1828).—Collections upon the Lives of the Reformers and Most Eminent Ministers of the Church of Scotland (1834-45).—Analecta; or, Materials for a History of Remarkable Providences, etc. (1842-43), and other works.

Wodu, one of the sacred lustrations authorized by the Koran. The principal parts of this institution are six: (1) intention, (2) the washing of the entire face, (3) the washing of the hands and forearms up to the elbows, (4) the rubbing of some parts of the head, (5) the washing of the feet as far as the ankles, and (6) observance of the prescribed order. The institutes of the traditional law about this lustration are ten: (1) the preparatory formula, "In the name of the most merciful God," must be used; (2) the palms must be washed before the hands are put into the basin; (3) the mouth must be cleansed; (4) water must be drawn through the nostrils; (5) the entire head and ears must be rubbed; (6) if the beard be thick, the fingers must be drawn through it; (7) the toes must be separated; (8) the right hand and foot should be washed before the left; (9) these ceremonies must be thrice repeated; (10) the whole must be performed in uninterrupted succession. Wolcott, JOHN, an English satirist, better known as Peter Pindar, was born at Dodbrooke, Devonshire, in 1738. He was educated as a physician, and in 1767 accompanied sir William Trelawney, governor of Jamaica, to the West Indies as medical attendant. Though an avowed unbeliever, he returned to England, took orders in the Church, and sailed again for Jamaica, where he accepted a small curacy until the death of Trelawney, in 1768, when he returned to England, and spent twelve years in trying to establish himself as a physician at several places in Cornwall. He died Jan. 14, 1819. He published numerous satirical pieces, ridiculing the Royal Academy to such an extent that the government, it is said, thought it worth while to purchase his silence with £300 a year. Collections of his writings appeared between 1789 and 1812.

Wolder, DAVID, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hamburg, and studied at Rostock. In 1577 he was appointed deacon of St. Peter's, in his native city, where he died, Dec. 11, 1604. He is the editor of a Polyglot Bible in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, which was issued at Hamburg in 1595. Besides, he published Neu-Catechismus Gesangbüchlein (ibid. 1598), in which some of his own hymns are given. See Le Long-Masch, Bibliotheca Sacra, i, 387; J. Wolf, ABRAHAM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Cabelitz in 1680, studied at Halle, and was appointed professor at Königsberg in 1708. In 1717 he received the chair of Oriental languages, was made doctor of divinity in 1727, received the pastorate of the Altenstadt, together with a seat in consistory, the same year, and died June 20, 1731. He wrote, Diss. de Asino ad Cohel. iii, 21.—De Elihu Amicorum Jobi Optimo.—De Loco Cohel. xii, 11, 12.—Diss. in Haggai ii, 5, 6, de ὁρδοξίας et ὁρδομαξ Vinculo Necessario, etc. See Arnold, Historie der königsbergischen Universität: Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Wolf (or Wolff), Christian von, a German philosopher, was born at Breslau, Jan. 24, 1679. He had been dedicated to the ministry from his childhood by his parents, and hence received, as he himself expresses it, an ecclesiastical education. He studied in the gymnasium at home and at the University of Jena, where he developed a special taste for mathematical studies, and applied the principles of the science to theology. He preached a few times with great acceptability, and was noted for the clearness of his explanations. He was a professor at Halle from 1707 to 1723, when he was driven from the country by Frederick William I, and assumed a similar position at Marburg. In 1740 he was recalled to Halle by Frederick II, where he was received with unbounded enthusiasm. Here he remained until his death, April 9, 1754. See Ueberweg, History of Philosophy, ii, 116; Hagenbach, History of the Church in the 18th and 19th Centuries, i, 117 sq.; Selbstbiographie (published by Wuttke, Leipzig, 1841).

Wolf, Friedrich August, a Protestant theogian of Germany, was born July 31, 1784. He was appointed preacher at St. Peter's, in Leipsic, in 1805, and died Aug. 12, 1841. He left in MS. sermons, which were published by Kritz (Leipsic, 1841-44, 6 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 171; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1466. (B. P.)

Wolf (Lat. Wolfius), Jerome, a learned German, was born in the principality of Oettingen (Swabia), Aug. 13, 1516. As an envoy to Nördlingen and then to Nuremberg, he made rapid progress in the ancient languages. His misanthropy and morbid asceticism prevented his promotion, but at length, in 1536, the death of his father left him at full liberty to gratify his inclination for study. The fame of Melancthon attracted him to Wittenberg, where he had opportunities to hear the lectures of Luther and Amerbach. In 1545 he was charged with the direction of a Protestant school at Mulhausen (Thuringia), but he left this position after a very brief trial, and from that time he lived in the homes of his friends at Tübingen and Strasburg, devoting his time to translating the Greek authors into Latin. In 1557 he obtained the position of director of the college of Augsburg, and thus of the library, which position he held until his death, Oct. 8, 1580. He wrote, De Vero et Licito Usu Astrologiae (1558):—De Expeditio Utriusque Linguae Discendae Ratione:—Judicium de Poetis Legendis:—De Christianae Clavis Victoria. He is better known by his Latin translations, accompanied with notes, of Isocrates (1549, 1570), Demosthenes (1549), Nicetas (1557), Zonaras (eod.), Epicetetus (1560), Nicephorus Gregorius (1562), and Suidas (1564). These were published at Basle. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Wolf, Martin, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died May 31, 1875, at Stulberg, near Homburg, dean and member of consistory, is the author of, Die Urgeschichte oder Genesis cap. i-ii, 6 (Homburg, 1860):—Die Bedeutung der Welschöpfung nach Natur und Schrift (1866). (B. P.)

Wolfenbüttel Fragments (or Fragments of the Wolfenbüttel Anonymous Work) is the name of a work written from the deistic point of view to contest the truth of the gospel history, of which Lessing (q. v.) began to publish fragments in 1774. As early as 1771, during a visit to Berlin, he tried to find a publisher of the work, in spite of the advice of Ch. F. Nicolai and Moses Mendelssohn to the contrary, but as the royal censor (though he promised not to interfere with the publication) refused to authorize it, he gave up the plan for the time. In 1773, however, he began to issue a kind of periodical publication, Zur Geschichte und Litteratur aus den Schätzen der herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel, which was exempted from the control of the ducal censor; and in the third number of that publication appeared, in 1774, the first instalment of the work, Von Duldung der Deisten, Fragment eines Ungenannten, accompanied with a few cautious remarks by the editor, but very adroitly introduced by the preceding article. The fragment attracted no particular attention; but when, in 1777, the whole fourth number was occupied by fragments, of which some, Unmöglichkeit einer Offenbarung, Durchgang der Israeliten durch das rothe Meer, Ueber die Auferstehungsgeschichte, etc., were of a rather pronounced character, quite a sensation was produced; and Lessing did not fail to deepen the impression by publishing, in 1778, in the form of an independent book, a new fragment, Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger. He immediately lost his privilege of publishing anything without the permit of the censor, and a violent controversy with the orthodox party began, the most prominent figure of which was the Lutheran pastor, Johann Melchior Götze (q. v.). After the death of Lessing, the seven fragments which he had published appeared in Berlin in 1784 (4th ed. 1835). Some more fragments, which Lessing had had in his possession, but had not published, appeared in 1787, edited by C. A. E. Schmidt, a pseudonym for Andreas Riem, canon of Brunswick. The anonymous author of the fragments, which form one of the most remarkable productions of German deism, was Samuel Reimarus (q. v.). Lessing tried to lead public curiosity on a wrong track by hinting that the author probably was Johann Lorenz Schmidt, editor of the Wertheim Bible (q. v.). But already Hamann mentions Reimarus as the author in a letter to Herder, of Oct. 13, 1777; and the authorship was afterwards established beyond any doubt by the declaration of the son of Reimarus, made in a letter addressed to the managers of the Hamburg town-library, to whom he also presented a complete manuscript of the entire work of his father. The letter, written in 1813, a year before the death of the younger Reimarus, was published by Gurlitt in the Leipziger Literatur-Zeitschrift, 1827, No. 55, and by Klose, in Niedner's Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie (1850), p. 519 sq. See Röpe, Johann Melchior Götze (Hamburg, 1860), p. 152 sq.; Strauss, Herman Samuel Reimarus und seine Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes (ibid. 1862); Mönckeberg, *Hermann S. Wolf, Ludwig, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in 1808. He was brought up in rationalism, but the influence of Leo and J. Müller, of Halle, gave him that true foundation on which he afterwards lived and labored. In 1866 he was appointed superintendent of the Ottenstein diocese. He died at Halle, Oct. 15, 1877. (B. P.)

Wölflin, Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Owen, in Württemberg, Dec. 23, 1625. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1651 deacon at Aurach, in 1657 at Tübingen, in 1659 professor of Greek, and in 1660 was made doctor and professor of theology. In 1669 duke Eberhard III appointed him court-preacher, and provost of Lorch. In 1680 duke Frederic Charles appointed him provost of Stuttgart, a position which has never again been occupied after Wölflin. He died Oct. 30, 1688. He wrote, Exercitationes 8 de Lapsu Adami:—Exercit. 7 de Obligatione Credendi in Christum:—Exercit. 5 de Pamitentia Tyriorum et Sidoriorum:—Dissert. de Triduo Mortis Christi:—Historia Incestus Lothi, etc. See Fischlin, Memoria Theologorum Wirtembergensium; Freheri, Theatrum Eruditorum; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Wolfgang of ANHALT is known from the history of the reformation as one of those German princes who fought for the cause of Luther. Born in 1492, he succeeded his father in 1508. At the Diet of Worms, in 1521, the new doctrine found in him a strong arm and Luther a true friend. In his own country he introduced the reformed doctrine, and was its warmest promoter at home and abroad. He opposed the emperor, signed in 1529 the protest at Spenger, and the Augsburg Confession in 1530; and here (at Augsburg) it was that he, together with George of Brandenburg, told the emperor that they would rather give up their heads than follow the procession on Corpus-Christi day. He belonged to the promoters of the League of Smalkald, and the part which he took in the war brought upon him the ban of the empire and the loss of his estate, which was given to the Spaniard Ladrone. On horseback he left his castle in Bernburg, singing Luther's famous battle-song of the reformation "Ein feste Burg." In 1552 his estates were returned to him, and he died March 23, 1566. See Theol. Universalexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Wölflin (Lat. Lupulus), HEINRICH, a Swiss hagiographer, was born about 1470 at Berne. He was director of the gymnasium at his native place, and canon of the chapter. The doctrines of Zwingle, who had been his disciple, he corrupted. He spread with ardor the religious reform, married in 1524, was appointed in 1527 secretary of the consistory, and died in 1532. Wölfflein contributed much towards reviving the tone of literature among his compatriots. He wrote, Vita Nicolai Subriulani (1501); it was republished by J. Eichhorn, under the title, Historia F. Nicolai de Suzo (Fribourg, 1808; Constance, 1831):—Officium S. Vincentii Martyris (Basle, 1517). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Wolfrath, Friedrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 3, 1757, at Glückstadt. In 1794 he was called as pastor primarius to Husum, in 1798 as court-preacher to Glückstadt, in 1805 as doctor and professor of theology to Rinteln, and died June 26, 1812. He wrote, Was soll der Candidat der Theologie wissen? (Altdorf, 1800):—Versuch eines Lehrbuchs der allgemeinen Katechetik und Didaktik, etc. (Lemgo, 1807, 1808):—Fragen über liturgische Gegenstände, etc. (Hamburg, 1792):—Predigten (ibid. 1791-97, 8 vols.):—Geistliche Reden (Altona, 1791):—Menschenleben und Schicksal (Rinteln, 1808):—Religionslehrbuch (Hamburg, 1811):—Liturgisches Handbuch (Marburg, 1806). Wolfssohn, Aaron, also called Aaron Halle, a German rabbi, was born in 1736, and died at Fürth, March 20, 1835. He was a distinguished disciple of Mendelssohn, and worked in the department of Biblical exegesis and Hebrew literature in conjunction with Joel Löwe, G. Solomon, etc. He published a German translation of Lamentations, with an elaborate Hebrew introduction and commentary by Löwe (Berlin, 1788):—a translation of Esther, with a Hebrew introduction, etc. (ibid. eod.):—a translation of Ruth, with a Hebrew introduction, etc. (ibid. eod.):—a Hebrew commentary on the Song of Solomon, written conjointly with Löwe, accompanying Mendelssohn's translation of this book (ibid. 1789):—the book of Job, with a German translation and Hebrew commentary (Prague, 1791; Vienna, 1806):—the first book of Kings, with a German translation and Hebrew commentary (Breslau, 1809):—critical and exegetical annotations on the vision of Habakkuk (ibid. 1806):—a German translation of the first two chapters of Habakkuk, published in the periodical Jedilja, ii, 107 sq.:—a German translation and Hebrew exposition of the Sabbatic and festival lessons (Berlin, 1790):—a Hebrew primer, entitled אבטליר, with an introduction by D. Friedländer (ibid. eod.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 533 sq.; Kitto, Cyclop. s. v.; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibl. Bodl. col. 2782-2784; the same, *Bibl. Wollaston, George, D.D., an English divine, for some time father of the Royal Society, and sixty-two years member of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, was born in 1738. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and afterwards at Sidney College, Cambridge, where he graduated A.B. in 1758. Such was the high character he sustained, that he was chosen mathematical lecturer; and while at Cambridge he was also engaged in editing Newton's Principia. He was presented to the rectory of Stratford, Suffolk, in 1754; to the rectory of Dengey, Essex, in December, 1762; and to the rectory of St. Mary Aldermay, London, in 1774. He died Feb. 14, 1826. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 226.

Wollaston, William, an English clergyman and author, was born at Coton Clauford, Staffordshire, March 26, 1659; became pensioner at Sidney College, Cambridge, in 1674; took deacon's orders about 1681; became assistant master of Birmingham School; was ordained priest in 1686; inherited a large estate in 1688, and thereafter passed his time in literary leisure in London, where he died, Oct. 29, 1724. He published, The Design of a Part of the Book of Ecclesiastes; or, the Unreasonableness of Men's Restless Contentions for the Present Enjoyments, Represented in an English Poem (1691):—and Religion of Nature Delineated (1722). He also left a number of works in MS. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wolle, Christoph, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 24, 1700, at Leipsic, where he also prosecuted his theological, philosophical, and Oriental studies. On presenting and defending his dissertation, De Facultatibus Intellectualibus in Bonos Habitus Mutandis, he was allowed to lecture as private docent. In 1746 he was made doctor of divinity, and two years later was appointed to the chair of theology. He opened his lectures with a discourse, In Anton. Collinum de Christiana Religione ut ab Ipso Christo et Ejus Discipulis Tradita est, Nulli rei Minus quam Pii Fraudibus Favente. He died July 6, 1761. Of his many writings we mention, Diss. Philol. Sacra de Regulis xxx Hermeneuticis, ad Circumspectum Scriptura Sacra Illustrationem, etc. (Leipsic, 1722):—Diss. de Mysteriis Orationis ad Mysteria Revelationis Pædagogicis (ibid. eod.):—*Diss. Wolleb, Johannes, a theologian of the Reformed Church, was born Nov. 30, 1586, at Basle, where his father, Oswald, was a magistrate. At the age of twenty, after preliminary courses in philosophy and theology, in both of which he excelled, he was ordained to the ministry. In 1607 he was made city deacon; in 1611 pastor of St. Elizabeth's; in 1618 pastor at the Cathedral, as successor to Grynaeus, and professor of the Old Test., as successor to Sebastian Beck. He wrote a number of dissertations, and a single theological work, the Compendium Theologiae Christianae (1626), a volume of only 278 pages, but a masterpiece of compact brevity, clear arrangement, and thorough comprehensiveness as respects all important doctrinal matters. It was made a text-book at Basle and several other reformed universities. A second edition appeared at Basle in 1634, and a third at Amsterdam in 1638. An English edition was prepared by Alexander Ross, and published under the title, Wolleb's Christian Divinity. Wolleb did not live to see the success of his book, but died of the plague, Nov. 24, 1629, leaving two sons, Johann Jacob and Theodor, both of whom afterwards became pastors at Basle, and in 1667 died of the same disease. A volume of funeral sermons by Wolleb appeared in print in 1657. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wollgast, Johann Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Schweidnitz, May 16, 1797, and died March 29, 1839. He is the author of Kirchenagende für Stadt- und Landprediger (Breslau, 1811, 2 parts). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 280. (B. P.)

Wöllner, Christoph, the Prussian statesman of the reign of Frederick William II, who originated the famous religious edict in which orthodoxy in teaching was commanded, was born in 1732 at Döberitz, and was at first an orthodox, though tolerant, theologian. He became engaged in secular affairs after a time, and resigned his pastorate at Behnitz. During fifteen years (1765-80) he contributed nearly all the reviews on domestic and horticultural matters which appeared in Nicolai's Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek. In 1776 he joined an order of templars founded at Wiesbaden by a certain knight, Theophilus a Cygnus, which promised to open the way into the most secret mysteries of nature. In 1777 he published in Nicolai's Bibliothek a prophecy concerning "the impending destruction of the prevalent rationalistic enlightenment." He became tutor in political economy to the crown-prince in 1782, was ennobled in 1786, and appointed councillor of finance and intendant of royal buildings, etc. On July 3, 1788, he was made minister of the department of justice, which included in its jurisdiction the affairs of the Church, and in that position was employed by the king to place a barrier in the way of the progress of the "enlightenment," which had become powerful in the land. The notorious religious edict, written by Wöllner, was issued in consequence, July 9. It accorded liberty of belief to everybody, but ordered that teachers who could not accept the doctrines of evangelical orthodoxy should either resign their positions or refrain from promulgating their own views, and in public support those of the Church, under penalty of "being dismissed and still more severely punished." The edict, issued in the country of Frederick the Great, and after fifty years of governmental principles of a directly opposite character, produced an immense excitement, and called forth more than a hundred pamphlet reviews, about one third of which were in its favor, and, curiously enough, one by Semler, the father of rationalism, was in this class. Nothing in the way of enforcing the edict was done, however, for about two years; but then a royal order, dated Aug. 13, 1791, compelled Wöllner to proceed against offenders, e. g. Bahrdt (q. v.), who had ridiculed the edict by writing a comedy upon it. A commission, of which pastor Hermes of Breslau was the head, was instituted by the king to give effect to the edict; but as its members were altogether unknown in the learned world, its authority was not great, and its work unimportant. It addressed threatening fulminations to Nössel, Niemeyer, Kant, the University of Halle, etc., which were followed by no consequences whatever. With the accession of Frederick William III (1797), all the measures taken to advance the cause of orthodoxy were set aside. Wöllner retained his office, and in 1798 attempted to revive the religious edict, but received a cutting rejoinder from the king. He resigned and retired to his estates, where he died, respected for his character and abilities, in the year 1800. See Teller, Denkschrift auf Herrn Staatsminister v. Wöllner, etc. 1802; Das preussische Religionsedikt, etc. (Leipsic, 1842); Manso, Gesch. d. preuss. Staats, i, 165 sq., 201 sq.; Sack, *Gesch. d. geistl. Wolters, Albrecht, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died at Halle, March 30, 1878, doctor and professor, is the author of Predigten, published in 1847, 1860, and 1874:—Reformationsgeschichte der Stadt Weasel bis zur Befestigung ihres reformirten Bekenntnisses durch die weeseler Synode (last ed. Bonn, 1868) (B. P.)

Wolters, Otto Ludwig Siegmund, doctor of theology and pastor of St. Catherine's, at Hamburg, was born there Dec. 17, 1796, and died May 13, 1874. For thirty years he occupied the pulpit of St. Catherine's, in his native place, of which he was one of its truest and most learned sons. His sermons were repeatedly printed. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1469. (B. P.)

Woltersdorf, ERNST GOTTLIEB, an evangelical hymn-writer, was born at Friedrichsfelde, near Berlin, May 31, 1725. He was a student of Halle, and resided and taught in the orphanage. In 1744 he became a private tutor, and four years afterwards associate pastor at Bunzlau. He evinced great interest in the instruction of the young, and consented to assume the direction of an orphanage founded in his parish by a mason named Zahn. This institution enjoyed his supervision until his death, Dec. 17, 1761. Woltersdorf possessed uncommon readiness in versification, and was continually tempted to spread his thoughts over a great deal of surface. Some of his hymns are largely in the style of Zinzendorf, with whom he shared many doctrinal views, though not otherwise connected with him.

Several of them have considerable value, and have found deserved admission, in a revised and abridged form, in the hymn-books of various evangelical churches. He had the ability to seize upon some pregnant word taken from Scripture or other source, and to present it in a different light with every succeeding strophe, and did this in several of his hymns. This power led him to write also a number of parodies. He published a collection of Paulms (1750; 2d ed. 1768; a recent ed., by Schneider, accompanied with a biography of the author, Dresden, 1849). A second collection was issued in 1751. This volume contains a list of other writings by Woltersdorf, generally admonitions addressed to the young. After his death a volume of sketches of sermons prepared by him was published. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Wolzogen, Johann Ludwig von, a famous Socinian, was born in 1599, in Austria, of a family belonging to the Calvinistic Church, and died in 1685, at Sohlichingsheim, near Fraustadt. His exegetical writings are found in the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum (Amsterdam, 1656). He also wrote, Compendium Religionis Christianae (ibid. eod.). His Opera Omnia were published at Amsterdam in the same year. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 17, 81, 308, 419. Fock, Der Socinianismus (Kiel, 1847), Theol. Universallezikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Wolzogen, Ludovicus van, a Reformed theologian of Holland, was born in 1632. After completing his studies, he travelled through France and Germany, and was appointed preacher of the French congregation at Gröningen. In 1664 he was appointed professor in Utrecht, and shortly afterwards was called to Amsterdam, where he died, Nov. 13, 1690. He wrote, Orator Sacer, seu Præceptiones de Ratione Concionandi — Tractatus de Scripturæ Sacræ Interprete — Dissert. Critico-Theologicæ de Correctione Scribarum, etc. After his death there was published, in 1700, Explication de la Prière. See Burmann, Trajectum Eruditum, Lettres sur la Vie et sur la Mort de Louis de Wolzogue (Amsterdam, 1692), *Lud. Wolzogenii Apologia Parentalis, Auctore Pet. Woman (Heb. אִשָּׁה, ishsháh [plur. נָשִׁים, a masc. form contracted for נְשִׁים, men], fem. of אִישׁ, ish, as vira [in virago] from rir, and ἀνδρῖς from ἀνὴρ), like our own term woman, is in the Hebrew (and so the Greek, γυνή) used of married and unmarried females. See MAN.

I. Original Position of the Sex.—The derivation of the word shows that, according to the conception of the ancient Israelites, woman was man in a modified form—one of the same race, the same genus, as man, a kind of female man. How slightly modified that form is, how little in essential structure woman differs from man, physiology has made abundantly clear. Variant, however, in make as man and woman are, they differ still more in character; and yet the great features of their hearts and minds so closely resemble each other, that it requires no depth of vision to see that these twain are one! This most important fact is characteristically set forth in the Bible in the account given of the formation of woman out of one of Adam's ribs: a representation to which currency may have the more easily been given, from the apparent space there is between the lowest rib and the bones on which the trunk is supported. "And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of man." An immediate and natural inference is forthwith made touching the intimacy of the marriage-bond: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. ii, 21-24). This narrative is hence effectively appealed to as supplying an argument for enforcing the duties of the husband towards the wife (Eph. v, 28-31). Those who have been pleased to make free with this simple narrative may well be required to show how a rude age could more effectually have been taught the essential unity of man and woman—a unity of nature which demands, and is perfected only in, a unity of soul. The conception of the Biblical writer goes beyond even this, but does not extend further than science and experience unite to justify. There was solid reason why it was not good for Adam “to be alone.” Without a helpmeet he would have been an imperfect being. The genus homo consists of man and woman. Both are necessary to the idea of man. The one supplements the qualities of the other. They are not two, but one flesh, and as one body so one soul.

The entire aim, then, of the narrative in Genesis was, by setting forth certain great physical facts, to show the essential unity of man and woman, yet the dependence of the latter on the former; and so to encourage and foster the tenderest and most considerate love between the two, founded on the peculiar qualities of each—pre-eminence, strength, intellectual power, and wisdom on the one side; reliance, softness, grace, and beauty on the other—at the same time that the one set of excellences lose all their worth unless as existing in the possession of the other. Many usages of early times interfered with the preservation of this theoretical equality: we may instance the existence of polygamy, the autocratic powers vested in the head of the family under the patriarchal system, and the treatment of captives. Nevertheless a high tone was maintained generally on this subject by the Mosaic law, and, as far as we have the means of judging, by the force of public opinion.

II. Condition of Ancient Hebrew Females.—1. Liberty.—Women appear to have enjoyed considerably more freedom among the Jews than is now allowed them in western Asia, although in other respects their condition and employments seem to have been not dissimilar. At present, women of all ranks are much confined to their own houses, and never see the men who visit their husbands or fathers, and in towns they never go abroad without their persons and faces being completely shrouded; they also take their meals apart from the males, even of their own family. But in the rural districts they enjoy more freedom, and often go about unveiled. Among the Jews, women were somewhat less restrained in their intercourse with men, and did not generally conceal their faces when they went abroad. Only one instance occurs in Scripture of women eating with men (Ruth ii, 14), but that was at a simple refectory, and only illustrates the greater freedom of rural manners. Instead of being immured in a harem, or appearing in public with the face covered, the wives and maidens of ancient times mingled freely and openly with the other sex in the duties and amenities of ordinary life. Rebekah travelled on a camel with her face unveiled, until she came into the presence of her affianced (Gen. xxiv, 64, 65). Jacob saluted Rachel with a kiss in the presence of the shepherds (Gen. xxix, 11). Each of these maidens was engaged in active employment, the former in fetching water from the well, the latter in tending her flock. Sarah wore no veil in Egypt, and yet this formed no ground for supposing her to be married (Gen. xii, 14-19). An outrage on a maiden in the open field was visited with the severest punishment (Deut. xxii, 25-27), proving that it was not deemed improper for her to go about unprotected. Further than this, women played no inconsiderable part in public celebrations: Miriam headed a band of women who commemorated with song and dance the overthrow of the Egyptians (Exod. xv, 20, 21); Jephthah's daughter gave her father a triumphal reception (Judg. xi, 34); the maidens of Shiloh danced publicly in the vineyards at the yearly feast (Judg. xxi, 21); and the women feted Saul and David, on their return from the defeat of the Philistines, with singing and dancing (1 Sam. xviii, 6, 7). The odes of Deborah (Judg. v) and of Hannah (1 Sam. ii, 1, etc.) exhibit a degree of intellectual cultivation which is in itself a proof of the position of the sex in that period. Women also occasionally held public offices, particularly that of prophetess or inspired teacher, as instanced in Miriam (Exod. xv, 20), Huldah (2 Kings xxii, 14), Noadiah (Neh. vi, 14), Anna (Luke ii, 36), and above all Deborah, who applied her prophetic gift to the administration of public affairs, and so was entitled to be styled a “judge” (Judg. iv, 4). The active part taken by Jezebel in the government of Israel (1 Kings xviii, 13; xxi, 25), and the usurpation of the throne of Judah by Athaliah (2 Kings xi, 3), further attest the latitude allowed to women in public life.

2. The employments of the women were very various, and sufficiently engrossing. In the earlier or patriarchal state of society, the daughters of men of substance tended their fathers' flocks (Gen. xxix, 9; Exod. ii, 16). In ordinary circumstances, the first labor of the day was to grind corn and bake bread. The other cares of the family occupied the rest of the day. The women of the peasantry and of the poor consumed much time in collecting fuel, and in going to the wells for water. The wells were usually outside the towns, and the labor of drawing water from them was by no means confined to poor women. This was usually, but not always, the labor of the evening; and the water was carried in earthen vessels borne upon the shoulder (Gen. xxiv, 15-20; John iv, 7, 28). Working with the needle also occupied much of their time, as it would seem that not only their own clothes but those of the men were made by the women. Such garments, at all events, were either for the use of the family (1 Sam. ii, 19; Prov. xxxi, 21), for sale (Prov. xxxi, 14, 24), or for charity (Acts ix, 39). Some of the needlework was very fine, and much valued (Exod. xxvi, 36; xxviii, 39; Judg. v, 30; Psa. xlv, 14). The women appear to have spun the yarn for all the cloth that was in use (Exod. xxxv, 25; Prov. xxxi, 19); and much of the weaving seems also to have been executed by them (Judg. xvi, 13, 14; Prov. xxxi, 22). The tapestries for bed-coverings, mentioned in the last-cited text, were probably produced in the loom, and appear to have been much valued (Prov. vii, 16). See HANDICRAFT.

The value of a virtuous and active housewife forms a frequent topic in the book of Proverbs (xi, 16; xii, 4; xiv, 1; xxxi, 10, etc.). Her influence was, of course, proportionably great; and, where there was no second wife, she controlled the arrangements of the house, to the extent of inviting or receiving guests on her own motion (Judg. iv, 18; 1 Sam. xxv, 18, etc.; 2 Kings iv, 8, etc.). The effect of polygamy was to transfer female influence from the wives to the mother, as is incidentally shown in the application of the term gebirah (literally meaning powerful) to the queen mother (1 Kings ii, 19; xv, 13; 2 Kings x, 18; xxiv, 12; Jer. xiii, 18; xxix, 2). Polygamy also necessitated a separate establishment for the wives collectively, or for each individually. Thus, in the palace of the Persian monarch there was a “house of the women” (Esth. ii, 9), which was guarded by eunuchs (ii, 3); in Solomon's palace the harem was connected with, but separate from, the rest of the building (1 Kings vii, 8); and on journeys each wife had her separate tent (Gen. xxxi, 83). In such cases it is probable that the females took their meals apart from the males (Esth. i, 9); but we have no reason to conclude that the separate system prevailed generally among the Jews. The women were present at festivals, either as attendants on the guests (John xii, 2), or as themselves guests (Job i, 4; John ii, 3); and hence there is good ground for concluding that on ordinary occasions also they joined the males at meals, though there is no positive testimony to that effect. See EATING.

2. We have no certain information regarding the dress of the women among the poorer classes; but it was probably coarse and simple, and not materially different from that which we now see among the Bedawin women, and the female peasantry of Syria. This consists of drawers, and a long and loose gown of coarse blue linen, with some ornamental bordering wrought with the needle, in another color, about the neck and bosom. The head is covered with a kind of turban, connected with which, behind, is a veil, which covers the neck, back, and bosom. See VEIL. We may presume, with still greater certainty, that women of superior condition wore, over their inner dress, a frock or tunic like that of the men, but more closely fitting the person, with a girdle formed by an unfolded kerchief. Their head-dress was a kind of turban, with different sorts of veils and wrappers used under various circumstances. The hair was worn long, and, as now, was braided into numerous tresses, with trinkets and ribbons (1 Cor. xi, 15; 1 Tim. ii, 9; 1 Pet. iii, 3). With the head-dress the principal ornaments appear to have been connected, such as a jewel for the forehead, and rows of pearls (Sol Song i, 10; Ezek. xvi, 12). Ear-rings were also worn (Isa. iii, 20; Ezek. xvi, 12), as well as a nose-jewel, consisting, no doubt, as now, either of a ring inserted in the cartilage of the nose, or an ornament like a button attached to it. The nose-jewel was of gold or silver, and sometimes set with gems (Gen. xxiv, 47; Isa. iii, 21). Bracelets were also generally worn (Isa. iii, 19; Ezek. xvi, 11), and anklets, which, as now, were probably more like fetters than ornaments (Isa. iii, 16, 20). The Jewish women possessed the art of staining their eyelids black, for effect and expression (2 Kings ix, 30; Jer. iv, 30; Ezek. xxiii, 40); and it is more than probable that they had the present practice of staining the nails, and the palms of their hands and soles of their feet, of an iron-rust color, by means of a paste made from the plant called henna (Lawsonia inermis). This plant appears to be mentioned in Sol. Song i, 14, and its present use is probably referred to in Deut. xxi, 12; 2 Sam. xix, 24. See DRKSS.

4. Family Relations.—The customs concerning marriage, and the circumstances which the relation of wife and mother involved, have been described in the article MARRIAGE.

The Israelites eagerly desired children, and especially sons. Hence the messenger who first brought to the father the news that a son was born, was well rewarded (Job iii, 3; Jer. xx, 15). The event was celebrated with music; and the father, when the child was presented to him, pressed it to his bosom, by which act he was understood to acknowledge it as his own (Gen. i, 28; Job iii, 12; Psa. xxii, 10). On the eighth day from the birth the child was circumcised (Gen. xvii, 10); at which time also a name was given to it (Luke i, 59). The first-born son was highly esteemed, and had many distinguishing privileges. He had a double portion of the estate (Deut. xxi, 17); he exercised a sort of parental authority over his younger brothers (Gen. xxv, 23, etc.; xxvii, 29; Exod. xii, 29; 2 Chron. xxi, 3); and before the institution of the Levitical priesthood he acted as the priest of the family (Numb. iii, 12, 13; viii, 18). The patriarchs exercised the power of taking these privileges from the first-born, and giving them to any other son, or of distributing them among different sons; but this practice was overruled by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxi, 15-17).

The child continued about three years at the breast of the mother, and a great festival was given at the weaning (Gen. xxi, 8; 1 Sam. i, 22-24; 2 Chron. xxxi, 6; Matt. xxi, 16). He remained two years longer in charge of the women, after which he was taken under the especial care of the father, with a view to his proper training (Deut. vi, 20-25; xi, 19). It appears that those who wished for their sons better instruction than they were themselves able or willing to give, employed a private teacher, or else sent them to a priest or Levite, who had perhaps several others under his care. The principal object was that they should be well acquainted with the law of Moses; and reading and writing were taught in subservience to this leading object.

The authority of a father was very great among the Israelites, and extended not only to his sons, but to his grandsons—indeed, to all who were descended from him. His power had no recognised limit, and even if he put his son or grandson to death, there was, at first, no law by which he could be brought to account (Gen. xxi, 14; xxxviii, 24). But Moses circumscribed this power, by ordering that when a father judged his son worthy of death, he should bring him before the public tribunals. If, however, he had struck or cursed his father or mother, or was refractory or disobedient, he was still liable to capital punishment (Exod. xxi, 15, 17; Lev. xx, 9; Deut. xxi, 18-21). See CHILD.

III. Description of Modern Oriental Females.—It will at once be seen that under the influence of a religion, at the bottom of which lay those ideas concerning the relations of the sexes one to another, slavery on the part of the woman was impossible. This fact is the more noticeable, and it speaks the more loudly in favor of the divine origin of the religion of the Bible, because the East has in all times, down to the present day, kept women everywhere, save in those places in which Judaism and Christianity have prevailed, in a state of low, even if in some cases gilded, bondage, making her the mere toy, plaything, and instrument of man. Nothing can be more painful to contemplate than the humiliating condition in which Islamism still holds its so-called free women—a condition of perpetual childhood—childhood of mind, while the passions receive constant incense; leaving the fine endowments of woman's soul undeveloped and inert, or crushing them when in any case they may happen to germinate; and converting man into a capricious, haughty idol, for whose will and pleasure the other sex lives and suffers. In those parts of the East where the influence of the Bible has not prevailed, woman has been subjected to degradation, and viewed as little better than the slave of an imperious master. Being mainly immured within the harem, and prohibited from mingling in general society, their minds are left wholly uncultivated; and what time they can spare from their household duties is principally devoted to embroidery, dress, and smoking. This universal want of education, with the influence of polygamy, naturally disqualifies them from being the proper companions of their husbands. The state of morality in the higher circles, in some of the principal Eastern cities, consequent on this condition of society, is just what might be expected. Wherever the influence of Christianity prevails, woman is invariably elevated to her natural position in society—the equal and companion of man.

It will assist the reader in forming a just conception of Hebrew women in the Biblical periods, if we add a few details respecting the actual condition of women in Syria. Mr. Bartlett (Walks about Jerusalem, p. 291 sq.) visited the house of a rich Jew in the metropolis of the Holy Land. We give the substance of his observations:

"On entering his dwelling we found him seated on the low divan, fondling his youngest child; and on our expressing a wish to draw the costume of the female members of his family, he commanded their attendance, but it was some time before they would come forward: when, however, they did present themselves, it was with no sort of reserve whatever. Their costume is chaste and elegant. The prominent figure in the room was the married daughter, whose husband, a boy of fourteen or fifteen, as he seemed, wanted nearly a head of the stature of his wife, but was already chargeable with the onerous duties of a father. An oval head-dress of peculiar shape, from which was hung a long veil of embroidered muslin, admirably set off her brow and eyes: the neck was ornamented with jewels, and the bosom with a profusion of gold coins, partly concealed by folds of muslin; a graceful robe of striped silk, with long open sleeves, half-laced under the bosom, invested the whole person, over which was worn a jacket of green silk with short sleeves, leaving the white arm and bracelet hand at liberty. An elderly person sat on the sofa, the mother, whose dress was more grave, her turban less oval, and of blue shawl, and the breast covered entirely to the neck with a kind of ornamented gold tissue, and over all was seen a jacket of fur: she was engaged in knitting, while her younger daughter bent over her in conversation; her dress was similar to that of her sister, but with no gold coins or light muslin folds, and, instead of large ear-rings, the vermilion blossom of the pomegranate formed an exquisite pendant, reflecting its glow upon the dazzling whiteness of her skin. We were surprised at the fairness and delicacy of their complexion, and the vivacity of their manner. Unlike the wives of Oriental Christians, who respectfully attend at a distance till invited to approach, these pretty Jewesses seemed on a perfect footing of equality, and chatted and laughed away without intermission."

are remarkable for their attractions. Mr. Wolff describes one of them with enthusiasm, and no small unconscious poetry—"the beautiful Sarah," whom his lady met at a "wedding-feast."

"She was scarcely seated when she felt a hand upon hers, and heard a kind greeting. She turned to the voice and saw a most beautiful Jewess, whom I also afterwards saw, and I never beheld a more beautiful and well-behaved lady in my life, except the beautiful girl in the valley of Cashmere: she looked like a queen in Israel. A lovely lady she was; tall, of a fair complexion and blue eyes, and around her forehead and cheeks she wore several roses. No queen had a finer deportment than that Jewess had."

Mr. Bartlett was also admitted into the abode of a Christian family in Jerusalem, of whom he thus speaks (p. 205, 206):

"The interior of their houses is similar to those of the Jews. In our intercourse with them we were received with more ceremony than among the former. The mistress of the family is in attendance with her children and servants, and besides pipes and coffee, the guest is presented with saucers of sweetmeats and small glasses of aniseed: which, when done with, are taken from him by his fair hostess or her servant, who kiss his hand as they receive them. They are more reserved, often standing during the visit. Their dress is more gorgeous than that of the Jewish women, but not so chaste and elegant: it suits well with the languor of their air, their dusky complexion, and large black eyes. The head-dress has a fantastic air, like that of a May-day queen in England, and the bust is a little in the style of

'Beauties by sir Peter Lely,

Whose drapery hints we may admire freely.'

A heavy shawl is gracefully wreathed round the figure, and the dress, when open, displays long, loose trousers of muslin and small slippers. The ensemble, it must be admitted, is very fascinating, when its wearer is young and lovely."

We now pass to the peasantry, and take from Larmatine a sketch of the Syrian women, as seen by him at the foot of Lebanon, on a Sunday.

"After having with their families attended divine service, the latter return to their houses to enjoy a repast somewhat more sumptuous than on ordinary days: the women and girls, adorned in their richest clothes, their hair plaited, and all strewn with orange-flowers, scarlet wall-flowers, and carnations, seat themselves on mats before the doors of their dwellings, with their friends and neighbors. It is impossible to describe with the pen the groups so redolent of the picturesque, from the richness of their costume and their beauty, which these females then compose in the landscape. I see among them daily such countenances as Raphael had not beheld, even in his dreams as an artist. It is more than the Italian or Greek beauty: there is the nicety of shape, the delicacy of outline, in a word, all that Greek and Roman art has left us as the most finished model: but it is rendered more bewitching still by a primitive artlessness of expression, by a serene and voluptuous languor, by a heavenly clearness, which the glances from the blue eyes, fringed with black eyelids, cast over the features, and by a smiling archness, a harmony of proportions, a rich whiteness of skin, an indescribable transparency of tint, a metallic gloss upon the hair, a gracefulness of movement, a novelty in the attitude, and a vibrating silvery tone of voice, which render the young Syrian girl the very houri of the vernal paradise. Such admirable and varied beauty is also very common; I never go into the country for an hour without meeting several such females going to the fountains or returning, with their Etruscan urns upon their shoulders, and their naked legs clasped with rings of silver."

The ordinary dress of the women of Palestine is not, perhaps, much fitted to enhance their natural charms, and yet it admits of ease and dignity in the carriage. Dr. Olin thus describes the customary appearance of both male and female:

"The people wear neither hats, bonnets, nor stockings; both sexes appear in loose, flowing dresses, and red or yellow slippers; the men wear red caps with or without turbans, the women are concealed by white vells, with the exception of the eyes" (ii, 437).

The singular beauty of the Hebrew women, and the natural warmth of their affections, have conspired to throw gems of domestic loveliness over the pages of the Bible. In no history can there be found an equal number of charming female portraits. From Hagar down to Mary and Martha, the Bible presents pictures of womanly beauty that are unsurpassed and rarely paralleled. But we should very imperfectly represent in these general remarks the formative influence of the female character as seen in the Bible, did not we refer these amiable traits of character to the original conceptions of which we have spoken, and to the pure and lofty religious ideas which the Biblical books in general present. If woman there appears as the companion and friend of man, if she rises above the condition of being a bearer of children to that noble position which is held by the mother of a family, she owes her elevation in the main to the religion of Moses and to that of Jesus. The first system—as a preparatory one—did not and could not complete the emancipation of woman. The Oriental influence modified the religious so materially as to keep women generally in some considerable subjection. Yet the placing of the fondest desires and the glowing hopes of the nation on some child that was to be born, some son that was to be given, as it made every matron's heart beat high with expectation, raised the tone of self-respect among the women of Israel, and caused them to be regarded by the other sex with lively interest, deep regard, and a sentiment which was akin to reverence. There was, however, needed the finishing touch which the Great Teacher put to the Mosaic view of the relations between the sexes. Recognising the fundamental truths which were as old as the creation of man, Jesus proceeded to restrain the much-abused facility of divorce, leaving only one cause why the marriage-bond should be broken, and at the same time teaching that as the origin of wedlock was divine, so its severance ought not to be the work of man. Still further—bringing to bear on the domestic ties his own doctrine of immortality, he made the κοινωνία coexistent with the undying soul, only teaching that the connection would be refined with the refinement of our affections and our liberation from these tenements of clay in which we now dwell (Matt. v, 32; xix, 8 sq.; xxii, 23 sq.). With views so elevated as these, and with affections of the tenderest benignity, the Saviour may well have won the warm and gentle hearts of Jewish women. Accordingly, the purest and richest human light that lies on the pages of the New Test. comes from the band of high-minded, faithful, and affectionate women, who are found in connection with Christ from his cradle to his cross, his tomb, and his resurrection. These ennobling influences have operated on society with equal benefit and power. Woman, in the better portions of society, is now a new being. Yet her angelic career is only just begun. She sees what she may, and what under the gospel she ought to be; and ere very long, we trust, a way will be found to employ, in purposes of good, energies of the finest nature, which now waste away from want of scope, in the ease and refinements of affluence, if not in the degradations of luxury—a most precious offering made to the Moloch of fashion, but which ought to be consecrated to the service of that God who gave these endowments, and of that Saviour who has brought to light the rich capabilities, and exhibited the high and holy vocation, of the female sex. Women. The influence of Christianity did much in early times for the female sex. They were freely admitted to the Church, but they sat in upper rooms or galleries set apart for them. In many churches they had a gate of their own by which to enter, and of which the deaconess had charge. See DEACONESS. But women were never allowed to preach, though they might hold the rank of deaconess, and as such might instruct privately catechumens and their own sex generally. The Montanists (q. v.) were an exception to this general rule. As women were not to preach, so they could not baptize; nor were they allowed to keep private vigils. Tertullian thus describes the felicity of domestic life: "How can we find words to express the happiness of that marriage which the Church effects, and the oblation confirms, and the blessing seals, and the angels report, and the Father ratifies! What a union of two believers, with one hope, one discipline, one service, one spirit, and one flesh! Together they pray, together they prostrate themselves, and together keep their fasts, teaching and exhorting one another. They are together at the Church and at the Lord's Supper; they are together in straits and refreshments. . . . Christ rejoices on hearing and beholding such things; to such persons he sends his peace. Where the two are, he is himself; and where he is, there the evil one is not."—Eadie, Eccles. Cyclop. p. 662; Bingham, Christ. Ant. bk. ii, ch. xxii; see DIVORCE; MARRIAGE; WIDOWS.

The estimate of womanhood in the earliest Christian literature exhibits a remarkable contrast to that of paganism, as both attaching far more importance to female modesty and chastity, and, at the same time, greatly enhancing the dignity of the female character and enlarging the sphere of woman's activities. The epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians speaks of the husbands whom he addresses as exhorting their wives to the discharge of their duties with a blameless, grave, and pure conscientiousness, and in a spirit of conjugal affection, and also teaching them to superintend domestic matters with dignified decorum (σπουδῶς) (c. i, ed. Dressel, p. 48). In the same manner, Polycarp (Ad Philipp. c. 4) exhorts the Christian wives of Philippi to live in the faith, in love and purity, to duly honor their husbands, and to instruct their children in the fear of the Lord. Second marriages being systematically discouraged in the early Church, the advice given by the same writer to the widows seems directed against the faults to which women, when lonely and unemployed, are specially prone—"calumny, speaking against their neighbors, bearing false witness, and avarice" (ed. Dreesel, p. 381).

The advice of Tertullian (Ad Uzorem, bk. ii, c. 8), that a woman should not refuse to marry one slightly below herself in station, provided he is likely to prove in other respects a good husband, points probably to the existence of a certain social ambition among those to whom his treatise is addressed, which he considered unworthy of the Christian character. As contrasted with the cruelty which too often disgraced the privacy of pagan households, we find Chrysostom observing that it is a shame for a man to beat his female slave, much more his wife (In Epist. I, ad Corinth. Hom. 26; Migne, Patrol. Græc. lxi, 222).

The teaching of the most enlightened of the fathers was undoubtedly to the effect that there was no natural inferiority in the woman to the man. Theodoret (Græc. Affect. Curat. bk. v) insists emphatically on their exact equality, and says that God made woman from man in order that the tendencies and action of both might be harmonious. Sometimes, indeed, he observes, woman has been found superior to man in encountering adversity (Migne, lxxxiii, 836). Chrysostom (Hom. lxi, 8) says that no one is more fit to instruct and exhort her husband than a pious woman. This conception differed, however, materially from that of Plato (Repub. v, 455), in that while the Greek philosopher sought to obliterate the ordinary distinctions between the sexes, the Christian father held that nature assigned to woman her special and distinct province of activity. Chrysostom, in a passage of singular beauty, gives us a comparison between the duties of the wife and those of the husband, the former being represented as in some respects the more dignified; for while the husband is described as engaged in the rougher work of life, in the market or the law-courts, the wife is represented as remaining at home and devoting much of her time to prayer, to reading the Scriptures, καὶ τῇ ἁλλῇ φιλοσοφίᾳ. When her husband returns, harassed with his labors, it is her function to cheer and to soothe him, so that he again goes forth into the world purified from the evil influences to which he has there been exposed, and carrying with him the higher influences of his home-life (In Journ. Hom. 61; Migne, lix, 840).

The participation of young females in the exercises of the palestra and in races, commended by pagan theorists (Grote, Plato, iii, 217), is condemned by Clemens of Alexandria (Pæd. iii, 10) as altogether repugnant to the notions of female modesty (Migne, viii, 626). Chrysostom (In Matt. Hom. 1) contrasts the difference in relation to these points between Christian and pagan teaching, and even goes so far as to affirm that true virginity was a notion which paganism was unable to realize (Migne, lvii, 19).

At the same time we have satisfactory evidence that this exalted conception of the female character and female duties did not involve any renunciation of woman's humbler functions. Clemens says that it is right that women should employ themselves in spinning, weaving, and watching the bread-maker (τῇ πειρώσει), and that it is no disgrace for a wife to grind corn or to superintend the cookery with the view of pleasing her husband (Migne, viii, 626).

The excessive luxury of the 4th century would seem, however, to have been not less fatal to the maintenance of this high ideal than to other features of the Christian character. Amédée Thierry says that, by one of those contradictions which "déroutent la logique des idées," Christianity itself, essentially the religion of the poor, conspired to give to the manners of the Western empire a degree of effeminacy unknown in pagan times (Saint Jérôme, p. 2). Chrysostom declares that many of the ladies of Constantinople would not walk across even a single street to attend church, but required to be conveyed for the shortest distance (In Matt. Hom. 7; Migne, lvii, 79). When there they were to be seen with their necks, heads, arms, and fingers loaded with golden chains and rings, their persons breathing precious odors, and their dresses of gold stuff and silk (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv, c. 1). Others, again, affected masculine apparel, and seemed to blush for their womanhood, cutting short their hair, and presenting faces like those of eunuchs (Jerome, Epist. 18). According to the same authority, the greater facilities possessed by ecclesiastics for gaining admission to female society was an inducement with some to become priests (ibid.). Elsewhere Jerome strongly dissuades the clergy from accustoming themselves to private interviews with those of the other sex (Epist. 52; Migne, xxii, 260).

The exaggerated importance attached by Jerome to the unwedded life, as one of superior sanctity, seems to have led him to dwell somewhat harshly on the weaknesses and worldliness of many of the wealthy matrons of his day. He represents them as given to excessive personal adornment, and bestowing much of their time on preparations for feasts and other household matters. When, however, we find him enumerating such obvious duties as "dispensatio domus, necessitates mariti, liberorum educatio, correctio servulorum," as prejudicial to the higher interests of the soul, we perceive that his tone is that of one to whom the ascetic life alone appeared adequately Christian (De Perp. Virg. c. 20; Migne, xxiii, 228). On the other hand, it is evident that the state of Roman society at this time rendered it exceptionally difficult for Christian women to carry the principles of their religion into daily practice. Of this Marcella's retirement to her mansion in the suburbs, as described by the same father, is an indication. He depicts the very different future which her mother, Albina, had designed for her—a splendid marriage and the possession of great wealth, while the daughter rarely issued from her seclusion save to visit the churches of the apostles and martyrs, especially those least frequented by the multitude (Epist. 96). The mistresses of large establishments, according to Jerome, were often exposed to exceptional temptations; and he states that young widows would sometimes consent to marry even pagan husbands, in order to avoid being plundered by dishonest stewards, and to escape the anxieties inseparable from the management of a large household, thus bringing home to their children by a former marriage, "not a guardian, but an enemy; not a parent, but a tyrant" (Epist. 54; Migne, xxii, 291).

Among other indications of the confusion and demoralization characteristic of that and the following century must be included that laxity of Church discipline which permitted the performance of public religious rites to be sometimes intrusted to women. In the twenty-first canon of the collection ascribed to Gelasius this is spoken of as evidence of the "contempt" into which religion had fallen.

It is generally assumed, though on somewhat scanty and doubtful evidence, that at the period of the conversion of the Teutonic nations the regard for female chastity and the respect paid to the sex were greater among pagan communities than among the Latin races. But however this may have been, it is certain that the views inherited and handed down by the Western Church with regard to "the personal and propriety liberty of women" were greatly superior to those that find expression in any of the barbaric codes. Something of this feeling seems reflected in Jerome when (Epist. 130) he censures parents for their too common practice of leaving deformed or otherwise unmarriageable daughters inadequately provided for (Migne, xxii, 281).

"The Church," says sir Henry Maine, "conferred a great benefit on several generations by keeping alive the traditions of the Roman legislation respecting settled property," and he points out that Christianity was really carrying on the tradition of the Roman dos. The formula of the marriage service, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow," is one, he says, "which sometimes puzzles the English lawyer from its want of correspondence with anything which he finds among the oldest English law" (Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 387; see also De Broglie, L'Eglise et l'Empire, I, ii, 278, and Eclaircissement D).

WOMEN, CHURCHING OF (τὸ ἐκκλησιασθῆναι), is alluded to by pope Gregory, in 601, as the thanksgiving, and by the emperor Leo's Constitutions, in 460. The Salisbury use calls it the purification after childbirth at the church door, evidently in allusion to the purification of the Virgin Mary. In 1549 the "quire door" was substituted for the original place. A veil, or churching-cloth, of white material, was used in 1560 by the woman and a pew or seat was allotted to her from an earlier date.

Women's Galleries were upper rooms or apartments in ancient churches, set apart for the use of women and catechumens. They were called κατηχομένα and ὑπερῶα. The author of the Constitutions speaks of it as the custom of the Church in his time, where he gives directions about it that women should sit in a separate place from the men, and thus orders, Let the doorkeepers stand at the gate of the men, and the deaconesses at the gate of the women. Intimations of this custom are frequent in writers on early Church usages. The barrier between the two was usually made by rails, or wooden walls, as they are called by Chrysostom, who has these remarkable words concerning the origin of this custom: "Men ought to be separated from women by an inward wall, meaning that of the heart; but because they would not, our forefathers separated them by these wooden walls. For I have heard from our seniors that it was not so from the beginning. For in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female. Do we not read that men and women prayed together in their upper room?" (Homil. 74 in Matt.). In later times, however, as in the Roman and Greek usage, the separation was made by placing the women in galleries directly over the apartments of the men. See Bingham, Christ. Ant. bk. viii, ch. v, § 6, 7.

Womock, LAWRENCE, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Lopham, in Norfolk, in 1612. He graduated from Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1632; took deacon's orders, Sept. 21, 1634; is supposed to have succeeded his father in the living of Lopham upon the latter's decease, in 1642, but was ejected by the Norfolk commissioners, and perhaps imprisoned, for his adherence to the cause of Charles I; was made archdeacon of Suffolk and prebendary of Ely at the restoration in 1660; became rector of Horningsheath, in Suffolk; in 1662, and of Boxford, in the same county, in 1663; was made bishop of St. David's, Nov. 11, 1683, and died March 12, 1685. He published, Beuten Oile for the Lumps of the Sanctuaries; or, The Great Controversie concerning Set Prayers and our Liturgie Examined (1641);—The Examination of Tilenus before the Triers (1685);—Arcana Dogmatum Anti-Remonstrantium; or, The Calvinists' Cabinet Unlocked (1659);—The Result of False Principles (1661);—The Solemn League and Covenant Arraigned and Condemned (eod.);—Supfragium Protestantium (1683), and other works.

Wonder (usually κῆδος, τίρας, both generally used in the sense of prodigy) is some occurrence, or thing, which so strongly engages our attention by its surprising greatness, rarity, or other properties, that our minds are struck by it into astonishment. Wonder is also nearly synonymous with sign: "If a prophet give thee a sign, or a wonder," says Moses (Deut. xiii, 1), and "If the sign or wonder come to pass," etc. Isaiah says, he and "his children are for signs and wonders" (viii, 18), that is, they were for indications of, allusions to, prefigurations of, things future, that should certainly take place; and they were to excite notice, attention, and consideration in beholders; to cause wonder in them. Wonder also signifies the act of wondering, as resulting from the observation of something extraordinary, or beyond what we are accustomed to behold. See MIRACLES, WONDERS.

Wonderful is the rendering in the A. V. at Isa. ix, 6 of the Heb. נִפְלֵא, pîlê (Sept. θαυμαστός; Vulg. admirabilis), as an epithet of the Messiah, and designates his incomprehensible character as the God-man.

Wonders, in an ecclesiastical sense, are those remarkable occurrences, whether deceptive or otherwise, which partake of the nature of miracles, and have been regarded as such by those who witnessed them. Miracles were very common in the early Church, and were a powerful weapon in the hands of the clergy, both to convince unbelievers and to secure submission on the part of believers. It is proposed in the present treatment to consider them under the heads of the persons or objects by which they were wrought, and in subdivisions to consider their purpose and the manner of their being wrought.

1. Wonders Wrought by Living Saints.—These were performed either by direct means, such as invocation of the name of Christ, prayer, signing of the cross, or the imposition of hands, or by indirect means, such as sending to the sick the garments of saints or others, bread, oil, or water which had been blessed by saints. It is a noticeable fact that in the accounts of miracles which have reached us from the early fathers the writers lay no claim to the performance of the miracles they attest, and do not even mention the authors by name. Under this head we notice,

1. Miracles of Beneficence.—These consisted of

(1) Exorcism and Healing.—Justin Martyr tells us that Christians, in the name of Jesus, cast out demons from those whom pagan enchanters could not cure. Irenæus and Cyprian bear similar testimony to their power, while Tertullian declares, "Devils we not only despise, but both overcome and daily expose and expel from men, as is known to very many." Some of the earliest miracles of this class were wrought by Gregory, bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, in Pontus, in the 3d century, the record of which, however, belongs to the 4th century. Among those recorded may be mentioned the exorcism of a youth by the imposition of hands, and the healing of the plague-stricken of Neo-Cæsarea. Among the miracles of this class wrought by the earlier Eastern monks, those of Antony and Hilarion will serve as examples. As belonging to the former we note the case of a boy in a fishing-boat, whose state of possession was indicated by a foul stench in the boat, but whose spirit yielded to the exorcism of the monk; and also that of a girl from whom he cast out an evil spirit at Alexandria in his old age; while among his cures may be mentioned the case of a man afflicted either with epilepsy or madness, upon whom he employed no means to effect a cure at once, but sent him away into Egypt, declaring that there he would be cured. Hilarion wrought chiefly in Sicily and Palestine. Of his miracles in the former place we have the testimony of a Grecian Jew that "a prophet of the Christians had appeared in Sicily, and was doing so many miracles and signs that men thought him one of the old saints." Jerome, who was his biographer, records among his miracles the restoration of sight to a woman who had been blind for ten years, a cure of paralysis, another of dropsy, and exorcising the possessed, even a camel, which, in its fury, had killed many. In one case a man was dispossessed, and offered a sum of money to the saint for the cure which had been wrought, but was informed that his acceptance of the money would surely bring back the possession. In another instance he effected the cure of an uneducated Frank, who began at once to speak Syriac and Greek, although having no previous knowledge of those languages. In the West we find, in the 4th century, St. Ambrose curing a woman of palsy, laying his hands on her in prayer while she touched his garment, casting out evil spirits, and, on the other hand, causing a thief to be repossessed on account of his misdeeds; also St. Martin of Tours delivering a slave of a devil, and healing a leper at Paris; while, in the following century, Germanus of Auxerre, at Arles, cures a præfect's wife of a quartan ague, at Alexia bestows power of speech on a girl who had lost it twenty years, at Autun heals a girl of a withered hand, in England a boy of contracted limbs, and at Milan and Ravenna casts out evil spirits.

Thus far the examples have been confined to exorcisms and cures by direct means. Some examples of the same results wrought through indirect means will next be presented. The monk Pachomius had been applied to by a man, whose daughter had an evil spirit, to work a cure. The saint bade the man bring him one of his daughter's tunics, warning him at the same time that the blessing he should bestow upon it would be of no avail so long as his daughter continued to live a sinful life. Accordingly, the girl was not cured until she had confessed and forsaken her sin. In another instance the saint had directed that in order to obtain a cure the energumens should, before each meal, take a small piece of a loaf of bread which had been blessed. As, however, he refused to touch the bread, the device was adopted of concealing morsels of it inside dates, but with no better success. The dæmonic carefully extracted them. At last, having been left some days without food, he took the bread and was cured. By means of consecrated oil Hilarion healed the bites of serpents, and St. Martin of Tours cured a paralytic girl, when at the point of death, by putting into her mouth a few drops of this oil. Threads frayed from St. Martin's garments healed the sick when wound around the neck or fingers, and a letter written by the saint cured a girl of fever when laid upon her chest. Straw upon which Germanus of Auxerre had reposed for a single night cured a dæmonic when bound upon it, and a barley loaf, which the bishop had blessed and sent to the empress Placidia, possessed and retained for a long time wonder-working properties. St. Geneviève of Paris cast out devils by threads of her garments, and cured the sick by bits of her candle.

With regard to the comparative prevalence of miraculous gifts of healing, as exercised by living saints in different ages, we can form an opinion only from the records which have reached us. It would appear, however, that the power of working cures was in nowise diminished in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Dæmoniacal possessions, madness, leprosy, paralysis, blindness, deafness, lameness, and many other diseases and infirmities constantly called forth, and found relief through, the thaumaturgic powers with which monks and bishops were endowed, while accidents, such as those to which monks themselves were exposed in the performance of their agricultural labors, were naturally not excluded from the sphere of miraculous treatment. Nor was there any partiality in the distribution of these gifts over the various regions of Christendom, although the accident of the birthplace or dwelling of some of those who undertook to record certain miracles might lead us to a contrary opinion. If, for example, during the 6th century, thaumaturgy, as exercised in the matter of healing and exorcism, shone brightly in the persons of monks and bishops, it shone no less brightly in Palestine in the person of the abbot Theodosius, or in France in the instances of Melanius, bishop of Rennes, and St. Geneviève of Paris.

(2) Raising from the Dead.—Irenæus declares that "with much fasting and prayer the spirit of the dead returned;" and again, "before now, as we have said, even the dead have been raised up, and have remained with us many years." We mention a few alleged instances of this wonder occurring at different times. Julian, who suffered martyrdom at Antioch in the Diocletian persecution, raised a dead man to life, and St. James, bishop of Nisibis, in A.D. 325, a man who was brought to him as dead, with a view to obtaining money (presumably to defray the expenses of burial), and who really died while counterfeiting death. St. Martin of Tours restored to life a catechumen, who had died in his monastery unbaptized, by throwing himself upon the dead body and praying earnestly for its restoration, and on another occasion a slave, who had hanged himself. Hilary of Poitiers raised a child to life who had died unbaptized; Marcellus, abbot of a monastery of the Acemete, near Constantinople, in 446, a monk; and Gelasius, abbot of a monastery in Palestine, in 452, a child. Germanus of Auxerre, when at Ravenna, raised a man from the dead; St. Benedict of Nursia, a boy; St. Bavo of Ghent, in 653, a man; St. Walaricus, abbot of a monastery on the Somme, in 662, one who had been unjustly hanged; St. Wulfram, bishop of Sens, in 720, five Frisian youths who had been hanged as a sacrifice to the gods.

(3) Miracles of Deliverance, Protection, and Succor.—These afford a series of wonders which range all the way from the deliverance of cities from siege or assault, or of districts from inundation, to the multiplication of corn in a granary, or of wine or beer in a cask. They differ widely from one another in respect of their object and importance, and the sphere they affect, and often degenerate into little else than a display of miraculous power for its own sake, thus losing the character of a true miracle. The raising of the siege of Nisibis will serve as an example of the power ascribed to living saints in this direction. Sapor II was besieging the city. The inhabitants, in their alarm, appealed to their bishop, St. James. In answer to the supplications he offered, swarms of gnats attacked the besiegers, their horses and elephants, irritating them to such a pitch of frenzy that they broke loose. To increase his discomfort, the Persian king mistook the bishop, when he appeared on the walls in his purple and with his diadem on his head, for the Roman emperor, and thereupon raised the siege. According to Theophanes (Chronographia, p. 52, 53), the bishop's prayers had the further result of bringing famine and pestilence upon the besiegers when they returned to their own land. The deliverance of Paris from the Huns by St. Geneviève is a case of like import. The miracle wrought by Gregory Thaumaturgus on the banks of the river Lycus furnishes an instance of the exercise of this power in another direction. The bishop, having been appealed to by the inhabitants of a certain district to deliver them from the calamities to which they were from time to time exposed by the overflowing of this river, made a journey to the place, and, invoking the name of Christ, planted his staff at the particular spot where the stream was wont to burst through the mound which had been erected on its banks to prevent its encroachments. The staff became a tree; the water rose as usual, but henceforth never passed the tree. The miracle had its ethical result in the conversion of the inhabitants, who were at that time heathens. Similar miracles are ascribed to several others in different places.

As a rule, however, such interpositions of miraculous power were in behalf of small communities and frequently of individuals. As illustrations of this fact, we mention the cases in which St. Hilary cleanses the Insula Gallinaria of serpents; St. Martin of Tours, when, in his missionary zeal, he has set fire to a heathen temple, successfully repels the flames from an adjoining building; St. Maur walks on the water to save his friend Placidius; Germanus of Auxerre restores a stolen valise to its owner; St. Benedict of Nursia, and Leutfred, abbot of a monastery near Erreux, in

A.D. 788, cause iron to swim, and others of like import. In marked contrast with the miracles of Christ and his apostles, we find the monks, on their missionary journeys or at home, working miracles in behalf of their own special needs, such as causing water to flow in dry places by the simple expedient of planting a staff in the ground or of striking on the rock with a rod, multiplying wine or beer in the cask, and of quenching the flames when fire had chanced to break out in a monastery or convent.

2. Miracles of Power.—In the early Church these assumed the forms of speaking with tongues, prevision of events, and the seeing of visions. Under this head we shall consider,

(1) Miracles Wrought in Confirmation of Christianity.

—For example, Gregory Thaumaturgus on one occasion was forced, through storm and the approach of nightfall, to take refuge, together with his companions in travel, in a heathen temple which happened to be famous for its oracles. Having invoked the name of Christ and signed the cross, the bishop spent the night in praising God. In the morning the priest of the temple found upon his arrival that the dæmons had forsaken their shrine. Gregory informed him that he could bring them back as well as expel them. Challenged to do so, he wrote upon a piece of paper, "Gregory to Satan—enter," and handed it to the priest, who placed it upon the altar. Forthwith the dæmons gave evidence of their return. To satisfy the priest still further as to the truth of Christianity, Gregory accepted a challenge to move a large stone which lay near, by means of his word alone. He at once moved it, and thus convinced his opponent. Hilarion wrought a remarkable miracle of this class at Gaza. A Christian named Italicus, who bred horses for the chariot-races, applied to Hilarion to help him against a rival who made use of magic to check the speed of his horses, and thus secure the victory for his own steeds. The saint, although at first unwilling to lend his aid in so trivial a matter, acceded to the request, and sent Italicus the vessel he was wont to use in drinking, filled with water, wherewith horses, chariot, and charioteers were to be sprinkled. This done, the Christian's horses, flying like the wind, easily won the race. Whereupon the pagan party, whose god was Marnas, raised a loud shout, "Marnas is conquered by Jesus Christ."

(2) Miracles Wrought in Confirmation of Orthodoxy.

—St. Arnulph, having received a command from the king of the Visigoths, who wished to test the saint's powers, to rid the land of a serpent whose breath was of so fiery a nature as apparently to dry up water, was conducted to the serpent's lair, where he laid his stole upon the head of the monster, and, bidding him follow, led him to a pond, and forbade him ever to leave it, or thenceforth to injure any living creature. In the same pond lay the body of a man who had died a violent death. Upon the approach of the saint the dead man prayed to be delivered from his miserable resting-place. In answer to the prayer, St. Arnulph raised the body and buried it in a fitting place. These miracles are said to have made such an impression upon the king and his courtiers that they forsook their Arianism and accepted the Catholic faith.

(3) Miracles Wrought in Punishment of Evil-doers.—

When St. Willibrod, A.D. 739, was on a missionary journey, he, with his company, sought rest one day in a field. The owner of the land proceeded to drive him away, refusing to listen to his remonstrances, or to drink with him in token of amity. "Then drink not," exclaimed the saint, and the man lost the power of drinking, while suffering all the pangs of thirst, nor did he regain it till he had confessed his sin to the saint upon his return in the course of a year.

(4) Miracles Wrought in Illustration of the Gifts Bestowed upon Men for their Enterprise and Piety.—St. Benedict of Nursia miraculously detected an infraction of the monastic rules by some of his monks, and a theft on the part of a messenger, and enabled two monks to carry a heavy fragment of a rock. Numerous other examples of miracles performed by living saints might be cited, but the foregoing will suffice.

II. Wonders Wrought by Relics.—The relics of a saint perpetuated the benefits which the saint himself, during his lifetime, had conferred upon those who stood in need of healing or succor. They originated in the latter half of the 4th century, and may be divided into

1. Miracles of Beneficence, consisting of

(1) Exorcisms and Miraculous Cures, wrought

i. By the Bodies of Saints.—Many miracles were wrought by St. Stephen's relics. The town of Calama had possessed relics of St. Stephen for about eight years, and that of Hippo for less than two years, when St. Augustine declared that many books would have to be written in order to recount all the miracles of healing alone which had been wrought by means of these relics during this space of time in the two districts of Calama and Hippo, and that of those which had been wrought in the latter district alone nearly seventy accounts had already been written (De Civitate Dei, xxii, 8, § 20).

ii. By Objects brought into Contact with, or Proximity to, the Bodies of Saints, Living or Dead.—Such miracles, according to Gregory the Great, were likely to make a deeper impression on the popular mind than those wrought by the bodies of the saints themselves, for the reason that in the latter case they might be regarded as wrought in answer to prayer, by the saint himself, whose spirit was supposed to hover about its former tenement. These may be further classified:

(a) The Garments or Possessions of Saints.—The tunic of St. John the Evangelist, preserved in Rome, worked many miracles; the shoes of St. Gall, A.D. 646, healed a man to whom they were given after the saint's death of contraction of the limbs; while the keys of St. Peter wrought many cures at Rome.

(b) Cloths Laid upon the Bodies of Dead Saints.—Cloths were laid upon the face of Miletius of Antioch on the occasion of his funeral at Constantinople, in 881, and distributed among the people as prophylactics. Handkerchiefs and garments in use were cast upon relics, in order to invest them with remedial properties, and even threads which had been frayed from a handkerchief that had been used to cover the face of Nicetius, bishop of Lyons, on the day of his death, when laid upon an altar, cured an epileptic who prayed before it.

(c) The Candles or Lamps which Illuminated the Tomb of a Saint.

(d) The Dust which Gathered upon the Tomb, e. g. of St. Hilary of Poitiers, was the means of cleansing two lepers, of bestowing sight upon a blind person, and soundness of limb upon two persons with withered hands. Dust from the tomb of martyrs in Lyons, when gathered in a spirit of faith, cured the infirm.

(e) Water with which the Tomb was Washed.—Several persons at Tours were cured of dysentery by the water with which St. Martin's tomb was washed in preparation for Easter.

(f) The Fabric and Furniture of the Church which Held the Relics.—A boy suffering from the effects of a poisoned dart was cured upon kissing the threshold of St. Martin's basilica. Sidonius Apollinaris tells a friend that he lost the sense of his debility when prostrate upon the threshold of the Vatican basilica at Rome.

(2) Raising the Dead.—A presbyter at Calama, in Africa, laid out as dead, revived when a tunic which had been taken to a memoria containing relics of St. Stephen was placed on his body. A wagon-wheel went over a child and killed him, his mother took him to the same memoria, "and he not only came to life again, but even appeared unharmed" (Augustine, De Civitate Dei, xxii, 8, § 12).

(3) Deliverance, Protection, Succor.—This belief came into existence along with that in their curative properties, and has been quite as prevalent and deep-seated.

The Romans regarded the relics of St. Peter and St. Paul as safeguards to their city. When a band of rebellious monks, belonging to the monastery of St. Sabas, in Palestine, were on their way to attack the monastery, they were seized with blindness, and unable to reach their destination. This deliverance of the abbot and his party was attributed to the presence of the relics of St. Sabas. In the time of Gregory of Tours, the population of several districts of Gaul were visited with a plague of an infectious character, and among them the province of Prima Germania. The town of Rheims, however, escaped by virtue of the pall or covering of St. Remigius's tomb, which was carried in procession, accompanied by crosses and candles, round the town. The belief in the miraculous virtues of relics led to the practice of carrying them, as the Jews their ark, into battle. The Frankish princes required their army chaplains to carry them at the head of their forces; Chilperic had them carried before him when he entered Paris, and an Eastern king, according to a story repeated by Gregory of Tours, went so far as to insert the thumb of St. Surgius in his own right hand, and was able, by raising his arm, to conquer his enemies. Besides this public use of relics, many individuals were accustomed to carry them about their persons for their own protection, especially when travelling.

2. Miracles of Power, consisting of

(1) Those Wrought in Attestation of the Righteousness of the Innocent and the Guilt of the Wrong-doer.—Gregory of Tours relates that a priest who had taken refuge in the Church of St. Martin at Tours, and was there put into chains, was proved to be innocent by the fact that his chains fell off him, and could not be made to remain on him when replaced. On the other hand, a priest who had falsely asserted his innocence before the tomb of St. Maximin, in Treves, fell down dead.

(2) Those Wrought in Punishment of Such as Treated Relics with Contempt.—For example, when the relics of St. Babylas, bishop of Antioch, had been removed at the emperor Julian's command from Daphne, where their presence was supposed to render dumb the oracles of Apollo, the temple of that god caught fire, and no traces of it were left (A.D. 354).

III. Wonders Wrought by the Eucharist.—It is a noteworthy fact that the miracles alleged to have been effected by the eucharist were wrought by it not only as a sacrament, but as that of the Catholic faith, in contradistinction to the rite, and in condemnation of the doctrines, of a heretical creed.

1. Miracles of Beneficence.

(1) Exorcism and Healing.—A girl possessed of an evil spirit, upon receiving the eucharist from St. Austregalis of Bourges, in 624, at once ceased to shout and rave; and a singer in a church choir, having been exhausted and in a prostrate condition from a conflict with demons, revived upon receiving it from Sulpicius, bishop of the same see, in 644.

(2) Deliverance, Protection, Succor.—During the reign of Justinian it was customary to distribute among the young children of Christian parents such fragments of the eucharistic bread as remained after communion. By accident a Jewish child, mingling with his Christian companions, received and ate one of these fragments. The father of the boy, a glass-blower by trade, was so enraged that he shut his son into his furnace, in order not only to kill him, but to destroy all traces of him. The child, however, was saved, and the miracle resulted in the conversion of the mother, who was baptized, together with her child.

2. Miracles of Power, wrought

(1) In Condemnation of Immorality.—Gregory of Tours relates that as a deacon, a man of unholy life, was one day carrying the eucharist into a church, the bread flew out of his hands and placed itself on the altar.

(2) In Condemnation of Heresy.—Certain members of the Donatist sect, in token of their contempt for the Catholics, once ordered the eucharistic bread to be given to their dogs. Upon eating it the dogs went mad and bit their masters. A woman receiving some of the eucharistic bread of the Macedonians, to her alarm found that it had turned into stone.

Similar miracles were also wrought by holy baptism. For example, as related by Augustine, the cure of a surgeon afflicted with the gout, and of an actor having paralysis.

IV. Wonders Wrought by Pictures and Images.

1. Miracles of Beneficence.—A picture of the Virgin Mary at Sozopolis, in Pisidia, was wont to shed, at the point where the hand of the Virgin was represented, a sweet-smelling ointment. The fact has been asserted, it is claimed, by many witnesses. An image of our Lord on the cross, which stood near the great gate of the imperial palace at Constantinople, was supposed to possess miraculous virtues, and, in fact, was believed to have wrought a cure of hemorrhage similar to that mentioned in the gospels.

The victories which Heraclius won over the Persians were attributed to the fact of his carrying at the head of his legions images of our Lord and the Virgin Mary; and the repulse of a Saracen army before the walls of Nicaea, A.D. 718, to the possession by that city of images of the saints.

2. Miracles of Power.—A Jew stole a picture of our Lord from a church, and in token of his contempt and hatred for the person it represented transfixed it with a dart. Forthwith blood began to flow from the picture, and in such quantity that the Jew was covered from head to foot. Thereupon he resolved to burn it, but the blood it had shed enabled its rightful owners to trace and bring condign punishment upon the thief.

Images of the cross, as representatives of the true cross, on the same theory, came to be regarded as possessing the same miraculous powers.

V. Wonders Wrought by Celestial Visitants.—Whatever miracles were attributed to living saints were also attributed to those beings supposed to possess the holy qualities, the angelic visitants. For example, St. Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, in 687, was cured of weakness in his knee by an angel who appeared to him on horseback; and a nun in a convent at Pauvilly, in Normandy, of an ulcer in her throat, after the hand of some invisible personage had been placed in support of her head, and a vision had been subsequently accorded to her of one clothed in the white robes of a virgin.

VI. Wonders Wrought Apart from Human or Angelic Agency.—Of this class of wonders, those which are best attested are least marvellous, while those which are most miraculous rest on manifestly insufficient testimony. Many of them might be looked upon as special providences, others as extraordinary coincidences; but at the time of their recurrence they were all looked upon as interpositions of Providence, intended to supply the needs or confound the enemies of the faithful. Of these we note

1. Miraculous Occurrences.

(1) Miracles of Beneficence.—A body of Catholics living in Typasa, in Mauritania, A.D. 484, for the crime of holding assemblies and refusing to communicate with a heretical bishop, had their right hands amputated, and their tongues cut out by the roots, by order of Hunneric, the Arian king of the Vandals. But on the third day after this occurrence they were able to speak as before. At least three of the narrators of this miracle—Æneas of Gaza, a rhetorician and philosopher, the emperor Justinian, and count Marcellinus, his former chancellor—were witnesses of the mutilation inflicted, and of the capacity of some of these martyrs to articulate who were living in their time. Marcellinus adds that one of the confessors having been born dumb, spoke for the first time after the excision of his tongue. Procopius states that two out of their number lost their supernatural power of speech through having lapsed into evil living. No contemporary authority gives the number of the confessors, but in an old menology it was stated as sixty.

When the emperor Marcus Aurelius was waging war against the Quadri, his troops suffered greatly on one occasion from thirst, owing to the intense heat. Among his soldiers were many Christians. Those who belonged to the Melitene legion fell on their knees in prayer; a shower of rain fell, refreshing and invigorating the Roman army, but terrifying and dispersing the enemy, to whom it had been a storm of thunder and lightning. The account is sometimes given without any mention of the prayers of the Christians, and again the miracle is attributed to the prayers of the emperor.

Individuals are mentioned as having been miraculously protected. We may mention Theotimus, bishop of Tomi, A.D. 400, who became invisible to his pursuers; St. Martin of Tours, the arm of whose assailant fell powerless; Armogastus, a young Catholic in Theodoric's service, whose limbs were freed from their bonds on his signing the cross and invoking Christ.

(2) Miracles of Power.—As an example of a primitive miracle, which rests upon ample testimony, we note the fiery eruption on the rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem. The emperor Julian had given orders for the rebuilding of the Temple, having intrusted the superintendence of the work to his lieutenant, and himself issued invitations to the Jews of all countries to assemble at Jerusalem and aid him in accomplishing his purpose. Of the marvellous manner in which the work was interrupted and the emperor's designs thwarted, we learn the particulars from several writers. A whirlwind arose, scattering heaps of lime and sand in every direction; a storm of thunder and lightning fell, melting in its violence the implements of the workmen; an earthquake followed, casting up the foundation of the old Temple, filling in the new excavations, and causing the fall of buildings, especially the public porticoes, beneath which the terrified multitude had sought shelter. When the workmen resumed their labors balls of fire burst out beneath their feet, not once only, but as often as they attempted to continue the undertaking. The fiery mass traversed the streets, repelling from the doors of a church, even with the loss of life or limb, those who had fled to it for safety. This miracle has the support of contemporary writers, Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. v, 4), and Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. xiii, 1), and of later historians, Rufinus (Hist. i, 87), Socrates (iii, 20), Sozomen (v, 22), Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. iii, 20). See also Warburton, Julian; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxiii; Newman, On Miracles, clxxv; Migne, Dict. des Mir. ii, 1115.

2. Miraculous Appearances.—Gibbon (c. xv) declares that "it is impossible to overlook the clear traces of visions and inspirations which may be found in the early fathers." The purport of visions was sometimes to allay the fears, to solve the doubts, to direct the steps of those who were in trouble or difficulty, sometimes to forewarn of approaching calamities. They were not restricted in their coming to any particular sort of persons, but appeared to all. We may classify them into

(1) Appearances of Beings.

(a) Angels.—The appearances of the archangel Michael were numerous, both in the East and the West. An angel appeared to St. Theuderius, directing him where to erect his monastery, two angels to Furseeus, A.D. 650, admonishing him, as abbot of a monastery, that monks should pay less attention to the mortification of the body, and more to the cultivation of an humble, contented, and charitable disposition.

(b) Demons.—The evil one appeared to St. Anthony in the guise of a woman, then of a black child; as a monk with leaves in his hands, when the saint was fasting; as a spirit calling himself the power of God, and, lastly, avowing himself to be Satan.

(c) Departed Spirits.—St. Stephen appeared, A.D. 420, to Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius II, informing her of the safe arrival of his relics (right hand) from Jerusalem. St. Ambrose, on the night, being Easter eve, on which he was laid out for burial, appeared to the newly baptized infants, varying the manner of his appearance, but to the parents of the children remaining invisible, even when pointed out. Again, on the day of his death, he appeared to saints in the East, praying with them and laying his hands on them, while in Florence he was frequently seen after his death, praying before the altar of the church he had built in that city.

(d) Living Saints.—A child who had fallen into a well was found sitting upon the surface of the water. His account was that St. Julian Sabas, who at the time was entertained by the mother of the child, had appeared to him and borne him up. A similar story is given in the life of Theodosius of Palestine.

(2) Visions of Purgatory, Hell, and Heaven.—A vision the martyr Perpetua had of her brother, in whose behalf she had been led to pray, first as suffering and in a place of darkness, and then as comforted and surrounded with light, has been supposed to refer to a state of purgatory. As indicative of the punishment of the wicked, an abbot in Auvergne had a vision of a stream of fire, and of men immersed in it, bitterly bemoaning their sufferings. These had lost their footing when crossing a narrow bridge which spanned the stream, and were men who had been careless in the discharge of their spiritual duties. After this vision the abbot became stricter in the regulation of his monastery. Visions of heaven were accorded among others to St. Furseeus and to Salvius, bishop of the Albigenses, as a place paved with gold and silver, and illuminated by a cloud shining beyond the light of sun or moon.

(3) Appearances of Crosses.

(a) In the Air.—Constantine, when marching against Maxentius, A.D. 311, and in doubt to what deity he should apply for succor against an enemy whose forces outnumbered his own, saw, in company with his whole army, a luminous cross in the sky above the mid-day sun, with this inscription, "In this conquer." The same night our Lord appeared to Constantine in a vision, showed him a cross, and bade him fashion a standard after the pattern of it as a means of victory in his contest against Maxentius. This is the account given by Eusebius in his Life of Constantine (i, 28-32), but not till twenty-six years after the occurrence, and which he professes to have heard from the emperor himself, who affirmed his statement with an oath. Socrates, Philostorgius, Geladius, and Nicephorus speak of the phenomenon as seen in the sky; Sozomen and Rufinus in a dream, although on the authority of Eusebius they also mention the apparition in the sky. On the feast of Pentecost, May 7, 351, a cross appeared in the sky at Jerusalem, stretching from Mount Calvary to Mount Olivet, and shining with a brilliancy equal to that of the sun's rays. The apparition lasted for several hours; the whole city beheld it, and all, residents and visitors, Christians and unbelievers, alike joined in the acknowledgment that "the faith of the Christians did not rest upon the persuasive discourses of human wisdom, but upon the sensible proofs of divine intervention." Of this phenomenon Cyril, then patriarch of Jerusalem, wrote an account to the emperor Constantius, who at the time was fighting against Maxentius in Pannonia, where also, according to Philostorgius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 26), it was seen by the contending armies, to the confusion of the pagan and the encouragement of the Christian host. Several other appearances of like character are mentioned.

(b) On the Garments of Men.—We read that when the emperor Julian was entering Illyricum the vines appeared laden with unripe grapes, although the vintage had taken place, and that dew falling from them on the garments of the emperor and his companions left upon them the imprint of crosses; a phenomenon which by some was supposed to portend that the emperor should perish prematurely, like unripe grapes.

The appearance of the luminous cross in the sky, on the occasion of Julian's attempt to rebuild the Temple, was accompanied by the appearance on the bodies and garments of men of crosses which were luminous at night, in some instances of a dark color, and would not wash out.

(c) On Animals.—When the emperor Julian was inspecting the entrails of an animal he was offering in sacrifice, he beheld in them the figure of a cross encircled by a crown. St. Placidus, when hunting a stag, beheld amid its horns a luminous cross and the figure of the Crucified, and heard a voice saying, "Why persecutest thou me, Placidus? Behold, I am here on account of thee. I am Christ whom thou, ignorant of, dost worship." St. Minulphus also saw a cross amid a stag's horns.

Besides the foregoing there are many other marvels mentioned in ancient writings, but illustrations of the leading classes have been given. For the credibility of such accounts see MIRACLES, ECCLESIASTICAL.

Wood, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the Isles, where he continued until 1680, when he was translated to the bishopric of Caithness. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 218, 310.

Wood, Jeremiah, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greenfield, N. Y., Nov. 11, 1801. He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1824; spent over two years in Princeton Theological Seminary; began his labors at Mayfield, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1826; was ordained as an evangelist, Jan. 10, 1828, and continued his work as stated supply at Mayfield until 1840. He was installed pastor at that place in September, 1841, and continued to labor there until his death, June 6, 1876. Dr. Wood was a man of clear intellect, and of unusual power in the pulpit and in debate; a wise counsellor, deeply pious, consistent in life, and successful as a pastor. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 20.

Wood, N. N., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Fairfax, Va., May 1, 1808. He graduated from Middlebury College, in 1835; for one year was principal of the Black River Academy; studied theology for a part of the regular course at Madison University; was ordained pastor of the Church at Lebanon Springs, N. Y., in 1838; in 1842 went to Vicksburg, Miss.; resigned his pastorate in 1845, and went to Market Street Church, Zanesville, O., where he remained until 1850, when he was called to the presidency of Shurtleff College, Upper Alton, Ill., holding this office until 1855. For one year after his resignation he was pastor at Palmyra, Mo.; then became a chaplain in the Union army. Near the close of the war he removed to Jacksonville, Ill., where, for several years, he was professor of mental and moral philosophy and logic in the Young Ladies' Athenaeum. He died there, Jan. 21, 1874. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1874, p. 16. (J. C. S.)

Woodbridge, George, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal divine, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated at West Point, served a short period in the United States army at Old Point, and afterwards at Fort Independence, near Boston; resigned, and went to Maryland, where he edited a political newspaper. He subsequently went to the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va., graduating in 1833, was ordained by bishop Moore, and soon after was called to the Monumental Church, Richmond, where he remained until his death, Feb. 14, 1878, at the age of seventy-four years.

Wood-carrying, THE FEAST OF, one of the annual festivals instituted after the Babylonian captivity, although not mentioned in the Bible. See FESTIVAL.

I. Name of the Festival and its Significance.—The name קָרְבֵּן עֵצִים or קָרְבֵּן חֲצִירִים, which literally denotes the wood-offering, ξυλοφορία, Xylophoria, or its fuller phrase, קָרְבֵּן עֵצִים שֶׁל קָרְבָּן, the feast of wood-offering, ἡ τῶν ξυλοφορίων ἑορτή (Josephus, War, ii, 17, 6), by which this festival is designated, is derived from Neh. x, 85; xiii, 31. It obtained its name from the fact that on the day in which it was celebrated all the people, without any distinction of tribe or grade, brought wood to the temple, being the last day in the year whereon wood could be felled for the burning of the sacrifices and the perpetual fire on the altar. It is also denominated זֶסֶן אֶת־לִבְיָאָה, the time of wood for the priests (Megillath Taanith, v), because on this festival the priests too, like the rest of the people, offered wood.

II. The Day, and Manner of its Celebration.—The day on which this festival was annually celebrated was the 15th of Ab (22=August). This is distinctly attested by the unanimous voice of the most ancient and most trustworthy records (comp. Mishna, Taanith, iv, 8; Babylon Gemara, ibid. 80 a; Baba Bathra, 121 a; Megillath Taanith, v; Midrash Rabba, on Lamentations, lvii). The remark in Josephus, that this festival was celebrated on the 14th (τῇ δὲ ἑξῆς τῶν ξυλοφορίων ἑορτῆς οὐσης—ἡ δὲ πᾶσιν ἑσθὲς ἕλην τῷ βωμῷ προσφέρειν, War, ii, 17, 6; and τῇ δὲ ἑξῆς, πεντεκαδεκάτῃ δὲ ἡν Ἀῶν μῆνός, κ. τ. λ., ibid. ii, 17, 7), must therefore be regarded as the error of a copyist (comp. Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i, 144; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, 2d ed. iii, 478). The nine days in the year appointed for the delivery of wood by the respective families were as follows: On the 20th of Ab, when the descendants of Pachat Moab b. Jehudah furnished the wood; the 20th of Elul, the family of Adeen b. Jehudah; the 1st of Tebet, the family of Parosh; the 1st of Nisam, the family of Arah b. Jehudah; the 20th of Tamuz, the family of David b. Jehudah; the 5th of Ab, the family of Parosh b. Jehudah; the 7th of Ab, the family of Jondab b. Rechab; the 10th of Ab, the family of Senas b. Benjamin; and on the 15th of Ab, the family of Salu b. Jehudah, with the priests, Levites, and all those who did not know from what they descended, as well as the families of Gonbei Ali and Kozai Keziath (Mishna, Taanith, iv, 3). So general was the delivery of wood on this day (i. e. the 15th of Ab) that even proselytes, slaves, Nethinim, and bastards brought fuel (Megillath Taanith, v). Hence the remark of Josephus, that on this day all the people brought wood, from which circumstance it derived its name (War, ii, 17, 6).

On this day, when all the people were thus congregated together, discarding all distinction of tribe, of rich and poor, of Israelite and proselyte, of master and slave, the maidens of Jerusalem met together for singing joyful and religious songs, and for dancing. Dressed in white garments, which they borrowed in order not to shame those who had none of their own, these damsels assembled together in an open place in the vineyards. They sang strophic songs in the sacred language, and danced in the presence of the congregation. It was on this occasion that the happy choice of partners in life frequently took place, since it was one of the two annual opportunities afforded to the young people of making their attractions known without violating feminine modesty (Mishna, Megilla, iv, 8). Cessation from manual labor on this day was, however, not enjoined; but fasting, penitential prayers, and mourning for the dead were forbidden (Megillath Taanith, v; Maimonides, Yad ha-Chesaka Hilchoth Kelei ham-Mikdash, vi).

III. Origin and Date of this Festival.—The origin of this festival is involved in great obscurity, as the ancient Talmudic authorities which describe its celebration differ materially in their opinions about the occasion which gave rise to its institution. From Neh. x, 35; xiii, 31, we learn that this statesman, in order to supply the necessary fuel for the burning of the sacrifices and the keeping up of the perpetual fire on the altar, ordained that each family in rotation was to furnish wood for the temple at a certain period of the year, and that the order and time of delivery were to be settled by casting lots. The result obtained by the casting of lots is not mentioned in the canonical Scriptures; but the post-canonical documents, which describe the temple service, furnish us with a minute account of both the names of the respective families upon whom it devolved to supply the wood, and the periods of the year in which they delivered it. This account is given in the preceding section of this article. It is, therefore, only natural to conclude that the different families who are thus recorded to have offered the wood at appointed times did so in accordance with the results obtained by the casting of lots. Now, the reason why the 15th of Ab was kept as a special festival, and why all the nation at large took part in the offering of wood on this day, is, according to some authorities in the Talmud, that on it the people ceased to fell wood for the temple, because, according to R. Eliezer the Great, the heat of the sun begins to diminish on this day, and the wood which was cut after this date did not become sufficiently dry. Hence the 15th of Ab was designated "the day on which the axe is broken." As it was also believed that the wood cut down after the 15th of Ab is aspires (Rosh hash-Shana, 2a, 14a), Herzfeld (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i, 145) ingeniously conjectures that the trees were regarded as dead after this date, and the wood of such trees was considered as unfit for the altar. The other ancient opinion about the origin of this festival is, that the furnishing of wood for the temple by the pious, which existed from time immemorial, and which Nehemiah reinstituted after the return from Babylon, was prohibited by some wicked sovereign, and that this interdiction was abolished on the 15th of Ab. Hence this day was constituted a festival, and the families who jeopardized their lives in stealthily supplying wood for the temple during the time of the prohibition are those named above, who, as a privilege, continued to bring some wood on this festival, whether the fuel was wanted or not. There is, however, a difference of opinion as to who this wicked monarch was. The Jerusalem Talmud will have it that it was Jeroboam who placed guards on the roads leading to the temple in order to prevent the people from taking to the sanctuary the first-fruits and the wood, and the families of Gonbei Ali and Kozai Keziath, mentioned in the Mishna, were those who encountered the danger in clandestinely supplying the wood (Jerusalem Talmud, iv, 6). The Megillath Taanith (cap. v) again has it that this interdiction proceeded from "the kings of Greece," who imitated the conduct of Jeroboam; while the Babylonian Talmud omits the dynasty altogether, and simply remarks that the prohibition emanated from some government (Taanith, 28a). As the reference to Jeroboam on the part of the Jerusalem Talmud is simply to make this monarch the author of all the wicked deeds in connection with the Jews, and as, moreover, the ascription of this deed in the Megillath Taanith to Greek rulers is unhistorical—since Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom alone it could refer, totally abolished the temple service, which rendered it useless to smuggle the first-fruits and wood—Grätz concludes that this prohibition could only proceed from Alexander Jannæus, who forbade the offering of wood out of hatred to the Pharisees, and that then the above-named pious families clandestinely furnished the fuel. When this interdiction ceased with the reign of Alexander, and the ancient custom of wood-offering was resumed, the concluding day for the delivery of it (comp. Taanith, 81a) obtained a higher significance, and was elevated into a national festival (Grätz, iii, 477). It will be seen from the account of the nature of this festival that the custom for all the people to bring large supplies of firewood for the sacrifices of the year could not possibly have been designed to relieve the Nethinim, and that these Nethinim did not bear a conspicuous part in it, as is supposed by many.

Wooden Churches. In Walcott's Sacred Archaeology (p. 614, 615), the principal facts concerning the wooden churches of the Middle Ages and a little later are given in brief.

"Neither Peavor, built in the time of Henry II; a chapel at Bury St. Edmund's until 1303; St. Aldhelm's, Durham, 998; St. Stephen's, Mayence, 1011; a stud Lady-chapel at Tykford, and another at Spalding, in 1050, were all built of wood, as many of the Norwegian churches (like Little Greenstead, 1018; Newtown, Montgomeryshire; and Newland, Worcester-shire) are to this day. The latter may have been a grange altered to form a church. Ribblesford has wooden nave-arcades. The excellence of English carpentry is conspicuous in the woodwork preserved to us in roofs, as at Peterborough, Ely, Old Shoreham, Polebrooke, Warmington, and St. Mary's Hospital and the palace kitchen, Chichester; the Gueston-hall, now in a church, at Worcester; and St. Mary's, Reading; doors, as at Beaulieu and Luton; cloisters, like the dean's at Windsor, of the 14th century; lychnæ, as at Beckenham; windows, like those of Englefield; stalls, as at Lancaster, and some of early English date at Salisbury; screens, as at St. John's Hospital, Winchester, Roydon, Ewerby, the palace chapel, Chichester, Lavenham, and St. Margaret's, Lynn; or early stall desks, like one preserved at Rochester, of the 12th century. The curious 'fish-scale' ornament of Norman spires is an imitation of the onken shingle so common in Kent and Sussex, a clear proof that there were earlier spires of wood. Probably the Gothic stone spire was derived from Normandy, where the earliest—the pyramid of Thann—forms a succession of steps, of the end of the 12th century, and was the prototype of Comornes, Basle, and Rouen. But England never produced such a grand example of ornamental carpentry and lead as the flèche of Amiens."

American churches and chapels from the first have been largely of wood; but the present tendency is towards structures built of more substantial material.

Woodford, JAMES RUSSELL, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Henley-on-Thames, April 30, 1820. He graduated from Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1842; was ordained deacon in 1843, and presbyter in 1845, became incumbent at St. Mark's, Easton, near Bristol, in 1847; vicar at Kempford, Gloucestershire, in 1855; of Leeds in 1868; bishop of Ely in 1873; and died Oct. 24, 1885. He published several volumes of sermons, lectures, etc.

Woodhead, ABRAHAM, an English clergyman, and subsequently a Roman Catholic controversial writer, was born at Meltham, Yorkshire, in 1608. He was educated in University College, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1633, and soon after entered into holy orders. In 1641 he was proctor at Oxford, and about this time travelled on the Continent as tutor to some young gentlemen of distinction. While at Rome he became a secret convert to the Catholic religion. In 1648 he was deprived of his fellowship for absence, but was reinstated at the Restoration in 1660. Finding it impossible to conform, however, he obtained leave to travel with an allowance of £20, on which he lived in concealment, teaching Roman Catholic pupils and writing controversial books, at Hoxton, near London, until his death, May 4, 1678. He was considered one of the ablest controversial writers, on the popish side, of his time, and his abilities and candor have been commended by some Protestant writers. Among his publications we note, Brief Account of Ancient Church Government (1662):—Guide in Controversies, in IV Discourses (1666):—Dr. Stillingfleet's Principles (1671):—Life of St. Terzu, from the Spanish (eod.):—Paraphrase of the Apocalypse (1682):—Two Discourses Concerning the Adoration of our Blessed Saviour in the Eucharist (1687):—Of Faith Necessary to Salvation, etc. (1688):—A Compendious Discourse on the Eucharist, etc. (eod.):—Motives to Holy Living (eod.):—Catholic Thees (1689):—and Concerning Images and Idolatry (eod.).

Woodland (עֲרֵב, "forests"). The groves of Palestine, inhabited by wild and even rapacious animals (2 Kings ii, 24, Jer. v, 6, xii, 8, Amos iii, 4, etc.), were, especially before the cultivation of the soil by the Israelites, not inconsiderable, but not adequate to supply timber, much less fuel. See WOOD. In the Mosaic law there is reference to forests and their employment (Deut. xix, 5), and conflagrations in them are occasionally noticed (Psa. lxxxiii, 15; Isa. ix, 17, comp. Jer. xxi, 14, James iii, 5). Several tracts of woodland are enumerated in the Bible (Rehland, Palast, p. 878 sq., Harnesveld, i, 436 sq.). See FOREST.

Woodruff, GEORGE W., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New York city, April 21, 1824. He was educated in the public schools of that city and at Oberlin, O.; joined the New York Conference in 1845, was ordained deacon in 1847, and elder in 1849. His successive appointments were: Greenport, Riverhead, Flatbush, L.I.; New Britain, West Winsted, Conn.; York Street, Brooklyn, N.Y.; Danbury, Conn.; St. John Street, New Haven; Middletown; Waterbury; Hanson Place, Brooklyn; Seventh Street, Alanson Church, New York city; First Church, New Haven; New Rochelle, N.Y.; in 1874 supernumerary; St. Paul's, Fall River, Mass.; Allen Street, New York city; Nostrand Avenue, Brooklyn; in 1881 supernumerary. He was secretary of the New York East Conference fourteen consecutive years, and was delegate to the General Conference four times, of which body he was three times secretary. He died March 20, 1882. He was an able and effective preacher, a good pastor, and a zealous counsellor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 77.

Woodworth, FRANCIS C., a Presbyterian minister and author, was born at Colchester, Conn., Feb. 12, 1813. He served eight years as a printer; was educated at Oneida Institute, N.Y., graduated at Union Theological Seminary in 1840, was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York, April 26 of that year, and ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church, Fairhaven, Vt., on the 28th of October. Here he labored three years, and then resigned, on the failure of his health, and devoted himself to juvenile literature, in which department he acquired a wide reputation. He died June 5, 1859, on board a steamer, at the wharf in New York, just arrived from Florida. He published, Uncle Frank's Home Stories (6 vols. 16mo):—Uncle Frank's Boys' and Girls' Library (6 vols. 16mo):—Uncle Frank's Picture Gallery (2 vols. 16mo):—Theodore Thinker's Stories for Little Folks (12 vols. 18mo). He also published in England, England as It Is (18mo):—Scotland as It Is (18mo):—The World as It Is (2 vols. 18mo):—Youth's Book of Gems (8vo):—Young American's Life of Fremont (1856, 18mo):—Uncle Frank's Pleasant Pages for the Fireside (1857, 12mo):—A Wheat-sheaf from Our Own Fields (16mo; republished as Buds and Blossoms from Our Own Garden, 16mo):—String of Pearls for Boys and Girls (16mo):—American Miscellany of Entertaining Knowledge (6 vols. 12mo), which is warmly commended:—Youth's Cabinet, and Uncle Frank's Dollar Magazine, of which he edited about fifteen volumes, and which made his name a familiar sound in many households. WooG, CARL CHRISTOPH, a German linguist, was born in 1713 at Dresden, and died as professor of Greek and Latin at Leipzig, April 24, 1771. He is the author of, Presbyterior. et Diaconor. Achaia de Martyrio S. Andrea Epistola Encyclicus (Leipzig, 1749):—*Progr. de Genus Antiquitatum Sacrar. in Primæva Ecclesia Obvior. Wool (Gr. ἐπίον, Heb. ix, 19; Rev. i, 4). The fleece of the sheep, as such, was properly called וּל or וּלָא, while the material of which it was composed was called וּלָא; hence וּלָא וּלָא, a fleece of wool (Judg. vi, 37). Wool was used by the Hebrews from an early period extensively for clothing (Lev. xiii, 47; Deut. xxii, 11; Job xxxi, 20; Prov. xxxi, 18; Ezek. xxxiv, 3; Hos. ii, 5).—Kitto, s. v. The importance of wool is incidentally shown by the notice that Mesha's tribute was paid in a certain number of rams "with the wool" (2 Kings iii, 4), as well as by its being specified among the first-fruits to be offered to the priests (Deut. xviii, 4). The wool of Damascus was highly prized in the mart of Tyre (Ezra xxvii, 18), and is compared in the Sept. to the wool of Miletus (ἐπὶ αἰ. Μιλήτου), the fame of which was widely spread in the ancient world (Pliny viii, 73; Virgil, Georg. iii, 306; iv, 334). Wool is occasionally cited as an image of purity and brilliancy (Isa. i, 18; Dan. vii, 9; Rev. i, 14), and the flakes of snow are appropriately likened to it (Psa. cxlvii, 16). The art of dyeing it was understood by the Jews (Mishna, Shab. i, § 6). See SHEEP, WOOLLEN.

Woollen and Linen (i. e. linary-woolery). Among the Mosaic laws against unnatural mixtures is found one to this effect, "A garment of mixtures (שְׂמֹרֶט, shaatnez) shall not come upon thee" (Lev. xix, 19); or, as it is expressed in Deut. xxii, 11, "thou shalt not wear shaatnez, wool and flax together." Our version, by the help of the latter passage, has rendered the strange word shaatnez in the former, "of linen and woollen;" while in Deuteronomy it is translated "a garment of divers sorts." In the Vulgate the difficulty is avoided; and κίβδηλος, "spurious" or "counterfeit," the rendering of the Sept., is wanting in precision. In the Targum of Onkelos the same word remains, with a slight modification to adapt it to the Chalkie; but in the Peshito-Syriac of Leviticus it is rendered by an adjective, "motley," and in Deuteronomy a "motley garment," corresponding in some degree to the Samaritan version, which has "spotted like a leopard." Two things only appear to be certain about shaatnez—that it is a foreign word, and that its origin has not at present been traced. Its signification is sufficiently defined in Deut. xxii, 11. The derivation given in the Mishna (Kilaim, ix, 8), which makes it a compound of three words, signifying "carded, spun, and twisted," is in keeping with rabbinical etymologies generally. Other etymologies are proposed by Bochart (Hieroz. pt. 1, b. 2, c. 45), Simonis (Lex. Heb.), and Pfeiffer (Deb. Vez. cent. 2, loc. xi). The last-mentioned writer defended the Egyptian origin of the word, but his knowledge of Coptic, according to Jablonski, extended not much beyond the letters, and little value, therefore, is to be attached to the solution which he proposed for the difficulty. Jablonski himself favors the suggestion of Forster, that a garment of linen and woollen was called by the Egyptians shontnes, and that this word was borrowed by the Hebrews, and written by them in the form shaatnez (Opusc. i, 294). See LINEN.

The reason given by Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 11) for the law which prohibited the wearing a garment woven of linen and woollen is, that such were worn by the priests alone (see Mishna, Kilaim, ix, 1). Of this kind were the girdle (of which Josephus says the warp was entirely linen, Ant. iii, 7, 2), ephod, and breastplate (Braunius, De Vest. Sac. Hebr. p. 110, 111) of the high-priest, and the girdle of the common priests (Maimonides, Cele ham-Mikdash, cviii). Spencer conjectured that the use of woollen and linen inwoven in the same garment prevailed among the ancient Zabii, and was associated with their idolatrous ceremonies (De Leg. Heb. ii, 83, 3); but that it was permitted to the Hebrew priests, because with them it could give rise to no suspicion of idolatry. Maimonides found in the books of the Zabii that "the priests of the idolaters clothed themselves with robes of linen and woollen mixed together" (Townley, Reasons of the Laws of Moses, p. 207). By "wool" the Talmudists understood the wool of sheep (Mishna, Kilaim, ix, 1). It is evident from Zeph. i, 8, that the adoption of a particular dress was an indication of idolatrous tendencies, and there may be therefore some truth in the explanation of Maimonides. See DIVINE.

Woolston, THOMAS, an English divine, who was noted in his day for the boldness of his opinions, was born at Northampton in 1669. He received the proper training in the grammar-school, and entered Sidney College, Cambridge, in 1685, where he subsequently graduated, and became fellow of his college. He was prosecuted before lord chief-justice Raymond for the views advanced in his Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £100. He purchased the liberty of the rules of the King's Bench, where he continued after the expiration of the year, being unable to pay the fine. Efforts were made for his release, but were unsuccessful, because he refused to desist from offensive writings. He died in the bounds of King's Bench prison, Jan. 27, 1732. Among his principal writings are the following: The Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion against the Jews and Gentiles Revived (1705); — Dissertatio de Pontii Pilati ad Tiberium Epistola (1720); — A Free Gift to the Clergy, in Four Parts (1722-24); — Moderator Between an Infidel and an Apostate (1725); — Six Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour (1727-29); — Defence of the Six Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour (1729-30).

Worcester, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Wigornienae). Worcester is a city of England, capital of the county of the same name, situated on the left bank of the Severn, twenty-five miles south-west of Birmingham. Under the name Cuer Guorington, it was one of the principal cities of the ancient Britons. Two ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

I. Was held about 601, by St. Austin, in which he endeavored, ineffectually, to persuade the bishops of the British Church to observe the festival of Easter, to administer baptism according to the custom of the Latin Church, and to yield obedience to the Church of Rome. See Mansi, Concil. v, 1610; Wilkins, Concil. i, 24.

II. Was held July 26, 1240, by the bishop Walter of Chanteloup. Fifty-nine constitutions were published, which, among other things, enjoin to baptize conditionally in doubtful cases, but always with trine immersion. Forbids to celebrate mass before having said prime, to plight troth except when fasting, and to observe any particular day or month for marriage. It is also ordered that any person desiring to confess to any other than his own priest, shall first modestly ask permission of the latter. See Mansi, Concil. xi, 572; Wilkins, Concil. i, 665.

Word is in Hebrew (דבר) often put for thing or matter; as Exod. ii, 14, "Surely this thing [Heb. word] is known;" "To-morrow the Lord shall do this thing [Heb. word] in the land" (ix, 5); "I will do a thing [Heb. word] in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle" (1 Sam. iii, 11); "And the rest of the acts [Heb. words] of Solomon" (1 Kings xi, 41). So likewise the Gr. ῥῆμα, which properly signifies an utterance, came to denote any sensible object or occurrence.

WORD OF GOD, or, OF THE LORD. Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the word of God supernatural effects; or represents it as animated and active. So, "He sent his word, and healed them" (Psa. cvii, 20). Enlarging upon this idea, the apocryphal book of Wisdom ascribes to the word of God the death of the first-born of Egypt (xviii, 15; xvi, 26; ix, 1; xvi, 12); the miraculous effects of the manna; the creation of the world; the healing of those who looked up to the brazen serpent. In a similar sense of omnific power the centurion in the gospel says to our Saviour, "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed" (Matt. viii, 8). Referring to the preserving influence of divine truth, Christ says to the devil that tempted him, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (iv, 4).

From these and other passages we see that the phrase "word of God" or "of the Lord" is taken (1) for that internal word heard by the prophets, when under inspiration from God; (2) for that which they heard externally, when God spoke to them; as when he spoke to Moses, face to face, or as one friend speaks to another (Exod. xxxiii, 11); (3) for that word which the ministers of God, the priests, the apostles, the servants of God, declare in his name to the people; (4) for what is written in the sacred books of the Old and New Tests; (5) for the only Son of the Father, the uncreated wisdom. For the first four of these, see BIBLE; the last only we propose to discuss here.

I. The Logos (ὁ Λόγος) is the name given to the divine or pre-existent nature of Christ, designating him as the great medium of communication between God and man (John i, 1, 14; 1 John i, 1; v, 7; Rev. xix, 13; comp. Heb. iv, 12). This remarkable usage of the term word, as designating not a mere attribute, but a hypostasis in some respects diverse from God, yet at the same time God himself, does not appear to have been derived from the poetical personification of "wisdom," in Prov. viii, 12, 22; nor from the apocryphal books of Wisdom, vii, 22-26; and of Ecclesiasticus, i, 1-10; xxiv, 1-14. Even the Logos of Plato, and that of Philo, is no more than an abstraction or personification of divine power, intelligence, and wisdom. As John has united the idea of proper personality with his designation of the Logos, it is certain that he could not have derived his views from any of those writers. There is an immeasurable discrepancy between the views of John and those of Plato and the Jewish writers. If the Logos of John be the same as theirs, then proper personality and divinity are out of the question. But from the passages cited it is evident that the Logos of the New Test. is a proper and real person, not a mere personification, i. e. a philosophical, speculative, or poetical abstraction, amounting to nothing more than a poetico-rhetorical method of describing either divine attributes or divine operations or energies. In the prologue to the gospel of John, the original state or condition of the Logos, and his essential nature, are first described; and then the developments of himself, which had been made either in the way of creation or redemption. He is eternal; was with God; was God. As such he was the Creator of all things without exception. In particular, he was the source of all life; and as the author of spiritual life, he was the source also of all true spiritual light (1 Cor. viii, 6; Col. i, 15-19; Heb. i, 2, 3). See FULNESS.

How God communed with the first human pair in the innocence of Eden we know not; but after the first transgression his communings were in a different mode, and adapted to man in his altered circumstances. The Logos was God revealed—communicating with his creatures, and disclosing to them the way of salvation. The various divine revelations to the patriarchs, and to others under the law, whether as the angel Jehovah, or otherwise in visions, voices, and symbols, were revelations by the Logos. So, in the tabernacle, God of old dwelt, and the shekinah, as significant of the abiding divine glory over the mercy-seat, was the symbol of his presence among his people. So also in the theophany described in Isa. iv, 1-18, we learn something of the glory of the Logos before he became incarnate (John i, 14; xii, 41; xvii, 5). Jehovah was indeed revealed in many respects, in the Old Test.; but God as Father, and Christ as Son and Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit as Sanctifier, were, to say the most, only foreshadowed in the Hebrew Scriptures. It is the Logos manifested in the flesh, Christ the Son of God, who hath revealed God, i. e. placed the character and designs of God in the light that the gospel affords. His light shone on the darkness of all the ages which preceded his coming; but this darkness was so gross that little impression was made upon it. In order to save the world from its ruinous state, the Logos became incarnate, i. e. took on him the human form and nature, and thus dwelt among men, and manifested his glory, which was truly that of the Only Begotten of the Father. Neither Moses nor any other prophet ever understood and disclosed the character and designs of God in such a way as was adequate to accomplish the plan of our redemption. But he who is in the bosom of the Father exhibited grace and revealed truth in such a way as fully to satisfy our wants and alleviate our woes. See LOGOS.

II. The Memra (מֵמְרָא).—The Chaldee paraphrasts, the most ancient Jewish uncanonical writers extant, generally use this name (signifying word) where Moses puts Jehorah, and it is thought that under this term they allude to the Son of God. Now, their testimony is so much the more considerable, as, having lived before or at the time of Christ, they are irrefragable witnesses of the sentiments of their nation on this article, since their Targum, or explication, has always been, and still is, in universal esteem among them. In the greater part of the passages where the sacred name occurs, these paraphrasts substitute Memra Jehovah (מֵמְרָא יְהוָה), the Word of God, and as they ascribe to Memra all the attributes of deity, it is concluded that they believed the divinity of the Word. In effect, according to them, Memra created the world; appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre, and to Jacob at Bethel. It was to Memra Jacob appealed to witness the covenant between him and Laban: "Let the Word see between thee and me." The same Word appeared to Moses at Sinai, gave the law to Israel, spoke face to face with that lawgiver, marched at the head of that people, enabled them to conquer nations, and was a consuming fire to all who violated the law of the Lord. All these characters, where the paraphrasts use the word Memra, clearly denote Almighty God. This Word, therefore, was God, and the Hebrews were of this opinion at the time when the Targum was composed. See SHEKINAH.

The author of the book of Wisdom, as above observed, expresses himself much in the same manner. He says that God created all things by his Word (Wisd. ix, 1); that it is not what the earth produces that feeds man, but the Word of the Almighty that supports him (xvi, 26). It was this Word that fed the Israelites in the desert, healed them after the biting of the serpents (ver. 12), and who, by his power, destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians (xviii, 15; see Exod. xii, 29, 30), and by which Aaron stopped the fury of the fire that was kindled in the camp, which threatened the destruction of all Israel (Wisd. xviii, 22; see Numb. xvi, 46). See WISDOM PERSONIFIED.

III. The Bath-Kol (בַּת קוֹל, daughter of the voice).—Under this name the Talmud, the later Targums, and the rabbinical writers make frequent mention of a kind of oracular voice, constituting the fourth grade of revelation, which, although it was an instrument of divine communication throughout the early history of the Israelites, was the most prominent, because the sole, prophetic manifestation which existed during (and even after) the period of the second temple. The Midrashim and the Gemara, cited in Reland's Antiq. Sacr. pt. ii, ch. ix, severally affirm that the Bath-Kol is the voice which spoke to Abraham, Moses, David, Nebuchadnezzar, and others; and the Targums of Jonathan and of Jerusalem make the Bath-Kol appear in Gen. xxxviii, 26; Numb. xxi, 6, and in other places. The treatise Sanhedrin, cited in Vitringa's Obser. Sacr. ii, 338, uses the words, "From the death of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the Holy Spirit (רוּחַ הַקֹּדֶשׁ), which, according to the Jewish distinction, is only the second degree of the prophetic gift) was withdrawn from Israel; but they nevertheless enjoyed the use of the Bath-Kol."

The Jewish authorities are not agreed as to what the Bath-Kol was, nor as to the precise reason of its designation. It is disputed whether the persons hearing the Bath-Kol heard the very voice from heaven, or only a daughter of it—an echo of it; whether, as thunder is often mentioned as a sign of the divine presence, and as the word voice appears to be used for thunder in Exod. ix, 23; Jer. x, 13; Psa. xxix, 3, the Bath-Kol may not signify an articulate voice proceeding out of the thunder; or whether, according to the explanation of Maimonides, "the Bath-Kol is when a man has such a strong imagination that he believes he hears a voice from without himself."

As to the meaning of the name itself, passages are cited in Buxtorf's Lex. Talm. s. v. בַּת, and in Reland's Antiq. Sacr. loc. cit., which show that the daughter of the voice sometimes means the echo of a sound, and sometimes merely a primary sound itself. It is certain that the Peshito has sometimes rendered the simple Greek φωνή by "daughter of the voice," as in Acts xii, 22; 1 Tim. vi, 20; Heb. iii, 15. It is necessary, however, to remark that, according to a fundamental law of all Syro-Arabian grammar, these two words must either stand to each other in the relation of apposition or of the state construct. But as apposition can only take place between equivalent and convertible terms, which "daughter" and "voice" are not, accordingly the alternative rendering of daughter voice proposed by Prideaux (which Horne also has adopted, Introdact. iv, 149) violates that rule, because, in such an English combination, the word "daughter" has the force of an adjective; and the Hebrew language, possessing but few adjectives, would have expressed the sense of daughter voice (if that had been the sense intended to be conveyed by Bath-Kol) by making Bath the last word, depending as a genitive on the former. For instance, what we render the Holy Spirit is literally "the spirit of holiness" in Hebrew. Thus, "daughter voice" is not an apposition in English, nor is it the translation of a state construct according to the Hebrew order, but of a state construct in which Prideaux has taken the liberty of transposing the dependent word, i. e. of making "daughter of the voice" become, in effect, "voice of a daughter." Jennings also, in his Jewish Antiq. p. 229, when he renders Bath-Kol by "filia vox, seu filia vocis," only commits, in the first case, the same error more palpably, and is guilty of quite as great a violation of the first principle of Hebrew grammar as he would be, in the case of Latin, were he to translate filia vocis by "voice of the daughter."

The occasions on which it is alleged that the Bath-Kol was heard after the death of Malachi are of very various degrees of solemnity or significance. Supposing the instances mentioned in Josephus (Ant. xiii, 10), of the voice which announced to Hyrcanus that his sons had conquered Antiochus, and (War. vi, 5) of the awful voice which was heard in the temple, just before the capture of Jerusalem, to exclaim, Μεταβαίνωμεν ἱερὺς! not to belong to the Bath-Kol (as it is to be observed that the pseudo-Josephus ben-Gurion has, in these cases, merely used the Hebrew word for voice), most of the other recorded instances fall far short of these in dignity, and some appear irreconcilable with even very credulous notions of the limits of divine interposition. Only a few of them, however, can be classed with quite as trivial a species of divination as the Sortes Virgilianæ, which is done in the unfair statement of Prideaux (Connex. ii, 354). The fact is, that most Christian writers who have treated of the Bath-Kol have not been able to divest themselves of an undue desire to discredit its pretensions, in consequence of their fearing any comparison which might be instituted between it and the voices from heaven mentioned in the New Test. Indeed, Lightfoot (in his Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. iii, 17) considers all cases of Bath-Kol to be either Jewish fables or devices of the devil. Instances of voices from heaven, on occasions outwardly very analogous to some among the Jews, are recorded in the history of the early Christian Church, as the voice which was instrumental in making Alexander bishop of Jerusalem, and that which exhorted Polycarp to be of good courage (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iv, 15; vi, 11). See BATH-KOL.

Words of Institution are those words which were used by our Saviour when he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, the essential parts of which are commonly held to be "This is my body" and "This is my blood of the New Testament," words found in all the ancient liturgies.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, D.D., an English prelate, nephew of the poet, was born in 1807. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1830; was elected a fellow, ordained, and in 1836 appointed public orator at Cambridge and head-master of Harrow School; in 1844 canon in Westminster, and bishop of Lincoln in 1869, a position which he held until his death, March 20, 1885. He was of the Low-church or evangelical type, and the author of numerous critical and historical works, the most important being his Holy Bible, with Annotations (Lond. 1856-76, 10 vols.). See COMMENTARY.

Wörger, FRANZ, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Lubeck in 1647. He studied at different universities, became preacher of St. Laurence, in his native place, in 1673, was suspended in 1692 on account of his great zeal, and disobedience against the magistrate, and died, as a private scholar, in 1708. He was a voluminous writer. See Seelen, Athena Lubeccensis; Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 567. (B. P.)

Works (ἔργα), "works, or deeds, of the law," is equivalent to the works which the law requires, or the entire performance of those works which the moral law, whether written or unwritten, i. e. law in general, whether applicable to Gentile or Jew, demands (Rom. ii, 15; iii, 20; ix, 12, 32; x, 6; xi, 8; Gal. ii, 16; iii, 2, 5, 10; Eph. ii, 9). On the ground of works, i. e. of perfect obedience and therefore of merit, none can be justified, because "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." If, then, any are justified at all, it must be of grace; but this grace, although freely bestowed and without any just claims on the part of the sinner, is still not unconditionally bestowed. Faith in him who died to save sinners is requisite to prepare one for the reception of pardon; and he who is justified in this way, as a consequence of his faith, is still justified in a manner altogether gratuitous.

The reader will mark the difference between the phrase "works of the law," in the above passages, and the expression "work of faith" or "good works" (1 Thess. i, 3; 2 Thess. i, 11; 2 Cor. ix, 8; Ephes. ii, 10; Col. i, 10; 1 Tim. v, 10, 25; vi, 18; 2 Tim. iii, 17; Titus i, 16; ii, 7, 14; iii, 1, 8, 14). In the writings of Paul, works of the law always designates the idea of perfect obedience, i. e. doing all which the law requires. But works of faith or good works are the fruits of sanctification by the Spirit of God; the good works which Christians perform, and which are sincere, are therefore acceptable to God under a dispensation of grace, although they do not fulfil all the demands of the law. On the ground of the first, Paul earnestly contends, at length, in his epistles to the Romans and Galatians, that no one can be justified. The latter he everywhere treats as indispensable to the Christian character. So also the apostle James, when disputing with those who make pretensions to Christian faith, and mere pretensions, maintains that no man has any good claim to the faith of a Christian who does not at the same time exhibit good works; in other words, he avers that a mere speculative faith is not a real Christian faith (James ii, 14-26). In a word, Paul has taught us that justification is not on the ground of merit, but of grace: James has taught us that a faith which will entitle one to hope for justification must be accompanied with evangelical obedience. Both are true and faithful teachers; the doctrines of both are equally the doctrines of the gospel. Good works, in the gospel sense of these words, are an essential condition of our acceptance with God; but on the ground of perfect obedience to the divine law, no one ever was or ever will be accepted. See JUSTIFICATION.

In an evangelical sense, good works are those actions which spring from pure principles, and are conformable to truth, justice, and propriety; whether natural, civil, relative, moral, or religious. The phrase is often used of acts of charity. The qualities of a good work, in the Scriptural sense of the term, are, (1) That it be according to the will of God; (2) that it spring from love to God (1 Tim. i, 5); (3) that it be done in faith (Rom. xiv, 23); (4) that it be done to the glory of God (1 Cor. x, 31; Phil. i, 11). The causes of good works are, (1) God himself (Heb. xiii, 21); (2) union with Christ (Ephes. ii, 10); (3) through faith (Heb. xi, 4, 6); (4) by the word and spirit (Isa. iii, 8; Luke viii, 15; 2 Tim. iii, 16). As to the nature and properties of good works in this world, (1) They are imperfect (Eccles. vii, 20; Rev. iii, 2); (2) not meritorious (Luke xvii, 10; Titus iii, 5); (3) yet found only in the regenerate (Matt. vii, 17). The necessary uses of good works, (1) They show our gratitude (Psa. cxvi, 12, 13); (2) are an ornament to our profession (Titus ii, 10); (3) evidence our regeneration (Job xv, 5); (4) are profitable to others (Titus iii, 8). See Gill, Body of Div. vol. iii, bk. iv.

World is the English term by which our translators have rendered four Hebrew words (in addition to the general term עֲרֵץ, eretz, "earth"): 1. חֲדָל, châdêl, which is erroneously supposed by some to have arisen by transposition of letters from חָלַל, comes from a root which signifies "to rest," "to discontinue," and hence "to cease from life," "to be at rest;" and as a noun, "the place of rest," "the grave." The word occurs in the complaint uttered by Hezekiah, when in prospect of dissolution, and when he contemplates his state among the inhabitants, not of the upper, but the lower world (Isa. xxxviii, 11); thus combining with many other passages to show that the Hebrews, probably borrowing the idea from the Egyptian tombs, had a vague conception of some shadowy state where the manes of their departed friends lay at rest in their ashes, retaining only an indefinable personality in a land of darkness and "the shadow of death" (Job x, 21, 22). 2. חָלָה, châlah (Psa. xlii, 14), means "to conceal," and derivatively "any hidden thing," hence "age," "antiquity," "remote and hidden ages;" also "the world," as the hidden or unknown thing (Psa. xlix, 1). 3. מְלָאָה, melâah (in the New Test. αἰών), the root-signification of which is "to hide," denotes a very remote, indefinite, and therefore unknown period in time past or time to come, which metaphysicians call eternity à parte ante, and eternity à parte post (Eccles.

iii, 11). In Psa. lxxiii, 12, it is rendered "world;" but in this and in the previous instance it may be questioned whether the natural creation is really meant, and not rather "the world" in our metaphorical use of the term, as denoting the intelligent world, the rational inhabitants of the earth, and still more specifically that portion of them with which we are immediately concerned. 4. עֲרֵב, tebbēl (the usual word so rendered the Greek κόσμος), comes from a root that signifies "to flow," and as water is the unfailing cause of fertility in the East, it denotes "to be productive," "to bear fruit;" and as a noun, "the fruit-bearer," that is, the earth. This word is frequently rendered "world" in the common version, but if more was intended than the earth on which we dwell, it may be doubted if the passages in which it occurs will justify the translators.

In truth, the Hebrews had no word which comprised the entire visible universe. When they wanted to speak comprehensively of God's creation, they joined two words together and used the phrase "heaven and earth" (Gen. i, 1). We have already seen that they had an idea of an under world; the meaning of their ordinary term for earth, אֶרֶץ, 'eretz, which signifies the "lower," shows that they also regarded the earth as beneath the sun; while the term for heaven, שָׁמַיִם, shamaim, denoting "what is elevated," indicates that their view was that the heavens, or the heights, were above. Above, below, and under—these three relations of space comprehend their conception of the world. See EARTH; HEAVEN.

The following Greek words are also translated "world." 1. κόσμος, kosmos, the world, universe (Matt. xiii, 35; xxiv, 21; Luke xi, 50; John xvii, 5, 24; Acts xvii, 24; Rom. i, 20); the inhabitants thereof (1 Cor. iv, 9); also the earth, as the abode of man (Matt. xiii, 38; Mark xvi, 15; John i, 9; iii, 19; vi, 14; xvi, 21, 28; xxi, 25; Heb. x, 5; Matt. iv, 8; Rom. i, 8); the inhabitants of the earth (Matt. v, 14; John i, 29; iii, 16; xvii, 14, 25; Rom. iii, 6, 19; Heb. xi, 7; 2 Pet. ii, 5; 1 John ii, 2); the multitude, as we say "everybody" (John vii, 4; xii, 19; xiv, 22; xviii, 20; 2 Cor. i, 12; 2 Pet. ii, 5); also the heathen world (Rom. xi, 12, 15). It likewise designates the state of the world, as opposed to the kingdom of Christ (Matt. xvi, 26; Mark viii, 36; John xviii, 36; 1 Cor. iii, 22; v, 10; Ephes. ii, 2; Gal. vi, 14; James iv, 4) and men of the world, worldlings (John xii, 31; 1 Cor. i, 2; iii, 19; 2 Cor. vii, 10; Phil. ii, 15); also the Jewish dispensation, founded on Sinai and ended on Calvary (Ephes. i, 4; 1 Pet. i, 20; Heb. ix, 26). 2. Οἰκουμένη, Oikoumenē, the inhabited earth, the world as known to the ancients (Matt. iv, 8; xxiv, 14; Luke iv, 5; Rom. x, 18; Heb. i, 6; Rev. xvi, 14); the inhabitants of the earth (Acts xvii, 31; xix, 27; Rev. iii, 10; xii, 9); the Roman empire (Acts xvii, 6; xxiv, 5); Palestine and the adjacent countries (Luke ii, 1; Acts xii, 28). 3. Αἰών, Aion, the world, or age, the present time, or the future, as implying duration (Matt. xii, 32; Mark x, 50; iii, 28, 29; Luke xviii, 30); the present world or age, with its cares, temptations, evils, etc. (Matt. xiii, 22; Luke xvi, 8; xx, 34; Rom. xii, 2; 1 Cor. i, 20; ii, 6, 8; 2 Cor. iv, 4; 2 Tim. iv, 10; Tit. i, 12; Gal. i, 4); and men of the world, wicked generation (Ephes. ii, 2; Luke xvi, 8; xx, 34); also the world itself, as an object of creation and existence (Matt. xiii, 40; xxiv, 3; Heb. i, 2; xi, 8). This term also denotes the age or world before the Messiah, i. e. the Jewish dispensation (1 Cor. x, 11; Heb. ix, 26); also, after the Messiah, i. e. the Gospel dispensation (Heb. ii, 5; vi, 5). See COSMOGONY.

In popular Christian phraseology, the world is taken also for a secular life, the present state of existence, and the pleasures and interests which steal away the soul from God. The love of the world does not consist in the use and enjoyment of the comforts God gives us, but in an inordinate attachment to the things of time and sense. We love the world too much (1) when, for the sake of any profit or pleasure, we wilfully, knowingly, and deliberately transgress the commands of God; (2) when we take more pains about the present life than the next; (3) when we cannot be contented, patient, or resigned, under low and inconvenient circumstances; (4) when we cannot part with anything we possess to those who want, deserve, and have a right to it; (5) when we envy those who are more fortunate and more favored by the world than we are; (6) when we honor and esteem and favor persons purely according to their birth, fortunes, and success, measuring our judgment and approbation by their outward appearance and situation in life; (7) when worldly prosperity makes us proud and vain and arrogant; (8) when we omit no opportunity of enjoying the good things of this life; when our great and chief business is to divert ourselves till we contract an indifference for rational and manly occupations, deceiving ourselves, and fancying that we are not in a bad condition because others are worse than we (Jortin, Sermons, vol. iii, ser. 9). See Hopkins, On the Vanity of the World; Stennet, Sermon on Conformity to the World; More, On Education, vol. ii, ch. 9; Walker, Sermons, vol. iv, ser. 20.

Worm is the rendering, in the A. V., of several Hebrew and one Greek word.

1. Śās (שָׂס, from its leaping; Sept. σῆς; Vulg. timea) occurs only in Isa. li, 8, "For the śās (שָׂס, 'moth') shall eat them up like a garment, and the śās shall eat them like wool." The word probably denotes some particular species of moth, whose larva is injurious to wool, while perhaps the former name is the more general one for any of the destructive timea, or "clothes-moths." See MOTH.

2. Rimmāh (רִמָּה, of uncertain etymology; Sept. σκώληξ, σῆψις, σαπρία; Vulg. vermis, putredo, timea) occurs Exod. xvi, 24; Job vi, 5; xvii, 14; xxi, 26; xxiv, 20; xxv, 6; Isa. xiv, 11, and seems to denote worms in putrid substances, or putridity itself. The Hebrew word points evidently to various kinds of maggots, and the larvæ of insects which feed on putrefying animal matter, rather than to earth-worms. Job, under his heavy affliction, exclaims, "My flesh is clothed with rimmāh" (Job vii, 5; see also xvii, 14). There is no reason to doubt that the expression is to be understood literally; a person in Job's condition would very probably suffer from entozoa of some kind. In Job xxi, 26; xxiv, 20, there is an allusion to worms (insect larvæ) feeding on the dead bodies of the buried (comp. Ecclus. x, 11; xix, 3; 1 Macc. ii, 62). Our translators, in the well-known passage (Job xix, 26)—"And though after my skin worms destroy this body"—have over-interpreted the words of the original, "My skin shall have been consumed," for there is no mention of worms whatever in the original. These passages, and especially the last, have contributed to the popular impression that the human body, when buried in the grave, is consumed by worms. The Oriental method of burial in wrappers, and of depositing the corpse in caves, etc., would no doubt often afford the spectacle of the human body devoured by the larvæ of different insects; but the allusions in Scripture to such sights do not apply to burial elsewhere, except where the body is buried in a wooden coffin only, in vaults which have communications with the external air, when swarms of a species of fly, of a cimex aspect, insinuate themselves between the lid and lower part of the coffin, and their larvæ batten in the corpse within, while the adult insect sports in the lurid atmosphere of the vault.

3. The distinctive term is tolā (תֹּלַהּ, Exod. xvi, 20; Isa. i, 18; Lam. iv, 5), or (fem.) toleāh, or tolāuth (תֹּלְאִית, or תֹּלְאִיּוֹת, Deut. xxviii, 39; Job xxv, 6; Psa. xxii, 6; Isa. xxi, 11; xli, 14; lxvi, 24; Jonah iv, 7; besides the use of the latter in connection with רִמָּה, together rendered "scarlet" [q. v.]), yet it often stands in parallelism with the preceding term. The manna that the disobedient Israelites kept till the morning of a week-day "bred worms" (תולעים), and stank (Exod. xvi, 20); while of that kept over the Sabbath and gathered the night before, it is said that "it did not stink, neither was there any worm (דבר) therein." The patriarch uses both terms in Job xxv, 6, where he compares the estate of man to a rimmāh, and the son of man to a toledāh. Homer also compares a man of inferior consequence to a worm, ὥστε σκώληξ ἐπὶ γαῖῃ κείτῳ τὰ θεῖς (Iliad, xiii, 654). תולע is applied to that which preys on human flesh (Job xiv, 11; lxvi, 24); on vegetables, as on the gourd of Jonah (Jonah iv, 7), and on vines (Deut. xxviii, 39). The ancient Hebrews applied such words as indeterminately as the common people now do the words "worm," "fly," etc. Similar indeterminateness attends the Sept. and Vulg. renderings. Aristotle also applies the word σκώληξ to the larva of any insect—τίκτει δὲ πάντα σκώληκα, "all insects produce a worm" (Hist. Anim., i, 19).

The insect which the manna is said to have "bred, when kept till the morning" (Exod. xvi, 20, 24), whatever it was, must be considered as miraculously produced as a punishment for disobedience, since the substance now understood to be the same keeps good for weeks and months, nor did the specimen laid up in the ark breed worms. See MANNA.

An insect is alluded to as injuring vines and grapes (Deut. xxviii, 39; תולע, σκώληξ, vermis). The Greeks had a distinct name for this insect, and probably as early as the Sept. translation of Exodus was made, ἰψ and ἰξ (Theophrastus, De Causis, iii, 27). It was called by the Latins invololus, convolvulus, and roleoz (Plautus, Cistell. act iv, sc. 2; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvii, 28). Rosenmüller thinks it was the Scurabæus hirtellus, or the Scurabæus muticus hirtus testaceo-nigricornis of Linnaeus (Syst. Nat. i, iv, 1577). Forskål calls it the Pyrallis vitana, or Pyrallis fusciana. Various kinds of insects attack the vine, among which one of the most destructive is the Tortrix vitana, the little caterpillar of which eats off the inner parts of the blossoms, the clusters of which it binds together by spinning a web around them. A species of beetle, Lehrus cephalotes, is injurious to the vines of Hungary; other species of beetles do similar mischief (rynchites, bacchus, eumolpus). Vine-leaves in France are frequently destroyed by the larva of a moth, Tortrix vitana. In Germany another species does great injury to the young branches, preventing their expansion by the webs in which it involves them; and a third species, Tortrix fusciana, makes the grapes themselves its food (Kirby and Spence, Introduct. to Entomology [Lond. 1828], i, 205). It may serve as an illustration of the looseness of popular diction respecting insects to remark that what the farmers call "the fly" in the turnip is in reality a small species of jumping beetle, for which turnip-fly would be a more appropriate name.

The "gourd" of Jonah is said to have been destroyed by "a worm" (Jonah iv, 7; תולע, σκώληξ, vermis). The identity of the gourd with the Ricinus communis has been thought to be well established (see GOURD), and Rumphius (Herbar. Ambinens. iv, 95) testifies to the ravages of a species of black caterpillar upon it. These are produced, he says, in great quantities in the summer-time, during a gentle rain, and eat up the leaves of the Palma Christi, and gnaw its branches to the pith in a single night (Michaelis, Suppl. ad Lex. Hebraic. p. 2187). Allusions to the worm in wood occur in the Sept. of Prov. xii, 4, and xxv, 20: ἐν ξύλῳ σκώληξ; Vulg. vermis ligno, which words have nothing corresponding to them in the present Hebrew text (see Vulg. of 2 Kings xxiii, 8).

It is possible that the word תולע was also given as a proper name; thus "Tola" occurs among the descendants of Issachar (Gen. xlii, 18), and was also the name of a person of the same tribe (Judg. x, 1). Bochart conjectures that the name was given to these children by their parents because the tribe of Issachar was one of the meanest, and they were themselves in needy circumstances, or that these were very sickly children when born. He remarks, however, that the first Tola became a great man, the head of the Tolaïtes (Numb. xxvi, 28), who, in the days of David, amounted to 22,600 (1 Chron. vii, 2), and that the latter judged Israel twenty years (Judg. x, 1, 2).

4. In Mic. vi, 17 the words "like worms of the earth" represent the Heb. דְּוֹמָלִי בְּדוֹמָלִי, lit. "creepers in the dust," "serpents;" Vulg. Reptilia terræ (comp. Deut. xxxii, 24).

5. The usual Greek word for worm is σκώληξ. In 1 Macc. ii, 62, "Fear not the words of a sinful man, for his glory shall be dung and worms," instead of κοπρία, "dung," should be read σαπρία, "rotteness," as in the Sept. of Job vii, 5; xxv, 6. So also in Eccles. xix, 3, "Moths and worms shall have him that cleaveth to harlots," instead of σήτες, "moths," read σήπη, "rotteness."

"Worm" occurs in the New Test. in a figurative sense only (Mark ix, 44, 46, 48), "Their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" words borrowed from Isa. lxvi, 24, which originally relate to a temporal state of things, but which had also become, in our Lord's time, the popular representation of future punishment (Jud. xvi, 17; Eccles. vii, 17). See ΤΟΡΝΗΤ. Origen here understands "worm" in a metaphorical sense, as denoting the accusation of conscience; but Austin, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Theophylact, etc., contend that the word should be understood literally.

The death of Herod Agrippa I was caused by worms (σκωληκόβρωτος, Acts xii, 23); according to Josephus (Ant. xix, 8, 2), his death took place five days after his departure from the theatre. It is curious that the Jewish historian makes no mention of worms in the case of Agrippa, though he expressly notes it in that of Herod the Great (Ant. xvii, 6, 5; War. i, 83, 5). A similar death was that of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. ix, 9; see also Eusebius, Eccles. Hist. viii, 16; Lucian, Pseudomant. i, 904; comp. Wetstein on Acts xii, 23). Whether the worms were the cause or the result of the disease is an immaterial question. The "angel of the Lord struck Herod" with some disease, the issue of which was fatal, and the loathsome spectacle of which could not fail to have had a marked humiliating effect on his proud heart. It has been attempted to explain all these instances as cases of phthisiasis, or the loury disease, but the conjecture is inconsistent with the words employed in the several narratives; and since they are instances of persons being devoured by worms while alive, contrary to the order of nature, we are compelled to ascribe the phenomenon to divine agency. At all events, the larvae in Herod's case were internal. On the other hand, the cruel Pheretima, the wife of Battus, whose horrible vengeance is detailed by Herodotus (Hist. iv, 202-204), is described by him as dying under a disease which, from the terms he uses, must have been peculiarly terrible. "She died miserably; for even while alive she swarmed with maggots." So odious to the gods are the excesses of human vengeance." The word εὐχαι, which the father of history employs in this passage, is generally considered as synonymous with σκώληξ, inasmuch as it signifies the maggots or larvae produced by the carrion-eating flies; but the two terms are not equivalent, since the Greek σκώληξ has a wider meaning, including all insect larvae without an exception (Arist. Hist. Anim. ii, 1). For the account of insects infesting the human frame, from disease, see Kirby and Spence, Introduct. to Entomology, i, 84; Bartholin, Morb. Bibl. c. 23; Mead, Bibl. Diseases, c. 15.

There are several species of earth-worms (lambricus) in Palestine similar to our own, but by far the most abundant of the so-called worms there are the myriapoda, or millipedes, especially the scolopendra, which appear to perform the functions of the earth-worm in nature, though belonging to a very different order of animal life, and which supply food to many of the birds of the country (Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 801). On the general subject, see Bochart, Hieroz. (ed. Rosenmüller, Leipzig, 1798-96), iii, 519 sq.

WORMS, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Vormatiense). Worms is a city of Germany, in Hesse, province of Rhein-Hessen, on the Rhine, twenty-six miles south-east of Mentz. It was formerly an imperial city, and is very ancient, having existed before the arrival of the Romans. Three ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

I. Was held in 829. Several regulations were published, one of which condemns the ordeal by cold water; a treatise written by Agobard against these practices is still extant. See Mansi, Concil. vii, 1669.

II. Was held May 16, 868, in the presence of Louis of Germany, to which all the bishops of his kingdom were cited. Having drawn up a confession of faith, in which the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son was clearly stated, the council proceeded to publish forty-four canons.

1. Forbids to administer holy baptism except at Easter and Whitsuntide, unless in a case of necessity.

2. Orders that the chrism be consecrated by the bishop only.

3. Forbids bishops to exact any fee or present for the consecration of a church; also forbids them to consecrate any church except there be a writing under the hand of the founder, confirming the foundation, and signifying what endowment he has given.

4. Forbids to offer upon the altar for the eucharist anything save bread, and wine mixed with water. States that wine and water should be used, "quia videmus in aqua populum intelligi, in vino vero ostendi sanguinem Christi," and thus, by the union of the water with the wine, the union of Christ with his Church.

5. Approves the regulations of St. Gregory, upon the subject of single and true immersion.

6. Gives to the bishop, and not to the founders, the disposal of the revenues of new churches.

7. Orders that all offerings and revenues belonging to a church be divided into four portions—one for the bishop, the second for the clerks serving the church (according to their zeal and diligence), the third for the poor, and the fourth to the fabric.

9. Orders the celibacy of the clergy.

13, 14. Forbid excommunication, without weighty and sufficient cause, and declare that the bishop so excommunicating without sufficient cause shall be deprived of the communion of the neighboring bishops.

15. Enacts that when a robbery shall have been committed in any monastery, the thief being unknown, the abbot or some other priest shall celebrate mass, at which all the inmates shall attend, in order by this to prove severally their innocence.

16. Excommunicates bishops who refuse to attend synods, or who retire before the conclusion of business.

17. Orders bishops keeping sporting dogs, or birds, to be suspended for three months; a priest, two; and a deacon, one.

19. Excommunicates and suspends priests who refuse to obey their bishop.

22. Forbids those who, having been in their infancy offered by their parents to some monastery, for the service of God, and who have accordingly been brought up to the regular life, when they come to the age of puberty, to renounce that life and return into the world.

36. Declares that a man who has murdered a priest shall neither eat meat nor drink wine, but fast on every day, except festivals, till the evening; that he shall never carry arms, never go except on foot, nor enter a church for the space of five years; after which he may enter the church, but shall still not be received to communion. At the expiration of ten years he may be received, but shall fast three times a week to his life's end.

25. Orders that a man who has killed any one shall be put to a light penance should he ever recover his senses.

31. Orders that the holy eucharist be given to lepers.

See Mansi, Concil. viii, 941.

III. Was held Sept. 8, 1122. It was settled that all elections of bishops were to be freely conducted according to the laws of the Church, but under the supervision of the emperor; and that the right of spiritual investiture by ring and staff belonged to the pope, while that of secular investiture with the sceptre was conceded to the emperor. This agreement was confirmed by the first general council of Lateran in 1123.

WORMS, DIET OF, was held in 1521; for an account of which see LUTHER.

WORMS, EDICT OF, was the edict passed at the diet of Worms, which declared Luther a heretic and schismatic. See LUTHER.

WORMS, (RELIGIOUS) COLLOQUIES OF. This title applies to two conferences held at Worms, in Germany, in the 16th century, for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation between the Romish and Protestant parties in the German states.

I. The first Colloquy of Worms formed a link in the long series of negotiations by which it was hoped to render an appeal to the sword unnecessary. It is certain that the desire for peace was very sincere, whether the situation be regarded in its religious or its political features. The Augsburg Confession, though the ultimatum of the Protestant party at the time, was yet intended to serve as a new basis upon which the entire Church, rather than a separate party, might stand. The Romanists conceded the need of reforms in the Church, and a spirit of improvement seemed disposed to assert itself even in the immediate vicinage of the pope. The emperor, also, though emphatically rejecting the demands of the evangelical party, evinced an intention to make some concessions in important matters. It was natural, therefore, that the Protestants should indulge the hope of ultimate reconciliation, however strongly a few of the more sagacious minds among them might insist that no solid peace could be thus secured. In its political bearings, the Augsburg Confession led to the formation of the Smalkald League (q. v.), an alliance intended to be wholly defensive in its nature, but nevertheless constituting a powerful influence in favor of peace, by reason of the general complication in which the affairs of the empire were involved. The result of these conditions was an alternation of warlike preparation with efforts to preserve the peace, continued through more than a decade of years.

The Reformation had been able, in about twenty years, to extend its rule over regions previously regarded as the strongholds of Romanism, and seemed likely to obtain control of the whole of North Germany. A majority of the electoral college, too, was on its side. These facts, coupled with the pressure brought to bear by the offensive operations of the Turks on the one hand, and the hostile attitude of France on the other, compelled the emperor to give respectful attention to Protestant grievances and demands, and to arrange for a conference which should attempt a reconciliation upon disputed matters of doctrine, such as had been suggested in 1539. The assembly was appointed to meet at Spire, April 2, 1540, but was compelled by an epidemic to convene at Hagenau instead, in June of that year. A preliminary meeting of Romanists, called by king Ferdinand, had been held in May, however, in which Morone, the papal legate, aided by the emperor and king, who imagined the holding of a national council to be contrary to the interests of the empire, was able to start a train of influences which led to the breaking-up of the Hagenau Conference before it had fairly begun. The emperor's necessities, however, compelled its revivification, and a decree recalled its members to Worms to open the renewed conference, Oct. 28. The actual date of its opening was, however, Nov. 25, the imperial chancellor, Granvella, presiding. As at Hagenau, the princes were represented by their political and theological agents. Rome was represented by Campeggio, brother to the cardinal, and bishop of Feltre, whose diplomatic ability was equal to the task of preventing the success of this renewed attempt to secure a national council. He proposed that the discussions should be in writing, and that each party should have but one vote, instead of being permitted to secure victory by a majority of individual voices, both of which measures were rejected. Granvella's proposition, however, that a single theologian from either party should represent his side, but that any member of the conference should be at liberty to add whatever he might deem proper, was rejected by the nuncio, and afterwards admitted only with the proviso that such additions might be made by a majority of either party only, a minority being allowed to submit their objections in writing to the president and the imperial orator. Discussions respecting such matters of form occupied the whole of December. The business of the conference began Jan. 2, 1541. Melancthon and Calvin were prominent on the Protestant side, and the former was opposed to his familiar antagonist, Eck, the disputation beginning with the charge, advanced by Eck, that the alterations made in the Augsburg Confession marked a departure from the original ground of that instrument, and the response by Melancthon that the changes made had respect merely to matters of form. The question of original sin was again taken in hand, but with no result, as might have been expected from a disputation to which a man like Eck, whose vanity would permit no retraction even if he were defeated, was a party. The conference was thus fruitlessly occupied from Jan. 14 to 17, and on the following day an imperial rescript brought the Conference of Worms to a close, and transferred its business to Ratisbon, where a diet of the empire had begun to assemble. The result of that congress demonstrated completely the impossibility of a peaceful settlement of existing differences, and left the prospect dark with clouds of strife, which ultimately burst in the Smalkald war.

Documents relating to the first Colloquy of Worms are quite fully given in Corp. Reform. iii, 1182-iv, 90. See, in addition, Raynald, ad ann. 1540, 47-59; Seckendorf, Hist. Luth. iii, 21, § 79, 80; Salig, Hist. d. Augsburg Conf. I, bk. iii, 2, § 3, 4; Ranke, Deutsch. Gesch. im Zeitalter d. Reformation, iv, 151 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

II. The Colloquy of 1557 was the last in the series of fruitless endeavors to bring together the now completely divided religious parties of the German empire. Its principal importance, however, consists in its bearing upon the internal conditions of the Protestant Church itself. The religious peace of Augsburg had secured the external interests of that Church for a time; but the rise of Flacianism originated most bitter controversy within its own pale, whose subject was the Augustana, the confession upon which the Evangelical Church based its right to recognition itself. There was consequently no desire among theologians for a religious congress, particularly such a congress as was called for by the recess of the Diet of Ratisbon in 1557, which directed that a colloquy between the adherents of the Roman Catholic faith and of the Augsburg Confession should be held. Statesmen, for their part, had learned by repeated experiences to regard such measures as wholly unsuited to accomplish the end in view and give the desired rest to Church and country. The wish of king Ferdinand, however, decided the case, and the colloquy was fixed for August, 1557. A previous diet of Protestant princes was convoked at Frankfort, for the purpose of attempting a reconciliation of parties in the evangelical camp, but without result; and the representatives of Ernestine Saxony went to Worms instructed to labor that a solid front might be presented to the Roman Catholic foe, but to make the utterance of the Flacian shibboleth the condition of any unity that might be reached. The arrival of the delegation from electoral Saxony was delayed, and the Flacianists used the opportunity thus afforded to attempt the proselytizing of the representatives of other governments as they arrived; but in this respect their success was very imperfect. An attack directed against Melancthon in the assembly of Sept. 4 by the theologians of Weimar was equally without satisfactory result, and even led to threats of excluding the troublesome party from the colloquy, the occasion being marked with great violence and passion. A written condemnation of the corrupters of the Augsburg Confession was finally placed in the hands of the Protestant assessors, with the reservation of liberty to publish the paper if it should become necessary. Melancthon, against whom all those efforts were principally directed, endeavored to harmonize the conflicting elements, and even drew up a formula of consensus, which amounted to a retraction of the points offensive to Flacianists, but was thwarted in his purpose to restore peace by the obstinacy of others, particularly the Württembergers.

In the absence of the princes king Ferdinand had appointed the bishop of Spire to preside at Worms, and when that prelate became sick he substituted for him the bishop of Naumburg, Julius von Pflug, the only person, perhaps, besides Melancthon, who cherished a real desire for reconciliation. Pflug was supported by Seldius, the royal vice-chancellor, and each party had its assessors, adjuncts, auditors, and notaries. The principal collocutors were Melancthon, Brentius, Mörlin, Schnepf, etc., on the Protestant, and the theologian Canisius and the perverts Staphylus and Wicelius (q. v.) on the Romish side. A preliminary meeting, for agreement on the methods to be observed in the disputation, was held in September, which, however, served only to begin the series of difficulties encountered in the progress of the conference, and to foretell its failure. Melancthon made a preliminary statement, unequivocally based on the Augsburg Confession, in behalf of the Protestant party; and Sidonius, speaking for the other party, interposed objections, whose effect the president was able to neutralize only by refusing to receive either statement in documentary form. On Sept. 14 the expectation of ultimate failure to realize the ends hoped for from the conference, which the delegates evidently entertained, found expression in the decision to conduct the disputation in writing—a decision which protracted the debate interminably. On the following day a question of fundamental importance was discussed, upon which the parties came to a disagreement so unqualified that no future reconciliation was possible—the question respecting standards of authority by which to test questions of doctrine, etc. The Romanists proposed and insisted on the Consensus Patrum as such a standard, but the Protestants interposed a formal protest against the proposition. The attempt to ignore the fundamental character of this difference, made by introducing and proceeding to discuss the doctrine of original sin, met with failure; and as it was now evident that no agreement could be reached where the opposing principles were so surely destructive of each other, the Romish party adopted the tactics of exciting quarrels among their opponents, which should necessitate the adjournment of the conference. Canisius called attention to the many alterations made in the Augustana, and Sidonius demanded that the evangelicals should declare whether Zwinglians and Calvinists on the sacraments, Osiandrians on justification, Flacianists with respect to the De Seruo Arbitrio and good works, and the Picards on many points, were judged to be beyond the pale of the Augsburg Confession. The Weimar theologians now submitted their hitherto unpublished protestation to the president and the Romish councillors, despite the opposition of the Protestant assessors and the threat that they should be excluded from the congress. Duke John Frederic the Intermediate attempted, by personal intervention, to influence Melancthon to favor the Weimar party, but that theologian could lay the blame for the failure of the colloquy at no other door than that of the Weimar delegation, and was, besides, too closely united with the Württembergers to become the ally of Weimar. The Flacianists thereupon wrote to Pflug to explain their action, and to protest against their exclusion from the congress; and the Romish assessors, etc., voted against the continuation of the colloquy, on the ground that it was no longer possible to determine the party with which the disputation ought, by the terms of the Ratisbon recess, to be held. Both protestations were officially acknowledged by Pflug, Oct. 6. Duke Christopher of Saxony sent other theologians, but the Romanists persisted in their refusal to dispute. A delegation of French Protestants arrived at this precise juncture to invoke the good offices of their coreligionists with Henry II, who had incarcerated one hundred and thirty-five members of the Evangelical Church in Paris, and their arrival complicated matters by raising the question whether adherents of the Augsburg Confession could properly take action in favor of members of the Reformed churches; and the difficulty was still further aggravated by a violent controversial sermon, with which George Major, at Leipzig, responded to the charges submitted by the Weimarians at Worms. The protest rendered Oct. 21 by the evangelical party, in which they charged the failure of the colloquy upon the Romish opponents, though in some respects authorized, was yet neutralized by the irreconcilable differences which were thus shown to exist among its alleged supporters, and elicited no response. All the papers relating to the colloquy were sent to Ferdinand, and the members of the congress scattered. A royal rescript was received, Nov. 16, ordering, if possible, a renewal of the colloquy, in which the Weimar theologians should be allowed to participate, and in connection with which the Romish party should be satisfied with a general profession of adherence to the Augsburg Confession on the part of its opponents. A long series of protests and responses was the result of this order, whose persistency finally exhausted even the patience of Pflug. He forwarded the whole collection to the king, and reported the impossibility of securing the results desired from a disputation. The last official attempt to unite the two opposing religious parties of Germany was ended.

Wormwood, STAR OF (ἀστρον ἄψινδος, Rev. viii, 10, 11), the Apocalyptic appellation for the national daemon of Egypt, set forth in the vision of Patmos as a luminous idol presiding over "the third part of the waters." The vocation of this star was to destroy by poison, not by fire, sword, or famine; hence the Talmudic phrase "poison in Egypt" is put in opposition to food or "corn in Ephraim" as the symbol of blasphemy and idolatry (Bab. Talmud, Menachoth, fol. 85, 1). Philo also, speaking of Helicon, "the scorpion-like slave," represents him as having cast up τὸν Αἰγυπτιακὸν ἰόν, "the Egyptian venom," against the dwellers in Palestine (De Legat. p. 102, ed. Turneb.). Daniel gives a clear intimation of his acquaintance with the prevalent belief that, like Persia, Greece, and Judæa, every nation had a celestial prince or patron, שָׂר, sar, or sir (Dan. x, 21). This sar lameala, "prince on high," of the rabbins had also a representative image in the material firmament (rabbi Salomon on Dan. xi, 1), some (חֵלֶל, hélél) glittering son of the morning (Isa. xiv, 12), or "light of lights" (moré roé) among the splendid stars or intercessors above (Melitim, Ezek. xxxii, 7, 8), who were "darkened" when Pharaoh was extinguished. Eusebius (Demon. Evang. iv, 8, 10) and Iamblichus (De Egyptiorum Mysteriorum, § v, c. 25) both mention "the angels who preside over the nations;" and rabbi Solomon, the chief of the Gallican synagogue in his day, affirms that "before God wreaks his vengeance on a people he punishes their prince, because it is written, 'The Lord shall punish the host of the high ones on high,' and then follows 'and the kings of the earth upon the earth;' and, moreover, it is written, 'How art thou fallen, O Lucifer, son of the morning!'" (Comment. on Isa. xiii, 13). Hence, as the literal fulfilment of Isa. xxiv, 21, the Jews yet anticipate "the extirpation of all the Gentiles, with their princes on high and their (pretended) gods" (Nizzezon, p. 255, in Wagenseil's Tela Ignea).

John seems to employ this symbol of Egyptian poison and bitterness, as the prototype of a great anti-Christian power, which would poison and embitter the pure waters of Christian life and doctrine, converting them into "wormwood," miteraim being a figure of apostasy and rebellion. See STAR.

Woronicz, JAN PAWEŁ, an eminent Polish prelate and writer, was born in 1757. He was educated in a Jesuit seminary, entered that order at an early age, and on its abolition, in 1772, entered the Society of Missionaries. In consideration of important literary services rendered bishop Cholm, then vice-chancellor, he was rewarded with the deanship of Lvov. In 1795 he retired to the small town of Kazimierz, and took upon him the duties of a parish priest. When the duchy of Warsaw was formed, in 1808, he was made both a member of the council and dean in the chapter of the cathedral. In 1815 he became bishop of Cracow, and in 1827 archbishop of Warsaw and primate of Poland. Going abroad for medical advice, he died at Vienna, Oct. 16, 1829. He published, among other works, Sibylla, a poem:—Sejm Wislicki, or the Diet of Wislica, also a poem. His sermons were published at Cracow in 1829, under the title of Kazania, czyli Nauki Parafjalne.

Worrell, CHARLES FLAVEL, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., June 30, 1805. He graduated from Lafayette College in 1836, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1840. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newton in 1839. During his last year in the seminary he supplied the churches of Knowlton and Blairstown, N. J., preaching half of his time in Titusville. He was ordained an evangelist by the Newton Presbytery, and supplied the Upper Freehold (now Perrineville) Church for two years, when he was installed pastor. He labored here for twenty-five years, when he was released, in 1868, and supplied the Plumsted Church at New Egypt for one year. His next charge was at Squan Village, where he was installed in 1880. He then retired in very infirm health to his farm in Perrineville, and gradually declined until his death, Jan. 27, 1881. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 58. (W. P. S.)

Worship (properly some form of עֲבֹדָה, especially in Hithpael; λατρεία), homage paid to a superior, especially to God (which we consider only), usually expressed by prayer, sacrifice, and ritual. See each term in its place; also ADORATION.

I. General View.—The homage of the progenitors of our race was the direct and simple effusion of gratitude (see Schröder, De Prima Cultus Dirini Publici Institutione, Marburg, 1745). There can be no doubt that the Most High, whose essence no man hath seen, or can see, was pleased to manifest himself in Eden, by an external symbol, to the eyes of his innocent worshippers. This divine manifestation is called the presence of the Lord; and may have been in connection with the tree of life in the midst of the garden (Gen. ii, 9; iii, 8).

After the first transgression the mode of the divine manifestation was altered; and a mediatorial economy was established. Henceforth, the homage paid by man was the service of a creature conscious of crime, approaching God through the medium of sacrifice, pleading for forgiveness, and confiding in mercy. Though the divine manifestation was no longer immediate, yet a visible symbol of Jehovah was still vouchsafed in the Shekinah or visible glory, from which Cain was exiled (Gen. iv, 16; comp. 2 Thess. i, 9; Psa. xcvi, 8); which was seen by Abraham (Acts vii, 2); by Moses and the people (Exod. iii, 2-6; xiii, 21, 22; xxiv, 16, 18; Numb. xiv, 10; xvi, 19, 42); by the high-priest (Exod. xxv, 22; Lev. xvi, 2); by Solomon in the temple (1 Kings viii, 10-12); and finally in "the Word made flesh" (John i, 14).

Since this last visible manifestation, the worship of the Most High, which is no longer external and symbolic, has not been confined to any one place. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth" (John iv, 21-24). God now manifests himself to the spirits of his faithful worshippers, helping their infirmities. Hence the presence of the Lord is in every place where Christ is active in the Spirit, and where through him, the sole mediator, the faithful pay their homage. As the true worship of God is only in the inward heart, and the whole life a spiritual service, every Christian in particular, and every Church in general, now represent a spiritual temple of the Lord. In the assemblies of the faithful, God by his Spirit diffuses his vital and sanctifying influence, and takes his devout worshippers into fellowship with himself, from which they derive strength to do and suffer his will in the various scenes of life, while he there affords them a foretaste of the deep and hallowed pleasures which are reserved for them in his immediate presence forevermore (Matt. v, 8; Heb. xii, 14). See the monographs cited by Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 107, 127, 130.

II. Among the Ancient Israelites.—1. In General Acts.—The forefather of the Hebrew nation, Abraham, appears at the outset as a firm monotheist; but in his migrations there are obscure traces of a lingering idolatry, at least in his family (Gen. xxi, 19, 30; xxxv, 2 sq.; comp. Josh. xxiv, 2, 14; Jud. v, 6 sq.; see Jonathan, Targ. on Gen. xxxi, 19; also Sonne, Der Gott Abraham's [Hanover, 1806]). See TERAPHIM. The worship of the patriarchs (Ben-David, Ueb. die Relig. der Ebräer vor Moses [Berlin, 1812], contains strange hypotheses) was exceedingly simple, consisting of offerings and prayer (Gen. xxiv, 63), presented at whatever place of residence, although very early particular spots seem to have been held sacred (i. e. where God had specially manifested himself; see Gen. xii, 7, 8 [comp. xiii, 4]; xlv, 1 [comp. xxvi, 23]; e. g. anointed pillars, Gen. xxviii, 18; xxxv, 14), heights laving the preference to plains (Gen. xxii, 2; xxxi, 54; see Creuzer, Symbol. i, 158 sq.; Zachariä, De More Vett. in Locis Editis Colendis Deum [Halle, 1704]). See HIGH-PLACE. Subsequently worship was held under (shady) trees and in groves (Gen. xiii, 18; xxi, 33; comp. Tacit. Germ. xxxix, 7; Callim. In Dian. xxxviii; Soph. Trach. 754; Ovid, Fast. iii, 295; Apollon. Rhod. iv, 1714; see Woken, De Locis Temporibusque quæ Fideles, Ante Legem Cerimon. Preces Destinarent [Rostock, 1720]; Doughty Analect. i, 24 sq.). See GROVE. In the offerings the ruling idea was that of thanking and propitiating God in general, the proper notion of expiation not yet appearing. See OFFERING. The priests were the heads of the families. See MELCHIZEDEK.

In Egypt the larger part of the Israelites may perhaps have been more or less addicted to nature worship (see Exod. xxxii; Lev. xvii, 7; Josh. xxiv, 14; Ezek. xx, 7), and in the desert traces of Sabaism are evident (Numb. xxv; Amos v, 26 sq.). Moses, however, established the cultus of Jehovah as the exclusive religion, and to him the strict rule of monotheism is due. The ritual of the law is no copy of the Egyptian (Spener) nor of the Phœnician (Yatke) institutions, although particular features may have been derived from the former (Hengstenberg, Moses, p. 147 sq.; Bähr, Symbol. i, 39 sq.), but recognised Jehovah as the sole national deity, and stood in direct personal as well as public relation to him. See LAW. It contained a multitude of special provisions (such as sacrifices, vows, fasts, etc.), both of a positive and a negative kind, pointing to God as the giver of all good, and the object of all moral obligation, both of blessing and atonement; especially embodying the distinction of clean and unclean in all the bodily relations of life. The cardinal sections of this cultus are marked by the regularly recurring festivals (q. v.), and the tabernacle and temple were its central rallying-points as a national system of observance, while the priesthood formed its official conservators and expounders. See PRIEST.

The most marked of its peculiar features were the invisible character of the deity adored, in which it stood in bold contrast with all the prevalent idolatries; and the universality of its prescriptions, as pertaining not only to the whole nation, but to every individual in it, and to the minutest affairs of social and private economy. See MOSAISM.

In later times, especially after the exile, the national worship was in some degree affected by foreign subjugation, and in process of time abnormal elements gradually crept in, such as Sadduceism and Essenism. Under Antiochus Epiphanes a violent effort was made to force paganism bodily upon the Jews, but it succeeded only to a small extent. Under the Ptolemies full toleration was allowed, and under Alexander extraordinary privileges were granted even to foreign Jews. During all this period the heathen rulers occasionally contributed to the Mosaic worship (see Ezra vi, 9; 1 Macc. x, 34; 2 Macc. iii, 3; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 3; xiv, 10-23). It is well known that under the Roman rule, the Jews, even in Rome itself (Dio Cass. xxxvii, 17), were allowed the full exercise of their religion (see Zimmer, Gesch. d. röm. Privatrechts, I, ii, 470; Levysohn, De Judæor. sub Cæsar. Conditione [L. B. 1828]). See JUDAISM.

2. In Prayer Particularly.—This, as constituting the central idea of worship, was always strictly, although not formally, understood in the Mosaic service. There are no directions as to prayer given in the Mosaic law; the duty is rather taken for granted, as an adjunct to sacrifice, than enforced or elaborated. The temple is emphatically designated as "the House of Prayer" (Isa. lvi, 7); it could not be otherwise, if "He who hears prayer" (Psa. lxxv, 2) there manifested his special presence; and the prayer of Solomon offered at its consecration (1 Kings viii, 30, 35, 38) implies that in it were offered, both the private prayers of each single man, and the public prayers of all Israel.

It is hardly conceivable that, even from the beginning, public prayer did not follow every public sacrifice, whether propitiatory or eucharistic, as regularly as the incense, which was the symbol of prayer (see Psa. cxli, 2; Rev. viii, 3, 4). Such a practice is alluded to as common in Luke i, 10; and in one instance, at the offering of the first-fruits, it was ordained in a striking form (Deut. xxvi, 12-15). In later times it certainly grew into a regular service, both in the temple and in the synagogue. See SYNAGOGUE.

But, besides this public prayer, it was the custom of all at Jerusalem to go up to the temple, at regular hours if possible, for private prayer (see Luke xviii, 10; Acts iii, 1); and those who were absent were wont to "open their windows towards Jerusalem," and pray "towards" the place of God's presence (1 Kings viii, 46-49; Psa. v, 7; xxviii, 2; cxxxviii, 2; Dan. vi, 10). The desire to do this was possibly one reason, independently of other and more obvious ones, why the house-top or the mountain-top were chosen places of private prayer.

The regular hours of prayer seem to have been three (see Psa. lv, 17; Dan. vi, 10), the "evening," that is, the ninth hour (Acts iii, 1; x, 3), the hour of the evening sacrifice (Dan. ix, 21); the "morning," that is, the third hour (Acts ii, 15), that of the morning sacrifice; and the sixth hour, or "noonday." To these would naturally be added some prayer at rising and lying down to sleep; and thence might easily be developed (by the love of the mystic number seven), the "seven times a day" of Psa. cxix, 164, if this is to be literally understood, and the seven hours of prayer of the ancient Church. Some, at least, of these hours seem to have been generally observed by religious men in private prayer at home, or in the midst of their occupation and in the streets (Matt. vi, 5). Grace before meat would seem to have been an equally common practice (see Matt. xv, 36; Acts xxvii, 35).

The posture of prayer among the Jews seems to have been most often standing (1 Sam. i, 26; Matt. vi, 5; Mark xi, 25; Luke xviii, 11); unless the prayer were offered with especial solemnity and humiliation, which was naturally expressed by kneeling (1 Kings viii, 54; comp. 2 Chron. vi, 13; Ezra ix, 5; Psa. xcv, 6; Dan. vi, 10); or prostration (Josh. vii, 6; 1 Kings xviii, 42; Neh. viii, 6). The hands were "lifted up," or "spread out" before the Lord (Exod. ix, 33; Psa. xxviii, 2; cxxxiv, 2, etc.). In the Christian Church no posture is mentioned in the New Test. excepting that of kneeling; see Acts vii, 60 (St. Stephen); ix, 40 (St. Peter); xx, 36; xxi, 5 (St. Paul); perhaps from imitation of the example of our Lord in Gethsemane (on which occasion alone his posture in prayer is recorded). In after-times, as is well known, this posture was varied by the custom of standing in prayer on the Lord's day, and during the period from Easter to Whitsunday, in order to commemorate his resurrection, and our spiritual resurrection in him. See PRAYER.

II. Christian Worship.—This is usually divided into three kinds, according to the extent of the persons engaged in it.

1. Private Worship, otherwise called secret prayer, is between the individual and his Maker. It is specifically enjoined by our Lord (Matt. vi, 6), and is essential to the maintenance of spiritual life in the soul of the believer. See CLOSET.

The lately discovered Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (§ viii) enjoins the use of the Lord's Prayer "three times a day," evidently for private devotion. See LORD'S PRAYER.

Private worship should be conducted with, (1) reverence and veneration; (2) self-abasement and confession; (3) contemplation of the perfections and promises of God; (4) supplication for ourselves and others; (5) earnest desire of the enjoyment of God; (6) frequency and regularity. See DEVOTION.

2. Family Worship, i. e. regular domestic prayer. This is obviously called for in order to the proper religious conduct of the Christian household, and its obligation is enforced by nearly every branch of evangelical Christendom. See FAMILY.

3. Public Worship, i. e. religious services conducted in the general congregation. Some who have acknowledged the propriety of private worship have objected to that of a public nature, but without any sufficient ground. For Christ attended public worship himself (Luke iv); he prayed with his disciples (Luke ix, 28, 29; xi, 1); he promises his presence to social worshippers (Matt. xviii, 20). It may be argued also from the conduct of the apostles (Acts i, 24; ii, 4; vi, 4; xx, 36; Rom. xv, 30; 1 Cor. xiv, 2 Thess. iii, 1, 2; 1 Cor. xi) and from general principles (Deut. xxxi, 12; Psa. c, 4; 1 Tim. ii, 2, 8; Heb. x, 25).

The obligation of public worship is partly founded upon example, and partly upon precept; so that no person who admits that authority can question this great duty without manifest and criminal inconsistency. The institution of public worship under the law, and the practice of synagogue worship among the Jews, from at least the time of Ezra, cannot be questioned; both of which were sanctioned by the practice of our Lord and his apostles. The preceptive authority for our regular attendance upon public worship is either inferential or direct. The command to publish the gospel includes the obligation of assembling to hear it; the name by which a Christian society is designated in Scripture is a Church, which signifies an assembly for the transaction of business; and, in the case of a Christian assembly, that business must necessarily be spiritual, and include the sacred exercises of prayer, praise, and hearing the Scriptures.

But we have more direct precepts, although the practice was obviously continued from Judaism, and was therefore consuetudinary. Some of the epistles of Paul are commanded to be read in the churches. The singing of psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs is enjoined as an act of solemn worship to the Lord; and Paul cautions the Hebrews that they "forsake not the assembling of themselves together." The practice of the primitive age is also manifest from the epistles of Paul. The Lord's Supper was celebrated by the body of believers collectively; and this apostle prescribes to the Corinthians regulations for the exercises of prayer and prophesying, "when they came together in the Church"—the assembly. The periodicity and order of these holy offices in the primitive Church, appear also from the apostolic epistle of Clement of Rome: "We ought also, looking into the depths of the divine knowledge, to do all things in order, whatsoever the Lord hath commanded to be done. We ought to make our oblations, and perform our holy offices, at their appointed seasons; for these he hath commanded to be done, not irregularly or by chance, but at determinate times and hours; as he hath likewise ordained by his supreme will where, and by what persons, they shall be performed; that so all things being done according to his pleasure, may be acceptable in his sight." This passage is remarkable for urging a divine authority for the public services of the Church, by which Clement, no doubt, means the authority of the inspired directions of the apostles. See SERVICE.

The ends of the institution of public worship are of such obvious importance that it must ever be considered as one of the most condescending and gracious dispensations of God to man. By this his Church confesses his name before the world; by this the public teaching of his word is associated with acts calculated to affect the mind with that solemnity which is the best preparation for hearing it to edification. It is thus that the ignorant and the vicious are collected together, and instructed and warned; the invitations of mercy are published to the guilty, and the sorrowful and afflicted are comforted. In these assemblies God, by his Holy Spirit, diffuses his vital and sanctifying influence, and takes the devout into a fellowship with himself, from which they derive strength to do and to suffer his will in the various scenes of life, while he there affords them a foretaste of the deep and hallowed pleasures which are reserved for them at his right hand forevermore. Prayers and intercessions are offered for national and public interests, and while the benefit of these exercises descends upon a country, all are kept sensible of the dependence of every public and personal interest upon God. Praise calls forth the grateful emotions, and gives cheerfulness to piety; and that instruction in righteousness, which is so perpetually repeated, diffuses the principles of morality and religion throughout society, enlightens and gives activity to conscience, raises the standard of morals, attaches shame to vice and praise to virtue, and thus exerts a powerfully purifying influence upon mankind. Laws thus receive a force which, in other circumstances, they could not acquire, even were they enacted in as great perfection; and the administration of justice is aided by the strongest possible obligation and sanction being given to legal oaths. The domestic relations are rendered more strong and interesting by the very habit of the attendance of families upon the sacred services of the sanctuary of the Lord; and the meeting of the rich and the poor together, and their standing on the same common ground as sinners before God, equally dependent upon him, and equally suing for his mercy, has a powerful, though often an insensible, influence in humbling the pride which is nourished by superior rank, and in raising the lower classes above abjectness of spirit, without injuring their humility. Piety, benevolence, and patriotism are equally dependent for their purity and vigor upon the regular and devout worship of God in the simplicity of the Christian dispensation.

Public worship therefore is of great utility, as (1) it gives Christians an opportunity of openly professing their faith in and love to Christ; (2) it preserves a sense of religion in the mind, without which society could not well exist; (3) it enlivens devotion and promotes zeal; (4) it is the means of receiving instruction and consolation; (5) it affords an excellent example to others, and excites them to fear God, etc.

Public worship should be (1) solemn, not light and trifling (Psa. lxxxix, 7); (2) simple, not pompous and ceremonial (Isa. lxii, 2); (3) cheerful, and not with forbidding aspect (Psa. c); (4) sincere, and not hypocritical (Isa. i, 12; Matt. xxiii, 13; John iv, 24); (5) pure, and not superstitious (Isa. lvii, 15). Worshipper is a translation of the Greek word νεωκόρος, used once only (Acts xix, 35; marg. "temple-keeper"). The neocoros was originally an attendant in a temple, probably intrusted with its charge (Eurip. Ion [ed. Dindorf], p. 115, 121; Plato, Leg. [ed. Bekker], vi, 7; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iii, 14, 16; Pollux, i, 14; Philo, De Prov. Sac. 6, ii, 237; Hezychius explains it by ὁ τὸν ναὸν κοσμῶν, κορεῖν γὰρ τὸ σάειν; Suidas, κοσμῶν καὶ ἐντρεπίζων, ἀλλ' οὐκ ὁ σαρῶν [ed. Gaisf. p. 2579]). The divine honors paid in later Greek times to eminent persons, even in their lifetime, were imitated and exaggerated by the Romans under the empire, especially in Asia (Plut. Lys. p. 23; Appian, Mithr. p. 76; Dion Cass. xxxi, 6). The term neocoros became thus applied to cities or communities which undertook the worship of particular emperors, even in their lifetime, but there is no trace of the special title being applied to any city before the time of Augustus. The first occurrence of the term in connection with Ephesus is on coins of the age of Nero (A.D. 54-68), a time which would sufficiently agree with its use in the account of the riot there, probably in 55 or 56. In later times the title appears with the numerical adjuncts δύς, τρίς, and even τετράκις. A coin of Nero's time bears on one side Ἐφεσίων νεωκόρων, and on the reverse a figure of the temple of Artemis (Mionnet, Inscr. iii, 93; Eckhel, Doctr. Vet. Num. ii, 520). The ancient veneration of Artemis and her temple, on the part of the city of Ephesus, which procured for it the title of νεωκόρος τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος, is too well known to need illustration; but in later times it seems probable that with the term νεωκόρος the practice of neocorism became reserved almost exclusively for the veneration paid to Roman emperors, towards whom many other cities also of Asia Minor are mentioned as neocorists, e. g. Nicomedia, Perinthus, Sardis, Smyrna, Magnesia (see Herod. i, 26; Strabo, xiv, 640; Aristid. Or. [ed. Dindorf], xlii, 775; Mionnet, Inscr. iii, 97, Nos. 281, 285; Eckhel, De Num. ii, 520, 521; Boeckh, Inscr. 2617, 2618, 2622, 2954, 2957, 2990, 2992, 2993; Krause, *De Civ. Worthington, JOHN T., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector at Pittsfield, Ill., several years prior to 1856, and then at Prairieville, Mo. In 1859 he became rector at Louisiana, Mo. The following year he served two churches, viz., Calvary Church, in the same place, and St. Mark's Church, in Bowling Green. He served these two parishes until about 1864, when he fixed his residence at Pittsfield, Ill.; but in 1865 again became rector of Calvary Church, in Louisiana, Mo.

The following year he was employed as a missionary at Macon City and Shelby, and in 1867 officiated at Pittsfield, Ill., where he died in 1868, at the age of sixty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Wound (usually פצע, פלגה, a stroke; but prop. פצע, פצע). The Hebrews had but little knowledge of surgery, less than the Egyptians. They seldom used inward remedies, but trusted mainly to outward applications. Isa. i, 6 illustrates the treatment of wounds; they were "closed," that is, the lips of the wound were pressed together and bound, that cohesion of the parts might be effected. "There was, and is, no sewing up of wounds in the East; and hence the edges, healing without being perfectly united, make the scar of a wound more conspicuous and disfiguring than with us. The only attempt to produce cohesion is by 'binding up' the wound, after the edges have been as far as possible 'closed' by simple pressure" (Kitto, Daily Bible Illustr. vi, 25). See MEDICINE.

Wrangel, CHARLES MAGNUS, D.D., a Lutheran clergyman, regarded as the ablest of the early Swedish Lutheran ministers, entered upon his labors in America, as provost or chief pastor of the Swedish churches, in 1759. During his brief ministry here two new churches were built at Kingsessing and at Upper Merion, Pa. He preached with facility and acceptance in Swedish, German, and English. The Synod of Pennsylvania recommended the use of his translation into English of Luther's Catechism. He preached, not only throughout Pennsylvania, but occasionally in New Jersey, laboring in company with the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg. He was a man of culture, large and varied acquisitions, and great eloquence. The crowds that attended his preaching compelled him to hold service in the open air. After a residence of nine years in America he was recalled, and returned to Sweden in 1768, where he received from the government an episcopal appointment. He died in 1786. Wrath is great and permanent anger (q. v.). The wrath of God is his indignation at sin and punishment of it. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold the truth in unrighteousness" (Rom. i, 18). The objects of God's anger or wrath are the ungodly, whom he has declared he will punish. His wrath is sometimes manifested in this life, and that in an awful degree, as we see in the case of the old world, of Sodom and Gomorrah, the plagues of Egypt, the punishment and captivity of the Jews, and the many striking judgments on nations and individuals. But a still more awful punishment awaits the impenitent in the world to come, for the wicked, it is said, shall go away into everlasting punishment (Matt. xxv, 46), where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched (see Rom. ii, 8, 9). See MEDIATION; PUNISHMENT.

Wreath (סִבְכָּה, sebekah, a net-work or lattice [as often rendered], i. e. balustrade, 2 Kings xxv, 17; 2 Chron. iv, 12, 13; but perhaps really a festoon or checkerwork, as גְּדִיל, gedil, 1 Kings xvii, 17 ["fringe," i. e. tassel, Deut. xxii, 12] certainly means). Garlands in ancient times were chiefly made of green leaves or twigs (Wisd. ii, 18), which, among the ancient Israelites, likewise were symbols of joy (3 Macc. vii, 16). Accordingly, victorious chieftains and warriors were crowned with such wreaths (Jud. iii, 8; comp. Herod. i, 7, 11), and they were sometimes strewn in their path (Sueton. Ner. xxv; Livy, xxxiii, 33; Curtius, ix, 10, 25). Guests were adorned with them (see Heindorf, Horat. Satir. [ii, 3], p. 256) at feasts (3 Macc. iv, 8; comp. Athen. xv, 674); and on gala occasions dwellings and sacred objects were decked with them (1 Macc. iv, 57; Let. of Jer. 9 [in the Apocr. Greek]; see Voss, Virg. Georg. p. 826; Orelli, Arnob. ii, 43), as likewise sacrificial victims (Herod. iv, 11, 8) and altars (Acts xiv, 13; comp. Herod. ii, 45; Strabo, xv, 732; P'liny, xvi, 4; Ovid, Mel. v, 366; see Tzetzee, Lycoph. p. 327; Wetstein, N. T. ii, 543; Doughtaei Anal. ii, 81; P'erson. Ælian. V. WREATH, ECCLESIASTICAL, is a circular garland of flowers intertwined; a chaplet; that which is interwoven or entwined. Such symbols were made use of to designate certain saints, and are found represented both in old MSS., stained glass, and on the lower panels of rood-screens. A wreath of flowers, sometimes designated a "marriage crown," was often placed on the head of a virgin bride. Wreaths were also carried at funerals. One, of the 17th century, remains suspended in the south aisle of St. Alban's Abbey. And they were anciently, and are now not uncommonly, put upon graves and memorial crosses. See CROWN.

Wren, Sir CHRISTOPHER, an eminent English architect and mathematician, son of Dr. Christopher Wren, was born at Knoyle, in Wiltshire, Oct. 20, 1632, and early discovered a special genius for mathematics. He entered Wadham College, Oxford, at the age of fourteen, and graduated A.B. in 1650. He was then chosen fellow of All-Souls' College, and graduated A.M. in 1652. He was made professor of astronomy in Gresham College, London, in August, 1657, and three years later he received the Savilian professorship at Oxford. In 1661 he was appointed by Charles II assistant to sir John Denham, the surveyor-general, and was commissioned, in 1663, to survey and report upon St. Paul's Cathedral, with a view to its restoration in such a form as to harmonize it with the Corinthian colonnade added to it by Jones. The scheme met with such opposition from many quarters that it was indefinitely postponed. Wren was in the meantime employed on some other buildings, as the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, from 1664 to 1669, and the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, which, however, was not built until 1772. He visited Paris in 1665, while the works of the Louvre were in progress. After the great fire of 1666 he began at once a plan for the entire reconstruction of the city of London on a magnificent architectural plan, with wide streets and piazzas at intervals. But the immediate necessities of the citizens prevented the accomplishment of so vast a design, so he was obliged to content himself with labors upon individual structures. Among these were the Royal Exchange, Custom-House (both since destroyed by fire and rebuilt), Temple Bar, the Monument, and some churches, including that of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, all of which were built before St. Paul's was begun. He was busy in the meantime with designs for St. Paul's Cathedral, and when it came to the actual construction of the edifice, the plan which he preferred was rejected, and the one chosen he was compelled to modify contrary to his own judgment. The first stone of the present edifice was laid June 21, 1675, and the last stone on the summit of the lantern was laid by the architect's son, Christopher, in 1710. On the decease of sir John Denham, in March, 1688, Wren succeeded him in the office of surveyor-general of his majesty's works, an office which he held until after the death of queen Anne, in 1714. He had resigned the office of Savilian professor in 1673, and accepted that of president of the Royal Society in 1680. He also sat several times in Parliament, but his numerous and important professional engagements left him little leisure for other pursuits or duties. He was found dead in his chair after dinner, Feb. 25, 1723, and received the honor of a splendid funeral in St. Paul's, where his remains were deposited in a crypt, with no other adornment to his tomb than the inscription, "Si monumentum quæ-ris, circumspice." Among his numerous architectural works not already mentioned are, spire and Church of St. Mary-le-Bow (1671-78); St. Lawrence, Jewry (1671-86); Royal Observatory, Greenwich (1675); Chelsea Hospital (1682-90); St. James's, Westminster (1683); Hampton Court (1690), and towers of the west front of Westminster Abbey (1713). Wrestling (παλιν, Gen. xxx, 8, figuratively; πάλη, Eph. vi, 12, literally; in Gen. xxii, 25, 26, the verb is Πῆλ, used in a literal sense). This was one of the principal exercises in all the public games of Greece. The Greeks ascribed the invention of wrestling to mythical personages, and Mercury, the god of all gymnastic exercises, also presided over wrestling. In the Homeric age wrestling was much practiced; during this period wrestlers contended naked, and only the loins were covered with the perizoma (περιζωμα), and this custom probably remained throughout Greece until Ol. 15, from which time even this covering was no longer used, and wrestlers fought entirely naked. In the Homeric age the custom of anointing the body for the purpose of wrestling does not appear to have been known, but in the time of Solon it was quite general, and was said to have been adopted by the Cretans and Lacedæmonians at a very early period. After the body was anointed it was strewed over with sand or dust, in order to enable the wrestlers to take a firm hold of each other. The Greeks, in their combats, were generally matched two against two; but sometimes several couples contended at the same time. In case the whole aim and design of the wrestlers was to throw their adversary upon the ground, both strength and art were employed for this purpose; they seized each other by the arms, drew forward, pushed backwards, used many distortions and twistings of the body, locking their limbs in each other's, lifting from the ground, dashing their heads together, and twisting one another's necks. In this manner the athletes wrestled standing, the combat ending with the fall of one of the competitors. See GAMES.

Ancient Greek Wrestlers.

Among the ancient Egyptians likewise, according to Wilkinson, "wrestling was a favorite amusement; and the painting of the grotesques at Beni Hassan presents all the varied attitudes and modes of attack and defence of which it is susceptible. In order to enable the spectator more readily to perceive the position of the limbs of each combatant, the artist has availed himself of a dark and light color, and even ventured to introduce alternately a black and red figure. It is not, however, necessary to give an instance of every position indicated in those varied subjects; and a selection of the principal groups will suffice to convey some idea of their mode of representing the combatants, and of their general system of attack and defence. It is probable that, like the Greeks, they anointed the body with oil when preparing for these exercises, and they were entirely naked, with the exception of a girdle, apparently of leathern thongs. The two combatants generally approached each other holding their arms in an inclosed position before the body, and each endeavored to seize his adversary in the manner best suited to his mode of attack. It was allowable to take hold of any part of the body, the head, neck, or legs; and the struggle was frequently continued on the ground, after one or both had fallen, a mode of wrestling common also to the Greeks. I do not find that they had the same sign of acknowledging their defeat in this game as the Greeks, which was by holding up a finger in token of submission; and it was probably done by the Egyptians with a word" (Anc. Egypt. i, 204). See SPORT.

Writing (some form of 𓂏𓏏, katháb, γραφή) is the art of expressing thought by letters or other marks. See LETTER.

I. Origin and Various Kinds of Writings.—Language expresses thought, preserves thought, and also suggests or creates thought. But it is obvious that, so long as language is unwritten, it can accomplish these ends only in a very imperfect measure. Hence we may well suppose that, at a very early stage of man's history, attempts were made to present in some way to the eye the thought which spoken language conveyed to the ear, and thus give it visible form and permanence. But we cannot wonder that no record remains of the origin of an art, the beginnings of which must be placed in the political infancy of mankind. Pliny speaks of the "æternus literarum usus" (N. H. vii, 56).

The various kinds of writing which have been in use in different ages and in different parts of the world may be classified in two great divisions, according as the object of their inventors was to present the ideas to which they wished to give visible expression directly and immediately to the mind, or indirectly, through the medium of spoken language. Each of these methods—the ideographic and the phonographic or phonetic—has its attendant advantages and disadvantages; but the advantages of the latter method greatly preponderate. The principal recommendation of the former method, in which the depicted idea is caught up immediately by the mind, is that it addresses itself to a much wider circle than the latter, being intelligible, so far as it is intelligible, alike by all classes and in all countries; whereas the latter, in which the word is depicted, not the idea, is of course intelligible only to those who are acquainted with the language to which the depicted word belongs. On the other hand, the very serious drawbacks attendant upon the direct method are (1) that it is capable of giving distinct expression only to a very limited range of ideas, viz. the ideas of sensible objects and qualities, and if it attempts to go beyond that range at once becomes arbitrary and obscure; and (2) that in its representation even of the limited class of ideas to which it is capable of giving distinct expression, it is cumbrous and altogether unfitted for general use.

The sacred writing of the Egyptians may be regarded as forming a stage of transition between the two sorts of writing just described. Regarding the Mexican writing, see Robertson's America, bk. vii, and Prescott's Mexico, i, 86. See also Kopp's remarks on the Chinese writing in Bilder u. Schriften, ii, 66, 76, 87. Till the present century it was the received opinion that the ancient Egyptian was an exclusively ideographic writing, and to this conclusion the testimonies of those ancient writers who have given any account of it seemed to point (Kenrick, Anc. Egypt, i, 285–292). But the labors of Young, Champollion, Wilkinson, Lepsius, and others, during the last half-century, have thrown new light on those ancient and mysterious characters; and it is now agreed that, though very possibly a picture-writing originally, the hieroglyphic, in the form in which it appears on the most ancient monuments, and which it retains unchanged down to the early centuries after Christ, bears a composite character, being in part ideographic, in part phonetic. According to Mr. Kenrick (i, 300, etc.), "the characters are used in three different ways." There is first of all the pictorial use, in which "the character is designed to convey to the mind the idea of the object it represents, and nothing more.... This pictorial representation sometimes stands instead of a phonetic name for the object, but the most common use of it is to make the phonetic group of characters more intelligible by being subjoined to them. Thus, to the names of individuals the figure of a man is subjoined." Such characters Champollion calls determinatives. "The second use of the hieroglyphical writing is the symbolical, in which the object delineated is not meant to convey to the mind the idea of itself, but of something associated with it and suggested by it. Thus, a crescent denotes a month, . . . a stretched-out hand the act of giving, etc." "The last class, the phonetic, is really by far the most extensive. The greater part of the characters are as truly letters as if the language were English or Greek; . . . syllabic characters are the exception, not the rule." Mr. Kenrick adds that "in every inscription of any length we find these three modes of writing in use together, but with a great predominance of phonetic." See HIEROGLYPH.

Thus, in the hieroglyphic, we find the point of meeting between the two great classes of written characters, the ideographic and phonetic, and, as it seems, we have some light thrown on their mutual relation, and the manner in which the one arose, or, at least, may have arisen, out of the other. It has been affirmed, indeed, that the two kinds of writing are so entirely distinct that it is impossible to entertain the idea of a historical relationship between them (Kopp, ii, 62). But the fact is, that in the hieroglyphic, and to a certain extent also in the Chinese, such a relationship is already established. No nation which has made any considerable advances towards civilization can remain satisfied with a pictorial or symbolic writing, more particularly if it be disposed to cultivate to any extent intercourse with other nations. To represent by means of such a method of writing foreign words and names is a matter of the utmost difficulty; and it is not improbable that the origin of the phonetic writing may be traced to the intercourse of nations speaking different languages. Thus the Chinese are compelled to employ their ideographic characters phonetically in writing foreign words; and something of the same kind may, it is said, be discovered even in the Mexican writing. In the hieroglyphic the process had advanced much further. In Chinese, the name of the patriarch Shem is represented in writing by the ideograph for "life," sem being the Chinese for life (Kopp, ii, 80, 81). Here, consequently, we have an example of the same character used in two ways: (1) ideographically, to represent the idea of life, and (2) phonetically, to represent the sound sem.

From this there is but a step to the discovery of an alphabet, viz. the employment of the same sign to represent not the combination of sounds forming the word sem, but the initial sound s. That this step was actually taken by the Egyptians we appear to have sufficient evidence. "Thus, an eagle stands for A, and its Coptic name is ahom; a leaf of an aquatic plant, Coptic achi, stands for the same letter; a lion for L, Coptic libo; an owl for M, Coptic moulad, etc." (Kenrick, i, 305, 306). It is true, as Mr. Kenrick remarks, this correspondence cannot be traced through the whole of the phonetic alphabet. But when we consider how very imperfect is the knowledge which even the most distinguished Egyptologists possess of the ancient Egyptian language, we are fully warranted in putting aside this negative evidence, and receiving the hypothesis just mentioned (which was that of Champollion), as furnishing a very probable explanation of the origin of what may be called the Egyptian alphabet.

Passing now to the purely phonetic system of writing, it is of two sorts, viz. syllabic and alphabetic, in the former of which each character represents a combination of sounds, in the latter a simple sound. The most ancient alphabet is the Hebrew, or Phœnician, which, having its origin in the south-western corner of Asia, the home of the Shemitic nations, was at a very early period introduced by the Phœnicians into Greece, and perhaps at a somewhat later period even into India (Max Müller, Ancient Sanscrit Literature, p. 521; Journal of Asiatic Society, vi, 461, etc.; Zeitschrift d. D. M. G. x, 390, etc.), and thus became the medium through which almost all that is known of the ancient world has been preserved for the instruction of mankind. Who the person was who framed the first alphabet, and thus conferred upon his race a benefit of incalculable value, is unknown. It is the received opinion that in South-western Asia, as in Egypt, the alphabetic writing had for its precursor an ideographic, which, after passing through several stages of change, assumed at last the form in which it has come down to us. This opinion is founded (1) on a comparison with the hieroglyphic and other forms of writing, in which, as has already been observed, we detect the process of transition from the ideographic to the phonographic; and (2) on the names of the letters. These names are all significant; and it is probable that each of the letters in its original form was an ideograph representing the object denoted by the name which the letter still bears. Thus aleph (N) in its original form would be the ideograph of ox, beth of house, etc. Afterwards, when the ideographic writing gave place to the alphabetic, each of the alphabetic sounds was represented by a character which had formerly been the picture or symbol of an object of whose name that letter was the initial sound. We admit that it is by no means easy in the case of several of the letters to trace the resemblance between the letter form and the object of which, according to this hypothesis, it was originally the picture. But this need not excite our surprise, if we consider how great the change of form which these letters must have undergone as they passed from one country to another, or were transmitted from age to age (see Kopp, ii, 157, 377-399). The ancient Shemitic stone-cutters and engravers were not always careful to preserve an exact uniformity in their delineation of the several characters; they were probably less expert than their Egyptian contemporaries; and, it may be, had no very fixed standard by which to test the accuracy and to correct the errors of their workmanship. Moreover, the wide diffusion of the Shemitic alphabet would naturally occasion still more extensive changes in the forms of the letters. Ewald (Lehrbuch, § 77, b) speaks of three main branches from the parent stem, a southern, western, and eastern, viz. (1) the Himyaritic, in Southern Arabia, and the Ethiopic, though the latter is by others brought into closer connection with the Greek form of the Shemitic alphabet; (2) the western, including the Phœnician writing, and the Samaritan, which closely resembles it; and (3) the Babylonian or Assyrian, of which it is generally agreed that the Hebrew square character is an offshoot. Now, it is impossible to say which of these different forms of the Shemitic alphabet approaches nearest to the original. It is probable that all have deviated from it more or less. The original symbolic meaning of the characters having fallen into disuse, there was nothing to be gained by rigid adherence to all the details of the original forms.

Some writers, admitting that a resemblance does exist between the letters and the objects denoted by their names, have attempted to account for it otherwise than by the hypothesis of an earlier ideographic use of the alphabetic forms. They are of opinion that letters were from the first arbitrary signs of sounds, never of objects; and that the names they have so long borne originated, like the names of the constellations, in some fancied resemblance between them and the objects denoted by these names (Zeitschrift d. D. M. G. xi, 83). But, not to mention other objections to this view, when we consider that this resemblance in form is not the only point of correspondence, that there is the further correspondence between the sounds expressed by the letters and the initial sounds of the letter-names, it must appear improbable that whoever invented the latter should have been at the pains to search for names bearing to the letters this twofold correspondence, in initial sound and in form, and should not have been satisfied with a single point of correspondence. On the whole, the weight of argument, and also the weight of authority, are in favor of the other hypothesis.

It is impossible with any confidence to decide to which branch of the Shemitic family of nations the invention of the Shemitic alphabet is to be traced. From the names of the letters one might expect to have some light thrown upon this point; but this expectation is not realized. For, though the names are certainly Shemitic, there is no single language of the Shemitic family (so far as these languages are known) in which they all find explanation. But, in truth, of the Shemitic languages in their ancient form, with scarcely the exception of the Hebrew, our knowledge is very imperfect; and it would be extremely rash to say that such and such words did not exist in, for example, the old Phœnician language, because they have not been found in the few fragments of that language which have come down to us. See PHœNICIA.

It is the opinion of some that the idea of the alphabet was borrowed from Egypt. Hug (Die Erfindung der Buchstabenschrift, p. 82, etc.) thinks the Phœnicians resident in Egypt were the inventors of the alphabet, the forms of the letters being Egyptian, the names Phœnician. But if the Shemitic nations did borrow the idea from Egypt, they certainly worked it out much more successfully than those with whom, according to this hypothesis, it originated; and moreover, when we consider that there is no very marked correspondence between the Egyptian and Shemitic alphabets, except in the general idea, it is on the whole safer to conclude, in the absence of all historical evidence, that the two alphabets originated independently of each other, and were alike the offspring of that necessity which is the mother of invention. See ALPHABET.

II. The Hebrew Alphabet.—This consists of twenty-two letters. It has been conjectured that several of these letters did not belong to the alphabet in its original form; and there is a traditional statement found in some Greek writers of authority that the Phœnician alphabet (which, there is no question, was identical with the Hebrew) when first introduced into Greece consisted of not more than fifteen letters (see Hug, Erfindung der Buchstabenschrift, p. 12, etc.). However this may be, it is certain that at a very early period the Hebrew alphabet included the same number of letters as at present. This is ascertained (1) from those Scriptural songs and poems, the several lines or stanzas of which begin with the successive letters of the alphabet (see POETRY); and (2) from the use of the letters as marks of number, particularly when compared with the corresponding use of the Greek letters.

With regard to these twenty-two letters various questions have been started, to some of the more important of which it is necessary briefly to advert.

1. Did these letters originally represent syllables or simple sounds? Some writers, as Lepsius (Paläographie, § 19), have maintained that originally one and the same sign stood for both vowel and consonant. They hold that after the ideographic writing comes not the alphabetic but the syllabic; our separation of vowels and consonants being entirely ideal, and never actually possible, inasmuch as consonants cannot find expression without the aid of a vowel sound; and vowels cannot be pronounced except in dependence on a preceding consonantal element more or less distinct. In all this these writers are probably theoretically correct. Of the phonetic writing the syllabic is naturally the earliest stage, and in the Assyrian cuneiform we have the example of such a writing in actual use among the Shemitic nations (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i, 84, 337). But how essentially different in their nature the Assyrian letters are from the Hebrew is evident from the fact that the former, according to Sir H. Rawlinson and M. Oppert, number from three to four hundred, the latter only twenty-two. Indeed, it is impossible that a really syllabic alphabet should have fewer characters, except in the case of such a state of language as Lepsius presupposes, in which all the syllables are open, i. e. end with a vowel, and there is no variety of vowel sounds.

It is to be noted, however, that in the Ethiopic alphabet, in which each letter appears under seven different forms, according to the vowel sound associated with it, the simplest form is not that which the letter takes when no vowel follows, as we might expect, but that which it takes when followed by short a. When this sound follows, the original form of the letter is retained unchanged; when no vowel follows, a slight alteration is made in the form of the letter to indicate that it closes the syllable. See ETHIOPIC LANGUAGE.

2. Admitting that the Hebrew writing is alphabetic, is it purely consonantal, or does it contain signs to express vowel sounds as well as consonants? Some have held that the letters א, י, ו, were originally vowels, and that their use as consonants was of later introduction. It has been said that the alphabet of each language must contain a sufficient number of letters to represent all the sounds of the language, and that it is as easy to conceive of a language without vowel sounds as of an alphabet without vowel letters. And further, with regard to the Hebrew alphabet, Kopp (Bilder u. Schriften, ii, 112, etc.) thinks it absurd to suppose that it originally contained separate forms for guttural breathings so little differing from one another as א, י, ו, and not a single sign to represent the vowels, which constitute the life of every language. Now, with regard to the letters י and ו, it is certain they were used as vowels from a very ancient period; but there is no reason whatever to suppose that this use of these letters preceded their use as consonants, but every reason to suppose the contrary. At the beginning of a syllable only י is ever used as a vowel, and in the few cases in which it is so used it has been softened from an original consonantal sound. In the middle of a word, י and ו appear as vowels much less frequently in the earlier Hebrew books than in the later; and on the surviving monuments of the Phœnician language and writing they have uniformly a consonantal force. Besides, it is known that one of these letters, viz. ו, passed over from the Phœnicians to the Greeks as a consonant, though as a Greek letter it afterwards fell out of use. As for א, it is difficult to conceive how, if it originally stood for A in the Hebrew alphabet, it should, even at the date of the very earliest monuments of the language, have so entirely lost this power, and passed into a simple breathing. With regard to the alleged improbability of so ancient an alphabet distinguishing the closely allied sounds of א, י, ו, by the use of different characters, we are scarcely in a position to form a sound judgment on such a point, as the languages we speak differ so entirely from the Shemitic tongues, and our organs are consequently incapable of giving distinct expression to the variety of guttural sounds which characterized the ancient Hebrew, as it does the modern Arabic.

8. As to the origin of the Hebrew square characters, which appear in all extant MSS., as well as in our printed Bibles, the most diverse views have been propounded; some, especially among the older scholars, tracing them back to the age of Moses and the tables of the law; and others believing them to be of comparatively recent origin. The latter view is taken by Kopp (Bilder u. Schriften, ii, 164), who places their introduction somewhere about the 4th century, chiefly on the ground that the Palmyrene characters, from which, in his opinion, they were derived, were in use, as appears from inscriptions yet extant, as late as the 8d century of our era. But whatever may be the connection between the square character and the Palmyrene (and there is no doubt it is very intimate), the opinion of Kopp is quite untenable. We have direct testimony to the fact that the square character belongs to a much earlier age than that to which he assigns it. Jerome informs us that in his day the ineffable name Jehovah, יהוה, was sometimes introduced into Greek MSS. in its Hebrew form, and that readers of these MSS. unacquainted with Hebrew often by mistake read the name Πῑπῑ, ΙΙΙΙΙΙ: from which it is quite certain that, in Jerome's age, the Hebrew Bible must have been written in the square character presently in use, for only on this supposition was such a mistake possible. But, if Kopp's hypothesis be well founded, the square character must then have been quite recently elaborated from the Palmyrene. Was it so? Let us turn to another passage of Jerome, in his celebrated Prologus Galeatus, in which he informs us that the Hebrew character in use in his day had been introduced by Ezra, in place of a more ancient character which had passed over to the Samaritans. Is it credible that the square character was invented by the Jewish scholars, and introduced into MSS. for the first time in the 4th century, and yet that before the close of that same century its origin was completely forgotten, and had passed from the region of history to that of tradition or fable?

A similar testimony on the part of Origen carries us back a century earlier. He, too, mentions the Jewish tradition of a change of characters by Ezra, and speaks of MSS. in which the divine name was found even in his day written in the ancient characters (Montfaucon, Hexapla, ii, 94). The expression in the sermon on the mount, "not one jot," carries us back a step further still, indeed, almost to the beginning of our era; for it is evident that the phrase was a proverbial one, and that the alphabet which gave rise to it must have been in use for a considerable time. Now, it is only in the square character (also, though not so decidedly, in the Palmyrene) that the letter yod is very much smaller than the others. Kopp, who not unfrequently makes up by strength of assertion for weakness of argument, declares the foregoing argument to be "indescribably weak." He points to the Greek iota (ι), in the writing of those days by no means a small letter.

To all this we may now add the still more decisive evidence of monumental inscriptions, from which it appears that even before the period of the Maccabees the square character was in use among the Jews (Revue Archéol. 1864; Zeitschrift d. D. M. G. xix, 637-641; comp. Chwolson, Achtzehn Grabeschriften aus der Krim). That another character, more closely allied to the Phœnician and Samaritan, is found on the extant coins of the Maccabees does not militate against this conclusion. Ancient forms and usages often survive in coins and official documents after they have fallen into disuse in common life. Besides, it is not impossible that the Maccabees, vindicating as they did the nationality of Israel against the tyranny of Syria, may have purposely revived the use of the old characters, regarding, it may be, those in common use, which had been introduced under foreign auspices, as a badge of national servitude. However this may be, it is pretty certain that the old Jewish tradition of a change of letters having taken place in the time of Ezra, however erroneous it may be in some of its details, is not without a solid foundation in fact. See HEBREW.

III. Progressive Diffusion of the Art among the Ancient Hebrews.—The art of writing is not mentioned in the Hebrew Scriptures previous to the age of Moses. In the book of Genesis there is no allusion to documents of any sort. Abraham buys the field and cave of Machpelah, but there is no bill of purchase as in the case of a similar transaction in the history of Jeremiah (comp. Gen. xxiii with Jer. xxxii). The cave and the field "were made sure unto Abraham for a possession in the presence of the children of Heth, before all that went in at the gate of his city" (Gen. xxiii, 18). There is no hint of any documentary proof of the purchase being given or asked. It does not, however, by any means follow from this absence of allusion to the art of writing in the book of Genesis that that art was altogether unknown in Palestine in the patriarchal age. It may have been unknown, or but rarely practiced, by the nomad and rural population, in the midst of which the scene of the patriarchal story is laid; and yet have been known and practiced in the great centres of population and civilization, as it certainly was in Egypt, and we can scarcely doubt in Mesopotamia also, even at that early period (Kenrick, Egypt, ii, 101, 102). In confirmation of this we may refer to the story of Ruth, from which we find that even in a much later age it was not uncommon in Palestine to transact and complete purchases similar to Abraham's without the aid of writing materials, though no one will now maintain that the art of writing was then unknown (Ruth iv, 7-11). Instances of the same sort might be adduced from the history of all nations at a similar stage of social advancement.

When we pass from the age of the patriarchs to that of Moses, from the family life of Palestine to the political life of Egypt, and afterwards of the desert, we first meet with distinct traces of the art of writing. It is probable that the shoterim, or "officers" subordinate to the taskmasters, mentioned in Exod. v, 6-19, whose duty it was to see that the full amount of labor was performed by their enslaved countrymen, were so named from the use they made of writing in the discharge of their degrading functions (Arab. satar, to write). But, however this may be, we immediately afterwards read of the two tables of the law, and of the "book of the covenant" which "Moses read in the audience of all the people" (Exod. xxiv, 7, 12); also of a book, in which was entered a record of the victory over Amalek in Rephidim, and which Moses was directed to "rehearse in the ears of Joshua" (Exod. xvii, 14; this sepher or document may afterwards have formed part of the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," mentioned in Numb. xxi, 14); and at a later period mention is made of a written account of the journeyings of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii, 2). We also read of the high-priest's breastplate with its four rows of stones, on which were engraven, "like the engravings of a signet," the names of the twelve tribes of Israel; and of the mitre with its plate of pure gold, on which was a "writing like to the engravings of a signet," Holiness to the Lord (Exod. xxxix, 14, 30). Of the use of writing in legal transactions and processes mention is made in Numb. v, 23; Deut. xxiv, 1, 8. Specially to be noted is the figurative use which is made of the word sepher in Exod. xxxii, 32, 33: "Blot me out of the book which thou hast written," in which we already meet with the idea of a memorial book kept by God, "for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name" (Mal. iii, 16; Psa. lvi, 9 [8]). From all this it is evident that in the age of Moses the art of writing was commonly employed for the purpose of preserving the knowledge of important truths and the memory of important events. The assumption by some writers that the art of writing among the Hebrews is due to and dates from the delivery of the Law on Sinai, is negatived by the fact that it was evidently accepted at that time as a well-known art, and no hint is there given of it as a new invention.

We are not, however, to conclude from this that in that age, or for many ages after, writing was in common use among the body of the people. The knowledge of it was probably confined to the few who occupied an official position; the people being still dependent chiefly on oral instruction for their knowledge of what God had done for them, and what he required of them. Writing was in those days employed rather as a means of preserving than of circulating knowledge. The tables of stone were laid up in the ark. The book of the covenant (mentioned Exod. xxiv) was read to the people. The book of the law (mentioned Deut. xxxi, 24-26) was given to the Levites "to put it in the side of the ark; . . . for a witness against Israel." The song of Moses (ch. xxxii) was not circulated in writing among the people, but "was spoken in their ears" (xxxii, 30); and thus they were taught to repeat it and to transmit it to others (ver. 19, 22). It is only the king who was expressly enjoined to have written out for his special use a copy of the law, and to read therein all the days of his life (xvii, 18, 19). Of the people in general it was required that they should learn God's statutes, and have them in their heart, and teach them diligently to their children (vi, 6, 7), plainly by word of mouth; for when it is added (ver. 9), "Thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates," the expression is probably to be understood figuratively, like the "binding on the hand, and as frontlets between the eyes" (ver. 8; comp. also Psa. xlv, 2 [1]; lxxviii, 8, with ci, 19 [18]).

During the wars under Joshua no advancement in the art of writing is to be looked for. In the book of Joshua, accordingly, there is mention made but of one new document, viz., a geographical description and sevenfold division of the land west of Jordan, drawn up by delegates from the several tribes (Josh. xviii, 9). The shoterim are likewise mentioned among the civil and military officers (i, 10; iii, 2; viii, 23; xxiii, 2; xxiv, 1). In the same connection, also, frequent reference is made to the book of the law, which Joshua, in accordance with the injunction of Moses, wrote upon great stones on Mount Ebal, and afterwards read in the hearing of all the people. The book of Jasher (quoted x, 13) probably belongs to a somewhat later age (2 Sam. i, 18). See Book.

Important to our present purpose is the mention in Josh. xv, 15, 16, and Judg. i, 11, 12, of Kirjath-sepher (book-town), afterwards named Debir; and with this may be conjoined the allusion in the immortal song of Deborah to the mechokelim (engravers) and sopherim (writers), who led the bands of Machir and Zebulon "to the help of the Lord against the mighty" (Judg. v, 14). As yet the art of writing was not only confined to certain classes, but would seem to have been cultivated chiefly in certain localities (yet comp. viii, 14). The vicinity of Zebulon and Machir to Phœnicia and Damascus is to be noted (Gen. xlix, 13).

Under Samuel the institution of the schools of the prophets must have conducted not less to the literary than to the religious advancement of Israel. The seed which was then sown ripened into an abundant harvest during the glorious reigns of David and Solomon, which were rendered not less illustrious by the literary achievements which distinguished them than by the successful cultivation of the arts of war and peace. During these reigns the art of writing must have been largely employed, not only for literary, but for political purposes. The sopher, or secretary, scribe, was a constant attendant upon the monarch's person (2 Sam. viii, 17; xx, 25); so also the mazkir, or recorder. We also read of David himself writing a letter (sepher) to Joab (xi, 14, 15), though the fact that the reply of Joab was by messenger, and not by letter, would seem to indicate that the latter mode of communication was still rare and exceptional.

In the age of Isaiah, in which (or not long before) the strictly prophetic literature may be said to commence, various circumstances contributed to the development of the art of writing, such as the commercial activity of the reign of Uzziah; the closer relations and increased intercourse between Palestine and the great seats of civilization on the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, on the one side, and of the Nile, on the other; and also the captivity of the ten tribes, and the breaking-up of the local and geographical unity of Israel, which would necessitate a written intercourse between the widely separated branches of the nation. Accordingly, in the book of Isaiah we find various notices illustrative of our present subject, one of which is specially interesting, as it would appear to indicate a wider diffusion than we have had any evidence of previously to this period, of the practice of reading and writing among the people. We refer to Isa. xxix, 11, 12, where the prophet, in describing the blindness of the people, compares the word of God to a sealed book (סֵפֶר חִתּוּם), a document of any description, "which men deliver to one that is learned (lit. that knows writing, יֵדֵי סֵפֶר), saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot, for it is sealed; and the book is delivered to him that is not learned (who does not know writing), saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned (לֹא יֵדֵי סֵפֶר), I do not know books or writing." Here we read of two classes of the population, those able to read a written document, and those not able; and though the latter were probably still much the larger class, it would seem from the form of the prophet's language that the knowledge of writing was no longer confined within the limits of an official class, but was diffused somewhat more widely among the people.

This was still more decidedly the case in the age of Jeremiah, as is evident from the frequency with which the art of writing is alluded to in his writings, as compared with those of the earlier prophets. In Jeremiah we read for the first time of a conveyance of property being drawn out in writing, and subscribed not only by the principal parties, but also by witnesses (Jer. xxxii, 10-12). That this was the common practice is evident from ver. 34 of the same chapter. Copies of the sacred writings appear also to have been multiplied (viii, 8). Letters are spoken of more frequently (xxix, 25, 29). The class of sopherim, or scribes, had become numerous (viii, 8; xxxvi, 10, 12, 23, 26; xxxvii, 15, 20; lii, 25; Ezek. ix, 2, 3, 11; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 13). On the whole, the state of matters, with respect to the art of writing at this period in Palestine, was very similar to that which we find delineated on the Egyptian monuments (Kenrick, Egypt, i, 283, 284; ii, 52). A still wider diffusion of the art of writing is indicated by the notices in Eccles. xii, 12, and Ecclus. xlii, 7; Luke xvi, 6. See SCRIBE.

IV. Materials of Writing.—We have no very definite statement in the Old Test. as to the material which was in most common use for the purposes of writing. In all ages it has been customary to engrave on stone or metal, or other durable material, with the view of securing the permanency of the record; and accordingly, in the very commencement of the national history of Israel, we read of the two tables of the law written in stone, and of a subsequent writing of the law on stone (Deut. xxvii, 8; Josh. viii, 32). In the latter case there is this peculiarity, that plaster (sid, lime or gypsum) was used along with stone, a combination of materials which Hengstenberg, in the valuable dissertation on the art of writing among the Hebrews, contained in his Genuineness of the Pentateuch, illustrates by comparison of the practice of the Egyptian engravers, who, having first carefully smoothed the stone, filled up the faulty places with gypsum or cement, in order to obtain a perfectly uniform surface on which to execute their engravings (i, 488, Clarke's transl.; comp. also Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii, 111).

The metals also are mentioned as a material of writing; as lead, in Job xix, 23, 24 (though whether the reference in that passage is to writing on lead, or filling up the hollow of the letters with lead, is not certain) (comp. Pliny, Nat. Hist. xiii, 11; Hengstenberg, i, 488); brass (1 Macc. viii, 22; xiv, 18, 27, 48); gold (Exod. xxxix, 30). Of stamped coins of the Hebrews there is no trace earlier than the age of the Maccabees (1 Macc. xv, 6).

To the engraving of gems there is frequent reference in the Old Test., as in the account of the high-priest's breastplate (see also Isa. xxix, 11, 12, 18; Jer. xxxii, 14; Dan. xii, 4). In Gen. xxxviii, 18 we read of Judah's signet, and from the recent discoveries in the East we learn that it was the custom of the ancient Chaldeans to carry about with them an engraved cylinder in agate or other hard stone, which was used as a seal or signet, and probably worn round the wrist; but the engraving on these cylinders was not always accompanied with an inscription. (For specimens, see Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. i, 87, 117, 118, 134, 211, 331; comp. also Heeren, Hist. Res. ii, 203). See SEAL.

The common materials of writing were the tablet (פָּתִיל, liach) and the roll (מִגִּילָה, megillâh), the former probably having a Chaldean origin, the latter an Egyptian.

"The tablets of the Chaldeans," says Rawlinson (Anc. Mon. i, 85-87), "are among the most remarkable of their remains. . . . They are small pieces of clay, somewhat rudely shaped into a form resembling a pillow, and thickly inscribed with cuneiform characters. . . . What is most curious is that these documents have been in general enveloped, after they were baked, in a cover of moist clay, upon which their contents have been again inscribed, so as to present externally a duplicate of the writing within; and the tablet in its cover has then been baked afresh." The same material was largely used by the Assyrians, and many of their clay tablets still remain. "They are of various sizes, ranging from nine inches long by six and a half wide, to an inch and a half by an inch wide, and even less. . . . Some thousands of these have been recovered; many are historical, some linguistic, some geographical, some astronomical" (comp. Pliny, Nat. Hist. vii, 56; Heeren, Hist. Res. ii, 185). For the similar use of hollow cylinders, or prisms of six or eight sides, formed of fine terra cotta, sometimes glazed, on which the characters were traced with a small stylus, in some specimens so minutely as to be capable of decipherment only with the aid of a magnifying-glass, see Rawlinson (Anc. Mon. i, 380, 478). See BRICK.

In Egypt the principal writing material was quite of a different sort. Wooden tablets are indeed found pictured on the monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii, 100); but the material which was in common use, even from very ancient times, was the papyrus. This reed, found chiefly in Lower Egypt, "had various economic uses; . . . for writing, the pith was taken out, and divided by a pointed instrument into the thin pellicles of which it is composed; it was then flattened by pressure, and the strips glued together, other strips being placed at right angles to them, so that a roll of any length might be manufactured (Pliny's account, Nat. Hist. xiii, 23, is partly erroneous)" (Kenrick, Egypt. i, 89, 90). That this material was in use in Egypt from a very early period is evidenced by still existing papyrus MSS. of the earliest Theban dynasties (ibid. i, 283, 357, 485, 497; ii, 102, 142; see also Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii, 99). As the papyrus, being in great demand, and exported to all parts of the world, became very costly, other materials were often used instead of it, among which Wilkinson mentions leather, a few leather rolls of an early period having been found in the tombs (ibid. p. 152).

Now, as Palestine lay between Babylonia and Assyria on the one hand, and Egypt on the other, and formed the highway of union and commerce between them, we may expect to find the materials of writing very similar to those in common use in the two great centres of civilization, with which it was so intimately connected.

Accordingly, we do find mention made in the Old Test. both of the tablet (liach) and of the roll (megillâh); but we are not distinctly informed of what substance either tablet or roll was composed. From the character of the soil of Palestine it is pretty certain that the tablet was not, as usually in Assyria and Babylonia, of baked clay, unless we are to suppose an importation of Assyrian tablets, which is scarcely possible, as the writing seems to have been inscribed on these tablets when the clay was fresh, which, of course, it could not be after the lapse of time occupied in its carriage from Assyria to Palestine. Accordingly, brick is mentioned in Scripture usually in connection with Babylonia or Egypt (Gen. xi, 8; Exod. v, 7-19; Nah. iii, 14; Jer. xliii, 9; Ezek. iv, 1); rarely in connection with Palestine (Isa. ix, 9 [10]); and we read of no tablet of clay, but either of stone (as in the case of the tables of the law), or of metal (1 Kings vii, 86; Isa. viii, 1; comp. iii, 23), or of wood, which was probably the material commonly employed for writing on (Luke i, 63; comp. 2 Esdras xiv, 24), where tablets of box-wood are mentioned.

The roll, מִגִּילָה (or פָּתִיל סֵפֶר, Psa. xl, 8 [7]; Jer. xxxvi, 2, 4; Ezek. ii, 9), is not mentioned before the time of Jeremiah (unless Psa. xl be earlier), and only in Jer. xxxvi; Ezek. ii and iii, and Zech. v (comp. also Isa. xxxiv, 4, "And the heavens shall be rolled up as a book;" also 1 Esdras vi, 23; Luke iv, 17; Rev. vi, 14). Egyptian Scribes.

Egypt, especially in the later period of the kingdom, it is probable that the roll was of papyrus, though we have no actual statement to that effect in the Hebrew Scriptures. All we certainly know is that it was of a substance which might be torn and burned (Jer. xxxvi, 28); that the writing was with ink, דֵּגֶשׁ, değ, and was arranged in columns, דֶּלֶת הֹחַ, deluthóh, lit. doors (ibid.); and that both sides of the material were sometimes written on (Ezek. ii, 10). Mention is made of paper in 2 John 12; also 2 Esdras xv, 2; Tobit vii, 14. See PAPER.

That prepared skins were used for writing on by the ancient Hebrews is probable, but we have no direct evidence of the fact. Whether the Hebrew sopher, book or document, was so called from its connection with a root meaning to "scrape," is very doubtful; it is certain that in Hebrew the root saphár has no such meaning. The only Scriptural mention of parchment is found in the New Test. (2 Titus iv, 13). See PARCHMENT.

The tablet was inscribed with a stylus, which made an indentation in the substance of which the tablet was composed; the roll was written on with ink (2 Cor. iii, 8; 2 John 12; 3 John 13). In Ezek. ix, 2, 3, 11, the inkstand, כֶּסֶף הַכֶּתֶב, is mentioned. As to the stylus or pen, the Hebrew word for it is כֶּתֶב, et, the derivation of which is obscure. It is found in four passages, in two of which it has attached to it the epithet "iron" (Job xix, 24; Jer. xvii, 1); in the other two (Psa. xlv, 2 [1]; Jer. viii, 8) it denotes the pen in common use among the sopherim or scribes, of whatever sort that may have been. The word כֶּתֶב, chéret, which is usually conjoined by writers upon this subject with כֶּתֶב, is mentioned only in one somewhat obscure passage (Isa. viii, 1) as an instrument of writing; it has probably some connection with chartumim, the name of the Egyptian sacred scribes. In Egypt the reed-pen seems to have been in use from the earliest times. It even forms part of one of the ancient alphabetic characters. "The reed-pen and inkstand, and scribes employed in writing, appear among the sculptures in the tombs of Gizeh, which are contemporaneous with the pyramids themselves" (Kenrick, Egypt, ii, 102, 142). Wucherer, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 8, 1803, at Nördlingen. He studied at Erlangen, and, after completing his course, acted for some time as assistant minister in his native place. In 1832 he was appointed hospital-preacher of Nördlingen, and pastor at Baldingen. In 1855 he was called to Aha, and died there, Dec. 26, 1881. Wucherer was a faithful follower of his Master, and the many difficulties which he had to overcome in the early period of his ministry proved to be a blessing not only to him but also to his flock. He wrote, Vom ewangelisch-lutherischen Hauptgottesdienst (Nördlingen, 1846):—Zu einem Zeugnis (ibid. ed.):—Populäre Einleitung in die Schriften des Neuen Testaments (ibid. 1848-50, 2 parts):—Aufwärtlicher Nachweis aus Schrift und Symbolen, etc. (ibid. 1853). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1475. (B. P.)

Wülfer, JOHANN, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, June 7, 1651, and died there, Sept. 8, 1724. He is the author of שְׂקִלָּה Hebraice et Latine cum Amplo et Erudito Commentario Perpetuo (Altdorf, 1680):—Theriaca Judaica ad Examen Revocata, etc., Acc. Is. Viva Vindex Sanguinis (Nuremberg, 1681). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 537; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 525. (B. P.)

Wülffer, DANIEL, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, July 3, 1617, and died there, May 11, 1685, professor and pastor. He is best known as the author of that fine hymn, O Ewigkeit, O Ewigkeit, a favorite with the historian Niebuhr. It has been translated into English in the Lyra Germ. i, 26: "Eternity! Eternity! How long art thou, Eternity!" See Will, Nürnberg. Gelehrten-Lexikon, iii, 1757; Wülfferische Leichenpredigt (Nuremberg, 1685); Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 144 sq. (B. P.)

Wulfhelm, archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated by archbishop Athelm, to whom, both at Wells and at Canterbury, he was the successor. One of the first public acts he was called upon to perform, within two years of his appointment, was to officiate at the coronation of Athelstan, which occurred in 925. In January, soon after the coronation, his services were required at Tamworth, to officiate at a political marriage. Again, at a later period, the good offices of the archbishop of Canterbury were required at the marriage of the daughter of Edward the Elder to Hugh the Great, count of Paris, the son of Robert I. As a ruler he was discreet, and did much to civilize the people and promote Church privileges. He died in 942. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 339 sq.

Wulfach (or Wulf), an ecclesiastic of Longobardian origin, established himself as a stylite, in the latter half of the 6th century, in the district of Triera, France, and gained the admiration of the people for whose conversion he prayed, preaching to the multitudes that thronged around him, and persuading them to destroy their idols. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 28.

Wulfred, an English ecclesiastic of the 10th century, went over as a missionary to Skara, in West Gothland, and very inconsiderately seized an axe and dashed to the ground a much venerated idol, for which act he was attacked by a body of furious pagans and put to death at once. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 292.

Wulfred, archbishop of CANTERBURY, was nominated by Ethelhard, and was the first occupant of that important office. His consecration took place in August, 805, and it is said that, although he held the archbishopric for more than twenty-eight years, he did nothing worthy of record. He died March 24, 832. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 270 sq.

Wundemann, JOHANN CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian, who died doctor of theology and pastor at Wahlendorf, in Schleswig, Dec. 26, 1827, is the author of, Meletemata de S. Cæsa Comm. Exeg. Critic. (Rostock, 1820):—Geschichte der christlichen Glaubenslehren vom Zeitalter des Athanasius bis auf Gregor den Grossen (Leipzig, 1798-99, 2 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 454, 594. (B. P.)

Wunderbar, REUBEN, a Jewish teacher at Riga, where he died, Aug. 19, 1868, is the author of, חֲכָמִים לְבָרִי i. e. Biblisch-talmudische Medicin (Riga, 1850-60, 2 vols.). Besides, he contributed largely to Fürst's Orient and other periodicals. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 537. (B. P.)

Wundt, DANIEL LUDWIG, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 12, 1741, at Creuznach. He studied at Heidelberg, was appointed in 1765 second preacher at Ladenberg, and in 1770 first preacher at Oppenheim. In 1778 he was called to his native place, where he labored till 1788, when he was appointed second professor of theology at Heidelberg, advancing in 1797 to the first professorship. He died Feb. 19, 1805. Of his writings we mention, Kurzer Entwurf von Vorlesungen über die Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes (Heidelberg, 1788):—Magazin für die Kirchen- und Gelehrtengegeschichte des Churfürstenthums Pfalz (ibid. 1789-90, 2 vols.):—Magazin für die pfälzische Ge- schichte (ibid. 1798). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 758 sq. (B. P.)

Wuorin Väki, in Finnish mythology, were the genii of the rocks and mines, who worked under the guidance of Kämüläinen.

Würdtwein, STANISLAUS ALEXANDER, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born at Amorbach in 1719, and died, as suffragan of Worms, April 12, 1796. He is the author of, Monasticon Palatinum (Mannheim, 1793-97, 6 vols.);—Diocesis Megunt. in Archidiacon. Distr. et Comment. Dipl. Illustr. (ibid. 1767-77, 3 parts);—Thuringia et Eichsfeldia Med. Aevi Eccles. (ibid. 1790);—Subsidia Diplom. ad Selecta Juris Eccles. Germ. et Historiar. Capita Elucidanda (Bamberg, 1772-80, 18 parts);—Nova Subsidia Diplom. etc. (ibid. 1781-90). Würfel, ANDREAS, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, Feb. 28, 1718, and died at Offenhausen, in Bavaria, Oct. 6, 1769. He is the author of, Lebensbeschreibungen aller Geistlichen, welche in der Reichsstadt Nürnberg und auf deren Land seit der Reformation gedient (Nuremberg, 1756; continued until 1779 by Waldau, ibid. 1779-85);—Historische Nachricht von der Judengemeinde, welche ehemals in der Reichsstadt Nürnberg angesetzt gewesen, aber anno 1499 ausgeschafft worden (ibid. 1755);—Historische Nachricht von der Judengemeinde in der Hofmark Fürth, etc. (Frankfort and Prague, 1754). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 787; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 538. (B. P.)

Wurakaiti were priests of the third order among pagan Prussians. Griwa takes the lead as supreme head; next in order come the Griwaites, then the Siggonas, and lastly the Wurakaiti. They are said to have had in control the management of religious duties. Probably the dedication, cleansing, and sacrificing of the offerings was their main duty.

Württemberg, THE KINGDOM OF, has, according to the census of 1880, a population of 1,971,255 souls, of whom 1,861,412 are Protestants, 590,405 Roman Catholics, 18,826 Jews, etc. The constitution of the Protestant Church is consistorial. The highest legislative and administrative authority is, so far as regards purely ecclesiastical matters, vested in the consistory, composed of a president, a legal councillor, and seven ordinary councillors (five laymen and two ecclesiastics), who are all appointed by the king. Since 1848, however, there has been established alongside the consistory, and acting in unison with it, a series of parish councils, diocesan synods, and annual synods-general, to which the membership is elective. The territory of the Church is divided into six superintendencies, each with a "prelate" at the head. These prelates superintend 49 deaneries, comprising 906 parishes, with 1021 pastors. Each prelate has to visit his diocese every three years. The general synod meets every four years, and is composed of fifty-six members, viz., of forty-nine members representing the different deaneries, one representing the theological faculty of Tübingen, and six nominated directly by the king. The University of Tübingen has a faculty of Protestant theology, consisting of five ordinary professors, besides professors extraordinary and "Privatdozenten." The Roman Catholics in Württemberg form the episcopal diocese of Rottenburg, which comprises 672 parishes and 946 priests, paid by the state. The University of Tübingen has also a faculty of Roman Catholic theology, consisting of six professors. The diocese of Rottenburg belongs to the ecclesiastical province of Freiburg, to which its relations have been arranged by the papal bull Provida solersque, of Aug. 11, 1821. The present incumbent of the episcopal see at Rottenburg is the famous Church historian Hefele. Besides the Catholic faculty, there is also a clerical seminary at Rottenburg, with three professors. The relations of the Jews are regulated by the law of April 25, 1825. The territory of the synagogue is divided into twelve rabbinates, which are governed by an ecclesiastical council, consisting of the chief rabbi of Stuttgart and five laymen, who are responsible to the ministry for ecclesiastical affairs. Würzburg (or Wurtsburg), COUNCIL OF (Concilium Herbipolense). Würzburg is a fortified city of Bavaria, capital of the circle of Lower Franconia, one hundred and forty miles north-west of Munich, on the right bank of the Main. An ecclesiastical council was held there March 18, 1287, in the presence of the emperor Rudolph, by the legate, John, bishop of Tusculum, assisted by four archbishops, viz. those of Mayence, Cologne, Salzburg, and Vienna, some of their suffragans, and many abbots. Forty-two canons were published.

The first five relate to the moral conduct and manner of life of clerics, enjoining them not to frequent taverns, nor play with dice, and to dress according to their calling.

7. Forbids to celebrate two masses in one day, except in a case of necessity.

8. Orders that the Body of our Lord shall be carried with proper solemnity to the sick, and to women near the time of their delivery.

10. Forbids to hold two vicarages.

14. Orders those who have received investiture at the hands of laymen to resign their benefices into the bishop's hands, to whom the collation properly belongs.

15. Forbids any fee for the nuptial benediction and for funerals.

28. Forbids to fortify a church without the bishop's consent.

29. Forbids to excommunicate wives or mothers on account of their deceased husband's or children's debts, except they have succeeded to their property.

Wuttke, KARL FRIEDRICH ADOLPH, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born at Breslau, Nov. 10, 1819. Here he studied theology and philosophy, and lectured from 1843 as a private teacher on philosophy. In 1854 he was called as professor of theology to Berlin, and in 1861 as ordinary professor to Halle, where he died, April 12, 1870. He wrote, Abhandlung über die Cosmogonie der heidnischen Völker vor der Zeit Jesu u. der Apokal., a prize essay (Hague, 1850);—Geschichte des Heidenthums in Bezug auf Religion, Wissen, Kunst, Sittlichkeit und Staatsleben (Breslau, 1851-53, 2 vols.);—Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart (Hamburg, 1850; 2d ed. 1869);—Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre (Berlin, 1861-62, 2 vols.; Engl. transl. by J. P. Lacroix, Christian Ethics, N. Y., 1873, 2 vols.). After his death was published Zur Vorgeschichte der Bartholomäusnacht von Dr. S. Müller-Frauenstein (Leipzig, 1879). Besides these works he published some minor writings. See Literarischer Handweiser, 1870, p. 489; Theologische Universitätslexikon, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1478. (B. P.)

Wyatt, CHRISTOPHER B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from the General Theological Seminary, N. Y. He was ordained deacon in 1846 and presbyter in 1849; became rector of a church in San Francisco, Cal., which he served until about 1856; in 1858 of St. Thomas's Church, New Windsor, N. Y.; in 1862 of Mount Calvary Church, Baltimore, Md.; in 1864 of Trinity Church, San Francisco, Cal., whence he removed, in 1869 or 1870, to New York city, where he resided until 1872, and then became rector of St. Peter's Church, Westchester, N. Y., in which office he remained until his death, Nov. 8, 1879, at the age of fifty-four years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 172.

Wylie, SAMUEL, D.D., a Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland about 1792, and came to the United States when a boy. He was educated under the supervision of his uncle, the Rev. S. B. Wylie, D.D., of Philadelphia. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania and at the theological seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and was ordained in 1818. He acted as a home missionary until 1820, when he was settled as pastor of a church at Sparta, Ill., where he remained until his death, March 20, 1872. He exerted a wide influence in his field of labor, above a dozen churches having been formed from the nucleus of his original congregation.

Wymundus, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of the Isles in the 12th century. He was deprived about 1151. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 297.

Wyntown (Wynton, or Winton), ANDREW or, a Scotch ecclesiastic and poet, was a canon regular of the priory of St. Andrews, and in or before 1895 was elected prior of St. Serf's Inch, Lochleven. He was prior at least as late as 1418, and records the death of Robert, duke of Albany, which occurred in 1420. But the dates of his own birth and death are unknown. He is the third of the early Scotch poets whose works are extant. Of his writings we have De Orygynale Cronykil of Scotland, be Andrew of Wynton, Priour of Sanct Serfis Ynche, in Loch Leven; now first published, with Notes, etc., by David Macpherson (1795). Wytenbach, DANIEL, one of the most prominent theologians of the Reformed Church of the 18th century, was born at Worb, near Berne, June 26, 1706. He studied in Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and France. In 1746 he was appointed professor at Berne, and in 1766 was called to Marburg, where he also received the degree of doctor of divinity. He died June 29, 1779. He is the author of, Prælectio de Iis, quæ Observanda sunt circa Theologiam et Dogmaticam et Eleuthericam Docendam (Berne, 1747);—De Principiis Statuum Evangelicorum circa Res Ecclesiasticas (Marburg, 1756);—Testamen Theologia Dogmatica Methodo Scientifica Pertractata (Berne, 1741-47, 8 vols.);—*Compendium Theol. Xenians, a Monophysite sect which held a middle line between the Aphthartodocæ (q. v.) and the Phthartolatræ (q. v.), maintaining that Christ truly became man, with the same capacities for suffering and the same human sensations as men in general, but that he did so of his own free will and choice, and not by the physical necessity of his human nature. This doctrine originated with Xenaias, of Tabei, in Persia, afterwards known as Philoxenus of Mabug (q. v.). The Xenian party was strongly opposed, in common with the other Monophysites, by Flavian, the patriarch who succeeded Peter the Fuller.

Xeniklades, a Greek philosopher, was a native of Corinth. The age in which he flourished is uncertain. Our knowledge of him is derived chiefly from Sextus Empiricus, who represents him as the most ultra sceptic, maintaining that all notions are false, and that there is absolutely nothing true in the universe.

Xenaias. See PHILOXENUS OF MABUG.

Xenocrates, a Greek philosopher, was born in Chalcedon, 396 B.C. He was originally a pupil of Æschines, the Socratic philosopher, and afterwards of Plato. His intimate connection with Plato is indicated by the account that he accompanied that master to Syracuse. After the death of Plato he betook himself, with Aristotle, to Hermias, tyrant of Atarneus and Assus, and, after his return to Athens, was repeatedly sent on embassies to Philip of Macedonia, and at a later time to Antipater, during the Lamian war. The want of quick apprehension and natural grace he compensated by persevering and thorough-going industry, pure benevolence, purity of morals, unselfishness, and a moral earnestness which compelled esteem and trust even from the Athenians of his own age. Yet even he experienced the fickleness of popular favor, and being too poor to pay the perioikion, or protection money, is said to have been saved only by the courage of the orator Lycurgus, or even to have been bought by Demetrius Phaleræus, and then emancipated. He became president of the academy, 389 B.C., even before the death of Spensippus, and occupied the post for twenty-five years. He died in 314 B.C. Xenocrates' doctrines were discussed by Aristotle and Theophrastus, and he was held in high regard by such men as Panætius and Cicero. Diogenes Laertius gives a long list of his writings, but the works themselves have perished. With a more comprehensive work on dialectic there were connected separate treatises on science, on divisions, on genera and species, on ideas, on the opposite, and others, to which probably the work on mediate thought also belonged. Two works on physics are mentioned, as are also books upon the gods, on the existent, on the One, on the indefinite, on the soul, on the affections, on memory, etc. In like manner, with the more general ethical treatises on happiness and on virtue, there were connected separate books on individual virtues, on the voluntary, etc. His four books on royalty he had addressed to Alexander. Besides these, he had written treatises on the state, on the power of law, etc., as well as upon geometry, arithmetic, and astrology. We know little of the doctrines of Xenocrates, but we may infer that he exhibited his opinions in a systematic form, and not in dialogues, like his master, Plato. To him is attributed the division of philosophy into logic, ethic, and physic, or physics. He occupied himself principally with attempting to reduce the ideal doctrines of Plato to mathematical elements. He predicted three forms of being—the sensuous, that which is perceived by the intellect, and that which is compounded and consists in opinion. In his positions we see the tendency of the academy towards the Pythagorean doctrines of number. Unity and duality he considers as the gods which rule the world, and the soul as a self-moving number. Other like conceits are attributed to him. Xenocrates considered that the notion of the deity pervades all things, and is even in the animals which we call irrational. He also admitted an order of dæmons, or something intermediate between the divine and the mortal, which he made to consist in the conditions of the soul. In his ethical teaching he made happiness consist not in the possession of a virtuous mind only, but also of all the powers that minister to it and enable it to effect its purposes. How decidedly he insisted, not only on the recognition of the unconditional nature of moral excellence, but on morality of thought, is shown by the declaration that it comes to the same thing whether one casts longing eyes or sets his feet upon the property of others. His moral earnestness is also expressed in the warning that the ears of children should be guarded against the poison of immoral speeches. See Van de Wynpersee, Diatribæ de Xenocrate Chalcedonio (1822); Diogenes Laertius, Xenocrates; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, ii; Ueberweg, History of Philosophy, i, 183 sq.; Smith, Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. and Myth. a. v.

Xenophānēs, a Greek philosopher, was born at Colophon, Ionia, probably about 570 B.C. He was the son of Orthomenes, or, according to others, of Dexius. He left his native land as an exile, and betook himself to the Ionian colonies, Sicily, Zancle, and Catana. There can be no doubt that, as the founder of the Eleatic school, he lived for some time at least in Elea (Velia, in Italy, founded by the Phocæans about 536 B.C.), the foundation of which he had sung. His death occurred probably about 480 B.C., though amid the conflicting statements concerning his age it is best to say that he lived between the times of Pythagoras and Heraclitus, for he mentions the one and is mentioned by the other.

Xenophanes was a poet as well as a philosopher. He wrote an epic of two thousand verses on the founding of Elea, and a poem on the foundation of his native city, Colophon. His philosophical doctrines were expressed in poetic form, and from the few fragments of his poetry which remain, and the brief notices of him by other writers, we collect what we know of his doctrines. He attacked Hesiod and Homer, in hexameter verses, elegiacs, and iambic verses, for their representations of the deities, to whom those poets attribute all the vices and weaknesses of men. He taught that God was one, unlike men either in form or mind. He pointed out the fact that men, in their representations of the gods, depict them as having bodies like their own, and declared that if animals could make representations of the deity, they would make them like themselves. Assuming that the deity is the most powerful of beings, he proves that he must of necessity be one, all alike, all endued with equal powers of seeing, comprehending, and hearing. He asserted that the deity is of a spherical form, neither limited nor unlimited, neither moving nor at rest. God rules and directs all, and things as they appear to us are the imperfect manifestations of the One eternal. He maintains that God's true nature cannot be known. He has been charged with being a pantheist, but from this accusation Cousin takes some pains to defend him. In the early history of philosophy the language of the science was not well defined, so that many expressions which have since come to mean certain things did not then have those meanings. Certain expressions of Xenophanes have been quoted by modern writers to prove his pantheism; but other quotations, as, for example, those of Aristotle, show that he speaks of God as a Being eternal, and distinct from the visible universe.

Xenxi, a sect of materialists in Japan, who believe in no other life than the present.

Xeodoxins are a sect among the Japanese who acknowledge a future state, and believe in the immortality of the soul. Amidas is their favorite deity, and the bonzes of this sect go up and down the public streets and roads, summoning devotees by the sound of a bell, and distributing indulgences and dispensations, constantly crying in a chanting tone, "O ever blessed Amidas, have mercy upon us."

Xerophagia (Ξηροφάγια, from ξηρός, dry, and φαγῆναι, to eat) were fast-days in the early ages of the Christian Church, on which they ate nothing but bread and salt, and drank water; but afterwards pulse, herbs, and fruits were added. Epiphanius says, "throughout the Holy Week people continue to use dry food, viz. bread and salt, using water only in the evening" (Compend. Doct. Cath.). This great fast was kept six days of the Holy Week for devotion, and not by obligation; so that the Church condemned the Montanists, who, of their own private authority, would not only oblige all people to observe the xerophagia of the Holy Week, but also other fasts that they had established, as well as several Lenten. The Essenes, whether they were Jews or the first Christians of the Church of Alexandria, observed xerophagia on certain days; for Philo says that they put nothing to their bread and water but salt and hyssop. During Lent fish was the only animal food permitted; but, according to some authorities, fowls were afterwards added.

Xerxes (Ξέρξης; Persa. Khashwarshe, or K'harsa; according to Benfey, K'hakyrashe), king of Persia, is chiefly known for his gigantic but unsuccessful invasion of Greece (Herod. vii, viii; Diod. Sic. xi). He was the son of Darius Hystaspis, and of Atossa, daughter of Cyrus. He succeeded his father, 485 B.C., having been declared heir to the kingdom of Persia a short time before his father's death, who preferred him before his elder brother Artabazanes, because the latter was born while Darius was a private individual; but Xerxes was born after his elevation to the throne. He was the "fourth" king prophesied of in Dan. xi, 2: "Behold there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia (Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius, son of Hydaspes), and the fourth (Xerxes) shall be far richer than they all; and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece." Xerxes, on his accession, showed himself very friendly to the Jews of the captivity, and confirmed all the favors granted to them by his father; indeed, Josephus (Ant. xi, 5) ascribes to Xerxes the letter in behalf of the returning Jews given in Ezra vii, 11-26. He began his reign by conquering Egypt; and rapidly subdued the Phœnicians, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pontus, Pisidia, Lycia, Caria, Myria, Troas, Bithynia, the Hellespont, and the Isle of Cyprus. Four years previously the forces of Darius had been defeated by the Greeks under Miltiades at the battle of Marathon, and the interval had been passed in preparing for a second expedition. These preparations Xerxes continued on a scale of magnificence almost incredible, and in the spring of 480 B.C. he commenced his march from Sardis: his army was moved forward with great deliberation, and being numbered on its arrival in Europe was found to muster 1,700,000 foot, and 80,000 horse, besides camels, chariots, and ships of war. These numbers, and the undisciplined crowds who must have attended them, to supply their necessities, are perfectly bewildering to the imagination; and they become still more so when their varied costumes, the silken and gilded tents, the standards, the costly armor, and the variety of national weapons are considered. One of the political parties of Greece, it must be borne in mind, was in league with the Persian court, and the terror of the country verged upon despair of maintaining their liberties. Themistocles, however, while the pass of Thermopylæ was defended by Leonidas and his Spartans, succeeded in rallying his countrymen, and, having created a navy, defeated Xerxes at the battle of Salamis. This great event took place in the year of the expedition, 480 B.C. The Persians were allowed to retreat in such order as they could, but Mardonius, one of the principal commanders, reserved a more manageable army, the best he could pick from the flying host, and with these he was defeated by the combined Greeks the year following. After the return of Xerxes from his unsuccessful campaign, he ordered the demolition of all the Grecian temples in Asia; that of Diana at Ephesus alone being spared. He had been instructed in the religion of the magi by Zoroaster, and was inspired with a horror of idolatry; wherefore he also destroyed all the idols in Babylon; thus fulfilling the prophecies of Jeremiah vi, 2, and li, 44-47. See BABYLON. Xerxes was assassinated by Artabanus, one of the great officers of his court, who aspired to found a new dynasty in Persia, 465 B.C. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. See PERSIA.

This prince was, according to most interpreters (see especially Scaliger, Emend. Temp. vi, 587, 596), the Ahasuerus (אֲחַשְׁוֵרֶשׁ) of the book of Esther (q. v.), an identification which the whole romantic story of Esther goes to confirm (see Rosenmüller, Alterth. I, i, 338 sq.; Hävernick, Einkl. ins A. T. II, i, 339 sq.; Baumgarten, De Fide Libri Esth. p. 123 sq.; Rödiger, in the Halle Encyclop. I, xxxviii, 295 sq.). The enumeration of his resources (Esth. i, 2; ii, 16) agrees with the statement of Herodotus (vii, 7 sq.) respecting the rallying of his forces against Egypt; and the date of the great feast, the third year of his reign (Esth. i, 8), tallies with the successful conclusion of that expedition which took place in his second year, the luxurious character of the carousal, moreover, being consistent with Persian customs (Herod. i, 138). Between the dismissal of his sultana Vashti, resulting from that feast, and the reception of Esther into his harem in his seventh year (Esth. ii, 16), falls appropriately the Greek campaign which Xerxes, after several years of preparation, undertook in his fifth year (Herod. vii, 20). The duration of the expedition, from the crossing of the Hellespont by Xerxes [ibid. vii, 33 sq.], to the return to Susa, is disputed by chronologers [see Baumgarten, l. c. p. 142 sq.]; but two years is a most probable interval [see Clinton, Fasti Hellen. ii, 28; L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, ii, 387 sq.]. Again, the extent of the dominions (Esth. i, 1 sq.) corresponds with the classical description of Xerxes; he occupied Ethiopia, which Cambyses had already attempted (Herod. iii, 20 sq.; moreover, the Ethiopians served in Xerxes' armies, ibid. vii, 69 sq.), as well as India, to which Darius Hystaspis had advanced (ibid. iv, 44 sq.). Moreover, the voluptuousness and impiousness of women (Esth. v, 8; vii, 8 sq.; viii, 8 sq.; ix, 12) in the time of Xerxes are well known (Herod. ix, 10 sq.). But especially does the vexation which Xerxes experienced from the failure of his expedition to Greece explain why, while living entirely for his own pleasure (Cicero, Tusc. v, 7), he should not only abandon the most important affairs of state to an upstart (Esth. iii, 15), but also give his assent to deeds of violence, now on this side, and now on that (iii, 10 sq.; vii, 10; viii, 8); all of which facts characterize, according to our ideas, a senseless (Herod. vii, 35), godless (viii, 109), and cruel despot (vii, 87 sq.). Finally the raising of a large tax (Esth. x, 1) may readily have followed the exhaustion of the royal treasury by the disastrous expedition into Greece. See AHASUERUS.

Xuarez, JUAN, an early Roman Catholic prelate in America, was a native of Valencia, Spain, and entered the Franciscan order in the province of St. Gabriel, established by Martin at a time when, by the zealous reforms of cardinal Cisneros, the Franciscans of Spain were full of fervor and piety. When Cortez applied for Franciscan missionaries to undertake the conversion of the thickly settled towns in the kingdom just reduced by his arms, a Spanish father, Francis de los Angeles, had just been elected general of the order of St. Francis. For the leader of the twelve missionaries chosen, he selected Martin de Valencia, and fourth among their number was Juan Xuarez. With his superior, he embarked at San Lucar, Jan. 15, 1524, and on May 18 they reached the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, before Vera Cruz, and met Cortez at Mexico. Father Xuarez was placed at Huegocongo, and as the result of his labors there the temple, where human sacrifices had often been perpetrated, was destroyed. After laboring here two years he returned to Spain, in 1526, accompanied by some of his Indian pupils, and sent out six more missionaries. In 1527 Xuarez was assigned to the expedition then fitting out by Pamphilo de Narvaez, which was intended to establish in Florida a settlement to rival that of Mexico. Xuarez was not only made commissary of his order, but was nominated bishop of Florida, his diocese to extend from the Atlantic to Rio de las Palmas, Mexico. With four Franciscan fathers and other priests, he sailed from San Lucar, June 17, 1527, and reached Florida in April. Misfortune attended this ill-starred expedition. The people were fierce and hostile, and the force, thinned by disease and constant engagements, crept along the northern coast of the gulf of Mexico. The brave Narvaez was driven out to sea, and never again heard of. The party then scattered, and many perished on an island called Malhado, probably that called Massacre Island by the French. There is no record of the death of bishop Xuarez and his companion, John de Palos. Alvar Nunez Cabeza de Vaca, with three others, reached a Spanish post in Sonora, but has left no details. They either perished of hunger or at the hands of the Indians, about the close of 1528. The portraits of the original twelve Franciscans of Mexico have been preserved, and that of Xuarez appears in the relation of Cabeza de Vaca. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1872, p. 67.

Yahgan Version of the Scriptures. Yahgan is the language spoken by a tribe in the south of Tierra del Fuego. The Rev. T. Bridges, of the South American Missionary Society, who has been laboring among this people for the last eleven years, and has taught them to read and write their own tongue, written according to Ellis's phonetic system, has prepared the gospel of Luke in the above language, spoken by about three thousand people. This is the only part of the Bible which has been published in Yahgan by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and appears for the first time in the seventy-sixth report (1880), in the table of languages. Yaks are a species of demons recognised as remnants of the primitive superstition of the Singhalese in Ceylon. They are supposed to be the authors of diseases and other misfortunes, and the Yakadura, or devil-dancer, is almost invariably called upon to overcome their malignity by his chants and charms. In these exorcisms the performers wear horrible masks, which have beaks, and are, in fact, caricatures of birds' heads. These demons are believed to marry, and delight in dances, songs, and other amusements. They have great strength, and some of them are represented as possessing splendor and dignity.

Yalden (or Youlding), Thomas, D.D., an English divine and poet, was born at Exeter in 1671. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and chosen fellow in 1700. He entered into holy orders the following year, became rector of Willoughby, in Warwickshire, and was chosen lecturer of moral philosophy. In 1706 he entered the family of the duke of Beaufort, and soon after became rector of Chalton and of Cleanville, in Hertfordshire. He also had the sinecure prebends of Deans, Hains, and Pendles, in Devonshire. In 1718 he was chosen preacher of Bridewell Hospital, on the resignation of Dr. Atterbury. He was arrested and tried for complicity in what is known as Bishop Atterbury's Plot, in 1722, but was soon released for want of evidence. He died July 16, 1736. He published an Ode for St. Cecilia's Day (1693):—On the Conquest of Namur, a Pindaric ode (1695):—The Temple of Fame, a poem (1700):—A Hymn to Darkness:—A Hymn to Light, and other works, chiefly poetical. Yale, ELISHA, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Lee, Mass., June 15, 1780. He was converted in 1799; pursued his classical and theological studies, under the Rev. Dr. Perkins, at West Hartford, Conn.; was licensed to preach by the North Association of Hartford County in February, 1803, and ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Kingsborough, N. Y., May 28, 1804, where he remained until 1852. He was chosen a corporate member of the American Board of Foreign Missions in 1838. He died Jan. 9, 1853. Dr. Yale was an excellent classical and general scholar. His discourses were always rich in substantial and well-matured thought, and in nothing was he more remarkable than his devotion to the cause of missions and to the preparation of young men for the ministry.

He published, Divine Method for Raising Charitable Contributions (Boston, 1845):—Select Verse System, for the Use of Individuals, Families, and Schools (Rochester, 1853). He also published single sermons and articles in periodicals, and left in MS. A Review of a Pastorate of Forty-eight Years and Helps to Cultivate the Conscience. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 348; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Yang and Yin (or Yen) are terms used in Chinese philosophy to indicate the two phases under which the ultimate principle of the universe displays itself in the phenomenal world. They were generated by Tai-ki, or the supreme principle—Yang being a perfect, subtle, celestial, luminous nature; Yin being matter, imperfect, crude, earthly, obscure. From this duality of opposite essences, called the two Ke, all created existences have sprung. Gardner (Faiths of the World, a. v.) quotes from Hardwick as follows: "According to the different proportions in which Yang and Yin are blended is the character of every created existence. Everything is Yang and Yin together. For the highest actual manifestation in which Yang preponderates we look to heaven itself, which is, accordingly, to be esteemed the aptest image cognizable by the senses of the ultimate and all-embracing principle. Earth is, on the contrary, the highest form of Yin. The same duality, where one or other of the factors operated, either for the purpose of transforming or uniting, issued in the first production of the innate essences, which constitute the five elements of water, fire, wood, metal, and earth. A transcendental union and coagulation now takes place of the ultimate principle, the two essences, and the five elements. The positive essence becomes the masculine power, the negative essence the feminine power, conceived in which character the former constitutes the heavenly mode, or principle; the latter the earthly mode, or principle. By a mutual influencing, the two produce all things in the visible, palpable world, and the double work of evolution and dissolution goes on without end—Yang evincing its peculiar force in every kind of progress, Yin in every kind of retrogression; Yang determining commencement, Yin completion; Yang predominant in spring and summer, and the author of all movement and activity; Yin more visible in the autumn and the winter, passive, drooping, and inert." The same idea pervades their notions of rational as well as irrational beings. In the ethical system of the Chinese, evil is Yin of the moral world, and good is Yang. See CHINA.

Yao Version of the Scriptures. This language is spoken by the Yaos, occupying the country to the east and south of Lake Nyassa, including the Scotch stations Blantyre and Livingstonia. The Rev. Chauncy Maples, of the Universities' Mission, after working three years at Masasi, in Africa, with bishop Steere, prepared a translation of the gospel of Matthew into that language, which was printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society in London in 1880, at the recommendation of bishop Steere, the translator himself carrying the work through the press. Yariba (or Yoruba) Version of the Scriptures. Yariba is an African language spoken by the tribes on the right, or west, bank of the Niger. A translation into this dialect is of recent date. The first part printed was the epistle to the Romans, translated by the Rev. S. Crowther, a native of the country. It was published in 1850. In the following year the gospel of Luke, the Acts of the Apostles, together with the epistles of James and Peter, were printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Other parts were added from time to time, and at present the Yorubas enjoy the entire New Test., together with the books of Genesis to Ruth, Psalms, and Daniel, of the Old Test., in their vernacular (B. P.)

Yarn (מִקְרֶה, mikrêh, a collection; or מִקְרָה, mikrâ). The notice of yarn is contained in an extremely obscure passage in 1 Kings x, 28 (2 Chron. i, 16): "Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn; the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price." The Sept. gives ἐκ Θεκουί, implying an original reading of מִתְקוֹיִס; the Vulg. has de Coa, which is merely a Latinized form of the original. The Hebrew received text is questionable, from the circumstance that the second mikrêh has its final vowel lengthened as if it were in the status constructus. The probability is that the term does refer to some entrepôt of Egyptian commerce, but whether Tekoah, as in the Sept., or Coa, as in the Vulg., is doubtful. Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 1202) gives the sense of "number" as applying equally to the merchants and the horses: "A band of the king's merchants bought a drove (of horses) at a price;" but the verbal arrangement in 2 Chron. is opposed to this rendering. Thénius (Exeg. Handb. on 1 Kings x, 28) combines this sense with the former, giving to the first mikrêh the sense "from Tekoah," to the second the sense of "drove." Bertheau (Exeg. Handb. on 2 Chron. i, 16) and Fürst (Lex. s. v.) side with the Vulgate, and suppose the place called Coa to have been on the Egyptian frontier: "The king's merchants from Coa (i. e. stationed at Coa) took the horses from Coa at a price." The sense adopted in the A. V. is derived from Jewish interpreters. See LINEN.

Year (שָׁנָה, shandh, lit. repetition, kindred with שָׁנָה, second; ἔτος), the highest ordinary division of time, marked by the solar revolutions of the seasons. See TIME.

1. Years, properly so called.—Two years were known to, and apparently used by, the Hebrews. See CALENDAR.

1. A year of 360 days, containing 12 months of 30 days each, is indicated by certain passages in the prophetic Scriptures. The time, times, and a half, of Daniel (vii, 25; xii, 7), where "time" (חֵן, Heb. מִדְּבָר) means "year," evidently represent the same period as the 42 months (Rev. xi, 2) and 1260 days of the Revelation (xi, 3; xii, 6), for $360 \times 3.5 = 1260$, and $30 \times 42 = 1260$. This year perfectly corresponds to the Egyptian Vague year, without the five intercalary days. It appears to have been in use in Noah's time, or at least in the time of the writer of the narrative of the flood, for in that narrative the interval from the 17th day of the 2d month to the 17th day of the 7th of the same year appears to be stated to be a period of 150 days (Gen. vii, 11, 24; viii, 3, 4; comp. 18), and, as the 1st, 2d, 7th, and 10th months of one year are mentioned (vii, 11; viii, 4, 5, 18, 14), the 1st day of the 10th month of this year being separated from the 1st day of the 1st month of the next year by an interval of at least 54 days (viii, 5, 6, 10, 12, 13), we can only infer a year of 12 months. Ideler disputes the former inference, arguing that as the water first began to sink after 150 days (and then had been fifteen cubits above all high mountains), it must have sunk for some days ere the ark could have rested on Ararat, so that the second date must have been more than 150 days later than the first (Handbuch, i, 69, 70, 478, 479). This argument depends upon the meaning of the expression "high mountains," and upon the height of "the mountains of Ararat," upon which the ark rested (Gen. viii, 4), and we are certainly justified by Shemitic usage, if we do not consider the usual inference of the great height attained by the flood to be a necessary one (Genesis of the Earth and of Man, 2d ed. p. 97, 98). The exact correspondence of the interval mentioned to 5 months of 30 days each, and the use of a year of 360 days, or 12 such months, by the prophets, the latter fact overlooked by Ideler, favor the idea that such a year is here meant, unless, indeed, one identical with the Egyptian Vague year, of 12 months of 30 days and 5 intercalary days. The settlement of this question depends upon the nature and history of these years, and our information on the latter subject is not sufficiently certain to enable us to do more than hazard a conjecture.

A year of 360 days is the rudest known. It is formed of 12 spurious lunar months, and was probably the parent of the lunar year of 354 days, and the Vague year of 365. That it should have continued any time in use would be surprising were it not for the convenient length of the months. The Hebrew year, from the time of the Exodus, as we shall see, was evidently lunar, though in some manner rendered virtually solar, and we may therefore infer that the lunar year is as old as the date of the Exodus. As the Hebrew year was not an Egyptian year, and as nothing is said of its being new, save in its time of commencement, it was perhaps earlier in use among the Israelites, and either brought into Egypt by them or borrowed from Shemitic settlers.

The Vague year was certainly in use in Egypt in as remote an age as the earlier part of the 12th dynasty (cir. 2000 B.C.), and there can be no reasonable doubt that it was there used at the time of the building of the Great Pyramid (cir. 2350 B.C.). The intercalary days seem to be of Egyptian institution, for each of them was dedicated to one of the great gods, as if the innovation had been thus made permanent by the priests, and perhaps rendered popular as a series of days of feasting and rejoicing. The addition would, however, date from a very early period, that of the final settlement of the Egyptian religion.

As the lunar year and the Vague year run up parallel to so early a period as that of the Exodus, and the former seems to have been then Shemitic, the latter then, and for several centuries earlier, Egyptian, and probably of Egyptian origin, we may reasonably conjecture that the former originated from a year of 360 days in Asia, the latter from the same year in Africa, this primitive year having been used by the Noachians before their dispersion.

2. The year used by the Hebrews from the time of the Exodus may be said to have been then instituted, since a current month, Abib, on the 14th day of which the first Passover was kept, was then made the first month of the year. The essential characteristics of this year can be clearly determined, though we cannot fix those of any single year. It was essentially solar, for the offerings of productions of the earth, first-fruits, harvest-produce, and ingathered fruits were fixed to certain days of the year, two of which were in the periods of great feasts, the third itself a feast reckoned from one of the former days. It seems evident that the year was made to depend upon these times, and it may be observed that such a calendar would tend to cause thankfulness for God's good gifts, and would put in the background the great luminaries which the heathen worshipped in Egypt and in Canaan. Though the year was thus essentially solar, it is certain that the months were lunar, each commencing with a new moon. There must, therefore, have been some method of adjustment. The first point to be decided is how the commencement of each year was fixed. On the 16th day of Abib ripe ears of corn were to be offered as first-fruits of the harvest (Lev. ii, 14; xxiii, 10, 11): this was the day on which the sickle was begun to be put to the corn (Deut. xvi, 9), and no doubt Josephus is right in stating that until the offering of first-fruits had been made no harvest-work was to be begun (Ant. iii, 10, 6). He also states that ears of barley were offered (ibid.). That this was the case, and that the ears were the earliest ripe, is evident from the following circumstances. The reaping of barley commenced the harvest (2 Sam. xxi, 9), that of wheat following, apparently without any considerable interval (Ruth ii, 23). On the day of Pentecost thanksgiving was offered for the harvest, and it was therefore called the Feast of Harvest. It was reckoned from the commencement of the harvest, on the 16th day of the 1st month. The 50 days must include the whole time of the harvest of both wheat and barley throughout Palestine. According to the observations of modern travellers, barley is ripe, in the warmest parts of Palestine, in the first days of April. The barley-harvest, therefore, begins about half a month or less after the vernal equinox. Each year, if solar, would thus begin at about that equinox, when the earliest ears of barley must be ripe. As, however, the months were lunar, the commencement of the year must have been fixed by a new moon near this point of time. The new moon must have been that which fell about or next after the equinox, not more than a few days before, on account of the offering of first-fruits. Ideler, whose observations on this matter we have thus far followed, supposes that the new moon was chosen by observation of the forwardness of the barley-crops in the warmer parts of the country (Handbuch, i, 490). But such a method would have caused confusion on account of the different times of the harvest in different parts of Palestine; and in the period of the Judges there would often have been two separate commencements of the year in regions divided by hostile tribes, and in each of which the Israelitish population led an existence almost independent of any other branch. It is more likely that the Hebrews would have determined their new-year's day by the observation of heliacal or other star-risings or settings known to mark the right time of the solar year. By such a method the beginning of any year could have been fixed a year before, either to one day, or, supposing the month-commencements were fixed by actual observation, within a day or two. We need not doubt that the Israelites were well acquainted with such means of marking the periods of a solar year. In the ancient Song of Deborah we read how "They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Siera. The river of Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon" (Judg. v, 20, 21). The stars that marked the times of rain are thus connected with the swelling of the river in which the fugitive Canaanites perished. So, too, we read how the Lord demanded of Job, "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Kimah, or loose the bands of Kesil?" (Job xxxviii, 81). "The best and most fertilizing of the rains," in Palestine and the neighboring lands, save Egypt, "fall when the Pleiades set at dawn (not exactly heliacally), at the end of autumn; rain scarcely ever falling at the opposite season, when Scorpio sets at dawn." That Kimah signifies the Pleiades does not admit of reasonable doubt, and Kesil, as opposite to it, would be Scorpio, being identified with Cor Scorpionis by Aben-Ezra. Therefore it cannot be questioned that the Israelites, even during the troubled time of the Judges, were well acquainted with the method of determining the seasons of the solar year by observing the stars. Not alone was this the practice of the civilized Egyptians, but, at all times of which we know their history, of the Arabs, and also of the Greeks in the time of Hesiod, while yet their material civilization and science were rudimentary. It has always been the custom of pastoral and scattered peoples, rather than of the dwellers in cities; and if the Egyptians be thought to form an exception, it must be recollected that they used it at a period not remote from that at which their civilization came from the plain of Shinar.

It follows, from the determination of the proper new moon of the 1st month, whether by observation of a stellar phenomenon, or of the forwardness of the crops, that the method of intercalation can only have been that in use after the captivity, the addition of a 13th month whenever the 12th ended too long before the equinox for the offering of the first-fruits to be made at the time fixed. This method is in accordance with the permission granted to postpone the celebration of the Passover for one month in the case of any one who was legally unclean, or journeying at a distance (Numb. ix, 9-18); and there is a historical instance in the case of Hezekiah of such a postponement, for both reasons, of the national celebration (2 Chron. xxx, 1-3, 15). Such a practice as that of an intercalation varying in occurrence is contrary to Western usage; but the like prevails in all Moslem countries in a far more inconvenient form in the case of the commencement of every month. The day is determined by actual observation of the new moon, and thus a day is frequently unexpectedly added to or deducted from a month at one place, and months commence on different days at different towns in the same country. The Hebrew intercalation, if determined by stellar phenomena, would not be liable to a like uncertainty, though such may have been the case with the actual day of the new moon.

The later Jews had two commencements of the year, whence it is commonly but inaccurately said that they had two years, the sacred year and the civil. We prefer to speak of the sacred and civil reckonings. Ideler admits that these reckonings obtained at the time of the second temple. The sacred reckoning was that instituted at the Exodus, according to which the 1st month was Abib; by the civil reckoning the 1st month was the 7th. The interval between the two commencements was thus exactly half a year. It has been supposed that the institution at the time of the Exodus was a change of commencement, not the introduction of a new year, and that thenceforward the year had two beginnings, respectively at about the vernal and the autumnal equinoxes. The former supposition is a hypothesis, the latter may almost be proved. The strongest point of evidence as to two beginnings of the year from the time of the Exodus, strangely unnoticed in this relation by Ideler, is the circumstance that the sabbatical and jubilee years commenced in the 7th month, and no doubt on the 10th day of the 7th month, the Day of Atonement (Lev. xxv, 9, 10), and as this year immediately followed a sabbatical year, the latter must have begun in the same manner. Both were full years, and therefore must have commenced on the 1st day. The jubilee year was proclaimed on the 1st day of the month, the Day of Atonement standing in the same relation to its beginning, and perhaps to the civil beginning of the year, as did the Passover to the sacred beginning. This would be the most convenient, if not the necessary commencement of a year of total cessation from the labors of agriculture, as a year so commencing would comprise the whole round of such occupations in regular sequence from seed-time to harvest, and from harvest to vintage and gathering of fruit. The command as to both years, apart from the mention of the Day of Atonement, clearly shows this, unless we suppose, but this is surely unwarrantable, that the injunction in the two places in which it occurs follows the regular order of the seasons of agriculture (Exod. xxiii, 10, 11; Lev. xxv, 3, 4, 11), but that this was not intended to apply in the case of the observance. Two expressions, used with reference to the time of the Feast of Ingathering, on the 15th day of the 7th month, must be here noticed. This feast is spoken of as אָדָמָה אֲדָמָה, "in the going out" or "end of the year" (Exod. xxiii, 16), and as אֲדָמָה אֲדָמָה, "[at] the change of the year" (xxxiv, 22), the latter a vague expression, so far as we can understand it, but quite consistent with the other, whether indicating the turning-point of a natural year, or the half of the year by the sacred reckoning. The rabbins use the term אֲדָמָה to designate the commencement of each of the four seasons into which they divide the year (Handbuch, i, 550, 551). Our view is confirmed by the similarity of the 1st and 7th months as to their observances, the one containing the Feast of Unleavened Bread, from the 15th to the 21st inclusive; the other, that of Tabernacles, from the 15th to the 22d. Evidence in the same direction is found in the special sanctification of the 1st day of the 7th month, which in the blowing of trumpets resembles the proclamation of the jubilee year on the Day of Atonement. We therefore hold that from the time of the Exodus there were two beginnings of the year, with the 1st of the 1st and the 1st of the 7th month, the former being the sacred reckoning, the latter, used for the operations of agriculture, the civil reckoning. In Egypt, in the present day, Moslems use the lunar year for their religious observances, and for ordinary affairs, except those of agriculture, which they regulate by the Coptic Julian year.

8. We must here notice the theories of the derivation of the Hebrew year from the Egyptian Vague year, as they are connected with the tropical point or points, and agricultural phenomena, by which the former was regulated. The Vague year was commonly used by the Egyptians; and from it only, if from an Egyptian year, is the Hebrew likely to have been derived. Two theories have been formed connecting the two years at the Exodus.

(1) Some hold that Abib, the 1st month of the Hebrew year by the sacred reckoning, was the Egyptian Epiphi, called in Coptic, Epepi, and in Arabic, by the modern Egyptians, Abib, or Ebib, the 11th month of the Vague year. The similarity of sound is remarkable, but it must be remembered that the Egyptian name is derived from that of the goddess of the month, PEP-T or APAP-T (?) whereas the Hebrew name has the sense of "an ear of corn, a green ear," and is derived from the unused root עָבַב, traceable in עָב, "verdure," Chaldee, עָב, "fruit," Arabic, ab, "green fodder." Moreover, the Egyptian P is rarely, if ever, represented by the Hebrew ב, and the converse is not common. Still stronger evidence is afforded by the fact that we find in Egyptian the root AB, "a nosegay," which is evidently related to Abib and its cognates. Supposing, however, that the Hebrew calendar was formed by fixing the Egyptian Epiphi as the 1st month, what would be the chronological result? The latest date to which the Exodus is assigned is about 1820 B.C. In the Julian year 1820 B.C., the month Epiphi of the Egyptian Vague year commenced May 16, 44 days after the day of the vernal equinox, April 2, very near which the Hebrew year must have begun. Thus, at the latest date of the Exodus, there is an interval of a month and a half between the beginning of the Hebrew year and Epiphi 1. This interval represents about 180 years, through which the Vague year would retrograde in the Julian until the commencement of Epiphi corresponded to the vernal equinox, and no method can reduce it below 100. It is possible to effect thus much by conjecturing that the month Abib began somewhat after this tropical point, though the precise details of the state of the crops at the time of the plague, as compared with the phenomena of agriculture in Lower Egypt at the present day, make half a month an extreme extension. At the time of the plague of hail, the barley was in the ear and was smitten, with the flax, but the wheat was not sufficiently forward to be destroyed (Exod. ix, 81, 82). In Lower Egypt, at the present day, this would be the case about the end of February and beginning of March. The Exodus cannot have taken place many days after the plague of hail, so that it must have occurred about or a little after the time of the vernal equinox, and thus Abib cannot possibly have begun much after that tropical point; half a month is therefore excessive. We have thus carefully examined the evidence as to the supposed derivation of Abib from Epiphi, because it has been carelessly taken for granted, and more carelessly alleged in support of the latest date of the Exodus.

(2) We have founded an argument for the date of the Exodus upon another comparison of the Hebrew year and the Vague year. We have seen that the sacred commencement of the Hebrew year was at the new moon about or next after, but not much before, the vernal equinox: the civil commencement must usually have been at the new moon nearest the autumnal equinox. At the earliest date of the Exodus computed by modern chronologers, about the middle of the 17th century B.C., the Egyptian Vague year commenced at or about the latter time. The Hebrew year, reckoned from the civil commencement, and the Vague year, therefore, then nearly or exactly coincided. We have already seen that the Hebrews in Egypt, if they used a foreign year, must be supposed to have used the Vague year. It is worth while to inquire whether a Vague year of this time would further suit the characteristics of the first Hebrew year. It would be necessary that the 14th day of Abib, on which fell the full moon of the Passover of the Exodus, should correspond to the 14th of Phamenoth, in a Vague year commencing about the autumnal equinox. A full moon fell on the 14th of Phamenoth, or Thursday, April 21, 1652 B.C., of a Vague year commencing on the day of the autumnal equinox, Oct. 10, 1653 B.C. A full moon would not fall on the same day of the Vague year within a shorter interval than twenty-five years, and the triple near coincidence of new moon, Vague year, and autumnal equinox would not recur in less than fifteen hundred Vague years (Encyclop. Brit. 8th ed. "Egypt," p. 458). This date of the Exodus, 1652 B.C., is only four years earlier than Hales's, 1648 B.C., and only six years later than that adopted in this Cyclopædia, 1658 B.C. In confirmation of this early date, it must be added that in a list of confederates defeated by Thothmes III at Megiddo, in the twenty-third year of his reign, are certain names that we believe can only refer to Israelitish tribes. The date of this king's accession cannot be later than about 1460 B.C., and his twenty-third year cannot therefore be later than about 1440 B.C. Were the Israelites then settled in Palestine, no date of the Exodus but the longest would be tenable. See CHRONOLOGY.

II. Divisions of the Year.—1. Seasons.—Two seasons are mentioned in the Bible, עֵסֶר, "summer," and חֹרֶף, "winter." The former properly means the time of cutting fruits, the latter, that of gathering fruits; they are therefore, originally, rather summer and autumn than summer and winter. But that they signify ordinarily the two grand divisions of the year, the warm and cold seasons, is evident from their use for the whole year in the expression עֵסֶר וְחֹרֶף, "summer and winter" (Psa. lxxiv, 17; Zech. xiv, 8; perhaps Gen. viii, 22), and from the mention of "the winter house" (Jer. xxxvi, 22) and "the summer house" (Amos iii, 15, where both are mentioned together). Probably חֹרֶף, when used without reference to the year (as in Job xxix, 4), retains its original signification. In the promise to Noah, after the flood, the following remarkable passage occurs: "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease" (Gen. viii, 22). Here "seed-time," זֵרַע, and "harvest," קְצִיר, are evidently the agricultural seasons. It seems unreasonable to suppose that they mean winter and summer, as the beginnings of the periods of sowing and of harvest are not separated by six months, and they do not last for six months each, or nearly so long a time. The phrase "cold and heat," קֹר וְחֹם, probably indicates the great alternations of temperature. The whole passage, indeed, speaks of the alternations of nature, whether of productions, temperature, the seasons, or light and darkness. As we have seen, the year was probably then a wandering one, and therefore the passage is not likely to refer to it, but to natural phenomena alone. See SEASON.

2. Months.—The Hebrew months, from the time of the Exodus, were lunar. The year appears ordinarily to have contained 12, but, when intercalation was necessary, a 13th. The older year contained 12 months of 30 days each. See MONTH.

3. Weeks.—The Hebrews, from the time of the institution of the Sabbath, whether at or before the Exodus, reckoned by weeks, but, as no lunar year could have contained a number of weeks without a fractional excess, this reckoning was virtually independent of the year as with the Moslems. See WEEK.

4. Festivals, Holy Days, and Fasts.—The Feast of the Passover was held on the 14th day of the 1st month. The Feast of Unleavened Bread lasted 7 days; from the 15th to the 21st, inclusive, of the same month. Its first and last days were kept as Sabbaths. The Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, was celebrated on the day which ended 7 weeks, counted from the 16th of the 1st month, that day being excluded. It was called the Feast of Harvest, and Day of First-fruits. The Feast of Trumpets (lit. "of the sound of the trumpet") was kept as a Sabbath on the 1st day of the 7th month. The Day of Atonement (lit. "of atonements") was a fast, held the 10th day of the 7th month. The Feast of Tabernacles, or Feast of Gathering, was celebrated from the 15th to the 22d day, inclusive, of the 7th month. Additions made long after the giving of the law, and not known to be of higher than priestly authority, are the Feast of Purim, commemorating the defeat of Haman's plot; the Feast of the Dedication, recording the cleansing and re-dedication of the Temple by Judas Maccabeus; and four fasts. See FESTIVAL.

III. Sacred Years.—1. The Sabbatical year, שְׁנַת הַשַּׁבָּת, "the fallow year," or, possibly, "year of remission," or שְׁנַת עֶשְׂרִים alone, kept every seventh year, was commanded to be observed as a year of rest from the labors of agriculture and of remission of debts. Two Sabbatical years are recorded, commencing and current, 164-3 and 186-5 B.C. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

2. The Jubilee Year, שְׁנַת הַיּוֹבֵל, "the year of the trumpet," or שְׁנַת חֲמִישִׁים alone, a like year, which immediately followed every seventh Sabbatical year. It has been disputed whether the jubilee year was every forty-ninth or fiftieth, the former is more probable. See JUBILEE.

YEAR, ECCLESIASTICAL. The present arrangement of the ecclesiastical year is one which has grown up and developed during the course of a long time, representing the wisdom of successive ages. It was but natural that the anniversaries of the chief events of our Lord's life, and of the day on which the Holy Ghost came down upon the Church, should be observed by the disciples. Accordingly, it is not surprising that one of the very earliest questions debated in the Church was as to the time of keeping Easter. As early as A.D. 158, Polycarp went to consult Anicetus at Rome on this question, and the controversy, which they could not settle, was brought to a close by the Council of Nicaea. Similar early testimony may be found as to other festivals and solemn days. The anniversary of our Lord's death, Good Friday, must have been kept from the first. So, too, Epiphanius (Hæres. lxxv; Arian. vi) speaks of St. Paul as keeping the feast of Pentecost, and quotes Acts xx, 16, in that connection. We find notices of the Epiphany as early as A.D. 200. Augustine observes that it, with other anniversary solemnities, was either instituted by the apostles themselves or by plenary councils.

Next after these "days which the Lord hath made," there arose the commemorations of the saints and martyrs of the Church. These are of very high antiquity. In the epistle of the Church at Smyrna to the Church at Philomelium (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iv, 15), the Christians of Smyrna tell their brethren where Polycarp's body was entombed, and how they intended to assemble at that place and celebrate his birthday with joy and gladness. The festival of St. Peter is traced back to the 8d century, and no doubt was observed much earlier as a festival of Peter and Paul. Origen names the Commemoration of the Holy Innocents, and Chrysostom the Festival of All Martyrs, which was kept on the octave of Pentecost.

Then, in course of time, other festivals were introduced; such as the Eucenias (q. v.). Bishops were also wont to keep the anniversaries of their consecrations, and particular churches had special days of thanksgiving for great mercies and deliverances vouchsafed to them from God. Ordination was gradually limited to the Ember (q. v.) season, that thus there might be a special time of prayer and fasting on behalf of the newly ordained. Marriages were forbidden in certain parts of the year; as from Advent Sunday to Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, three weeks before the feast of St. John, and from Rogation Sunday to Trinity Sunday. The special times for baptism were Epiphany, Easter, and Whitsuntide, but chiefly the latter two. During certain festal seasons kneeling at prayers was forbidden, as from Easter to Whitsuntide inclusive, as ordered by the twentieth canon of Nicaea. On the Lord's day the standing posture was also adopted, in memory of our Lord's resurrection. Thus gradually were ordered and harmonized the seasons of the Church. Kurtz says:

"In the East, the symbolical relation between the natural and the ecclesiastical year was ignored, except so far as implied in the attempt to give to the Jewish feast a Christian adaptation. To some extent, indeed, Western ideas had been imported in reference to the great festivals, such as Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, but not in connection with the ordinary sun and feast days. At first the ecclesiastical year in the East commenced with Easter, afterwards with Quadragesima or with Epiphany, and ultimately in September, as under the old dispensation. The year was divided into four parts, according to the 'lectio continua' of the gospels, and the Sundays obtained corresponding names. The επισημοί ἡμέραι τοῦ Μαρτίνου took place immediately after Pentecost. The Latin ecclesiastical year commenced in Advent, and was divided into a 'Semestre Domini' and a 'Semestre ecclesie.' But the idea underlying this arrangement was only carried out in reference to the 'Semestre Domini'—Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, with the Sundays which they included, indicating the commencement, the development, and the completion of the history of redemption. In reference to the 'Semestre ecclesie,' only the commencement of a symbolical arrangement was made. Thus the Feast of Peter and Paul, on June 29, represented the foundation of the Church by the apostles; the Feast of Laurentius, the martyr, on August 10, the contest awaiting the 'Church militant'; and the Feast of Michael, the archangel, on September 29, the complete success of the 'Church triumphant.' That these feasts were intended to form the basis of three cycles of festivals we gather from the circumstance that the Sundays after Pentecost had been arranged as 'Dominicæ post Apostolos, post Laurentii, post Angelos.' But the idea was not developed; the frequency of salutis days not only made this arrangement impossible, but rendered it even necessary to encroach on the 'Semestre Domini.' The principle of attempting to Christianize the worship of the heathen was authoritatively sanctioned by Gregory the Great, who, in 601, instructed the Anglo-Saxon missionaries to transform the heathen temples into churches, and the pagan into saints' festivals or martyr days, 'ut duræ mentes gradibus vel passibus non autem saltibus eleventur.' Saints now took the places of the old gods, and the ecclesiastical was made in every respect to correspond with the natural year, only in a Christianized form."

"Ecclesiastical festivals became seasons of home enjoyment; holy days were turned into holidays; the Church's children learned, in private life, to think and to speak in the Church's way. . . . The governors of the state fell almost unconsciously into the times and seasons of her who is not of this world; sheriffs were pricked on the morrow of St. Martin; lawyers reckoned by Hilary or Trinity term; every class was subject to the same moulding influence. . . . It was the same influence always and everywhere at work; sometimes beautifully, sometimes amusingly, sometimes extravagantly, but always really" (Neale, Essays, etc., p. 508). See CALENDAR.

Yedinovertzi, a name signifying co-religionists, was given to some members of the Russian sect of the Staroverzi (see RUSSIAN SECTS, I, 4) in the reign of the emperor Alexander (1801-25), when strong hopes were entertained of regaining them to the orthodox communion. They assume for themselves the name of Blagoslovenni, or, The Blessed.

Yeomana, EDWARD DORR, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at North Adams, Mass., Sept. 27, 1829. He spent one year in Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J., and became stated supply at New Columbia, Pa., from 1847 to 1849; was principal of the academy at Danville, from 1847 to 1850; ordained by the Presbytery of Northumberland, Nov. 29, 1854; pastor at Warrior Run from 1854 to 1858; of the Fourth Church of Trenton, N. J., from 1859 to 1863; at St. Peter's Church, Rochester, N. Y., from 1863 to 1867; of Central Church, Orange, N. J., in 1867 and 1868, and died there, Aug. 25 of the latter year. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 160.

Yesterday (prop. שְׂמֶשֶׁת, e'mesh; but frequently שְׂמֶשֶׁת, aforettime; χθις) is sometimes used in Heb. to denote all time past, however distant; as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day on which one speaks. "If the ox was wont to push with his horn in time past" (Exod. xxi, 29; Heb. yesterday). "And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time (Heb. yesterday); whereas thou camest but yesterday," (2 Sam. xv, 20). "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever" (Heb. xiii, 8). His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yesterday nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day. Job says (viii, 9), "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing; because our days upon earth are a shadow."

Yew Sunday is a term used in some parts of England to designate Palm-Sunday (q. v.).

Yew-tree, an evergreen tree of the genus taxus, allied to the pines, and valued for its wood or timber, is very commonly found planted in the old English churchyards; and was formerly much used to decorate churches at Christmas, Palm-Sunday, and Easter.

Yezidia, an ancient sect of unknown origin, forming a tribe with a distinct nationality, in the neighbor-

Common Dress of the Yezidis.

"We are Yezidia," they say, "that is, worshippers of God." The following account is taken from Layard's Nineveh and its Remains (New York, 1849), i, 245 sq.:

"The Yezidis recognise one Supreme Being, but, as far as I could learn, they do not offer up any direct prayer or sacrifice to him. Sheik Nasr endeavored to evade my questions on this subject, and appeared to shun, with superstitious awe, every topic connected with the existence and attributes of the deity. The common Mohammedan forms of expression—half-oath, half-ejaculation—are nevertheless frequently in the mouths of the people, but probably from mere habit. The name of the evil spirit is, however, never mentioned, and any allusion to it by others so vexes and irritates them that, it is said, they have put to death persons who have wantonly outraged their feelings by its use. So far is their dread of offending the evil principle carried that they carefully avoid every expression which may resemble in sound the name of Satan, or the Arabic word for 'accursed.' . . . When they speak of the devil they do so with reverence, as Melek Ta'as (king Peacock) or Melek el-Kût (the mighty angel). Sheik Nasr distinctly admitted that they possessed a bronze or copper figure of a bird, which, however, he was careful in explaining was only looked upon as a symbol, and not as an idol. It always remains with the great sheik, and is carried with him wherever he may journey. . . . This symbol is called Melek Ta'as, and is held in great reverence. . . . They believe Satan to be the chief of the angelic host, now suffering punishment for his rebellion against the divine will, but still all-powerful, and to be restored hereafter to his high estate in the celestial hierarchy. He must be conciliated and revered, they say, for as he now has the means of doing evil to mankind, so will he hereafter have the power of rewarding them. Next to Satan, but inferior to him in might and wisdom, are seven archangels, who exercise a great influence over the world; they are Gabrail, Michael, Raphael, Azrael, Dadrail, Azrapheel, and Shem-keel. Christ, according to them, was also a great angel, who had taken the form of a man. He did not die on the Cross, but ascended to heaven.

"They hold the Old Test. in great reverence, and believe in the cosmogony of Genesis, the Deluge, and other events in the Bible. They do not reject the New Test. nor the Koran, but consider them less entitled to their veneration. Still, they always select passages from the latter for their tombs and holy places. Mohammed they look upon as a prophet—as they do Abraham and the patriarchs. They expect the second coming of Christ, as well as the reappearance of Ismaum Mehdî, giving credence to the Mussulman fables relating to him. Sheik Adî is their great saint. . . .

"It is difficult to trace their ceremonies to any particular source. They baptize in water, like the Christians; if possible, within seven days after birth. They circumcise at the same age and in the same manner as the Mohammedans; and reverence the sun, and have many customs in common with the Sabæans. . . . They are accustomed to kiss the object on which its beams first fall; and I have frequently, when travelling in their company at sunrise, observed them perform this ceremony. For fire, as symbolic, they have nearly the same reverence: they never spit into it, but frequently pass their hands through the flames, kiss them, and rub them over their right eyebrow, or sometimes over the whole face. The color blue, to them, as to the Sabæans, is an abomination, and never to be worn in dress, or to be used in their houses. Their Kubleh, or the place to which they look while performing their holy ceremonies, is that part of the heavens in which the sun rises, and towards it they turn the faces of their dead. In their fondness for white linen, in their cleanliness of habits, and in their frequent ablutions, they also resemble the Sabæans. . . .

"They have four orders of priesthood, the Pirs, the Sheiks, the Cawals, and the Fakirs: and what is very remarkable, and, I believe, unexampled in the East, these offices are hereditary, and descend to females, who, when enjoying them, are treated with the same respect and consideration as the men.

"The Pirs, or saints, are most revered after the great sheik, or religious head of the sect. They are believed to have power, not only of interceding for the people, but of curing disease and insanity. They are expected to lead a life of great sanctity and honesty, and are looked up to with great reverence. . . .

"The Sheiks are next in rank. They are acquainted with the hymns, and are expected to know something of Arabic, the language in which the hymns are written. Their dress should be entirely white, except the skull-cap beneath their turbans, which is black. As servants of sheik Adî they are the guardians of his tomb, keep up the holy fires, and bring provisions and fuel to those who dwell within its precincts, and to pilgrims of distinction. . . .

"The Cawals, or preachers, appear to be the most active members of the priesthood. They are sent by sheik Nasr on missions, going from village to village as teachers of the doctrines of the sect. They alone are the performers on the flute and tambourine, both instruments being looked upon, to a certain extent, as sacred. . . .

"The Fakirs are the lowest in the priesthood. They wear coarse dresses of black or dark-brown cloth or canvas, descending to the knee and fitting tightly to the person, and a black turban, across or over which is tied a red handkerchief. They perform all menial offices connected with the tomb, trim and light the votive lamps, and keep clean the sacred buildings."

For many interesting particulars concerning this strange sect, see Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, vol. i, chap. ix; Nineveh and Babylon, p. 92; Badger, Nestorians and their Ritual, i, 105-134.

Ygdasil, in Norse mythology, is the tree of the world, an enormous ash, whose branches touch the sky and stretch out over the entire surface of the earth. Three roots feed it: one extends to the assembling place of the gods, Asgard; another into the giant country, Jotunheim; and the third reaches down to Niflheim (infernal regions). By the spring, Urdarborn, live the three holy destinies of fate, who daily water the roots with the water from the spring. This fountain is in the country of the Asas. By the other root, in Jotunheim, is the well of Minvera, and in the kingdom of Hel is the spring Hwergelmer, from which the hell-streams flow. The tree is inhabited by different animals. The two harts, Dunair and Duratöör, eat the buds of the tree. In the peak of the tree lives an eagle, who carries the hawk Wedurfölner between his eyes; at the bottom of the tree the reptile Nidhögr lives, and gnaws at the root of the tree; between both there travels up and down a squirrel, Ratatösker, that seeks to cause discord between the eagle and the snake. The harts bite its branches to destroy it, but the tree is preserved by watering, and will be preserved till the destruction of the earth, up to which time the gods will assemble daily in its shade to seek advice—and even at the end of the world it will not be destroyed, but only receive a heavy shock. See NORSK MYTHOLOG.

Yih-king, "the book of changes," is the oldest of the sacred books of the Chinese. It was written by Fohi, the reputed founder of Chinese civilization, and is described as a very mysterious and almost unintelligible work, treating chiefly of the nature of the universe in general, the harmonious action of the elements, and periodic changes of creation. These ideas were expressed by means of eight peculiar diagrams, which constitute the basis of natural philosophy as well as of religion. Some contend that in Fohi and his family we may recognise Noah and the second parents of our race. Many commentaries have been written on the Yih-king, and very varied have been the expositions, so that, from being regarded originally as a cosmological essay, it came to be looked upon as a standard treatise on ethics.

Ymer, in Norse mythology, is the giant from the separate parts of whose body the world was created. The heat at Muspelheim made the ice in Niflheim melt, which caused the creation of the great giant Ymer and the cow Audumbra, from whose milk the former was nourished. The cow satisfied her hunger by licking the salt-stones, by which means the first man, Bure, was created. Ymer himself created the frightful dynasty of the Hrymthussen. But he did not live long, for Bure's nephews, sons of Börs—Odin, Wile, and We—killed Ymer, and of his blood they made the sea, of his flesh the earth, of his bones the rocks and hills, of his skull the firmament, of his brain the clouds, and of his eyelashes the battlements about Asgard.

Yoga (Sanskrit yug, "to join;" hence, junction, and figuratively, contemplation, religious or abstract) is the name of one of the two divisions of the Santhya (q. v.) philosophy of the Hindûs. The main object of the Yoga is to establish the doctrine of a supreme being, and to teach the means by which the human soul may become permanently united with it. The reputed author of the system is Patanjali, who explains the term Yoga as meaning "the hindering of the modifications of thinking." These are accomplished either by a repeated effort to keep the mind in its unmodified state, or by dispassion, which is the consciousness of having overcome all desires for objects that are seen or heard of. According to the founder of the system, the practical Yoga by which "concentration" is to be attained comprises mortification, the muttering of certain hymns, and a devoted reliance on the Supreme Being. Through it meditations are established, and afflictions got rid of. By afflictions are understood ignorance, egotism, affection, aversion, and tenacity of life; which terms are then the subject of an especial investigation into the nature of what is to be got rid of, of what is not desired to be got rid of, of what is constituted by the cause, and of what is the constitutive cause.

There are eight means or stages subservient to the attainment of concentration, viz. yama, forbearance; niyama, religious observance; asana, postures; pranayama, regulation of the breath; pratyahara, restraint of the senses; dharana, steadying of the mind; dhyana, contemplation; and samadhi, profound meditation. The practical part of the Yoga was admitted into the later Vedanta (q. v.). Its ethical part is especially dwelt upon in the Mahabharata (q. v.). But the great power it has at all periods exercised over the Hindû mind is less derived from its philosophical speculations, or its moral injunctions, than from the wonderful effects which the Yoga practices are supposed to produce, and from the countenance they give to the favorite tendency of orthodox Hindûism—the performance of austerities. Frequently these practices were and are merely a cloak for imposture and hypocrisy. Professional Yogins (q. v.), numbers of whom are met with throughout India, are often nothing but lazy mendicants or jugglers, who, by impressing the vulgar with a belief in their supernatural powers, convert it into a source of easy livelihood. Such followers of Yoga pretend, for instance, to foretell future events; they deal in palmistry, and profess to cure diseases. There are instances, too, where, for a handsome consideration, they allow themselves to be buried for a certain time, so as to exhibit the power of the Yoga. Two such cases are related as authentic in the treatise of Navinachandrapala; and it would appear from them that a human being, after having undergone certain preparations, such as the Yoga prescribes, may be shut up in a box, without either food or drink, for the space of a month, or even forty days and nights, and yet remain alive. The author of the treatise endeavors, indeed, to show that the rules laid down by the Yoga regarding the mode of respiration, the postures, and the diet of a Yogin, may have been founded on a careful observation of hibernating animals; and in support of this view he enters into a detailed investigation of the effect of the Yoga practices on animal life. If, as it seems, his statements are correct, much of what otherwise would be incredible in the accounts given of the performances of the Yogins, could be received as true, because admitting of explanation.

The system of Patanjali was taught by him in a little work called Yogasutra, which consists of four padas, or chapters, each comprising a number of sutras (q. v.). The oldest commentary on it is ascribed to a Vyâsa (q. v.); and this was commented on by Vachaspati Mîsra. For an elaborate enumeration of works on the Yoga, see A Contribution towards an Index to the Bibliography of the Indian Philosophical Systems, by Fitzedward Hall (Calcutta, 1859). The first two chapters of the sutras have been translated, with annotations founded on the commentary of Bhojaveda, by the late J. R. Ballantyne (Allahabad, 1858); and a paraphrase, but somewhat too free, of the same commentary is contained in vol. iv of William Ward's View of the History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindûs, etc. (Lond. 1817-20, 4 vols.). For a brief account of the system, see also vol. i of H. T. Colebrooke's Miscellaneous Essays (Lond. 1837, 2 vols.); and for the practice of the Yoga, A Treatise on the Yoga Philosophy, by N. C. Paul (Benares, 1851).

Yogins are the followers of the Yoga (q. v.) system of Hindû philosophy, but in popular acceptance a term generally denoting a Hindû ascetic or devotee, a man who has entered the fourth stage of religious life as described in the sastras. A large class of such persons forms a division of the votaries of Siva.

Yoke, an agricultural term used in two senses.

1. The curved piece of wood upon the neck of draught animals, by which they are fastened to the pole or beam. This well-known implement of husbandry is described in the Hebrew language by the terms môt (מוֹט), mo'edâh (מוֹעֲדָה), and 'ôl (עֹל), the former two specifically applying to the bows of wood out of which it was constructed, and the last to the application (binding) of the article to the neck of the ox. The expressions are combined in Lev. xxvi, 13 and Ezek. xxxiv, 27, with the meaning, "bands of the yoke." The Hebrew word 'ôl (Numb. xix, 2; Deut. xxi, 3; 1 Sam. vi, 7) is often used as the symbol of servitude or slavery (1 Kings xii, 4-11; Isa. ix, 4; x, 27; xiv, 25; xlvi, 6; Jer. v, 5), and to break the yoke is to become free (Gen. xxvii, 40; Jer. ii, 20; v, 5; Nah. i, 13). An iron yoke is the symbol of severe bondage (Deut. xxviii, 48; Jer. xxviii, 14). The term "yoke" is also used as the symbol of calamity or suffering (Lam. i, 14; iii, 27). The Hebrew word mo'edâh also signifies a

Fig. 1, 2. The back and front of the yoke. 3. Collar or shoulder-pieces attached to the yoke. 4, 4. The pieces of matting for protecting the two shoulders from friction.

Among the ancient Egyptians yokes of different kinds were used for several purposes (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 33, 879; ii, 15).

(1) In many instances men were employed to carry the water in pails, suspended by a wooden yoke borne upon their shoulders. The same yoke was employed for carrying other things, as boxes, baskets containing game and poultry, or whatever was taken to market; and every trade seems to have used it for this purpose, from the potter and the brick-maker to the carpenter and the shipwright. The wooden bar or yoke was about three feet seven inches in length; and the straps, which were double, and fastened together at the lower as well as at the upper extremity, were of leather, and between fifteen and sixteen inches long. The small thong at the bottom not only served to connect the ends, but was probably intended to fasten a hook, or an additional strap, if required, to attach the burden; and though most of these yokes had two, some were furnished with four or eight straps; and the form, number, or arrangement of them varied according to the purposes for which they were intended.

(2) For ploughing the mode of yoking the beasts was exceedingly simple. Across the extremity of the pole a wooden yoke or cross-bar, about fifty-five inches or five feet in length, was fastened by a strap lashed backwards and forwards over a prominence projecting from the centre of the yoke, which corresponded to a similar peg, or knob, at the end of the pole; and occasionally, in addition to these, was a ring passing over them as in some Greek chariots. At either end of the yoke was a flat or slightly concave projection, of semicircular form, which rested on a pad placed upon the withers of the animal; and through a hole on either side of it passed a thong for suspending the shoulder-pieces which formed the collar. These were two wooden bars, forked at about half their length, padded so as to protect the shoulder from friction, and connected at the lower end by a strong, broad band passing under the throat.

Sometimes the draught, instead of being from the withers, yoke as worn chiefly by men; probably such as is still borne by water-carriers, having a vessel suspended by a rope or chain at each end (Jer. xxvii, 2; xxviii, 10, 12). The breaking or removal of the yoke is an emblem of freedom (Isa. lviii, 6, 9; Lev. xxvi, 13; Ezek. xxx, 18; xxxiv, 27; Nah. i, 13). So, likewise, the corresponding Greek term ζυγός is used as the emblem of spiritual service (Matt. xi, 29, 36), also of spiritual bondage (Acts xv, 10; Gal. v, 1).

was from the head, the yoke being tied to the base of the horns; and in religious ceremonies oxen frequently drew the bier, or the sacred shrine, by a rope fastened to the upper part of the horns, without either yoke or pole. See Plough.

(3) For carriages and war-chariots the harness was similar, and the pole in either case was supported on a curved yoke fixed to its extremity by a strong pin, and bound with straps or thongs of leather. The yoke, resting upon a small, well-padded saddle, was firmly fitted into a groove of metal; and the saddle, placed upon the horses' withers, and furnished with girths and a breast-band, was surmounted by an ornamental knob;

while in front of it a small hook secured the bearing-rein. See CHARIOT.

The word "yoke" also signifies a pair of oxen, so termed as being yoked together (1 Sam. xi, 7; 1 Kings xix, 19, 21). The Hebrew term, tsimed (צִמְד), is also applied to asses (Judg. xix, 10) and mules (2 Kings v, 17), and even to a couple of riders (Isa. xxi, 7). The term tsimed is also applied to a certain amount of land, equivalent to that which a couple of oxen could plough in a day (Isa. v, 10; A. V. "acre"), corresponding to the Latin jugum (Varro, R. R. i, 10). The term stands in this sense in 1 Sam. xiv, 14 (A. V. "yoke"); but the text is doubtful, and the rendering of the Sept. suggests that the true reading would refer to the instruments (iv kýλαξι) wherewith the slaughter was effected. See Ox.

Yoke-fellow (σύζυγος), a colleague (Phil. iv, 8). But many interpreters regard the word there as a proper name, Syzigus (although the gender is uncertain), as it occurs in connection with other actual names, and the person addressed would not otherwise be specified at all.

York, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Eboracense). York is the second city of England in point of rank, though not in size or in commercial importance, a parliamentary and municipal borough, and county of itself, capital of the county of the same name (Yorkshire), near its centre, at the junction of the Three Ridings on the Ouse, at the influx of the Foss, one hundred and seventy-five miles north-north-west of London. The ecclesiastical authority of the archbishop extends over the province of York, consisting, with the archbishopric, of the bishoprics of Durham, Carlisle, Chester, Manchester, Ripon, and Sodor and Man. It contains York cathedral, the finest structure of the kind in England, mostly built in the 13th and 14th centuries. Several ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

I. Was held June 14 and 15, 1195, in the Church of St. Peter, at York, by Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, legate and chancellor of England. No other bishop was present in the council, which was attended by Simon, dean of the Church, the precentor, the archdeacons of Nottingham and Cleveland, the chancellor, Robert, the provost of Beverley, and some of the canons, with almost all the abbots, priors, officials, deans, and pastors of the churches in the diocese of York. Pope Celestine III appears to have suspended Geoffrey, archbishop of York (son of the fair Rosamond), from the exercise of all his episcopal functions, and a few years before had cut off from his province the whole of Scotland, which he made immediately subject to the see of Rome. Nineteen constitutions were published.

1. Relates to the administration of the holy communion; directs that the minister shall take care that bread, wine, and water be provided for the sacrifice, that it shall not be celebrated without a lettered minister, that the host be kept in a decent Pyx, and renewed every Lord's day.

2. Directs that the host be carried to the sick with suitable solemnity.

3. Orders archdeacons to take care that the canons of the mass be corrected according to some approved copy.

4. Forbids to impose masses as part of penance, in order to obtain money for saying them. Forbids also priests to make bargains for celebrating masses.

5. Ordains that no more than two or three persons shall take a child out of the sacred font; that a child found exposed shall be baptized, whether it be found with salt or without, for that cannot be said to be iterated which was not known to have been done before.

6. Forbids deacons, except in cases of urgent necessity, to baptize, administer the body of Christ, or enjoin penance at confession. Charges priests, when desired to baptize a child, or administer the communion to the sick, to make no delay.

7. Directs that parsons and vicars shall take care that their churches are kept in proper repair.

8. Directs that in all ministrations the proper ornaments shall be used.

9. Orders that the chalice shall be of silver.

10. Orders all clerks to preserve their crown and tonsure, under pain of losing their benefices, if they have any, and of being forcibly clipped by the archdeacon or dean, if they have not.

11. Forbids priests to go about in copes with sleeves; orders them to wear suitable apparel.

12. Forbids any money to be taken by the judge in ecclesiastical causes.

13. Orders that the tithe be paid to the Church first, before the wages of the harvestmen, etc.

14. Forbids monks to take estates to farm, and to leave their houses without reasonable cause.

15. Forbids nuns to leave the verge of their monastery, unless in the company of their abbess or prioress.

16. Forbids laymen to farm churches or priories.

17. Orders that every priest shall annually excommunicate, with candles and bells, those who swear themselves.

18. Requires priests to abstain from drinking-bouts and taverns. Forbids them, under pain of suspension, to keep concubines in their own houses, or in the houses of others.

19. Orders that when any one is suspected of a crime on public report, the dean of the place shall familiarly admonish him thrice; if he do not thereupon reform, the dean shall reprove him in conjunction with two or three more with whom he has lost his reputation; if he cannot be reformed by this means, the dean shall bring the matter before the chapter, in order that the accused may be either punished or canonically purged.

See Wilkins, Concil. i, 501; Johnson, Eccles. Canons, x, 1791.

II. Was held about the year 1863, by John Thorsby, archbishop of York. Five fresh constitutions were published, and seven constitutions published by archbishop Zouche, in a provincial synod held at Thorp, in 1847.

1. Forbids to hold markets, pleadings, etc., in churches, churchyards, and other holy places, on the Lord's day, or other holy days.

2. Forbids the performance of plays and vanities in churches on vigils.

3. Relates to the salaries to be assigned to stipendiary priests and chaplains, and renews a constitution made by William Greenfield, archbishop of York, which assigns a salary of not less than five marks. Also renews the seven constitutions made by archbishop Zouche, at Thorp, in 1847, viz. I. Relating to the stipends to be assigned to assisting priests, etc. ii. Concerning the overlaying of children. iii. Concerning the obstruction offered by tithe-payers to those who take it, and declares that some hindered the tithe-owner from carrying it by the accustomed way, and compelled him to take it by intricate and roundabout paths; others forbade him to carry it until all their own corn was carried, and maliciously permitted the tithe to be trampled upon and destroyed. iv. Forbids to give away property at death to the injury of the Church's rights, and those of the king's relations, etc. v. Forbids priests to wear ridiculous clothes, and to seek glory from their shoes; declares that many priests did, "out of an affection to show their shapes," in defiance of the canons, wear clothes so short as not to come down to the knees. vi. Relates to the trying of matrimonial causes. vii. Forbids clandestine marriages, and orders that the banns be published on three several solemn days.

4. States how the above statute was in some particulars modified in another provincial council.

5. Specifies for the guidance of rectors, vicars, and other confessors, thirty-seven cases, which were to be reserved, either for the judgment of the archbishop, and his penitentiary, or for that of the pope; and orders that, in each of these cases, the offender shall be sent to the archbishop or his penitentiary, unless he be in danger of death, with letters granted to him free of cost, explaining his case.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, xi, 2482.

III. Was held in 1444, by John Kemp, archbishop of York, and cardinal of Balbina, in a provincial synod. Two constitutions were published.

1. Is with little variation the same with the fifth constitution of Merton, A.D. 1306.

2. Lays certain restrictions upon the sale of trees, woodlands, etc., and upon the granting of rights, rents, pensions, etc., by abbots, priors, and other administrators of Church goods.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canons.

IV. Was held April 26, 1466, in the metropolitan church of York, by George Neville, archbishop. From various causes connected with the state and liberty of the Church, it was assembled without a royal brief. Eleven constitutions were published.

1. Is the same with the ninth constitution of Lambeth, A.D. 1261.

2. Is the same with the fifth constitution of London, A.D. 1343.

3. Is the same with the ninth constitution of London, A.D. 1343.

4 and 5. Are the same with the twelfth constitution of London, A.D. 1343, mutatis mutandis, against the obstructors of ecclesiastical process.

6. Is the same with the last constitution of London, A.D. 1344.

7. Declares that some questors, in defiance of the decrees of the Council of Lateran, in 1315, had, with extreme impudence, granted indulgences to the people of their own will, had dispensed with vows, absolved for murders; had, for a sum of money, relaxed a third and fourth part of the penance enjoined, had falsely affirmed that they had drawn out of purgatory three or more souls of the parents or friends of those who had given them alms, and conveyed them to the joys of paradise; that they had, moreover, absolved such as had been excommunicated by the ecclesiastical judges, buried suicides in the churchyards, and done all sorts of like abominations. Orders, in consequence, that the decrees of Lateran and Vienne (A.D. 1312), which restricted the operations of the questors, be rigidly enforced, and subjects to a fine of forty shillings any rector, vicar, etc., who shall admit any such questor to preach contrary to the form prescribed. The fine to be applied to the fabric of the cathedral church of York.

8. Declares parishioners who attend a chapel of ease instead of their parish church, and contribute to the repair of it, shall nevertheless be bound to contribute to the fabric of the mother Church, and to support the other burdens thereof, at the discretion of the ordinary; and orders further, that if they refuse so to contribute, the said chapels shall be interdicted, and no service performed in them.

9. Forbids abbots, priors, and provosts to permit any of the religious belonging to their several houses to dwell alone out of the verge of their monasteries, in their manors, or churches, under penalty of paying forty shillings towards the fabric of York Minster. The religious vagabond himself to be deemed an apostate.

10. Forbids, under pain of excommunication, any ecclesiastical or secular person to arrest, cite, force out, or cause to be arrested, cited, or forced out, any man that is in church, during the celebration of the divine offices.

11. Is the same with the fifth constitution of Merton, A.D. 1306, except that no mention is made of the tithe of wine, whereas it speaks of the tithe of coal where it is dug, and of the tithe of saffron.

After these constitutions follow the constitutions of archbishop Kemp, published in 1444, as given in the preceding council. See Johnson, Eccles. Canons, xiii, 1423, Wilkins, Concil. iii, 599.

York Use is a term employed to designate that ritual which, taking its name from the cathedral of York, was commonly used in the northern province of England prior to the Reformation. Printed editions of the York Ritual were issued in A.D. 1516, 1518, and 1532. In the main it differs but slightly from that of Salisbury—first, in the manner of making the first oblation; and, secondly, in the words used by the priest in partaking of the sacrament. Other minor differences exist, but they are unimportant. See Use.

Young, John, a Scotch prelate, was professor of divinity in Glasgow, when he was elected bishop of Argyle, but died before he was consecrated, in 1661. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 291.

Young, John Freeman, LL.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Pittston, Me., Oct. 30, 1820. He graduated from the Alexandria Theological Seminary in 1845, was ordained deacon the same year, and became rector of St. John's Church, Jacksonville, Fla.; in 1846 was ordained presbyter, and removed to Texas as a missionary; in 1850 to Mississippi, and in 1852 to Louisiana; subsequently became assistant minister of Trinity Parish, New York city; was consecrated bishop of Florida, July 25, 1867, and died in New York city, Nov. 15, 1885. See The Church Almanac, 1886, p. 102.

Young, William McIntosh, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1820. In early life he went to Providence, R. I., where he was converted, and subsequently graduated from Columbian College, Washington. His first settlement was at Norfolk, Va.; next at Williamsburg, and then at Wilmington, N. C. Afterwards he became pastor at Pittsburgh, Pa.; then successively of churches at Oil City, Woburn (Mass.), Meadville (Pa.), and Cheyenne (Wyoming), where he died suddenly, Feb. 20, 1879. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1288. (J. C. S.)

Younger. Under the Jewish dispensation it was frequently the will of God to prefer the younger sons before the elder, notwithstanding the right of primogeniture, as Shem before Japheth, Isaac before Ishmael, Jacob before Esau, Joseph, Judah, and Levi, before Reuben, Ephraim before Manasseh, Moses before Aaron, and David before all his brethren. In some of these cases the elder had forfeited his right of primogeniture by transgression, as Esau and Reuben, but not so the others. The cause of the proceeding of God's providence may be conjectured to have been twofold—first, as a memorial of the sin of Cain, first-born of Adam, by which Seth and his posterity were preferred before them; and, secondly, as a type of the future preference of the Christian, or younger Church, before the Jewish, or elder Church, in consequence of the forfeiture of the latter by unbelief. See Agg.

Younglove, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Cambridge, N. Y. He graduated from Union College in 1801, was tutor in the college from 1802 to 1805, settled in the ministry at Brunswick, N. Y., and died there in 1833. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 97.

Youth. The ancients considered youth in a much more extended view than we do. They regarded it relatively with strength, activity, vigor; and while a man retained those attributes he was reckoned a young man, or a youth, without reference to the number of his years. Thus Benjamin is viewed as a mere youth when upwards of thirty years old. So in Numb. xxi, 28, Joshua is called a young man when about forty. The word frequently translated in our version young man is בְּחִירָה, bachúr, from בָּחַר, bachár, "to choose;" it signifies primarily a choice man—one who may be chosen for some particular qualities. See LAD.

Yuga. See JOGA.

Yule, the old name for Christmas, still in provincial popular use in England. It points to heathen times, and to the annual festival held by the Northern nations at the winter solstice as a part of their system of sun-worship. In the Edda (q. v.) the sun is styled sagrahoel (fair or shining wheel), and a remnant of his worship, under the image of a fire-wheel, survived in Europe as late as 1823. The inhabitants of the village of Konz, on the Moselle, were in the habit, on St. John's Eve, of taking a great wheel wrapped in straw to the top of a neighboring eminence, and making it roll down the hill, flaming all the way: if it reached the Moselle before being extinct, a good vintage was anticipated. A similar usage existed at Trier. The Greenlanders of the present day have a feast at the winter solstice to rejoice at the return of the sun, and Wormius (Fast. Dan. lib. i) tells us that in his time the Icelanders dated the beginning of their year from Yule. The old Norse hoel, Anglo-Saxon hveol, have developed into Iceland hiol, Sweden and Danish hjul, English wheel; but from the same root would seem to have sprung old Norse jol, Sweden and Danish jul, Anglo-Saxon geol, English yule, applied as the name of the winter solstice, either in reference to the conception of the sun himself as a wheel, or, more probably, to his wheeling or turning back at that time in his path in the heavens. The general nature of the observances of this festival are noticed under the head of Christmas (q. v.). In the greenery with which we still deck our homes and places of worship, and in the Christmas-trees laden with gifts, we may see a relic of the symbols by which the pagan ancestors of the modern English signified their faith in the power of the returning sun to clothe the earth again with green and hang new fruit on the trees; and the furnety, until lately eaten in many parts of England (in Scotland the preparation of oatmeal called sovcans) on Christmas eve or morning, seems to be a lingering memory of the offerings paid to Hulda, or Berchta, the divine mother, the Ceres of the North, or personification of fruitfulness, to whom they looked for new stores of grain. The burning of the Yule-log, Yule-dog, or Christmas-block, testifies to the use of fire in the worship of the sun. This custom still survives in the north of England. In 1684 Herrick tells, in his Hesperides, how the Yule-log of the new Christmas was wont to be lighted "with last year's brand," and already, in the same year, its blazes are condemned by Warmistrey as "foolish and vaine, and not countenanced by the Church." The religious keeping of Yule and Easter had been one of the articles of Perth (q. v.), which had been strongly objected to. On the accession of William and Mary the Scottish discharged what was called the "Yule vacancy" of the Court of Sessions, and compelled the judges to attend court at that period. But in 1712 an act was passed re-enacting the Christmas recess. The act gave great offence to many Presbyterians in Scotland. See Atkinson, Glossary of the Cleveland Dialect (1868); Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie; Brand, Popular Antiquities, a. v.

Yule Boughs are branches of holly, ivy, yew, and mistletoe, used to decorate churches and private houses at Christmas.

Yule Festival is the same as Yule (q. v.).

Yule Mass, a name for the three masses of Christmas-day.

Yves (IVES DE RER-MARTIN, known by the name of Saint) was born at the manor of Rer-Martin, parish of Menebi, Bretagne, Oct. 17, 1253. Sprung from a noble family of the diocese of Treguier, he was son of Heelor, or Helori, and Azo of Kenquis. Being sent to Paris, he devoted ten years to the study of theology and of civil and canon law (1267-77). Having passed through the University of Orleans, he attended the lectures of William of Blaye, with whom he examined the Decretals. Afterwards, at Rennes, under the Franciscans, he studied the Sentences of Pierre Lombard and the interpretation of the Scriptures. Having received there the minor orders, he was successively rector of Tredrez (1285) and curate of Lohanec (1293). He was connected with the hospital of the patrimonial estate of Rer-Martin, and appointed Advocate of the Poor. The fasts and austerities to which he submitted himself did not hinder him, in the meantime, from actively engaging in preaching, nor from filling his judicial functions with such energy and equity as to make him an object of terror to the evil litigants. The crown found no favor in his eyes in urging fiscal claims against the clergy, and he opposed more than once the levying of royal impositions, which he deemed unjust. He died at Lohanec, May 19, 1303. At the solicitation of duke Jean de Montfort, who made a trip to Avignon for that purpose, the canonization of Yves was declared by a brief of Clement VI on May 19, 1347, and his anniversary has since been held on that day. See Hoefel, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v. See also IVO.

Yvon, PETER, the friend and successor of Labadie (q. v.), was born at Montauban in 1646. At the age of five he already listened to Labadie's sermons, and his association with him was only severed by the master's death in 1674. He now became the head and leader of the Labadists, settled at Wiewert, in West Frisia, and died in 1687. His writings, mostly in French, but translated into Dutch and German, were once extensively read, and were not without influence upon the formation of Christian life in the Reformed Church. We mention, L'Impieil Connoissance:—Essencia Religioni Christiana Patefacta:—De Prædestinatione:—Emmanuel, ou la Connoissance du Seigneur Jesus, etc. See Moller, Cimbria Litterat. ii, 1020 sq.; Theologisches Universitätslexikon, a. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.; Winer, *Handbuch der theol. Zabarella (or De Zabarellis), archbishop of Florence and cardinal, the most notable man among the Italians present at the Council of Constance, was born at Padua in 1339. He studied canon law at Bologna, and taught at Padua. During the siege of the city by the Venetians he was deputed to invoke the assistance of France, and, after Padua had surrendered, he was the orator of the fourteen deputies who, in St. Mark's Place in Venice, handed over the Paduan flag. He subsequently migrated to Florence, and engaged in teaching canon law. After a time the town authorities elected him archbishop, but it was found that the pope had already given the place to another. Boniface IX called him to Rome to submit an opinion respecting the best methods for healing the schism in the Church, on which question he wrote the book De Schismatibus Auctoritate

Imperatoris Tollandis (Baale, 1565; Strasburg, 1609, 1618), which, together with the preface by Schardius, was placed in the index. He was appointed archiepiscopal to the cathedral on his return to Padua, and held a wealthy abbacy for a time, and until the dissolute John XXIII, who favored learned men, called him to Rome and made him archbishop of Florence and cardinal-deacon, with the title of St. Cosmas and Damianus (1411). He had previously earned a scholarly reputation by the numerous books which emanated from his pen.

When arrangements were made for the Council of Constance, Zabarella was one of the papal envoys to the court of emperor Sigismund. In the council itself he, as the youngest cardinal, announced the time of the first session and read the bull of John XXIII, intended to regulate the drift of its business. He joined other cardinals in submitting a memorial relating to a reform in the administration of the papal court, and read the offer by which the pope volunteered to abdicate if the antipopes would renounce their pretensions to his office. When John fled from Constance, Zabarella supported the resolutions affirming the superiority of a general council to a pope; but he nevertheless incurred the censure of the council by an unfairness committed in the interest of the pope, in connection with the reading of resolutions which had been agreed upon, affirming the divine right of the council to require the submission of all people, including the pope, in all matters concerning the faith, the removal of the existing schism, and the reformation of the Church in head and members, the italicized clause having been omitted by him from the reading. He was eventually sent with a delegation of cardinals to negotiate with John, and obtained from him the unconditional surrender of his pontificate.

Zabarella participated also in the negotiations with Huss, and suggested the drawing up of an exceedingly mild formula of retraction, which the reformer, however, refused to sign. In connection with the schism he delivered a strong argument against pope Benedict, in which he charged the miserable state of the Church upon the obstinacy of its leaders; and when a new pope was to be chosen, he delivered another speech in support of the cardinals' view that the election ought to precede any movement looking towards a reformation of the Church, which was so violent that he predicted it would be the occasion of his death. He soon became dangerously sick, and died Sept. 26, 1417 (others say Nov. 5). It is probable that he would have been chosen pope, instead of Martin V, but for his early death.

Zabarella wrote numerous works of limited extent, e. g. Comment. in Libros Decretal. et Clementinas (Venice, 1602); Comment. in Clementinas (ibid. 1481, 1487); Consilia Juris (ibid. 1581); Varior. Legum Repetitiones (ibid. 1587); De Schismatibus (supra), etc. See Von d. Hardt, Acten d. Const. Concils, tom. i; Lenfant, Hist. du Concil. de Constance, passim; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zabarella, Bartholomew, nephew and heir to the cardinal, a teacher of canon law at Padua, participant in important consultations at the papal court, and ultimately archbishop of Florence. He died in 1445. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zabarella, Jacob, professor at Padua, A.D. 1564 et seq., and author of the book, De Inventione Aeterni Motoris. Ideas presented in the book and otherwise, exposed him, before the inquisition, to the charge of doubting the immortality of the soul, from which, however, he was acquitted. He was born at Padua in 1538, and died in 1589. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zabathaites, the followers of Zabathai Zevi (or Sabatai Sebi), a celebrated Jewish impostor, who appeared at Smyrna about 1666, and, pretending to be the Messiah, promised to deliver the Jews, and re-establish them in more than pristine glory. Multitudes of his nation were deceived by him, and many of his followers pretended to visions and prophetic ecstasies. At length, falling into the hands of the sultan, he ordered him to be placed as a mark for his archers, to prove whether he was vulnerable or not (as he pretended), to avoid which Zevi turned Mohammedan. See MESSIAHS, FALSE. His sect, however, survived, and there is said to be still a remnant of them at Saloniki, who, while they profess to be Mussulmans, observe the Jewish rites in secret, marry among themselves, and all live in the same quarter of the city, without communicating with the Turks, except in commerce, and in the mosques. Zevi, it seems, had also adherents among the Jews of England, Holland, Germany, and Poland, some of which have remained to our own time; and M. Grégoire mentions a musician of this sect who came to Paris so lately as in 1808. See Adams, Hist. of the Jews, p. 316, 528; Grégoire, Hist. ii, 309-318. See SABBATHAL.

Zabians, an ancient sect, said to be Chaldeans, addicted to astrology and star-worship. The word is derived, according to Pococke, from the Aramaic tsabá, the heavenly host, from which same root the word Sabian is taken, but in the different sense of "to change religion." The Zabians were idolaters, dwelling in the north of Mesopotamia, in the Biblical Haran. An Arabic writer, quoted by Chwolson, says that they adopted the name Zabian as being a religion tolerated by the Koran, and so escaped the persecution to which their star-worship would have exposed them. They first gave planetary names to the days of the week; the feast day of each planet being determined by the time of its culmination; hence, also, the alchemists of the Middle Ages, and through them heralds, have borrowed the notion of assigning a particular metal and a particular color to the several planets. In common with other Aramaic races they had a civil year, which began like the Jewish Rosh Ha-Shanah in autumn, and an ecclesiastical year commencing at the vernal equinox. Before the time of Mohammed they offered human sacrifices to the deities which they believed were embodied in the planets. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. See SABIANS.

Zabism, the religion of the Zabians (q. v.), or Haranian idolaters. It was formerly understood that they were a distinct race, and that their religion was composed of Chaldaism, Parsaism, Judaism, Christianity, Neo-Platonism, Gnosticism, and cabalistic speculations. This is not, however, strictly true. They might best be described as Syrians, who, partly descended from Greek colonists, had been subject so long to Syrian influences that they became in a manner Syrianized. Their religion was the old heathenism of their fathers, which had, with incredible obstinacy, resisted not only Christianity, but rendered even Mohammedan ill-will harmless by stratagem. But there were certain non-pagan elements which crept into it during the early centuries, and many other additions of later years. We mention, first of all, a number of legends about Biblical personages, from whom they pretend to be descendants. There are also laws of purity and impurity, and of sacrifices, which are very similar to Judaism. Then again, names of Greek and Roman gods, such as Helios, Ares, and Kronos, occur, a circumstance which may be explained from the prevailing tendency of the period of exchanging the names of native divinities for Greek and Roman names. There are also certain metaphysical and physical views incorporated in their creed, which are distinctly traceable to Aristotle, and finally, the Neo-Platonic philosophy of heathenism, as presented by Porphyry, Proclus, Iamblichus, and others. All these elements, infused into it by the circumstances of the period, do not prevent it from being in reality heathenism.

The sources of information in reference to the creed are written in Arabic, in Hebrew, and in Greek. The Arabic are the most copious; the Hebrew are chiefly represented by Maimonides; and the Greek are ascribed to various pseudonymous writers, among whom are Aristotle and Hermes Trismegistus. From these, though somewhat various and contradictory, the following facts may be gathered in reference to the creed. The Creator is one in essence, primity, originality, and eternity; but manifold in his manifestations in bodily figures. He is chiefly personified by the seven leading planets, and the good, knowing, and excellent of earthly bodies. But his unity, they claim, is not thereby disturbed; and it is "as if the seven planets were his seven limbs, and as if our seven limbs were his seven spheres, in which he manifests himself, so that he speaks with our tongue, sees with our eyes, hears with our ears, touches with our hands, comes and goes with our feet, and acts through our members." Zabism expresses the idea that God is too great and too sublime to occupy himself directly with the affairs of this world; that he therefore has handed over its ruling to the gods, and that he himself only takes the most important things under his special care; and that man is too weak to address himself directly to the highest, and is therefore obliged to direct prayers and sacrifices to the intermediate deities to whom the rule of the world is intrusted. Thus the veneration of the planets, and even the worshipping of idols, is nothing but a symbolical act, the consequence of that original idea. There are many gods and goddesses in Zabism of this intermediate stamp. It is not the planets themselves, but the spirits that direct them, conceived as deities that stand to the spheres in the relation of soul and body. Apart from these there are those gods who cause or represent every action in this world. Every universal natural deed or effect emanates from a universal deity, every partial one from a partial deity that presides over part of nature. These gods know our most secret thoughts, and all our future is open to them. The female deities seem to have been conceived of as the feeling or passive principle. These gods or intelligences emanate directly from God without his will, as rays do from the sun. They are of abstract forms, free of all matter, and neither made of any substance nor material. They consist chiefly of a light in which there is no darkness, which the senses cannot appreciate, by reason of its immense clearness, which the understanding cannot comprehend, by reason of its extreme delicacy, and which fancy and imagination cannot fathom. Their nature is free from all animal desires, and they themselves are created for love and harmony, friendship and unity. Their existence is full of the highest bliss, by reason of their nearness to the Most High; they have a free choice, and always incline to the good; and are the "lords and gods" of the Zabians, their "intermediators and advocates with the Lord of lords and God of gods." All substances and types of the bodily world emanate from the spiritual world, which is one from which everything flows and to which everything returns, and which is full of light, sublime and pure. These two worlds correspond to each other, and are to each other like light and shadow. The way to approach these gods, and through them the highest essence, is by purifying the soul from all passions, by keeping a strict guard over one's words and deeds, by fasting, sincere prayer, invocations, sacrifices, fumigations, and incantations. By steadfastly persevering in these and similar acts of devotion, man may reach so high a step of perfection that he may communicate even directly with the Supreme Power. The planets, as the principal representative and intermediate gods, are to be carefully observed, especially as regards (1) the houses and stations of the planets; (2) their rising and setting; (3) their respective conjunctions and oppositions; (4) the knowledge of their special times and seasons, the hours and days of the ruling of special planets; (5) the divisions of the different figures, forms, climates, and countries, according to their dominant stars—in fact, everything below heaven, according to their belief, was subject in some way to the influence of the stars or the spirits which inhabit them. Every substance and every action, every country and every hour, had its special planetary deity. It is important, therefore, to study carefully the special conjunctions and figures, as well as the special mixtures of incense, which might render the individual nomen propitious. Thus, for example, the first hour of Saturday stands under Saturnus, and it is right and advisable at that time to select such prayers, seals, amulets, dresses, and fumigations as might be especially pleasing to that planetary god.

In order to address themselves to visible mediators, some of the Zabians are supposed to have directed their devotions to the stars themselves. But they soon found a worship that addressed itself to things that appeared and disappeared in turn very unsatisfactory. Accordingly they manufactured permanent representatives of them in the shape of idols, wrought in as complete accordance as possible with the theurgical rules derived from the nature of the deity to be represented. They were of gold to represent the sun; of silver, to represent the moon. The very temples in which they were placed were of as many corners as were supposed to correspond to the form of certain stars.

Zabism teaches that man is composed of contradictory elements, which make him the vacillating, struggling creature he is. Passions and desires rule him and lower him to the level of the brute creation, and he would utterly lose himself were it not for such religious rites as purifications, sacrifices, and other means of grace, by which he may be enabled to approach the great gods once more and attempt to become like them. The soul of man partakes partly of the nature of the animal soul and partly of that of the angelic soul. The soul never dies, and rewards and punishments will affect only it. These, however, will not be wrought in any future world, but in this, only at different epochs of existence. Thus all our present joys are rewards for good deeds done by us in former epochs, and the sorrows and griefs we endure spring in the same manner from evil actions we committed at former stages. As to the nature of the general world-soul itself, they say it is primitive, for if it were not so it would be material, as every newly-created being partakes of the material nature. Kathibi says, "The soul, which is thus an immaterial thing, and exists from eternity, is the involuntary reason of the first types, as God is the first cause of the intelligences. The soul once beheld matter and loved it. Glowing with the desire of assuming a bodily shape, it would not again separate itself from that matter by means of which the world was created. Since that time the soul forgot itself, its everlasting existence, its original abode, and knew nothing more of what it had known before. But God, who turns all things to the best, united it to matter which it loved, and out of this union the heavens, the elements, and composite things arose. In order that the soul might not wholly perish within matter, he endowed it with intelligence, whereby it conceived its high origin, the spiritual world, and itself. It further conceived through this that it was but a stranger in this world, that it was subject to many sufferings in it, and that even the joys of this world are but the source of new sufferings. As soon as the soul had perceived all this it began to yearn again for its spiritual home, as a man who is away from his birth-place pines for his homestead. It then also learned that, in order to return to its primitive state, it had to free itself from the fetters of sensuous desires, and from all materialistic tendencies. Free from them all, it would regain its heavenly sphere again, and enjoy the bliss of the spiritual world."

The life of the sect holding this creed was but short. After having first been on terms of great friendship with the ruling powers of Mohammedanism, as well as with Christians and Jews, and having filled many of the highest and most responsible posts at the courts of the caliphs, they were, by degrees, made the butt of fanaticism and rapacity. Molested, persecuted, banished at different periods, they disappear from history since the middle of the 11th century. Thus obscurely ended a sect which for two hundred years had produced a host of men pre-eminent in every branch of learning and literature, in philosophy, astronomy, history, natural history, poetry, medicine, and the rest. See Chwolson, Die Sabien und die Sabismus (St. Petersburg, 1856, 2 vols.).

Zaccaria, ANTONIO MARIA, an Italian monk, founder of the congregation of the Barnabites, was born at Cremona in 1500. He studied at first medicine and philosophy at Padua, and afterwards theology also. Having received holy orders, he settled at Milan, where, in 1525, he joined the fraternity of Eternal Wisdom, and where he soon, in connection with several other members, and with the sanction of Clement VII, founded a new congregation, of which he was made superior. From their first church, St. Paul's, in Milan, they were originally called the Regular Clerks of St. Paul's (Paulines), which name they exchanged for Barnabites, when, in 1541, they were presented with the Church of St. Barnabas, in Milan. Zaccaria, who is said to have had the power of prophecy and of working miracles, died, according to his own prediction, July 5, 1539, at Cremona. Of his writings, we mention a compilation from the Church fathers, Detti Notabili Raccolti da Diversi Autori (Venice, 1583; printed in French, Lyons, 1625; Latin, by J. A. Gallicus, Axiomata Sacra). See Arisius, Cremona Literata, ii, 88 sq., Biedenfeld, Monchs-orden, i, 180; Theol. Universalexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Zacchæans is a local name for the Gnostics, mentioned by Epiphanius (Hæres. xxvi, 3), but without adding where they were so called.

Zachalios, an ancient Babylonish writer, is mentioned by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 10) as the author of a book on gems and their magical powers, which was dedicated to the king Mithridates. "It was evidently a writing belonging to that Græco-Babylonian literature which was so widely developed during the centuries bordering on the Christian æra, and which had the same connection with the real Chaldean doctrines as the Grecian literature of the hermetical books had with the doctrine of ancient Egypt" (Lenormont, Chaldean Magic, p. 176).

Zacharia, JUST FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian, was born at Haina, in Gotha, in 1704. He studied at Jena and Kiel, was appointed at the latter place, in 1735, professor of Oriental languages, in 1742 elected to the chair of Biblical antiquities, and in 1747 to that of theology. He died March 8, 1773. He published, Dissertatio seu Commentatio Solemnis, Communi Secundum Quinti Hoseæ Cupitis Explicans (Kiloni, 1781):—Progr. de Usu Linguae Ebraeæ in Philosophia (ibid. 1786):—Diss. de Ritibus Scholasticis Judæorum (ibid. 1745). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 767 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 540. (B. P.)

Zacharias, bishop of ANAGNI, Italy, was sent in A.D. 860, as one of the legates of pope Nicholas I, to Constantinople with letters of reply to those of the emperor Michael and the patriarch Photius, making overtures to the Church of Rome for sympathy and co-operation. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 562.

Zacharias SCHOLASTICUS, bishop of MITYLENE, in the island of Lesbos, was present at the Synod of Constantinople (A.D. 536) which deposed Anthimus, the patriarch of Alexandria. Zacharias had studied philosophy at Alexandria, and for some time practiced as an advocate at Berytus. He is the author of Ammosius sive de Mundi Opificio, a dialogue in which he defends the Christian view of creation and government of the world against objections to it raised from the point of view of the Greek philosophy. It was first published at Paris in 1619. The best edition is that by Jean Fr. Boissonade, Aeneas Gazæus et Zacharias Mitylæus, de Immortalitate Animæ et Mundi Consummatione (Paris, 1836). He also wrote, Disputatio contra Ea, quæ de Duobus Principiis a Manichæo quodam Scripta et Projecta in Viam Publicam Reperit Justinianus Imperator (Latin interpretation by Turriano, in Bibl. Pat. Maz. Lugd. ix, 794). See Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. ii, 528; Ritter, Geschichte der christl. Philosophie, ii, 495; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Zacynthian Manuscript (designated as Ξ) is a palimpsest uncial fragment in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London, which, under an evangelistary, written on coarse vellum in or about the 13th century, contains large portions of Luke's gospel down to xi, 33, in full, well-formed characters, but surrounded by, and often interwoven with, large extracts from the Lectors, in a hand which cannot be earlier than the 8th century. It was obtained from Zante in 1821. The entire volume must have originally been a large folio (14 inches by 11), of which eighty-six leaves and three half-leaves survive. The readings are very valuable. They were communicated to dean Alford for the fourth edition of his New Test. by Dr. Tregelles, who has since (1861) collated and published it in full. See Scrivener, Intro. to the New Test. p. 126; Christian Remembrancer, Jan. 1862; Journ. of Sac. Lit. Jan. 1862, p. 495. See MANUSCRIPT.

Zahalon, ABRAHAM BEN-ISAAC, a Jewish writer of Spain, who flourished in the 16th century, is the author of, זכרון לנפש, or Healing of the Soul, an ascetical work, treating on repentance (Venice, 1595):—ירד חוריקים, on the Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan calendar (ibid. 1594-95):—ישע אלמרים, a grammatical and pedagogical commentary on the book of Esther (ibid. 1596). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 541; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico Degli Autori Ebrei (Germ. transl.), p. 838. (B. P.)

Zahalon, JACOB BEN-ISAAC, a Jewish writer of Rome, was born in 1680, and died at Ferrara in 1693. Besides a large medical work, אוצר החיים, he left, in MS., a commentary on Isaiah, entitled יסודות ס' קהלה יצקב:—a commentary on Ecclesiastes, יצקב יצקב:—disquisitions on Daniel, יצקב יצקב:—homiletical expositions on the Pentateuch, חתן אמת, יצקב יצקב:—a commentary on the Song of Songs, יצקב יצקב, etc. See Fürst, *Bibl. Zahn, a German philanthropist, was a mason of Bunzlau, who wandered about as an orphan in childhood, and learned to read at the age of twenty-four. He carried on a little school in his own house for the benefit of orphans. He made the first movement towards the establishment of an orphan-house in Bunzlau, and went to Berlin to solicit the royal sanction. The corner-stone was laid in 1755. Zahn became the first superintendent, but died of the plague in 1756. The institution was conducted from that time by Ernest Gottlieb Woltersdorf. See Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church in the 18th and 19th Centuries, i, 146.

Zair. Conder suggests (Hand-book to the Bible, p. 427) that this is "perhaps the ruin Zueireh on the south-west shore of the Dead Sea."

Zallwein, GREGORIUS, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Obervinchtach, in the Palatinate, Oct. 20, 1712. In 1733 he joined the order of the Benedictines, and received holy orders in 1737. In 1744 he was elected prior of the monastery at Wessobrunn, and shortly afterwards was called to Strasburg, in Carinthia, as professor of theology, Church history, and canon law. In 1749 he was called to the Salzburg University, and died Aug. 9, 1766. Of his publications, we mention, Fontes Originarii Juris Canonici, etc. (Salzburg, 1754-55):—Jus Ecclesiasticum Particulare Germaniae ab Æra Christi usque ad Carolum IX Imp. (ibid. 1757):—Collectiones Juris Ecclesiastici Antiqui et Novi, etc. (ibid. 1760):—Principia Juris Ecclesiastici Universalis et Particularis Germaniae (1763 sq. 4 vols.). Zampieri, DOMENICO (commonly known as Domenichino), an eminent Italian artist, was born at Bologna in 1581, and received his first instructions from Denis Calvart, but, on account of severe treatment by that master, he was removed to the Academy of the Caracci. His great talents did not develop themselves so early as in many other painters, and his studious and thoughtful manner drew from his fellow-students the appellation of the Ox; but Annibale Caracci testified of his abilities by saying to his pupils, "This Ox will in time surpass you all, and be an honor to the art of painting." In the first contest of the students for a prize after he entered the academy, Domenichino was triumphant; but this triumph, instead of rendering him confident and presumptuous, only stimulated him to greater assiduity, and he pursued his studies with such patient and constant application that he made such progress as to win the admiration of some of his contemporaries and to beget the hatred of others. After leaving the school of the Caracci, he visited Parma, Modena, and Reggio, to study the works of Correggio and Parmiggiano; and soon after returning to Bologna he went to Rome, where he commenced his brilliant career. Cardinal Agucchi was the first to patronize him, and he employed him in his palace, and commissioned him to paint three pictures for the Church of St. Onofria, representing subjects from the life of St. Jerome. He was employed about this time to assist Annibale Caracci in his great works in the Farnesian Gallery at Rome, and he executed a part of them from the cartoons of Caracci. He also painted in the loggia, in the garden, from his own designs, the Death of Adonis, in which he represented Venus springing from her car to succor her unfortunate lover. He was employed by cardinal Borghese to assist in decorating the Church of San Gregorio, in which his Flagellation of St. Andrea is so justly celebrated. Cardinal Farnese next employed him to paint some frescos in a chapel in the abbey of Grotto Farrata, where he executed several subjects from the life of St. Nilo; one of these, representing the cure of a demoniac, is considered one of the finest productions at Rome. Soon after this he executed his famous Communion of St. Jerome, painted for the principal altar of San Girolamo della Cavità, a work which has immortalized his name, and which was accounted, next to the Transfiguration of Raphael, the finest picture of Rome. This work has experienced some removals, but has been returned to its original place and copied in mosaic to preserve the design, the original having suffered from the effects of time. His next great work was in the Church of San Lodovico, representing the life of St. Cecilia. His great success and increasing fame had by this time so excited the envy and hatred of his contemporaries that he was constrained to leave Rome in disgust. He therefore returned to Bologna, where he resided several years in the quiet practice of his profession, and executed some of his most admired works, particularly the Martyrdom of St. Agnes, for the church of that saint, and the Madonna del Rosario, both of which were engraved by Gerard Audran for the Louvre at Paris by order of Napoleon. The fame of Domenichino was now so well established that intrigue and malice could not suppress it, and pope Gregory XV invited him back to Rome, and appointed him principal painter and architect to the pontifical palace. Cardinal Montalto employed him to decorate the vault of San Andrea della Valle, where he represented the four evangelists, with angels, in such a masterly manner that they were the admiration of Italy and the study of artists. He also painted in the chapel of cardinal Bandini, in the Church of San Sylvestro, in the Quirinal, four pictures—Queen Esther before Ahasuerus, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, David Playing on the Harp before the Ark, and Solomon and his Mother, Bathsheba, Seated on a Throne—which were esteemed among his finest works. Soon after he painted the Four Cardinal Virtues in the Church of San Carlo Catenari. He was next invited to Naples to paint the chapel of St. Januaria. He executed one of his most admired works in the Palazzo della Torre, representing the dead Christ supported on the knees of the Virgin, together with Mary Magdalene and others. But his life soon became so embittered by the jealousy and hatred of his rivals that he quitted Naples in disgust, and returned once more to Bologna, where he died, in 1641. His work as an architect began with the superintendence of the pontifical palace under Gregory XV, but he executed various other works, particularly two designs for the Church of San Ignazio, at Rome. He was not, however, allowed to complete this edifice, but his designs were combined by the Jesuit Grassi in another edifice. Thereupon Domenichino refused to furnish additional plans, and the building was transferred to Algardi. In Santa Maria Trastevere he designed the rich and ingenious entablature, also the chapel, called Della Madonna di Strada Cupa. He also designed the greater part of the elegant villa Belvidere at Frascati, and designed and erected the picturesque villa Lodovico at Rome, the gardens of which he laid out with a number of verdant walks, and divided the grove with exquisite taste. No better proof of his great merits as an artist can be desired than the fact that upwards of fifty of his works have been engraved by Gerard Audran, Raphael Morghen, and other famous engravers, and that many of them have been frequently copied. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, p. 265, 1119; Milizia, Lives of Celebrated Architects, ii, 152.

Zanchi, JEROME, a clergyman and theologian of the German Reformed Church, was born at Alzano, in the territory of Bergamo, Feb. 2, 1516, and was the son of the historian Zanchi. He entered the Augustinian order of regular canons in 1531, engaged in philosophical and theological studies, and, on their completion, came with his friend, count Celso Martinengo of Brescia, to the monastery of Lucca, where Vermigli was teaching, and where they became acquainted with the writings of Luther, Melancthon, Bullinger, and Calvin. They soon afterwards came into notice as evangelical preachers, and were compelled to flee—Martinengo to Milan and Geneva, where he became pastor of the Italian Church, in 1552, and Zanchi to Switzerland and Geneva, in 1551. In 1558 Zanchi accepted a professorship of the Old Test. at Strasburg, where Marbach and other Lutherans were his colleagues, the association involving him in controversies upon the doctrines of the antichrist, predestination, and the perseverance of the saints, which began in 1561, and were superficially settled by arbitrators, who drew up a formal agreement, which was signed by all the clergy and professors of the city, Zanchi, however, appending a reservation to his signature intended to prevent his being compelled to teach what he did not receive as the truth. Calvin and other reformed theologians, however, censured the yielding temper which Zanchi had exhibited, and thus induced him to speak his sentiments more positively. This naturally renewed the strife and involved disagreeable consequences, from which he was glad to escape by accepting a call to Chiavenna as pastor of the Italian congregation. He had previously declined repeated calls to a similar post at Lyons. False teachers and uneasy Italian agitators troubled him at Chiavenna, and in 1564 a pestilence interrupted the services of his Church and compelled his retirement to a mountain near Piuri, where he occupied himself with writing a sketch of his controversy with Marbach, which afterwards appeared under the title of Miscellanea (1566, 4to). In 1568 he became professor of theology at Heidelberg, and rapidly earned the first place among the scholars of the theological faculty. His advice was sought by persons in every quarter and upon all the debated questions of the day, e. g., the sacraments, the Trinity, the mediation of Christ, and replies in great number were written to inquirers, sometimes in the name of the faculty, and often in his own name, all tending to the confirmation of the teachings of Reformed orthodoxy. He was equally zealous and influential in the work of introducing a strict discipline in the churches of the palatinate. Of larger theological works written by him in this period we mention De Tribus Elohim, etc. (1572), which is chiefly important as collocating the grounds upon which the antitrinitarians based their opinions; De Natura Dei, etc., a sort of speculative philosophy of religion, in which the doctrine of predestination especially is carried to its logical consequences; and De Operibus Dei intra Spatium Sex Dierum Creatis, a cosmology in which dogmatic hypotheses and physical facts are intermingled—interesting as showing the amount of knowledge possessed, or supposed to be possessed, respecting nature and natural forces in that day. A fourth work, De Primi Hominis Lapsu, etc., was begun at Heidelberg, but not completed. A Lutheran prince succeeded to the throne of the Palatinate, and Zanchi was dismissed. The newly established University of Neustadt-on-the-Hardt received him, and made him its professor of the New Test. in 1578, and this post he retained until he died, Nov. 19, 1590, though he had been invited to return to Heidelberg when the Palatinate was restored to Calvinism. In 1577 he was required to write a confession by the deputies of the Reformed churches, then assembled at Frankfort, which confession was intended to be opposed to the Formula of Concord. This work became the basis of the Harmonia Conf. Fidei Orthodoxarum of Beza and Danæus (1581). His children collected his works and published them after his death, though no complete edition appeared prior to that of Geneva (1619, 8 vols. fol. 8 parts). These works rank among the leading sources of the Reformed theology of his time, but are already tainted with the scholastic spirit. See Schmid, in Stud. u. Krit. 1859; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zanchius, BASIL, a learned Italian monk and writer, was born at Bergamo in 1501. His real name was Peter, which he exchanged for Basil when he became a canon regular. He studied at Rome and various other places, but resided for the greater part of his life at Rome, where he died in 1560. He was the subject of persecution, for some cause not clearly ascertained, and died in prison. He was one of the best Latin poets of his age. His Latin poems were first printed at Rome in 1540, and were often reprinted. He also wrote observations on all the books of Scripture (Rome, 1553). He published Epithetorum Commentarii (1542), a second edition of which appeared under the title Dictionarium Poeticum et Epitheta Veterum Poetarum, etc. (1612).

Zanoah. (1) In the plain of Judah. The present Khurbet Zanua lies one and a half miles north of Beit Netif and two and a half south-east of Ain Shems (Beth-Shemeh), and is "a large and important ruin on high ground, mainly east of the road; but remains are also found on the hill-top to the west," consisting of chambers with arched entrances, foundations of house-walls, traces of mills, cave-tombs, etc. (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 128). (2) In the hills of Judah. The modern Khurbet Zanuta lies four and a half miles south-west of Es-Semûa (Eshtemoa), and one and a half north-west of Attû, and consists of "heaps of stones and foundations, fallen pillars, caves and cisterns on a hill" (described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 410 sq.).

Zanolini, ANTONIO, a Jewish writer of the 18th century, is the author of, Questiones e Scriptura Sacra (Padua, 1725):—Lexicon Hebraicum (ibid. 1782):—Lexicon Chaldaico-Rabbinicum (ibid. 1747):—Ratio Institutioque Addiscenda Linguae Chald.-Rabb.-Talmudicæ cum Singularum Dialectorum Exemplis etiam Latinitate Donatis, etc. (ibid. 1750). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 542 sq.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iv, 812; Steinschneider, Bibl. Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Zanti, ABRAHAM, a Jewish physician, philosopher, and poet, was born in 1670, and died, rabbi of Venice, in 1729. He is the author of כוחות אבריו, or a metrorhythmic paraphrase of the Psalms (Venice, 1719). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 548; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 385. (B. P.)

Zanzalus, JACOB (called also Baradaus), a monk of the 6th century, became conspicuous by reviving the Monophysite (q. v.) sect of the Eutychians (q. v.). They had been reduced to a very small number, but these had ordained Zanzalus bishop of Edessa, and by his zeal and unceasing toil he left the sect, at his death in A.D. 588, in a flourishing condition in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, and other countries. These are known as Jacobites (q. v.).

Zarembo, FELICIAN MARTIN VON, a famous missionary, was born at Zaroy, in the Russian government of Grodno, in Lithuania, March 15, 1794. He studied at Dorpat for a political career. In 1816 he was made doctor of philosophy, and in 1817 engaged at St. Petersburg in the college for foreign affairs. In the same year he concluded to give up everything and to work in the service of his Master. He went to Basle in 1818, and having spent there nearly three years, was appointed to commence missionary operations in Grusia. Having received his ordination in 1821, he went to Shusha, which became the nucleus for his operations. In 1830 he was obliged to leave his post on account of feeble health, and returned to Basle. In 1835 he again returned to his post, but, on his way, an imperial ukase forbade further operations. All representations were in vain, and Zarembo, the first and last missionary of the Basle Society, left Shusha in 1838 for Basle. From 1839 to 1864 he travelled through Europe in behalf of his society, but in 1865 he was struck with apoplexy. He died May 31, 1874. See Der evangelische Heidenbote, 1874, No. 7. (B. P.)

Zeal, a passionate ardor for any person or cause. The word in Hebrew is קנאה, kanâh, from קנן, kanâh, "to flush" with passion. The Sept. usually renders it by ζῆλος (the New Test. term), which is derived from ζῆω, "to be hot." Thus we say, "a fiery zeal." The psalmist says (Psa. lxxix, 9), "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me," or consumed me like fire (see Bauer, De Messia Zelo pro Domo Dei, Viteb. 1744). Zeal is an earnestness arising either from good or evil motives (2 Sam. xxi, 2; 1 Cor. xiv, 12; Col. iv, 13). Thus Phinehas was commended because he was zealous for Jehovah (Numb. xxv, 11–13); but Jehu, when he slew the priests of Baal and the family of Ahab, was zealous in order to gain public applause (2 Kings x, 16–31). Zeal may be misdirected, or it may be honorable (Phil. iii, 6; Gal. iv, 17, 18; Tit. ii, 14; Psa. lxxix, 9; John ii, 17). Zeal is attributed in Scripture to God as well as to man (2 Kings xix, 31; Isa. ix, 7; Ezek. v, 13). There are various kinds of zeal, as (1) an ignorant zeal (Rom. x, 2, 3); (2) a persecuting zeal (Phil. iii, 6); (3) a superstitious zeal (1 Kings xviii; Gal. i, 14); (4) a hypocritical zeal (2 Kings x, 16); (5) a contentious zeal (1 Cor. xi, 16); (6) a partial zeal (Hos. vii, 8); (7) a temporary zeal (2 Kings xii, xiii; Gal. iv, 15); (8) a genuine zeal, which is a sincere and warm concern for the glory of God, and the spiritual welfare of mankind (Gal. iv, 18; Rev. iii, 19). This last is generally compounded of sound knowledge, strong faith, and disinterested regard; and will manifest itself by self-denial, patient endurance, and constant exertion. The motives to true zeal are (1) the divine command (Rev. iii, 19); (2) the example of Christ and the end of his death (John ii, 17; Acts x, 38; Tit. ii, 14); (3) the importance of his service; (4) the advantage and pleasure it brings to the possessor; (5) the instances and honorable commendation of it in the Scriptures: Moses, Phineas, Caleb, David, Paul, etc. (Gal. iv, 18; Rev. iii, 15, etc.); (6) the incalculable good effects it produces on others (James v, 20). Mor.* sermon 28; Natural History of Enthusiasm. See FAITH; FANATICISM; JEALOUSY.

Zealots (Ζηλωται) were, in a technical Jewish sense, the followers of Judas the Gaulonite, or Galilean (q. v.). Josephus speaks of them as forming the "fourth sect of Jewish philosophy," and as distinguished from the Pharisees chiefly by a quenchless love of liberty and a contempt of death. Their leading tenet was the unlawfulness of paying tribute to the Romans, as being a violation of the theocratic constitution. This principle, which they maintained by force of arms against the Roman government, was soon converted into a pretext for deeds of violence against their own countrymen, and during the last days of the Jewish polity the Zealots were lawless brigands or guerrillas, the pest and terror of the land. After the death of Judas, and of his two sons, Jacob and Simon (who suffered crucifixion), they were headed by Eleazar, one of his descendants, and were often denominated Sicarii, from the use of a weapon resembling the Roman sica (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 1; War, iv, 1-6; vii, 8; see Lardner, Credibility, pt. i, bk. i, ch. vi, ix; Kitto, Palestine, p. 741, 751). See ZELOTES.

Zedner, JOSEPH, for a long time custodian at the British Museum, in London, was born at Gross-Glogau in 1804, and died in Berlin, Oct. 10, 1871. He wrote, Ueber den Wortton in der hebr. Sprache (Berlin, 1817):—Auswahl historischer Stücke aus hebr. Schriftstellern vom II. Jahrhundert bis auf die Gegenwart (Heb. and Germ. ibid. 1840):—ויריטת אברהם, or Abraham ben-Ezra's Commentary on the Book of Esther after another Version (Lond. 1850):—Catalogue of the Hebrew Books in the Library of the British Museum (ibid. 1867). He also contributed to the Ha-Maskiv for 1859 and 1861. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 546. (B. P.)

Zegedin (or Szegedin), STEPHEN DE, an eminent Lutheran divine, was born at Zegedin, a city of Lower Hungary, in 1505. His family name was Kis. He studied under Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg, taught and preached Lutheranism in several cities in Hungary, and was taken prisoner by the Turks, who treated him with great cruelty. He subsequently officiated as minister at Buda and in many other places. He died at Reven, in Hungary, May 2, 1572. He left the following works, which were afterwards published: Assertio de Trinitate (1573):—Tabula Analytica in Prophetas, Psalmos, et Novum Testamentum (1592):—Speculum Romanum Pontificum Historicum (1602). Zeibich, Carl Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Eilenburg, June 19, 1717. He studied theology, philosophy, and philology at Wittenberg, was made magister in 1737, on presenting a dissertation, De Chaldaicorum Veteris Testamenti apud Judaeos Auctoritate. In 1752 he was made professor, and died Aug. 3, 1763. Of his writings we mention, De Lingua Judaearum Hebraica Temporis Christi et Apostolorum (Viteb. 1741):—De Codicum Veteris Testamenti Orientalium et Occidentalium Dissensionibus

(ibid. eod.):—De Ritu Baptizandi in Mortem Christi, ab Eunomianis Recentioribus Introducto (ibid. 1752):—Σύμμυρα Antiquitatum Tarnicarum ex Scriptorum Veterum Monumentis Collecta (ibid. 1760). Zeibich, Heinrich August, a German theologian, was born at Merseburg, June 22, 1729, and died March 30, 1787, at Gera, being professor of elocution there. He is the author of, Vermischte Betrachtungen aus der Theologie und Philologie (Leipsic, 1772-74, 3 parts):—Progr. de Velo Hierosolymitano, etc. (Gera, 1757):—Von dem Grabe Moisis (ibid. 1758):—Progr. de Vento, Praesentia Divina Documento (ibid. eod.):—Pr. de Thuribulo Aureo (ibid. 1768):—Pr. de Radiante Moisis Facie a Cincinorum Cornibus Defensa (ibid. 1764):—De Censibus Hebraeorum (ibid. 1764-66):—De Circumcisionis Origine (ibid. 1770):—Progr. duo de Miraculo Mamae Israeliticae (ibid. 1770-71):—Pr. Isaaci Ortus in Fabula Orionis Vestigia (ibid. 1776):—Pr. de Fl. Josepho Vespasiano Imperium Romanum Vaticinante (ibid. 1783). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 81; Fürst, *Bibl. Zeisberger, DAVID, a Moravian missionary among the Indians of North America, was born in Moravia, Germany, in 1721, whence his parents emigrated to Herrnhut, in Upper Lusatia, for the sake of religious liberty. He was educated by the Moravians in Saxony, and afterwards lived at their settlement of Nerren-dyk, Holland. In 1738 he came to Georgia, where some of his brethren had begun a settlement, that they might preach the gospel to the Creeks. Thence he removed to Pennsylvania, and assisted in the commencement of the settlements of Bethlehem and Nazareth. Soon afterwards he became a missionary to the Indians, and labored among the Delawares at Shamokin, and the Iroquois at Onondaga, N. Y., till after the breaking-out of war in 1754. On the return of peace, after the conspiracy of Pontiac, he led the remnant of the Christian Indians, who had found a refuge in Philadelphia, Pa., to Wyalusing, on the Susquehanna, in Bradford County. In 1767 he established a Church among the Monseys, on the Alleghany. In 1772 he penetrated still farther, exploring the Muskingum region, and laying out the town of Schoenbrunn, on the Tuscarawas, about ten miles from the present Canal Dover, O. Here he was joined by all the Moravian Indians of Pennsylvania, and the mission was greatly enlarged. In 1781, at the instigation of the British commandant at Detroit, a party of Wyandots broke up these settlements, and compelled the Christian Indians to remove to Sandusky. The missionaries were shamefully abused. In the following year a party of ninety-six of those who had been driven to Sandusky returned to their former homes to gather their corn, and were treacherously murdered at Gnadenhütten by a party of the white settlers. After this melancholy incident most of the converts dispersed, and Zeisberger, with a small remnant, went to the Clinton River and formed a settlement in the present state of Michigan. In 1786 he returned to the southern shore of Lake Erie, and soon began another settlement, which he called New Salem. In 1791, however, he was obliged to remove to Canada on account of the hostility of the other Indians. There he founded Fairfield on the Thames. In 1798 the Moravian Indians received a grant from Congress of the tract of land which had been their former home in the valley of the Tuscarawas. To this locality Zeisberger returned with some of his converts, and established a new station, which he called Goshen. Here he remained until his death, Nov. 17, 1808. Perhaps no man ever preached the gospel so long among the Indians, and amid so many trials and hardships. He was a man of small stature, with a cheerful countenance, of a cool, intrepid spirit, with a good understanding and sound judgment. His portrait is prefixed to Heckewelder's Narrative. Amid all his privations and dangers he was never known to complain, nor ever regretted that he had engaged in the cause of the Redeemer. He would never consent to receive a salary, although he deemed it proper for some missionaries. He trusted in his Lord for the necessities of life, and he looked to the future world for his reward. Free from selfishness, a spirit of universal love filled his bosom. A more perfect character has seldom been exhibited on the earth. It is a melancholy fact that he suffered more from white men, called Christians, by reason of their selfishness and depravity and hostility to the gospel, than from the Indians. Had the back settlers of our country participated in the benevolent spirit of the Moravians the benefit to the natives would have been incalculable. Amid all obstacles the brethren, in the days of Mr. Zeisberger, instructed and baptized about fifteen hundred Indians. The calm death of those who were murdered at Muckingum, in 1782, is a striking proof of the influence of the gospel on men, concerning whom it is sometimes said they cannot be made Christians. About 1768 he wrote two grammars of the Onondaga, in English and German, and a dictionary, German and Indian, of more than seventeen hundred pages. In the Lenape, or language of the Delawares, he published a spelling-book, sermons to children, and a hymn-book, containing upwards of five hundred hymns, translated partly from German and partly from English. He left in manuscript a grammar in German of the Delaware language, which has been translated by Mr. Du Pont; also a harmony of the four gospels, translated into Delaware. See De Schweinitz, Life and Times of David Zeisberger (Philadelphia, 1870); Heckewelder, Narrative of the Missions among the Delaware and Mokegan Indians (ibid. 1820); Allen, Amer. Biog. Dict. (1857); Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Zeitmann, GOTTFRIED THOMAS, a Lutheran minister, was born of Jewish parentage at Cracow, Poland, in 1696. On account of the war between Poland and Sweden, Zeitmann's father had to leave his country, and settled at Frankfort, where his son Hirschel (this was Zeitmann's name before his baptism) received his early education. In 1707 he was baptized, taking the above-mentioned name. He desired to learn a trade, but his friends advised him to attend the gymnasium of St. Anna, at Augsburg, where he had gone on account of being persecuted by his relatives. In 1717 he commenced his studies at Jena, where he remained till 1721. Having passed some years as a private tutor, he was, in 1728, chosen pastor at Oberode, and in 1736, one of the pastors of Frankfort and Sachsenhausen. He died Feb. 7, 1747. His biographer, Dr. C. H. Martin, says of him, "Zeitmann preferred to speak in Latin, and as oft as we quoted a passage of Scripture, whether of the Old or New Test., he repeated the same in the original, with chapter and verse. He never entered the pulpit without having studied his subject with prayer and meditation. His delivery was distinct, his voice powerful; he could be heard in the largest church in Frankfort." (B. P.)

Zell, MATTHEW, the earliest Reformed preacher of Strasburg, was born in 1477 at Kaisersberg, in Upper Alsace, and graduated in theology at Freiburg. In 1518 he became pastor to the cathedral of Strasburg, having already been strongly influenced by Luther's Theses, and in 1521 he took decided ground as an evangelical preacher, while engaged in the exposition of the epistle to the Romans. Some persons traduced him for his course, but others became his supporters, and even the magistracy of the city pledged themselves in his defence against the chapter. In 1523 his bishop formulated a series of charges against him, to which Zell replied with a refutation, which was at the same time a Scriptural authentication of the evangelical doctrines. In the same year two clergymen publicly renounced their allegiance to the papacy and entered into wedlock, and Zell improved the occasion by publishing a sermon in defence of the marriage of priests. Soon afterwards he was himself married. On Dec. 1, 1523, the magistracy directed all preachers "to proclaim, freely and in public, to the people nothing but the Holy Gospel and the doctrines of God, and whatever may tend to the promotion of love for God and our neighbor." A few months later all the married priests were excommunicated by the bishop, but the measure proved ineffective. Zell replied with an Appellation, and the citizens continued in increasing numbers to turn away from Romanism. Zell was as liberal towards all who believed in Christ as he was firm in his own convictions. He gave hospitable entertainment to the fugitive Schwenkfeld, and refused to anathematize the Swiss because of their opinions respecting the sacraments. He attached no great importance to formulated creeds, and took no part in current disputes, nor yet in Bucer's attempt at union. In 1534 he published, in the name of the Strasburg clergy, a catechism (Kurtze christliche Erbauung für die Kinder u. Angohnden, etc.) for beginners; which seems suited rather to teachers than to children. He also wrote for the latter class an exposition of the Lord's Prayer. In 1542 he united with his colleagues in sending an opinion respecting images, etc., to the preachers of Frankfort, which decided them to be adiaphora, and which asserted the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, but in a heavenly and not bodily manner. Zell died in 1548. His widow, Catharine, was a skilful disputer, and maintained a correspondence with Schwenkfeld during many years, besides issuing a defence of her association with him. She also wrote a brave defence of her husband's memory, in 1557, against an attack made by Louis Rabus. She obtained the reputation of a pious benefactor of the afflicted, and especially of "poor scholars" and such as had fled for refuge to Strasburg on account of their religious convictions, not excluding even Anabaptists. See the biographies of Zell and his wife in Röhrich, Mittheil. aus d. Gesch. d. Evang. Kirche d. Elsasses (Strasburg, 1855), iii, 89 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v.

Zella, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Zellenae or Teleptense), was held in 418, at Zella, or Tella, in the province of Byzacena, in Africa, Donatianus, bishop of Zella, presiding. Various regulations were made.

1. Enacts that no man shall be admitted to holy orders who has served in war after baptism.
2. Enacts that every bishop shall be consecrated by three bishops, with the consent of the metropolitan, and that of the bishops of the provinces, expressed in writing.
3. Declares that one bishop only cannot consecrate another, except in the Roman Church.
4. Exhorts bishops, priests, etc., to observe continence.
5. Directs that the Montanists and Novatianists shall be admitted into the Church by imposition of hands.

Zeller, Christian Heinrich, a Protestant pedagogue, was born at Hohen-Entringen, near Tübingen, March 29, 1799. He studied law at Tübingen, which he did not practice, but gave himself entirely to the cause of education. In 1820 he founded his famous institution for children and teachers at Beuggen-on-the-Rhine, where he died, May 18, 1860. He published, Göttliche Antworten auf menschliche Fragen (2d ed. Basle, 1852):—Kurtze Seelenlehre (Stuttgart, 1846):—Monatsblatt von Beuggen, which contains a great many essays on various subjects. Zeller also distinguished himself as a hymn-writer; one of his hymns, Gott bei mir an jedem Ort, is found in an English translation in Hymns from the Land of Luther, p. 27 ("My God with me in every place"). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. a. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v.; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, vii, 188 sq. (B. P.)

Zeller, Hermann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Neckarwehingen, Aug. 26, 1807, and died at Mühlhausen, April 10, 1885. He is best known as the editor of Biblisches Wörterbuch für das christliche Volk (3d ed. Leipzig, 1884). (B. P.)

Zeller, Johann, a Protestant theologian, was born at Zurich, June 29, 1807, and died July 6, 1839. He is the author of Stimmen der deutschen Kirche über das Leben Jesu von Strauss (Zurich, 1837). His Predigten were published after his death (1840). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Zemsem is the name of a well at Mecca accounted sacred by the Mohammedans. It is said to have been formed from the spring of water which God pointed out to Hagar and Ishmael when they were driven from the house of Abraham and compelled to flee into Arabia. The Mohammedan pilgrims drink of its waters and believe it to be effectual in healing diseases, and even in purifying the soul.

Zend-Avesta is the name commonly given to the sacred books of the Parsees (q. v.), which are ascribed to Zoroaster (q. v.). The word avesta (avasthā) means text, or original text; zend, or zand, means translation and paraphrase. According to the latest researches, it would seem as if only a small portion of the entire collection now extant were formed by avesta, or text, the rest being made up of zend, or commentary, without text. The term zend has changed its meaning repeatedly. Originally it indicated an authoritative interpretation coming from the highest source, which was in time embodied in the text itself. Later it came to denote a translation into the Pehlvi, or native idiom of Persia, made by the Zoroastrian priests during the Sassanian period. There is also a special zend doctrine which differs considerably from that contained in the avesta. A still further explanation of the zend doctrine is the pāzend, a word which often occurs in connection with avesta and zend.

The doctrine of the "Magi," as the Zoroastrian priests were anciently called, as well as those of India and Babylonia, is first alluded to in Jeremiah, where the chief of the Magi is mentioned among Nebuchadnezzar's retinue. In the New Test. (Matt. ii, 1) the Magi came to worship Jesus at Bethlehem. The earliest account among Greek writers is furnished by Herodotus. There are also accounts by Ctesias, the Greek physician of Artaxerxes II, by Denon, Theopompus, and Hermippus. But only fragments from their writings remain, embedded chiefly in Plutarch and Diogenes Laertius. The writings of Pliny, Strabo, Pausanias, Dion Chrysostomus also contain more or less information on the subject. Among the Armenian writers of the 5th century of our era we find Eznik and Elizeus, from whose records we may gather that the Zoroastrians at their time were split into two parties, the one called Mag, the other Zendik—the former inhabiting chiefly Media and Persia, and acknowledging in the main the avesta; the latter living principally in Bactria, and following the traditional explanations, or zend proper. The nations of modern Europe came into contact with the adherents of Zoroastrianism in the western parts of India, and in the 17th century some MSS. of their sacred books were brought to England. But no one was able to read them; and Hyde himself, the celebrated Oxford scholar, was unable to make any use of them when, in 1700, he wrote his learned work on the Persian religion. The key to this book was first obtained by Anquetil Duperron, a young Frenchman, who went to Bombay in 1754, and there prevailed on some of the dasturs, or learned priests, to introduce him into the mysteries of the holy language and rites, and to sell him some of their most valuable works written in it. In 1759 he commenced a translation of the whole Zend-Avesta. In 1761 he returned to Paris with one hundred and eighty MSS. in different Oriental languages, and in 1771 published in French the first European translation of the Zend-Avesta, to which was added a great deal of supplementary matter. This work produced a profound sensation throughout Europe. In England it was pronounced a forgery by almost all scholars. In France there was but one opinion, viz., that English scholars were trying to run down the work out of sheer spite and jealousy. In Germany, however, opinions were divided; for while some acceded to all the arguments arrayed against it, there arose another renowned German scholar, Kleuker, who, in token of his complete and unreserved trust in the genuineness, set about translating Anquetil's work into German, adding much supplementary matter. After the lapse of more than fifty years, Rash, a Danish scholar, undertook an investigation of the matter. In 1826 he wrote a pamphlet, in which he pointed out (as had been done before) the close affinity between the language of the Zend-Avesta and the Sanscrit, and proved it to be, not a corruption of Sanscrit, but a distinct language. He also proved that modern Persian is derived from Zend, as Italian from Latin, and this gave the key to many of the errors of Anquetil's version. The learned dastur himself, from whom Anquetil derived his information of the language, possessed no grammatical knowledge of it. Rash had pointed out the way, Eugene Burnouf followed it. He, indeed, may be called the father of Zend philology. For more than twenty years this eminent scholar devoted all his energies to elucidating, commenting on, and discussing this language, and the sacred writings couched in it, and in publishing texts and translations. In Germany, Olshausen, Bopp, Müller, Brockhaus, Spiegel, Haug, and in Copenhagen, Westergaard, have been busy ever since in editing and translating the Zend-Avesta or some portions of it.

The Zend-Avesta was originally of very great extent, consisting of vastly more than at present. Pliny says that Zoroaster composed two million verses, and Attavari, an Arabian author, says that his writings covered twelve thousand cow-skins. But from the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great, in 330 B.C., to the accession of the Sassanides, in A.D. 235, the religion of Zoroaster and the wisdom of the Magi were thrown into the background by Greek ideas, and became nearly lost. When, however, the Sassanides assumed the rule their principal endeavors were directed to the revival of the ancient faith, and their unceasing efforts after the ancient fragments of the Zoroastrian doctrine have resulted in the small collection which we now possess. The whole Scripture is said to have consisted of twenty-one soaks, or parts, each containing avesta and zend, that is, text and commentary. The number, twenty-one, was to correspond to the twenty-one words of which the most sacred prayer of the Zoroastrians (the Honorar) was composed. By the unanimous consent of both classical and Persian writers the whole bulk of the sacred literature is ascribed to Zoroaster himself. They are supposed to be the substance, or, as was subsequently held, the very words of divine revelations to the prophet in the form of conversations.

The name Zend-Avesta belongs more particularly to the three collections which are severally called Vendidad, Vispered, and Yasna, while the remaining writings are comprised under the name of Khorda-Avesta, or small Avesta. The latter contains short prayers, and especially the Yashts, or Yeshits, hymns addressed to the different genii, on the days which bear their names and are sacred to them, or on the days of those genii who are considered to be the attendants of the former.

The Vendidad consists of twenty-two fargards, or sections, which treat of cosmogony, and may be called the religious and civil code of the old Parsees. The first fargard relates how Akura-Mazda (now called Ormuzd), the good spirit, created the several countries and places (of which sixteen are named), excellent and perfect in their kind, but that Angro-Manyus (now called Ahriman), the evil or black spirit, created in opposition all the evils which infest these worlds. In the second fargard Zoroaster bids Yima announce to mankind the sacred law which he had taught him, but Yima refuses compliance with this behest. He then bids him enlarge the worlds and make them prosperous. This he obeys, and carries out the orders given him by Ahura-Mazda. The third fargard enumerates the five things which are the most agreeable, then the five things which are the most disagreeable, and afterwards the five things which convey the greatest satisfaction in this world. The fourth fargard may be termed the criminal code of the Avesta. It enumerates, in the first instance, various offences, which are considered to be so grave as to affect, not only the person who commits them, but also his relatives, and then proceeds to define the punishments incurred by the offender. The eight following fargards contain injunctions in reference to impurities caused by dead bodies. The thirteenth fargard begins with the description of two kinds of dogs, the one created by Ahura-Mazda, the other by Angro-Manyus—the killing of the former being a criminal, that of the latter a meritorious, act; and the remaining part of the book is devoted to the proper treatment of dogs in general, while the same subject is continued in the fourteenth fargard, which enumerates also the penalties for injuring dogs. The treatment of young dogs is likewise the subject-matter of the latter part of the fifteenth fargard, which, in its first sections, treats of sexual offences, and the bringing-up of illegitimate children. The great care and attention given to dogs seems to have arisen from the fact that the country was infested with wolves. The sixteenth fargard teaches how to treat women when affected with impurities. The seventeenth fargard treats of impurities caused by the cutting of hair and the trimming of nails. The next fargard is more of a mixed character; it treats of various ceremonies, and gives injunctions on cleanliness, decency, and moral conduct. The nineteenth fargard relates how Angro-Manyus endeavored to kill Zoroaster, but how the latter successfully defended himself with weapons given him by Ahura-Mazda. Then the evil spirit, being aware that it had no material power over Zoroaster, next resorted to temptations; but those, too, were defeated by the prophet, who now resolved to conquer the evil spirit, and for this purpose addressed to Ahura-Mazda various questions on the rites of purification and the condition of souls after death. The twentieth fargard gives some information about the first man who understood curing disease. The twenty-first fargard is devoted to the phenomena of the sky and the luminous bodies, and comprises invocations of the clouds, the sun, the moon, and the stars. The last fargard relates that Angro-Manyus, having engendered diseases, Ahura-Mazda is compelled to devise remedies against them. The book concludes with an account of the creation of various animals and other objects to this end. The form of all these fargards is nearly always that of a dialogue between Ahura-Mazda and Zoroaster, and the same form is occasionally observed in the two other portions of the Avesta, which differ materially from those of the Vendidad.

The Vispered contains a collection of prayers, composed of twenty-three chapters, resembling the younger Yasna, next to be noticed, and referring to the same ceremonies. The Vispered and the Yasna bear prominently a liturgical character. All that can really be held to emanate from Zoroaster himself are the five Gathas, which form part of the Yasna. This Yasna consists principally of prayers to be recited at the sacrificial rites, such as the consecration of Zoôthra, or holy water; of the Baresona, or bundle of twigs of a particular tree; the preparation of the sacred juice of the homa (Indian, soma, q. v.), taken to be an emblem of immortality; the offering of certain cakes, etc. The whole of the Yasna now comprises seventy-two chapters. It consists apparently of two parts belonging to different periods. The older is written in what has been called the Gatha dialect, and was considered sacred even at the time when the other books of the Zend-Avesta were composed. This "older Yasna" was divided into the Gathas and some minor pieces. The former, five in number, are small collections of sacred prayers, songs, and hymns, arranged in metre, and exhibiting philosophical and abstract thoughts about metaphysical subjects. The name itself signifies song. Their metre resembles chiefly that of the Vedic hymns. They are without rhymes, and only the syllables are counted. The first bears the heading (which is implied as to the other four), "The Revealed Thought, the Revealed Word, the Revealed Deed of Zarathustra the Holy; the Archangels first sang the Gathas." They are all more or less devoted to exhortations on the part of the prophet to forsake polytheism, and to bow only before Ahura-Mazda. The difference between monotheism and idolatry is pointed out in the respective sources whence they flow, "existence" and "non-existence." The mission, activity, and teaching of Zoroaster are dwelt upon more or less in all the Gathas, but chiefly in the second. To the other portion belongs the "Yasna of Seven Chapters," which seems to have been composed by early disciples, and which consists of prayers, in prose, addressed to Ahura-Mazda, the angels, the fire, the earth, the waters, and other spiritual beings, genii presiding over the different parts of the good creation. There is also a chapter containing a formula by which the ancient Iranians were received into the new religious community. The so-called younger Yasna, written in the common Zend language, is of more varied contents, such as an invitation to Ahura-Mazda and all the good spirits to be present at the sacrifice, pieces referring to the preparation and drinking of the homa juice, the praises of the genius Seroash, and a commentary on the most sacred prayers.

The Yashts are in twenty-four divisions. Yasht (vesti) means worship by prayers and sacrifices, and in the Avesta indicates certain laudations of sacred persons and objects, called yazatas (izad), or angels; and in so far different in nature from the invocations in the Yasna and Vispered that, while in the latter the divine beings are invited promiscuously, the single yashts are addressed to individual minima. In these songs are also found the primary sources of the legends contained in the Shah-nameh.

There yet remain some smaller pieces. Khorda-Avesta, which are now used by the Parsees as common prayers, such as the five Niyayish, addressed to the sun, the moon, the water, and the fire; the Afrigans, or blessings to be recited over a certain meal prepared for an angel or a deceased person; the five Gabs, or prayers to the angels set over the five different times of the day and night; and finally the Sirozah, or thirty days, being a calendar, or rather an enumeration, of the thirty divine beings that preside over each of the days. It is chiefly recited on the thirtieth day after the death of a man.

The religious belief taught in the Avesta rests on the dualism of the two great principles—Ahura-Mazda, or the good, and Angro-Manyus, or the evil principle. The genii subordinate to the former are the Amesha-spentas, six of whom are named in the Yasna, viz., Vohumano, who protects living beings; Asha-vahishta, or the genius of fire; Kshathra-vairyas, or the genius of metals; Spenta-armaiti, or the genius of earth; Haurvat, or the genius of water; and Ameretat, or the genius of the trees. They are severally opposed by the Devas, or dæmons, subordinate to Angro-Manyus, viz., by Akomano, Andar, Saurva, Naonghaithi, Tauru, and Zairicha. Other dæmons are named in the Vendidad. The worshippers of fire belong to Ahura-Mazda, whereas the worshippers of the Devas are possessed by Angro-Manyus. See ZOROASTER.

The worship taught by Zoroaster seems to have been of the simplest kind, the adoration of fire by means of hymns and offerings, chiefly, if not exclusively, taken from the vegetable kingdom, an essential concomitant of the sacrifice being the juice of the homa (or soma), which occupies an important part also in the Vedic rites. This worship, however, must not be confounded with the complicated ritual of later periods of the Parsee creed, which assumed a similar development to that based by the Hindūs on the Rigveda text, and is indicated by several portions of the Avesta, which cannot be looked upon as its earliest part. At the present day every Parsee child is taught to repeat long passages in the original Zend; but hardly a single word of that language is intelligible even to the Parsee priests or dasturs.

Literature.—In the Zend language this consists chiefly of its translated text, the accompanying glosses, and a few independent works in the same language, the Huzvareh, or literary Pehlevi, as the Bundehesh and the Dim-karb, of much later date. It is an important aid to the understanding of the Avesta; yet its interpretation is not to be implicitly trusted. That part of the Zoroastrian literature which is composed in the so-called Parsee dialect is of still more modern date and limited extent. Glosses or interpretations of the Avestan texts, called Pa-Zend, versions of certain portions of them and of Pehlevi texts, sundry invocations and ascriptions of praise, and expositions of Parsee doctrine, constitute nearly its whole substance. Several passages of these texts were published in Spiegel's Parsee Grammar (Leipzig, 1851). After the settlement of the Parsees in India, a Sanscrit version of the Yasna and some other parts of the Avestan text was made by Neriosseugh. It has been published in a Latin transliteration by Spiegel (Leipzig, 1861). See Spiegel, Avesta; die heiligen Schriften der Parsen, aus dem Grundtext übersetzt (Leipzig, 1852-68, 8 vols.; Eng. ed. of the same by Bleek, Lond. 1864); Haug, Essays (1st ed. Zenkel, GEORG PETER, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 20, 1717, at Schwarzenbach, in Bayreuth. He studied theology, Oriental languages, and natural sciences at Jena. In 1740 he was permitted to lecture, and in 1746 was made adjunct to the philosophical faculty. In 1754 he was called as professor of philosophy to Erlangen, and opened his lectures with an address, De Methodo Docendi apud Veteres Hebræos. In 1755 he resigned his position, and died Dec. 14, 1760. He wrote, Commentarii Grammatici Ebrææ Linguae (Jena, 1748, 1749):—Commentarius Evangelico-Homileticus (ibid. 1747 a. o.):—Beiträge zur Vertheidigung der Mosaischen Religion, etc. (Gotha, 1752-56, 2 vols.):—Diss. Philologica de Sepultura Christi, ad Locum Esaiæ liii, 9 (Jena, 1754). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 782 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 550; Steinschneider, *Bibl. Zeno, a reputed bishop of VERONA, and alleged author of ninety-three sermons, which were published in 1508 by Jacob de Lenco and Albert Castellani under the title, S. Zenoni Episc. Veronensis. Sermones, after a very ancient manuscript found fifty years before in the episcopal library of Verona by Guarinus. These sermons were previously wholly unknown, and Zeno himself lived only in a few miracle-legends. He was represented with a fish attached to his angle or episcopal staff, because he had, while angling, delivered a drowning man from the clutches of the devil. Eleven of the sermons are certainly not by the author of the general mass. The age of the collection is variously estimated; Vogel, in Herzog (following Dorner), dating them back perhaps to the beginning of the latter half of the 8d century, Baronius to A.D. 200, others to A.D. 450-500. It would seem that they emanated from the mind of a bishop who was endowed with earnestness and dignity of character as well as theological learning, and who presided over an established Church and a regularly organized clergy. Zentgraf, JOHANN JACOB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Strasburg, May 21, 1643. He studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, was in 1676 professor in his native city, in 1678 doctor of theology, and died Nov. 28, 1707. Zentgraf was a voluminous writer. A complete list of his writings, embracing all departments of the theology, is given by Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrtes-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Zer (Heb. Zér, זֶר, rock; Sept. by misapprehension, Tópos, Vulg. Ser), one of the fortified towns of Naphtali (Josh. xix, 35), where it is named between Ziddim and Hamnath; but from the absence of the copulative ("and") between this and the preceding name, as well as from the total ("nineteen cities") in ver. 33, it is evidently a part of the preceding name, Ziddim-zer. See ZIDDIM. Schwarz remarks (Palest. p. 182) that Zer is mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah, i) as lying near Ziddim.

Zera Abraham (זֶרָא אַבְרָהָם) is the title of a grammatico-historical commentary on the Pentateuch, written by Abraham Seeb, of Brzesc, in the 17th century, and published at Sulzbach in 1685. See De' Rossi, Dictionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 65; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 11. (B. P.)

Zereda. The present Surda lies twenty-one and a half miles north-west of Beitin (Bethel), and is "a small village on a hillside, with a garden to the south of it, and the spring Ain Jelazün on the east" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 295).

Zerremer, HEINRICH GOTTLIEB, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Wernigerode, March 8, 1750. He studied at Halle, and, after completing his studies, accepted a position as teacher of Latin and mathematics at Klosterbergen. In 1775 he was called as pastor to Bayendorf. In 1787 he was appointed first preacher at Derenburg, in the duchy of Halberstadt. In 1810 he was appointed general superintendent at Halberstadt, where he died, Nov. 10, 1811. He was a popular writer, and his publications were greatly es-seemed in his day, though of little value for the present. They are given by Döring, in his Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 787; see also Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 192, 196, 226, 233, 248, 394. (B. P.)

Zestermann, August Christian Adolf, who died at Leipsic, March 16, 1869, doctor and professor, is the author of, De Basilicis Libri Tres (Leipsic, 1847):—Die antiken und christlichen Basiliken nach ihrer Entstehung, Ausbildung und Beziehung zueinander dargestellt (1847). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Zickler, Friedrich Samuël, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 14, 1721, at Schwabedorf, in Weimar. He studied at Jena, where he was made magister in 1744, on presenting a dissertation, Ad Vaticanum Jacobæum Genes. xlii, 12. In 1758 he was made professor of philosophy, and at the jubilee of the Jena University was made doctor of theology, presenting a dissertation, De Glorioso Servatoris in Cælum Ascensu. In 1760 he went to Erlangen as third professor of theology and university-preacher. He opened his lectures with a dissertation on De ὁδοδοξία et ὁδοποία Necessariis in Doctore Ecclesiæ Requisitis. He returned again to Jena in 1768, advanced rapidly, and died April 25, 1779, having four years before been chosen first professor of theology. He wrote, Diss. I et II Historico-Ergetica, Religionem Bestiarum ab Egyptiis Consecratarum Exponentes, etc. (Jena, 1745-46):—Diss. Ergetica Status Ecclesiæ Novi Fœderis Primæ a Jeremia iii, 14 sq., Prædictum Exponens (ibid. 1747):—Chaldaismus Danielis Prophetæ, etc. (ibid. 1749, etc.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 789 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 550. (B. P.)

Ziddim. The modern Hattin lies seven and a quarter miles north-west of Tiberias, and four and three quarters south-west of Mejdal (Magdala); it contains several rock-cut tombs to the west, and the wady of Neby Shuaib (Jethro) on the south (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, i, 384).

Ziegenbalg, Bartholomäus, a well-known Protestant missionary of Germany, was born June 14, 1683, at Pulsnitz, in Lusatia. He studied at Halle, where A. H. Francke enlisted him for missionary service. On Nov. 29, 1705, he left for Tranquebar with his friend Plüschow. For a time his work was opposed by the Danish officers, but finally he succeeded. Having mastered the language, he translated Luther's smaller catechism, the New Test., and commenced the translation of the Old Test. into the Malabar language. He also founded schools and built chapels there. In 1714 he returned to Europe, to return again to Tranquebar in 1716, where he died, Feb. 23, 1719. He published, Grammatica Damulica (Halle, 1716):—together with J. E. Gründler, he published Theologia Thetica in qua Omnia Dogmata ad Salutem Cognoscendam Necessaria Perspicua Methodo Tractantur, etc. (2d ed. Halle, 1856). See German, Ziegenbalg und Plüschow (Erlangen, 1868, 2 vols.); Theologisches Universalexikon, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1491. (B. P.)

Ziegenbein, Johann Wilhelm Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1766 at Braunschweig. In 1798 he was appointed pastor of St. Peter's, in his native place, and advanced in 1808 as general superintendent of the duchy of Blankenburg. In 1819 he was appointed abbot of Michaelstein, and died Jan. 12, 1824. Ziegenbein's writings are mostly of a pedagogical nature. He translated from the French Senebrier's lives of Calvin and Beza (Hamburg, 1789); from the English Priestley's Comparison of the Institutions of Moses with those of the Hindüs and other Ancient Nations; The Life of Gibbon, etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 793 sq.; Winer, *Handbuch der theol. Ziegler, Daniel, D.D., a German Reformed minister, was born at Reading, Pa., July 11, 1804. His parents removing to New Berlin, Union Co., in his infancy, his youth was spent there. He was a saddler by trade, and went to Philadelphia to work; but his mind being turned towards the ministry, he entered the University of Pennsylvania, located at Philadelphia; studied theology in the seminary of the Reformed Church at Carlisle; was licensed in 1830, and became pastor of some congregations in York County; was called to the Kreuzcreek charge, where he spent the whole of his life, with the exception of the last few years, which were devoted to the First Reformed Church in York. He died May 23, 1876. He preached almost exclusively in German, which he spoke with great fluency, accuracy, and elegance. His preaching was calm, clear, and impressive. He was a man of culture, pleasant, open-hearted, kind, and sympathizing. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v, 199.

Ziegler, Werner Carl Ludwig, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 15, 1763, at Scharnebeck, in Lüneburg. He studied at Göttingen, some time lectured in the Göttingen University, and was called, in 1792, as professor of theology at Rostock. He died April 24, 1809, leaving, De Mimis Romanorum Commentatio (Göttingen, 1788):—Vollständige Einleitung in den Brief an die Hebräer (ibid. 1791):—Progr. Adit. Historia Dogmatis de Redemptione, etc. (ibid. eod.):—Beiträge zur Geschichte des Glaubens an das Daseyn Gottes in der Theologie (ibid. 1792). Zierold, Johann Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 14, 1669, at Neustadt-ober-Wiesenthal, in Meissen. He studied at Leipsic, travelled extensively through Austria, Holland, and England, was appointed, in 1696, pastor and professor of theology at the Gröningen College in Stargard, received the doctorate of theology in 1698, and died Sept. 1, 1731. He wrote, Analogismus Nominum et Rerum ex Psa. i (Stargard, 1701):—באר היטב oder deutliche Erläuterungen der heiligen Schrift (Leipsic, 1715):—Der Prediger Salomo aus der Bedeutung der Buchstaben (ibid. eod.):—Der Prophet Obadja, etc. (ibid. eod.):—Der Prophet Jöel, etc. (ibid. 1720). Ziller, Tuiskon, a German philosopher, was born Dec. 22, 1817, and died April 20, 1882, at Leipsic, doctor and professor of philosophy. He was a pupil of Herbart, whose system he followed. Ziller published, Die Regierung der Kinder (1859):—Grundlegung zur Lehre vom erziehenden Unterricht (1861):—Vorlesungen über allgemeine Pädagogik (1876):—Allgemeine philosophische Ethik (1880). In 1860 he started with Allihn the Zeitschrift für exakte Philosophie im Sinne des neueren philosophischen Realismus. He also organized the society of scientific pedagogics, whose organ, the Jahrbücher, he edited for fourteen years. (B. P.)

Zillerthal, a valley of Tyrol, stretching for about five miles along the Ziller, between Salzburg and Innsbruck, and inhabited by about 15,000 souls, has become memorable in Church history on account of the infamous manner in which the Roman Catholic clergy succeeded in suppressing an evangelical rising which took place in our century. As in other countries of Germany, the Reformation found its way into Salzburg and Tyrol, but it was suppressed, in the latter part of the 16th century, in Salzburg, by the archbishops, and in Tyrol by the government, in connection with the nobility and the ecclesiastics. In 1780 archbishop Frinian inaugurated a cruel persecution, with a view of exterminating all adherents to the evangelical faith. Nevertheless it reappeared in the Zillerthal in the beginning of the present century. As soon as the Roman clergy became aware of the danger, the number of priests was doubled in the villages and the strictest watch was kept. When, in 1832, the emperor Francis of Austria visited the valley, the evangelical Zillerthalers petitioned him in behalf of their religion. The emperor promised to do what he could. When the Roman clergy became aware of this, they resorted to violent measures. The toleration edict of Joseph II, and the stipulations of the congress of Vienna, were thrown aside, and, instigated by the fanatical clergy, the provincial estates of Tyrol decreed that no split in the Church of the country should be allowed, that those who would not conform to the Church of Rome should leave the country and settle under an evangelical prince. But before this could be effected the Evangelicals had to suffer many things. Being under the ban of the Church, their neighbors were warned against holding any kind of intercourse with them. The children of the Evangelicals were forced to frequent the Roman Catholic schools, where they were placed on separate seats, as "children of the devil," apart from the "Christian children." When, after eleven years of perpetual chicanery, the Evangelicals were advised from Vienna that they could emigrate, they addressed themselves to Friedrich Wilhelm III of Prussia, in 1837, and by his humane intercession they were allowed to sell their estates and remove to his dominions, where they were settled, four hundred and forty-eight souls, in Hohen-Mittel, and Nieder-Zillerthal, in Silesia. Zimmer, Patriz Benedict, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 22, 1752. He studied theology and philosophy, received holy orders in 1775, was made professor of dogmatics at Ingolstadt in 1789, and died at Steinheim, Oct. 16, 1820. He wrote, Theologia Christiana Theoretica Systema (Dettingen, 1787); — Veritas Christiana Religionis (Augsburg, 1789-90); — Theologia Christiana Specialis et Theoretica (Landshut, 1802-1806); — Philosophische Religionslehre (ibid. 1805); — *Untersuchung über den allgemeinen Verfall des menschl. Zimmermann, Ernst, a brother of Karl, was born Sept. 18, 1786. Like his brother, he studied theology and philology at Giessen. In 1805 he was called as assistant preacher and teacher to Auerbach (where he published an edition of Euripides [Frankfort, 1808 sq.], and Suetonius's History of the Roman Emperors [Darmstadt, 1810]). In 1809 he was appointed deacon at Grossgerau, in 1814 advanced as court-deacon, and in 1816 made court-preacher, at the same time acting as tutor of prince Ludwig of Anhalt-Köthen. He died June 24, 1832, having been appointed prelate. He was an excellent preacher, and his homiletical works are still of great value. Besides sermons, he published, Homiletisches Handbuch für denkende Prediger (Frankfort, 1812-22, 4 vols.); — Monatschrift für Predigerwissenschaften (Darmstadt, 1821-24, 6 vols.); — Jahrbuch der theol. Literatur (Essen, 1832-36, 4 vols.); — Geist aus Luther's Schriften (Darmstadt, 1828-31, 4 vols.). In 1822 he commenced the Allgemeine Kirchenzeitung, which is still published. See Karl Zimmermann, Ernst Zimmermann nach seinem Leben, Wirken u. Character geschildert (Darmstadt, 1838); Zuchold, Zimmermann, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Langenwiesen, near Ilmenau, Aug. 12, 1702. He studied at Leipzig, and was appointed court-chaplain at Hanover in 1738. In 1743 he was called as provost and superintendent to Uelzen, in Hanover, where he died, May 28, 1783. He is the author of several hymns, which are found in Vermehrtes Hanoversches Kirchen-Gesangbuch (edited by Zimmermann, Hanover, 1740). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 566 sq. (B. P.)

Zimmermann, Johann Jakob (1), an eloquent German preacher, was born in the duchy of Würtemberg in 1644. He was generally regarded as a disciple of Boehman and Brouquelle, whose doctrines he rendered highly popular, making many converts in Germany and the united provinces of the Netherlands. He was for some years professor of mathematics at Heidelberg. He was about to depart for America to escape the persecution to which his preaching had subjected him, when he died at Rotterdam, in 1693. The most noted of his works is entitled a Revelation of Antichrist.

Zimmermann, Johann Jakob (2), a Swiss theologian, was born in 1685, became professor at Zurich in 1737, and died in 1756. He introduced more liberal views in his teaching than had been current hitherto, and was often suspected of heresy. See Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church in the 18th and 19th Centuries, i, 113; Fritzsche, Dissertation (Zurich, 1841); Schweitzer, Centraldogmen, ii, 791 sq.

Zimmermann, Karl, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Darmstadt, Aug. 23, 1803. He studied theology and philology at Giessen, and, after having labored for some years in the department of education, was appointed deacon to the court-church at Darmstadt in 1832. From that time he remained in the ministry, advancing rapidly, and was appointed in 1842 first preacher to the court. In 1847 he was made prelate and member of consistory, and filled this high position till 1872, when he retired. He died June 12, 1877. To him the Gustavus Adolphus Society (q. v.) is much indebted for the great interest and activity he showed in its behalf. His publications, mostly sermons, are all specified by Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1495-97. See also Theol. Universalerikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Zimmermann, Mathias, a German theologian, was born at Ypres, Sept. 21, 1625. He began his studies in his native village, and afterwards went to the College of Thun (1639), and thence (1644) to the University of Strasburg, where he studied philosophy. Having decided upon a religious career, he studied at Leipzig, and in 1651 returned home. He was soon nominated rector of the College of Leutsch, in Upper Hungary, but the next year (1652) returned home again. Soon afterwards the elector of Saxony appointed him a colleague of the superintendent of Colditz, and the minister and superintendent of Meissen. He had prepared himself for those positions by a license in theology (Nov. 1661), and in 1666 was made doctor in the university at Leipzig, but died suddenly, Nov. 29, 1689, leaving many religious works, which are enumerated in the Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Zimmermann, Wilhelm, historian and controversialist of Neustadt, in the duchy of Würtemberg, was preacher at Wimpfsw in 1569, member of consistory and court-preacher at Heidelberg in 1578, and finally (in 1586) inspector of churches and schools at Grotz. He left a Historia Germanica, and some Litteræ, which are inserted by Fecht in his collection of Epistolæ Theologicae.

Zingerle, Prus, a Roman Catholic Orientalist, was born at Meran, March 17, 1801, and died Jan. 10, 1881, at Mariaberg, Tyrol. He published, Echte Achten Heiliger

Märtyrer des Morgenlandes, aus dem Syrischen übersetzt (Innsbruck, 1836, 2 vols.) :—Clemens Romanus' zwei Briefe an die Jungfrauen, aus dem Syrischen mit Anmerkungen (Vienna, 1827) :—Ephraem Syrus' auserwählte Schriften (Innsbruck, 1830-34, 5 vols.) ; besides, he contributed largely to the Zeitschrift of the German Oriental Society. Zinzendorf, NICHOLAS LEWIS Count von, is entitled to a fuller notice than space allowed in vol. x. The founder of the modern Moravian Church was born at Dresden, May 26, 1700, and died at Herrnhut, Saxony, May 9, 1760. He was descended from an ancient Austrian family. For the sake of the Protestant faith his grandfather relinquished broad domains in Austria, and settled in Franconia. When he was but six weeks old, his father, one of the cabinet ministers of the elector of Saxony, died; while several years later his mother married the field-marshal Von Natzmar, of the Prussian army, and removed to Berlin. Young Zinzendorf did not accompany her, but remained with his grandmother, the baroness Catharine von Gersdorf, one of the most distinguished women of her day, who had organized a Spenerian ecclesiola in her castle of Gross Hennersdorf. That he was intrusted to her care proved to be an important event in his life. Amid the influences of that ecclesiola he spent his childhood, daily breathing the atmosphere of a transparent piety. His grandmother and aunt Henrietta shaped his religious development. When he was not yet four years old he grasped, with a clear perception and a flood of feeling, Christ's relation to man as a Saviour and divine brother. This consciousness produced a love for Jesus which was the holy and perpetual fire on the altar of his heart; so that in mature years he could truthfully exclaim: "I have but one passion; and it is He—He only!" In 1710 he was sent to the Royal Pædagogium at Halle, at the head of which stood the celebrated Francke; in 1716 he entered the University of Wittenberg; and in 1719, in accordance with the custom of young nobles of that day, began his travels. During all these years he confessed Christ with youthful enthusiasm, and labored for his cause with manly courage. At Halle he organized a fraternity among the students, known as "The Order of the Grain of Mustard Seed;" at Wittenberg he exercised no little influence; in Paris, where he spent an entire winter, neither the blandishments of the royal court nor the flatteries of the highest nobles could seduce him from the path of godliness. His commentary on the French capital, with its hollow gayeties and carnal frivolities, was: "O Splendida Misericordia!" while the impression which an exquisite Ecce Homo—with the inscription, "Hoc feci pro te, quid facis pro me?"—in the picture-gallery of Düsseldorf made upon his heart followed him through life. When Zinzendorf returned from his journey, it was his earnest wish to devote himself, in spite of his rank, to the ministry of the gospel. But neither his mother nor grandmother would listen to such a proposition, and insisted upon his adopting, like his father, the career of a statesman. With a heavy heart he yielded, and in 1721 accepted a position as Aulic and Justicial Councillor at Dresden. His purpose to promote the cause of Christ remained, however, unshaken, and soon after attaining his majority he purchased the domain of Berthelsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, with the intention of making that the centre of his Christian activity. In what such activity was to consist he did not as yet know. He was supported in his purpose by his young wife, the countess Erdmuth Dorothy von Reuss, whom he married in 1722, and through whom he became connected with several of the royal houses of Europe. Of the manner in which he was led to grant an asylum on his newly-purchased estate to the remnant of the Moravian Brethren, of the renewal of their Church through his agency, and of the peculiar character which he gave to it, a full account may be found in the article on the MORAVIAN BRETHREN, 2, vi, 585, etc. In all that he undertook in this respect his aim was, not to interfere with the established Church, but rather to make the Moravians a Church within that Church. His course was misunderstood and excited bitter opposition. In 1736 he was banished from Saxony, and, two years later, as he refused to sign a bond acknowledging himself guilty of "offences," banished "forever." The same result which generally grows out of religious persecutions appeared in this case also. His enemies overreached themselves. Instead of putting a stop to his Christian activity, it grew in importance and extended far and wide. A "Church of Pilgrims," as it was called, gathered around Zinzendorf, composed of the members of his family and his chief ministerial coadjutors, and itinerated to various parts of Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and England, everywhere making known the renewal of the Unitas Fratrum, and attracting large numbers to its communion. Zinzendorf, with the aid of his fellow-laborers, directed the entire work of the Moravians in Christian and heathen lands. He had long since resigned his civil office at Dresden, and devoted himself to the ministry; and now, May 25, 1737, at the recommendation of the king of Prussia, he was consecrated, at Berlin, a bishop of the Unitas Fratrum, by bishops Jablonsky and David Nitschmann. In the following year he set out on a tour of inspection to the mission in St. Thomas, and in 1741 visited America. His course continued to excite opposition, and brought upon him personal defamation of the grossest character. Few servants of the Lord have suffered more in this respect. But he leaned upon the strong arm of his divine Master, and gradually won the victory. The Saxon government recalled him to his native country, and fully acknowledged the Renewed Church of the Brethren; the British parliament recognised the Church, and passed an act encouraging the Moravians to settle in the British colonies; the government of Prussia granted the most favorable concessions. At the time of his death the Church for whose renewal God had appointed him the instrument was everywhere firmly established, and in Germany, over against the State Church, had gained a position even more independent than he had intended to secure. Zinzendorf died full of joy and peace, triumphing in the thought of his "going to the Saviour," blessing his children and fellow-workers, and when speech failed him, looking upon them with a countenance that was irradiated with the brightness of coming glory. Thirty-two presbyters and deacons from Germany, Holland, England, Ireland, North America, and Greenland bore his remains to their last resting-place on the Hulberg, at Herrnhut.

Zinzendorf was an extraordinary man, a heroic leader in the Church of Christ, a "disciple whom Jesus loved," a priest of the living God. Like all great men he had his faults, and some of them were of a grave character. He was often impetuous when he ought to have been calm; he allowed himself to be unduly swayed by his feelings; in one period of his career his theological views and utterances, which, however, he subsequently laid aside, were very objectionable; while his efforts to renew the Unitas Fratrum and yet make it a part of the established Church of Germany brought him into dilemmas the inevitable outcome of which was offences on the score of insincerity and double-dealing, although nothing was further from his thoughts. On the other hand, his sterling piety, his intense love to the Saviour, his Johannian intercourse with him, his work for the Moravian Church, his labors for the Church universal, the principles which he originated, often misunderstood and ridiculed in his day, but now the common and cherished property of all evangelical Christians, the missions which he inaugurated among the heathen, the lifelong efforts which he made to promote the unity of the children of God of every name, and to bring about the fulfilment of Christ's high-priestly prayer—"that they may be one"—assign to him an exalted place in ecclesiastical history, give him an imperishable name, and justify the epitaph on his tombstone: "He was ordained that he should go and bring forth fruit, and that his fruit should remain." In many respects—and this truth explains to a great degree the opposition with which he met—Zinzendorf was more than a century in advance of his age. His writings number more than one hundred, and consist of sermons, hymnals, offices of worship, controversial works, catechisms, and historical collections. He was a gifted hymnologist. In public service he frequently improvised hymns, which were sung by the congregation as he announced them line by line. Many of his compositions, both in point of the sentiments and the poetry, are worthless; many others are beautiful, and take their place among the standard hymns of the Christian Church. The best collection of them was edited by Albert Knapp, Geistliche Lieder des Grafen von Zinzendorf (Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1845).

We append a brief account of Zinzendorf's labors in America. His chief purpose was not to found Moravian churches, but to care for his neglected German countrymen in Pennsylvania. He landed at New York on Dec. 2, 1741, accompanied by his daughter, the countess Benigna, his private secretary, and several others. From New York he proceeded to Philadelphia, and established himself at Germantown, where he rented a house which is still standing. Keeping in view the main object of his visit to America, he opened, in that dwelling, a school for German children; preached the gospel wherever he came, in churches, school-houses, and barns; accepted from the Lutherans of Philadelphia, who were without a minister, an appointment as their temporary pastor, a thing that led, on Muhlenberg's arrival from Europe, to bitter animosities, for which both sides were responsible; and organized the so-called Pennsylvania Synod. This last was his favorite undertaking. He conceived the idea of uniting the German churches and sects of Pennsylvania, upon the basis of experimental religion, into what he called "The Congregation of God in the Spirit." Gaining over to his views Henry Antes, a prominent magistrate of the Reformed persuasion (see McMinn, Life and Times of Henry Antes, Moorestown, N. J., 1886), a call was addressed to all German religious bodies within the colony to send representatives to a Union Synod to be held at Germantown. It convened on Jan. 12, 1742, and met again, at various places, seven times during Zinzendorf's stay in America, and eighteen times after his return to Europe. But, however beautiful the ideal, it was premature—no real union was brought about; the interest in the movement gradually waned, and, in the end, it served but to augment the differences among the German religionists of Pennsylvania. Reports of the first seven meetings of this Synod, together with cognate documents, were published by Benjamin Franklin, and form a volume which is as valuable as it is rare. The title of the first report is Authentische Relation von dem Anlass, Fortgang und Schlusse der in Germantown gehaltenen Versammlung einiger Arbeiter derer meisten Christlichen Religionen und vieler vor sich selbst Gott-dienenden Christen-Menschen in Pennsylvania (Philadelphia: by Benj. Franklin). Zinzendorf's labors among his own brethren resulted in the organization of several churches, particularly the one at Bethlehem. After he had left the country Moravian enterprises were begun at nearly all the places where he had preached. The Indian mission attracted his earnest attention. He undertook three journeys to the aboriginal domain—the first, in July, 1742, to the Delawares of Pennsylvania; the second, in August, to the Mohicans of New York; and the third, in September, to the Shawnees of the Wyoming Valley. He was probably the first white man who encamped on what is now the site of Wilkesbarre, and he would have been murdered by the savages had it not been for the opportune arrival of Conrad Weisser, the government agent. The rattlesnake story, which has found its way into so many books and is so often quoted as an instance of God's special providence, is a fable. During his stay in America Zinzendorf laid aside his rank as a count, and was known as Lewis von Thürostein, which name formed one of his titles. On Jan. 9, 1743, he set sail for Europe in a chartered vessel commanded by captain Garrison, who afterwards, for many years, was the captain of the Moravian missionary vessel which plied between England and the American colonies.

Literature.—The books in relation to Zinzendorf are very numerous. Besides the works noted in the article on the Renewed Moravian Brethren, the most important are the following: Spangenberg, Leben des Grafen von Zinzendorf (Barby, 1772-75, 3 vols.; an abridged English translation by Jackson, Lond. 1838); Verbeek, Leben von Zinzendorf (Gnadau, 1845); Vanhagen von Ense, Leben des Grafen Zinzendorf (Berlin, 1846); Pilgram, Leben des Grafen Zinzendorf (Leipzig, 1857), from a Roman Catholic standpoint; Kölling, Der Graf von Zinzendorf dargestellt aus seinen Gedichten (Gnadau, 1850); Braun, Leben des Grafen von Zinzendorf (Bielefeld, ext.); Bovet, Le Comte de Zinzendorf (Paris, 1865; an English translation under the title of The Banished Count, by John Gill, Lond. eod.); Zinzendorf's Theologie, dargestellt von H. Plitt (Gotha, 1869-74, 3 vols.); Becker, Zinzendorf im Verhältnis zu Philosophie und Kirchenthum seiner Zeit (Leipzig, 1886). (E. DE S.)

Zipser, MAIER, chief rabbi at Stuhlweissenburg and afterwards at Rechnitz, in Hungary, was born Aug. 14, 1815, and died Dec. 10, 1870. He contributed largely to the Literaturblatt des Orients from 1846 to 1850, Ben-Chananja, and the Jewish Chronicle, published in London. His contributions to the latter periodical, headed "The Talmud and the Gospels," which were called forth by Mr. Newdegate in the British House of Commons, when he opposed the admission of Jews into Parliament, were published separately under the title, The Sermon on the Mount (Lond. 1852). After his death, Dr. A. Jellinek published his Des Flavius Josephus' Werk "Ueber die hohe Alter des jüd. Volkes gegen Apion" nach hebr. Originalquellen erläutert... (Wien, 1871). Zirkel, GREGORIUS, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Silbach, near Hassfurth, July 28, 1762, and died at Würzburg, Dec. 18, 1807, as doctor and professor of theology and regent of the clerical seminary. He is the author of, Der Prediger Salomon, übersetzt und erklärt (Würzburg, 1792);—Untersuchungen über den Prediger nebst kritischen und philologischen Bemerkungen (ibid. eod.). Zisca (or Zizka), JOHN, the military leader of the Hussites, was born at Trocnow, in the circle of Budweis, Bohemia, about 1360. He was of a noble Bohemian family, and in his boyhood lost an eye. At the age of twelve he became a page to king Wenceslas at the court of Prague, but his gloomy and thoughtful temperament unfitted him at this period for the frivolous occupations of the court. Embracing the career of arms, he served as a volunteer in the English army in France, and afterwards joined king Ladislas of Poland, with a body of Bohemian and Moravian auxiliaries, and greatly distinguished himself in the war against the Teutonic knights, deciding the battle of Tannenberg (July 15, 1410), in which the knights suffered a terrible defeat. High honors were heaped upon him by the king; but the war being now over, his restless spirit led him to join the Austrians against the Turks in Hungary, and afterwards to enter the English army, in which he engaged in the battle of Agincourt in 1415. He returned to Bohemia soon after the death of John Huss, and became chamberlain to king Wenceslas. He had early embraced the doctrines of the Hussites, and entered deeply into the feelings of resentment which the execution of Huss and Jerome of Prague excited throughout Bohemia. A powerful party was soon formed, which urged upon the king a policy of resistance to the decisions of the Council of Constance. Zisca was one of the prominent leaders of this party, and his personal influence with the king gained for it the latter's sanction to offer resistance, though the king's vacillating disposition incapacitated him from giving effect to his own honest convictions, and taking open part with his subjects against their oppressors. About the time of the outbreak at Prague (July 30, 1419), Zisca was chosen leader of the Hussite party. On that day, as a procession of Hussite priests was marching to St. Stephen's Church, one of them was struck by a stone which came from the town house, where the magistrates (Roman Catholics) were assembled. Zisca and his followers immediately stormed the building, and threw thirteen of the city council into the yard below, where they were instantly killed by the mob. This was the beginning of the first great religious controversy of Germany, known as the Hussite war. The shock produced by the news of this outbreak was fatal to Wenceslas, and his death gave more of a political character to the contest, for when his brother, the emperor Sigismund, attempted to obtain the throne by advancing an army of 40,000 men into the country, his project was frustrated for a time by the Hussites, who insisted on their religious and political liberties being secured, and totally defeated his army with a force of not more than 4000. In this contest he had captured Prague in the spring of 1420, and he completed the conquest of Bohemia by capturing the castle of Prague in 1421. He secured his hold of the country by the erection of fortresses, the chief of which was that of Tabor, whence his party received the name of Taborites (q. v.). The varied experience acquired by Zisca in foreign warfare was now of immense service to his party; his followers were armed with small firearms, and his almost total deficiency in cavalry was compensated for by the introduction of the wagenburg, or "cart-fort," constructed of the baggage-wagons, to protect his little army from the attacks of the mailed knights. In 1421 he lost his remaining eye by an arrow shot from the enemy while besieging the castle of Raby; and, though now entirely blind, he continued to lead his armies with the same masterly generalship. He was carried in a car at the head of his troops, and was enabled to give orders for their disposition from the description of the ground given him by his officers, and from his own minute knowledge of the country. About the close of 1421 Sigismund led a second large army into Bohemia, which included a splendid body of 15,000 Hungarian horse. A battle took place at Deutsch-Brod in January, 1422, in which the imperial army was totally routed. Followed closely by Zisca in their retreat to Moravia, the fleeing troops, in crossing the Iglawa on the ice, broke through and 2000 were drowned. He repeatedly vanquished the citizens of Prague who were not disposed to obey his orders, and the uniform success of his arms at last convinced Sigismund that there was no prospect of the reduction of Bohemia. After a short time, therefore, he proposed an arrangement with the Hussites, by which full religious liberty was allowed; and Zisca, who had an interview with the emperor on the footing of an independent chief, was to be appointed governor of Bohemia and her dependencies. But the war-worn old chief did not live long enough to complete the treaty, for while besieging the castle of Przibislaw he was seized with the plague, and died Oct. 12, 1424. He was buried in a church at Czaslaw, and his battle-axe was hung up over his tomb. The story that, in accordance with his express injunction, his skin was flayed off, tanned, and used for the cover of a drum which was afterwards employed in the Hussite army, is a fable. Zisca was victor in more than one hundred engagements, and won thirteen pitched battles. Once only, at Kremsir, in Moravia, he suffered a reverse; and even then the evil consequences were warded off by the skillful manner in which he conducted his retreat. The only accusation which can with justice be made against Zisca is on the ground of excessive cruelty, the victims being the monks who fell into his hands. It would have been strange if Zisca had not laid himself open to such a reproach; for the burning alive of the propagators of the faith to which he adhered, the atrocious cruelties practiced on such Hussite priests as fell into the hands of the imperialists, and the seduction of his own favorite sister by a monk, were events ill calculated to induce him to moderate the hatred entertained by himself and his followers against their opponents. Zisca considered himself the chosen instrument of the Lord to visit his wrath upon the nations, and a fanaticism which asked no mercy for its defenders gave none to its opposers. His line of march could be traced through a country laid waste with fire and sword, and over the ruins of plundered towns. One of the dogmas held by his followers was, "that when all the cities of the earth should be burned down and reduced to the number of five, then would come the new kingdom of the Lord; therefore it was now the time of vengeance, and God was a God of wrath." The cries and groans of the monks and priests whom he sent to the stake he was wont to call the bridal song of his sister. His victories were generally won by the decisive charge of a chosen band of his followers named the invincible brethren. In his great victory at Aussig over the German crusading army, commanded by Frederick the Warlike of Saxony, and the elector of Brandenburg, the furious onset of the Hussites was steadily sustained by the Saxons, and the Bohemians recoiled in astonishment at a successful resistance which they had never before encountered. Zisca, being apprised of the circumstance, approached on his cart, thanked the men for their past services, and added, "If you have now done your utmost, let us retire." Thus stimulated, they made a second charge, still more furious than before, broke the Saxon ranks, and left 9000 of the enemy dead on the field. Zittel, KARL, a Protestant theologian and doctor of theology of Germany, was born at Schmieheim, in Baden, June 21, 1802. He studied theology at Jena, was called in 1824 as pastor to Bahlingen, in 1849 to Heidelberg, where he died, Aug. 28, 1871. Zittel is known as leader of the Liberal Church movement in Baden. He published, Zustände der evangelisch-protestantischen Kirche in Baden (Carlsruhe, 1843); — Motion auf Gestaltung einer Religionsfreiheit (ibid. 1846); — Begründung der Motion über Religionsfreiheit (Berlin, eod.); — Die Sonntagsfeier (Heidelberg, 1851); — Der Bekenntnisstreit in der protestantischen Kirche mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Schrift von Hundeshagen (Manheim, 1852). He also edited the Sonntagsabend. Blätter für christliche Erbauung und für kirchliches Leben (Berlin, 1857-63). See Holtzmann, in Protest. Kirchenzeitung, 1871; Zuchold, *Bibl. Zoerard, a Polish monk of the 10th century (or early part of the 11th), visited Hungary by invitation of king Stephen for the purpose of instructing the people in the Christian religion which had been recently introduced. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 334.

Zohar (זֹהָר, i. e. light) is the name of the standard and code of the cabalistic system, and has been called "the Bible of the cabalists." The titles of the book vary: Midrash of R. Simon ben-Jochaï, from its reputed author; Midrash, Let there be light, from the words in Gen. i, 4; but more commonly Sepher haz-Zohar, from Dan. xii, 3, where the word Zohar is used for "the brightness of the firmament." The title in full is, Sepher haz-Zohar al hat-Torah, me-sh' Elohim Kodesh, hu nore meod hat-tana R. Simon ben-Jochai, etc., i. e. "The book of Splendor on the Law, by the very holy and venerable man of God, the Tanaite rabbi, Simon ben-Jochai, of blessed memory."

I. Contents.—The body of the work takes the form of a commentary, extending over the Pentateuch, of a highly mystic and allegorical character. But the Zohar is not considered complete without the addition of certain appendices, attributed either to the same author, or to some of his personal or successional disciples. These supplementary portions are,

1. Siphra de Tenuitha (ספר ד' צניעותא), i. e. "the book of mysteries," given in vol. ii, p. 176^a–178^b. It contains five chapters, and is chiefly occupied with discussing the questions involved in the creation. It has been translated into Latin by K. v. Rosenroth, in the second volume of his Kabbala Denudata (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1684).

2. Iddera Rabba (אדרת רבא), i. e. "the Great Assembly," referring to the community or college of Simon's disciples, in their conferences for cabalistic discussion. It is generally found in vol. iii, p. 127^a–145^b, and has also been translated into Latin by Rosenroth, i. c. See Index.

3. Iddera Zuta (אדרת זוטא), i. e. "the Small Assembly," referring to the few disciples who still assembled for cabalistic discussion towards the end of their master's life, or after his decease. This treatise is given in iii, 95^a–96^b (ed. Amsterdam, 1806), and is also found in Latin in the Kabbala Denudata, i. c. To these three larger appendices are added fifteen other minor fragments, viz.:

4. Saba (סבא), "the aged man," also called Saba demishpatim (סבא דמשפטים), or the discourse of the aged in meshpatim, given in ii, 94^a–114^b. The aged is the prophet Elisha, who holds converse with R. Simon ben-Jochai about the doctrine of metempsychosis, and the discussion is attached to the Sabbatic section, called Shabbatim, i. e. Exod. xxi, 1–xxiv, 18.

5. Midrash Ruth (מדרש רות), a fragment.

6. Sepher hab-bahir (ספר חבדיר), "the book of clear light."

7 and 8. Tosephta and Mattanian (תוספתא ומטנאן), or "small additional pieces," which are found in the three volumes.

9. Rata mehemna (רביא מהמנה), "the faithful shepherd," found in the second and third volumes.

10. Hekaloth (הקלות), i. e. "the palaces," found in the first and second volumes, treats of the topographical structure of paradise and hell.

11. Sithra Torah (סתר תורה), "the secrets of the law."

12. Midrash han-neham (מדרש הנחם), i. e. "the concealed treatise."

13. Raze de Razin (רזי דרזין), i. e. "mysteries of the mysteries," contained in ii, 70^a–75^b.

14. Midrash Chazith (מדרש חזית), on the Song of Songs.

15. Maamar ta Chazi (מאמר תא חזי), a discourse, so entitled from the first words "come and see."

16. Yanuka (ינוקא), i. e. "the Youth," and is given in iii, 196^a–199^b.

17. Pekuda (פקודא), i. e. "illustrations of the law."

18. Chibbura kadmaah (חבורת קדמאה), i. e. "the early work."

The body of the work is sometimes called Zohar Gadol (זוהר גדול), and the other portions Zohar Katon (זוהר קטן). The editio princeps is that of Mantua (1558–1560, 3 vols.), which has often been reprinted. The best edition of the book of Zohar is that by Christian Knorr von Rosenroth, with Jewish commentaries (Sulzbach, 1684, fol.), to which his rare Kabbala Denudata (1677–1684, 4to) forms an ample introduction. This edition was reprinted with an additional index of matters (Amsterdam, 1714, 1728, 1772, 1805, 3 vols. 8vo). To this last-mentioned issue the references in this article apply. The latest editions are those of Breslau (1866, 3 vols. large 8vo), Brody (1873, 3 vols. 8vo).

II. Authorship.—The Zohar pretends to be a revelation from God, communicated through R. Simon ben-Jochai (q. v.), to his select disciples, according to the Iddera Zuta (Zohar, iii, 287^b). This declaration and the repeated representation of R. Simon ben-Jochai, as speaking and teaching throughout this production, made R. Simon the author of it, an opinion maintained not only by Jews for centuries, but even by such distinguished Christian scholars as Lightfoot, Gill (A Dissertation concerning the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language, Letters, Vowel-points, and Accents, Lond. 1767), Bartolucci (Magna Bibl. Rabb. iv, 230 sq.); Pfeiffer (Critica Sacra), Knorr von Rosenroth (Kabbala Denudata), Molitor (Philosophy of History, vol. iii, Münster, 1839), Franck (La Kabbale, Germ. transl. by A. Jelinek, Leipzig, 1844), and Etheridge (Introduction to Hebrew Literature, Lond. 1856, p. 314). On the other hand it has been clearly demonstrated by such scholars as Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Vorträge, Berlin, 1831, p. 405), Geiger (Melo Chofnanim, ibid. 1840, introd. p. xvii), Sachs (Religiöse Poesie der Juden in Spanien, ibid. 1845, p. 327), Jelinek (Moses ben-Schem-Tob de Leon, Leipzig, 1851), Grätz (Gesch. d. Juden, ibid. 1863, vii, 73–87; 442–459; 487–507), Steinschneider (Jewish Literature, Lond. 1857, p. 104–122; 249–309), Ginsburg (The Kabbalah, p. 85–93), and a host of others, that it is not the production of R. Simon, but of the 13th century, by Moses de Leon (q. v.). For Simon ben-Jochai was a pupil of R. Akibah; but the earliest mention of the book's existence occurs in the year 1290; and the anachronisms of its style, and of the facts referred to, together with the circumstance that it speaks of the vowel-points and other Masoretic inventions, which are clearly posterior to the Talmud, justify J. Morinus (although too often extravagant in his wilful attempts to depreciate the antiquity of the later Jewish writings) in asserting that the author could not have lived much before the year 1000 of the Christian era (Exercitationes Biblicae, p. 358–369). This later view of the authorship is sustained by the following reasons:

1. The Zohar most fulsomely praises its own author, calls him the Sacred Light (רביא קדושא), and exalts him above Moses, "the true shepherd" (Zohar, iii, 137^a, 144^b), while the disciples defy R. Simon (ii, 38^a).

2. The Zohar quotes and mystically explains the Hebrew vowel-points (i, 16^a, 24^b; ii, 116^a; iii, 65^b), which were introduced for the first time by R. Mocha of Palestine (q. v.).

3. The Zohar (iii, 287^b), "the faithful shepherd" borrowed two verses (sect. קדושים, iii, 89^a) from Ibn Gabirol's (q. v.) celebrated hymn, "the royal diadem" (כתר מלכות); comp. Sachs, i. c. p. 229.

4. The Zohar (i, 18^a, 23^a) quotes and explains the interchange, on the outside of the Mazrua (q. v.), of the words (יהוה אלחינו יהוה) Jehovah our God is Jehovah for (יהוה ברוכסו כוזה) Kuza Bemuchas Kuza, by substituting for each letter its immediate predecessor in the alphabet, which was transplanted from France into Spain in the 13th century (Ginsburg).

5. The Zohar (iii, 287^b) uses the expression Ensoza, which is a Portuguese corruption of synagogue, and explains it in a cabalistic manner as a compound of two Hebrew words, i. e. אש נורה, brilliant light.

6. The Zohar (ii, 89^a) mentions the Crusades, the momentary taking of Jerusalem by the Crusaders from the Infidels, and the retaking of it by the Saracens.

7. The Zohar records events which transpired A. D. 1264.

8. The doctrine of the En-Soph and the Sephiroth (q. v.), as well as the metempsychic-elau retribution, were not known before the 13th century.

9. The very existence of the Zohar, according to the staunch cabalist Jehudah Chayoth (fl. 1500), was unknown to such distinguished cabalists as Nachmanides (q. v.) and Ben-Adereth (1255–1310); the first who mentions it is Todros Abulafia (1234–1306).

10. Isaac of Akko (fl. 1290) affirms that "the Zohar was put into the world from the head of a Spaniard." To the same effect is the testimony of Joseph Ibn-Wakkar, who, in speaking of later books which may be relied upon, recommends only those of Moses Nachmanides and Todros Abulafia, "but," he adds, "the Zohar is full of errors, and one must take care not to be misled by them." This, says Dr. Steinschneider, "is an impartial and indirect testimony that the Zohar was recognised scarcely fifty years after its appearing as one of the latter works, and not attributed to Simou ben-Jochai" (Jewish Literature, p. 113).

11. That Moses de Leon was the author of the Zohar, we have already stated in the art. Moses de Leon, and the account given there is confirmed in the most remarkable manner by the fact that—

12. The Zohar contains whole passages which Moses de Leon translated into Aramaic, from his works, e. g. ספר חמדים, ספר חנוכה, as the erudite Jellinek has demonstrated in his Moses de Leon, p. 21 sq.; comp. also Grätz, l. c. p. 498 (2d ed. 1878, p. 477 sq.). It is for these and many other reasons that the Zohar is now regarded as a pseudograph of the 13th century, and that Moses de Leon should have palmed the Zohar upon Simon ben-Jochai was nothing remarkable, since this rabbi is regarded by tradition as the embodiment of mysticism.

III. Diffusion and Influence of the Book.—The birth of the Zohar formed the great landmark in the development of the cabala, and the history of this theosophy divides itself into two periods, the pre-Zohar period, and the post-Zohar period. During these two periods different schools developed themselves, which Dr. Grätz classifies as follows:

1. The School of Gerona.—To this school, which is the cradle of the cabala, belong Isaac the Blind (fl. 1190–1210) (q. v.), Ezra and Azariel his disciples, Jehudah b. Jakar, his pupil Moses Nachmanides (q. v.), and Jacob ben-Sheeshet (q. v.). The characteristic feature of this school is that it, for the first time, established and developed the doctrine of the En Soph (אין סוף), the Sephiroth (ספירות), metempsychosis (סוד הנפול), with the doctrine of retribution (סוד הנפול) belonging thereto, and a peculiar christology (סוד משיח). It is the creative school; the cabalistic mode of exegesis is still subordinate in it.

2. The School of Segovia.—To this school belong Jacob of Segovia, his two sons Isaac and Jacob, Jr., Moses ben-Simon of Burgos, Isaac ben-Todros, teacher of Shem-Tob Ibn Gaon (d. 1332), Todros Abulafia (d. 1306), and his son Joseph, the author of אברהם אלהות, and Isaac of Akko (fl. 1290). It is the exegetical school, endeavoring to interpret the Bible and the Hagada per fas et nefas in accordance with the cabala.

3. The Quasi-Philosophical School of Isaac ben-Latif or Allatif (q. v.), which in its doctrines stands isolated.

4. The School of Abulafia, so called after Abulafia, the founder (born in 1240, and died about 1292). To this school also belonged Joseph Gikatilla ben-Abram (fl. 1260). The characteristics of this school are the stress laid on the extensive use of the exegetical rules called Gematria (גמטריא), Notaricon (נוטריקון) (q. v.), and Ziruph (צירוף). In this employment of commutations, permutations, and reduction of each letter in every word to its numerical value, Abulafia and his followers are not original.

5. The Zohar School, which is a combination and absorption of the different features and doctrines of all the previous schools, without any plan or method; and we must not be surprised at the wild speculations which we so often find in the writings of the post-Zohar period. In Spain especially the study of the Zohar took deep root, and found its way to Italy, Palestine, and Poland.

As it penetrated all branches of life and literature, voices were also raised against the Zohar. The first among the Jews who opposed its authority was Ella del Medigo, of Candia, who, in his philosophical treatise entitled An Examination of the Law (בחינת התורה), which he wrote in 1491, brings forth three arguments against the genuineness of the Zohar, but his voice and those of others had no power to check the rapid progress of the cabala. One of the most daring opponents was Leon da Modena (q. v.). In the meantime the Zohar had been published; Christians became somewhat acquainted with its contents by the extracts of the Zohar translated into Latin by Joseph de Voisin, in his Disputatio Cabalistica (Paris, 1635), and afterwards by the celebrated work entitled The Unveiled Cabalah, or Kabbala Demystified of Knorr v. Rosenroth (Sulzbach, 1677–78, 2 vols.; Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1684). With the 15th century a new era in the criticism of the Zohar commenced, and without quoting the different scholars who made the criticism of the Zohar their special study, we can only state, what has already been said above, that almost the unanimous result of criticism is that the Zohar was not written, as has hitherto been believed, by R. Simon ben-Jochai, but by Moses de Leon.

IV. Literature.—Besides the authorities already quoted, we will mention Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 329–335; Jellinek, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kabbala (Leipsic, 1852); Ben-Chananja, vols. i, ii, iii, iv, where a most thorough and instructive analysis of the Zohar is given by Ignatz Stern (Szegeidin, 1858–61); Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums u. s. Sekten, iii, 70 sq.; Munk, Mélanges de Philosophie Juive et Arabe (Paris, 1859), p. 275 sq.; Pauli, The Great Mystery, or How can Three be One (London, 1863), an endeavor to prove the doctrine of the Trinity from the Zohar; Wünsche, Die Leiden des Messias (Leipsic, 1870), p. 95 sq., gives some passages relating to the atonement and the Messiah. See also the article in the Theol. Universallezikon. (B. P.)

V. Doctrines.—The treatise of the Zohar is difficult and fantastic, embracing, moreover, not merely the origin of the world, but likewise speculating on the essence of God and the properties of man; in other words, covering at once cosmology, theology, and anthropology. It sets out with the conception of divinity as the self-existing, eternal, all-embracing first cause, the active as well as passive principle of all being, for which thought has no adequate measure, or language a fit name, although, while other systems have therefore styled it the great Naught or Void, the Zohar terms it the Boundless or Infinite (אין סוף). Deity at length emerges from this absolutism and reveals itself, i. e. becomes at once active and capable of being known; and thus, through the division of its essence into attributes (which before did not separately exist, because they imply a reduction incompatible with the absolute), is established a connection between the infinite and the finite, or real creator. These attributes are ten, called Sephiroth (ספירות, numbers), constituting so many vessels of the infinite, which contain and are forms of its manifestation, subject always to the contained, like colored glasses that receive the light and irradiate it. The impartation of the contents—in other words, the creation of the Sephiroth, is thus also a beaming or emanation; a fundamental principle of the speculation, as we shall see. The idea is further illustrated by various figurative applications, e. g. the cube, with its three dimensions and six surfaces, making up the perfect decade; and so man, with his limbs (the ten Sephiroth hence being sometimes designated as the first man, אדם קדמון, or ideal form of divinity, in accordance with Ezek. i, 26; Dan. vii, 13), whose shape is represented by the so-called "cabalistic tree" as follows:

- | | |
|----------------------------|-------------------------|
| 1. כֶּהֱר (Crown). | |
| 3. בִּינָה (Intelligence). | 2. חָכְמָה (Wisdom). |
| 5. דִּין (Judgment). | 4. חֶסֶד (Mercy). |
| | 6. תְּפָאֶרֶת (Beauty). |
| 8. הוֹד (Majesty). | 7. נֹצֶחַ (Splendor). |
| | 9. יְסוּד (Foundation). |
| 10. מְלָכִיּוּת (Kingdom). | |

To each of these Sephiroth correspond certain appellations of the Deity. To the first, which is the concentration and partial development of all the others (called also figuratively the old or the long face, אָרְיָה אֲנָפִין, a title indicative of personality), is assigned the undefined name אֶתְיָה, "I am." The second and third are the active and passive forms of being growing out of the first, and are considered as the male (father) and female (mother), the knowing and the known, the subject and the object, which with their result, perception (דַּעַת, included as a son or product), or else with the unit at the head, make up the metaphysical trinity of the divine essence. To these are attributed the sacred names יְהוָה, Jah, and יְהוֹוָה, Jehovih; and they constitute the shoulders of the mystical body. The fourth and fifth (equivalent to Grace and Right, also called Greatness, גְּדוּלָה, and Power, גְּבוּרָה) represent the arms (still duplicate, or male and female, active and passive, external and internal, soul and body, like all the others), with the sixth as an intermediate principle combining them, like the heart. These correspond to the higher or ethical principles, and are respectively design-nated by the sacred epithets אֱלֹהִים, El, Elohim, and יְהוָה, Jehovah (otherwise יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, Shaddai). The lower, or physical trinity, consisting of the seventh, eighth, and ninth Sephiroth (equivalent to Radiance [according to another exposition, Triumph], Glory, and Stability), and respectively corresponding to the divine appellations יְהוָה, Jehovah Sabaoth, אֱלֹהֵי, Elohe Sabaoth, and חַי, El Chai, represent the hips and genitals of the body, and are apparently the symbols of motion, quantity, and strength. The last Sephirah, to which the name אָדֹנָי, Adonai, is attached, is a sort of joint conception of all the others, as the feet or basis of the whole.

By further combinations of the different Sephiroth according to the above diagram or chart, the male triad (Nos. 2, 4, 7), or right column, separates from the female triad (3, 5, 8), or left column; but the middle column (Nos. 1, 6, 10), in which No. 9 is omitted, or included in No. 10, gives three fundamental conceptions, namely, absolute existence, ideal existence, and immanent strength, as the three phases of pre-worldly existence; or, if preferred, the three conceptions of Matter, Thought, and Life. In this connection, the sixth Sephirah is sometimes called the King or Messiah; and the tenth, the Queen or Matron, q. d. inhabitation (שְׂכִינָה). These two are also called the two persons (שְׁנֵי פָנִים, i. e. spósona). Elsewhere there are five persons counted, the first three Sephiroth being added to these (in both enumerations the residue are included under those named). If we notice that the 6th, as a consequence of the 3d, is called Son, and the 10th, as a consequence of the 3d, the Spirit (the latter is also considered as female or mother), we will find at once the point of contact of the Gnostic speculation with the Christian, and also the unsolved question of the manner of this connection.

These ten sephiroth or "vessels" (קְלִיִּים) of the Infinite, in so far as they are considered at once in their plurality and in their unity, are also called a world (עוֹלָם), and, in contradistinction from the other worlds, of which we will speak hereafter, the world of effluence (or emanation, אֶמְנָנוּת). This does not mean to imply that the origin of things outside of that world was in any special manner different from it, which would render the system inconsistent, but rather seeks to establish between the infinite and matter what is the object of every system of emanation—a medium by which, in spite of distance (in every sense of the word, not merely with regard to space) between effect and cause, this working could be understood. Now this medium is established by the two middle worlds, namely, the world of creation (בְּרִיאָה) and the world of formation (יְצִירָה), in which we are not yet led to substantial elements. The first is described as the world of the pure spirit, the latter as that of the angels or heavenly bodies. We can already perceive by this distinction that neither of these names is to be taken in its popular acceptance. In fact, the one treats of ideas, the other of power, physical as well as ethereal, but not of actual beings. In both worlds the decade is again found as a representative element. Each is considered as a production of the preceding, which is therein improved, and, at the same time, reflects the original light in a more diffuse and imperfect manner, each also establishing for itself a new unity. Neither must we understand the expressions "creation" and "formation" in their common acceptance. There is no mention made in either of any pre-existing matter, or a creation from nothing as usually understood. The Cabalist generally speaks of such, but mean thereby the original void, the En-soph, i. e. the absolute, which is the source of the whole metaphysics. But as by this the pre-existence of all things is implied, we consequently arrive at the principle of the immutability of existing things, while by means of the parallel propositions that these are the same, notwithstanding the mode of their origin, there is established a relative independence, which contains the possibility and cause of the fall and corruption of mind and nature.

This point, however, belongs to the obscure parts of the system, as it does not agree well with the premises, and the modern formula of its explanation has not yet been found (but, on the contrary, a different one, if we are to consider the fall as a materialization itself). Generally it is just in the cosmology we find the greatest obscurity, the least development, so much so that the question as to its being absolutely or only relatively pantheistic is not yet decided. It is also in this part of the system that the poetic garb of personification is the most abundant: for instance, when the stars are represented as the hieroglyphics of the active (speaking divinity). It is often perplexing: as, for instance, when a number of angels' names, virtues, natural forces, etc., become personified as regents of separate spheres of the universe.

We will here remark that the second world is called also the throne of God; the divine, spiritual element of it, which other philosophical systems would perhaps call the soul of the world, is here called Sandalphon (סַנְדַּלְפוֹן?). It is similar to the third world, that of the natural forces, or the assembling, governing principle, and is then called the angel Metatron (מֵטַטְרוֹן, i. e. μετὰ τὸν θρόνον). The expression "throne" brings us back to Ezekiel, from whose well-known vision the figurative expressions are here employed; so that the first world represents the Glory, and the third the four beasts. These are followed by the four wheels of God's chariot, by the fourth world, or that of action (עֲשִׂיָּה), i. e. the material, the mind of the spiritual, the residuum of the substance of the divine light. As we had just now ten classes of angels, which were leaders of the natural and vital forces, and which were retained in the ethereal sense, although not to be considered as endowed with personality, or as angels popularly so called, so there are also ten classes of devils as integuments of existence, i. e. as limits to intelligence and life. These last ten Sephiroth are, first, Wilderness (מִדְבָּרָה), Void (בְּוֵיחַ), and Darkness (חֹשֶׁךְ); then the seven houses of corruption (the laquei). Their chief, or principal unity, is Sammaël (poison-god), the angel of death; next to him, as personification of evil, is the harlot, the former representing the active, the other the passive conception of the idea; while both, as a whole, are called the beast (חַיָּה).

From all these metaphysical ground-ideas spring original views of the nature and destiny of man. From the foregoing scheme itself it follows, in short, that man, in the union of his soul and body, is a representation of the universe, a microcosm, while his body is a raiment of his soul, as the world is of God; and this comparison is sometimes carried out with a greater number of poetical figures. But as more closely united to God himself, according to his divine essence, man in this system attains a higher standing, as was indicated from the first: for the self-manifesting divinity itself was called the original man, because all nature could produce no more noble image for the idea. Thus man is next the image of God, and, like him, a unit and a triad, the latter being spirit (נְשָׁמָה), soul (רוּחַ), and life (נֶפֶשׁ). The first is the principle of thought, the second of feeling, the third of passions and instincts (we think the last can be so understood, although some consider it as a coarser organ of the soul, and some even as the body; at all events, the material substance is not meant thereby). All three are likewise unmistakable consequences of the three middle Sephiroth, from which they at the same time derive their relative dignity. By this, what we may call the pre-existence of the soul is established, and not only it, but also, in one sense, the pre-existence of the body so far as it is a prototype of corporeality—and even of a particular one for each, therefore called in later days Yehidrah (individual). The entrance into life, and the latter itself, are not considered as an evil or as a state of exile, although the souls would certainly prefer remaining always with God. It is a means of education for the soul, and of redemption for the world: for while the spirit descends even to being mixed up with matter, it still possesses at one point a clear consciousness of itself and of its origin, and is thus the more eager to return to its former position; but, on the other hand, it elevates the matter with which it is combined, enlightening and purifying it. God knows beforehand the destiny of each individual soul, so far at least as it will be affected by this combination with matter, but he does not determine that destiny. In other words, the Cabalist does not speak of predestination, nor, on the other hand, does he solve the problem of the relation between free-will and omniscience; but, in order to afford full scope to this free-will, and yet maintain the apokatastasis, or restoration (a consequence of its fundamental idea), it introduces the wandering (גִּלְגּוּל) of the soul, i. e. an infinite range of probationary life, which is to end only on reaching the aim above mentioned. The souls in their pre-worldly existence are already male and female, and even bound in couples; appearing sometimes to enter into life separately, but they will unite again in matrimony, by which they are completed and merged into one essence: thus they strive jointly towards the great end, which is their junction in heaven, in the temple of love (מִקְדָּשׁ אֶחָד), with God, who takes them to himself with a kiss (earthly death); and by perfecting themselves in him in thought and in will they become partakers of eternal holiness.

See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. "Kabbalah," and comp. Aharon Selig, שְׁבַע עֶבְרִי (Cracow, 1836), which is a full commentary on the Zohar. See also CABALA.

Zoharites, so called from their attachment to the book Zohar, are properly to be regarded as a continuous tion of the sect formed by the famous Sabbathai Zevi (q. v.). Their creed is briefly as follows: 1. They believe in all that God has ever revealed, and consider it their duty constantly to investigate its meaning. 2. They believe the letter of Scripture to be merely the shell, and that it admits of a mystical and spiritual interpretation. 3. They believe in a Trinity of Parzuphin, or persons, in Elohim. 4. They believe in the incarnation of God; that this incarnation took place in Adam, and that it will again take place in the Messiah. 5. They do not believe that Jerusalem will ever be rebuilt. 6. They believe that it is vain to expect any temporal Messiah; but that God will be manifested in the flesh, and in this state atone, not only for the sins of the Jews, but for the sins of all throughout the world who believe in him.

This sect was revived about the year 1750 by a Polish Jew, of the name of Jacob Frank, who settled in Podolia, and enjoyed the protection of the Polish government, to which he was recommended by the bishop of Kamenetz, in whose presence he held disputes with the orthodox Jews, and who was astonished at the approximation of his creed to the principles of Christianity. On the death of the bishop, he and his adherents were driven into the Turkish dominions; and being also persecuted there by the Rabbins, they resolved to conform to the rites of the Catholic Church. Frank at last found a place of rest at Offenbach, whither his followers flocked by thousands to visit him, and where he died in 1791. Their numbers do not appear to have increased much of late; but they are to be met with in different parts of Hungary and Poland. See ZOHAR.

Zöllner, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian, was born April 24, 1753. He studied at Frankfort, was in 1779 preacher at Berlin, declined a call as superintendent to Neu-Brandenburg in 1782, and remained at Berlin as pastor of St. Mary's, where he died, Sept. 12, 1804. He published, Disputatio pro Unicitate Dei (Frankfort, 1776):—Ueber Moses Mendelssohn's Jerusalem (1784), besides a number of sermons. See Döring, Die gelehrten Kanzelredner, p. 580–585. (B. P.)

Zonaras, JOHANNES, a Byzantine historian, was born in the last part of the 11th century, and died about 1130. He was secretary to the emperor Alexius Comnenus. After the death of Alexius (1118) he retired to the monastery of St. Elijah, in Mount Athos, and devoted himself to theological and literary studies. His Chronicle, from the creation till the death of Alexius, is a mere compilation from Josephus, Eusebius, Xenophon, Herodotus, Plutarch, Dio Cassius, etc., and was edited by Hieronymus Wolf (Basel, 1557), Du Fresnoy (Paris, 1686, 2 vols.), and Pinder (Bonn, 1841–44, 2 vols.). Of more value is his commentary on the Synlogia of Photius: 'Εξήγησις τῶν ἱερῶν καὶ θεῶν κανόνων τῶν τε ἀγίων καὶ σεπτῶν Ἀποστόλων, καὶ τῶν ἱερῶν οἰκουμενικῶν συνόδων, etc. In Latin and Greek the work was published at Paris in 1619; the best edition, however, is the one published at Oxford in 1672 fol. Zonaras also wrote scholia on the New Test., on which see Zonara Glossia Sacrae Novi Testamenti Illustrata a F. W. Schurz (Grimma, 1818–20). On the first two works see Schmidt, Ueber die Quellen des Zonaras, in Zimmermann's Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft (Darmstadt, 1839), vol. vi, No. 30–36; Zander, *Quibus e Fontibus Joh. Zōlātry (Greek ζῶον and λατρεία), the worship of animals. See ANIMAL WORSHIP; IDOLATRY.

Zōology, BIBLICAL. This, like all other scientific subjects, is practically and incidentally, rather than systematically and designedly, treated in the Scriptures; yet many animals are mentioned, and their characteristics are given with substantial accuracy. In the Talmud a more copious and minute description is given of many animals (see Lewysohn, Die Zoologie des Talmuds [Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1858]). The popular and general classification into beasts, birds, reptiles, etc., is the usual Biblical one, and they are further distinguished as clean and unclean. See each of these designations under its proper head. The following is a full list of all the animals (including certain animal products) mentioned in the Bible, in the alphabetical order of the names in the original, with the ordinary rendering in the A. V., and the real name as nearly as modern research has identified it. See each term in its proper place in the body of this Cyclopædia. Comp. NATURAL HISTORY.

Zoroaster (more correctly Zarathustra, which in Greek and Latin was corrupted into Zarathrastræ and Zoroastres, while the Persians and Parsees changed it into Zerdusht) was the founder of the Parsee religion. The original meaning of the word was probably that of "chief," "senior," "high-priest," and it was a common designation of a spiritual guide and head of a district or province. Indeed, the founder of Zoroastrianism is hardly ever mentioned without his family name Spitama. He was a native of Bactria. He applied to himself the terms Manthran (reciter of "Manthras"), a messenger sent by Ahura-Mazda, or a speaker, one who listens to the voice of oracles given by the spirit of nature, one who receives sacred words from Ahura-Mazda through the flames. His life is covered with obscurity. The accounts of him are legendary and unhistorical. In the Zend writings he is to a great extent represented, not as a historical, but as a dogmatical personality, vested with superhuman, or even divine, powers, standing next to God. His temptations by the devil, whose empire was threatened by him, form the subject of many traditional stories and legends. He is represented as the fountain of all wisdom and truth, and the master of the whole living creation. One of the prayers of the Fravardin Yasht declares—

"We worship the rule and the guardian angel of Zarathustra Spitama, who first thought good thoughts, who first spoke good words, who first performed good actions—who was the first priest, the first warrior, the first cultivator of the soil, the first prophet, the first who was inspired, the first who has given to mankind nature, and reality, and word, and hearing of word, and wealth, and all good things created by Mazda, which embellish reality; who first caused the wheel to turn among gods and men, who first praised the purity of the living creation and destroyed idolatry, who confessed the Zarathustrian belief in Ahura-Mazda, the religion of the living God against the devils. . . . Through him the whole true and revealed word was heard, which is the life and guidance of the world. . . . Through his knowledge and speech the waters become desirous of growing; through his knowledge and speech all beings created by the Holy Spirit are uttering words of happiness."

In the older Yasna alone he appears like a living reality, a man acting a great and prominent part, both in the history of his country and that of mankind.

I. History.—Zoroaster's father seems to have been called Purusbaapa, and his daughter, the only one of his children mentioned, Puruchista. But the time when he lived remains very obscure. He is usually said to have flourished in the reign of a king Gushtasp, who has, on apparently sufficient grounds, been identified with the Darius Hystaspis of the classical writers (Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i, 234). The dates generally given are as follows: Xanthos of Lydia places him about six hundred years before the Trojan war; Aristotle and Eudoxus place him six thousand years before Plato; others, again, five thousand years before the Trojan war. Berosus, a Babylonian historian, makes him a Babylonian king, and the founder of a dynasty which reigned over Babylon between 2200 and 2000 B.C. The Parsees place him at the time of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, whom they identify with a king mentioned in the Shah-Nameh, from whom, however, Hystaspes is wholly distinct. This account would place Zoroaster at about 550 B.C. Yet there is scarcely a doubt that he must be considered as belonging to a much earlier age, not later than 1000 B.C. It is almost certain that Zoroaster was one of the Soshyantos, or five priests, with whom the religious reform first arose, which he boldly carried out. The Aryans seem to have originally led a nomad life, until some of them, reaching, in the course of their migrations, lands fit for permanent settlements, settled down into agriculturists. Bactria and the parts between the Oxus and the Jaxartes seem to have attracted them most. The Iranians became gradually estranged from their brother-tribes, who adhered to their ancient nomad life, and by degrees came to consider those peaceful settlements a fit prey for their depredations and inroads. The hatred thus engendered and nourished soon came to include all and everything belonging to those devastators—even their religion, originally identical with that of their own. The Deva religion became, in their estimation, the source of all evil. Moulded into a new form, styled the Ahura religion, the old elements were much more changed than was the case when Judaism became Christianity. Generation after generation further added and took away, until Zarathustra, with the energy and the clear eye that belongs to exalted leaders and founders of religions, gave to that which had originally been a mere reaction and spite against the primitive Brahminic faith a new and independent life, and forever fixed its dogmas, not a few of which sprang from his own brain.

II. Doctrines.—Zoroaster is commonly spoken of as the great reformer of the Magian system after it had suffered corruption; but it would be more correct to say that on the primitive dualistic worship of the Persians he superinduced some notions borrowed from the element-worship, with which Magism at a later period coalesced. His doctrines, as far as they can be gathered from the extant fragments of the Zend-Avesta, especially the Vendidad Sade, and from the Ulema's Islam (a treatise on the Parsee doctrine by an Arabic writer, supposed to belong to the 6th or 7th century of our era), relate principally to theology and ethics, with occasional references to questions of a cosmological and physiological character.

The problem of the world in relation to God he answers by reference to the antithesis of light and darkness, good and evil; all things, according to him, consist in the mingling of antitheses. His primary physical principle is the Zerwane Akerene, the Endless Time (with which may be compared the τὸ ἀπείρον of Anaximander; see Arist. Physic. i, 4, 5; iii, 4-7). Everything else save time has been made. The original spiritual power was Ormuzd, the luminous, the pure, the fragrant, devoted to good and capable of all good. Gazing into the abyss, he beheld, afar off, Ahri-man, startled at the sight, and thought within himself, I must put this enemy out of the way; and set himself to use the fit means for this end. All that Ormuzd accomplished was by the help of Time. After the lapse of twelve hundred years the heavens and paradise were made, and the twelve signs which mark the heavens were fixed there. Each sign was formed in one thousand years. After the first three were formed, Ahri-man arose to make war on Ormuzd, but failing of success he returned to his gloomy abode, and remained there for other three thousand years, during which the work of creation advanced, and three other signs were made. During this period the earth and the sea were also formed, man was created, and plants and animals produced. Again Ahri-man assailed heaven with all his might, but failing in this, he attacked the world. He afflicted Kajumert, the first man, with a thousand plagues till he was destroyed; but was himself taken and driven into hell through the same opening by which he had come into the world. In man there is much of Ormuzd and much of Ahri-man: in his body are fire, water, earth, and air; he has also soul, understanding, judgment, a ferver ("principe des sensations," Anquetil), and five senses. By the soul are moved all the members we possess, and without the soul we are nothing. All these he has from Ormuzd. From Ahri-man he has desire, need, envy, hatred, impurity, falsehood, and wrath. When a man dies, the four elements of which his body is composed mingle with the four primitive elements; his soul, understanding, and judgment unite with the ferver, and all become one. In this state man goes to judgment, and according as his good works or his bad works have preponderated during life, he is rewarded with immortality in paradise, or punished by being cast into hell. During life he is in constant conflict with the Dews or Divas, a class of beings possessing a body formed of the four elements—beings essentially evil, and who tempt men to sin, but at the resurrection they shall be annihilated, and all men at last shall be received into paradise. Even Ahri-man himself shall be accepted and blessed; for the Dews are gradually abstracting from him the evil and darkness that are in him, so that at last he shall be left pure and bright (see Hyde, Hist. Rel. Vet. Pers. [Oxon. 1700]; Anquetil du Perron, Zend-Avesta [Par. 1771, 3 vols. 4to]; Vullers, Fragmente über die Rel. des Zoroaster [Bonn, 1831]).

It is chiefly from the Gathas, however, that Zarathustra's real theology, unmitigated by later ages, can be learned. His leading idea was monotheism. While the five priests before him, the Soshyantos, worshipped a plurality of good spirits called Ahuras, as opposed to the Indian Devas, he reduced this plurality to unity. This one supreme being he called Ahuru-Mazda, or the creator of the universe—the Auramazda of the cuneiform inscriptions of the Achemenidian kings, the Ahurmazd of Sassanian times, and the Hormazd, or Ormuzd, of the modern Parsees. This supreme god is, by Zoroaster, conceived to be "the creator of the earthly and spiritual life, the lord of the whole universe, at whose hands are all the creatures." Ahura-Mazda is to Zoroaster the light and the source of light. He is wisdom and intellect; he possesses all good things, temporal and spiritual, among them the good mind, immortality, wholesomeness, the best truth, devotion, piety, and abundance of all earthly good. All these gifts he grants to the pious man who is pure in thought, word, and deed. He rewards the good and punishes the wicked; and all that is created, good or evil, fortune or misfortune, is his work alone.

Nothing was further from Zoroaster's mind than to assume anything but one supreme being, one and indivisible. But the great problem of the ages, the origin of evil and its incompatibility with God's goodness, holiness, and justice, he attempted to solve by assuming two primeval causes, which, though different, were united, and produced the world of the material things as well as that of the spirit. The one who produced the reality is called Vohu-Mano, the good mind; the other, through whom the non-reality originated, is the Akem-Mano, the evil mind. To the former belong all good, true, and perfect things; to the second, all that is delusive, bad, wicked. These two aboriginal moving causes of the universe are called twins. They are spread everywhere, in God as in man. When united in Ahura-Mazda they are called Spento-Manyus and Angro-Manyus, i. e. white or holy, and dark or evil, spirit. It is only in later writings that these two are supposed to stand opposed to each other in the relation of God and devil. The inscriptions of Darius know but one God, without any adversary whatsoever. But while the one side within him produced all that is bright and shining, all that is good and useful in nature, the other side produced all that is dark and apparently noxious. Both are as inseparable as day and night, and, though opposed to each other, are indispensable for the preservation of creation. The bright spirit appears in the blazing flame, the presence of the dark is marked by the wood converted into charcoal. The one has created the light of the day, the other the darkness of the night; the former awakens men to their duty, the other lulls them to sleep. Life is produced by the one and extinguished by the other, who also, by releasing the soul from the fetters of the body, enables her to go up to immortality. See DUALISM.

Thus the original monotheism of Zoroaster did not last long. False interpretations, misunderstandings, changes, and corruptions crept in, and dualism was established in theology. The two principles then, for the first time, became two powers, hostile to each other, each ruling over a realm of his own, and constantly endeavoring to overthrow the other. Hence monotheism was, in later times, broken up and superseded by dualism. But a small party, represented by the Magi, remained steadfast to the old doctrine, as opposed to that of the followers of the false interpretation, or Zend, the Zendikā. In order to prove their own interpretation of Zoroaster's doctrines they had recourse to a false and ungrammatical explanation of the term Zervana Akarana, which, merely meaning time without bounds, was by them pressed into an identity with the Supreme Being; while the passages on which the present Parsee priests still rest their faulty interpretation, simply indicate that God created in the boundless time, or that he is from eternity, self-existing, neither born nor created.

The following is a brief summary of the principal doctrines of Zoroaster, drawn from certain passages from the Gathas, which probably emanated from Zoroaster himself.

1. Everywhere in the world a duality is to be perceived, such as the good and the evil, light and darkness; this life and that life, human wisdom and divine wisdom.
2. Only this life becomes a prey to death, but not that hereafter, over which the destructive spirit has no power.
3. In the universe there are, from the beginning, two spirits at work, the one making life, the other destroying it.
4. Both these spirits are accompanied by intellectual powers, representing the ideas of the Platonic system on which the whole moral world rests. They cause the struggle between good and evil, and all the conflicts of the world, which end in the final victory of the good principle.
5. The principal duty of man in this life is to obey the word and commandments of God.
6. Disobedience is punished with the death of the sinner.
7. Ahura-Mazda created the idea of the good, but is not identical with it. This idea produced the good mind, the Divine Spirit, working in man and nature, and devotion—the obedient heart.
8. The Divine Spirit cannot be resisted.
9. Those who obey the word of God will be free from all defects and immortal.
10. God exercises his rule in the world through the works prompted by the Divine Spirit, who is working in man and nature.
11. Men should pray to God and worship him. He hears the prayers of the good.
12. All men live solely through the bounty of God.

13. The soul of the pure will hereafter enjoy everlasting life; that of the wicked will have to undergo everlasting punishment, or as modern Parsee theologians explain, to the day of the resurrection.

14. All creatures are Ahura-Mazda's.

15. He is the reality of the good mind, word, and deed.

Zorab'abel (Ζοροάβελ), the Greek form (1 Esd. iv, 18; v, 5-70; vi, 2-29; Eccles. xlix, 11; Matt. i, 12, 13; Luke iii, 27) of the name of Zerubbabel (q. v.)

Zor'phi (Heb. with the art. kats-Tsorephi, צֹרֶפִּי; Sept. ροῦ Σαρεφί; Vulg. aurificis; A. V. "the goldsmith") is a marginal suggestion in Neh. iii, 31, for the name of the father of Malchiah, as if a proper name, but probably without good reason.

Zubly, JOHN JOACHIM, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born about the year 1730. In 1775 he took an active part in political matters, and was selected as one of the Georgia delegates to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia. The Georgia divine did not prove loyal to the Whig side, and a correspondence of his with the royal governor of the state having been discovered, he was compelled to resign his position in Congress, and subsequently his property was forfeited under the Confiscation Act. He died at Savannah, before the war ended, in July, 1781. He is said to have been "a man of great learning, of vigorous and penetrating mind." See Sabine, Royalists in the Rev. War, ii, 467. (J. C. S.)

Zuckrigl, JAKOB, a Roman Catholic theologian of Austria, was born July 26, 1807, at Grossolkowitz, in Moravia. In 1831 he received holy orders, in 1837 was appointed professor of Christian religious philosophy and university-preacher in Vienna, and in 1847 the Freiburg University honored him with the doctorate of divinity. In 1848 he was called to the chair of apologetics, theological encyclopedia, and philosophy at Tübingen, where he died, June 9, 1876. He wrote, Wissenschaftliche Rechtfertigung der christl. Trinitätslehre, etc. (Vienna, 1846); — Die Nothwendigkeit der christl. Offenbarungsmoral (Tübingen, 1850). Besides, he contributed largely to the Tübingen Theological Quarterly, the Freiburger Kirchenlexikon, and the Bonner theologische Literaturblatt. Zulu Version of the Scriptures. In this language, which is vernacular to the Kaffres, a translation of the New Test. has existed since 1869. It was published by the aid of the American Bible Society. It was formerly supposed that the analogies and general principles subsisting between the Kaffre and Zulu dialects were so proximate that one translation would meet the wants of the two tribes. This idea has been relinquished, and a translation was prepared by American missionaries to provide the Word of God for a million of benighted heathen. From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1879 we see that an edition of the New Test., slightly revised, but conforming to the society's rule, has been issued by the American Zulu Mission, and that this society has shared largely, as on former occasions, in the work. (B. P.)

ZUNZ, LEOPOLD, a famous Jewish writer, was born at Detmold, Germany, Aug. 10, 1794. He studied at Berlin, was in 1820 preacher at the new synagogue

there, in 1835 at Prague, and in 1839 director of the Teacher's Seminary at Berlin. When that institution was closed, in 1850, Zunz retired to private life, devoting all his energies to the production of works which have made him famous in the republic of letters. Zunz died at Berlin, March 18, 1886. He was a voluminous writer, and of his many works we especially mention Lebensgeschichte des Salomo Jizchaki, genannt Ruschi (Lemberg, 1840):—Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, historisch entwickelt (Berlin, 1832):—Zur Geschichte und Literatur (1845):—Die Synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters (1855):—Die Ritus des synagogalen Gottesdienstes (1859):—Literaturgeschichte der synagogalen Poesie (1865). His minor writings were issued under the title of Gesammelte Schriften (1875, 1876, 3 vols.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 555-558; Morais, Eminent Israelites of the 19th Century (Philadelphia, 1880), p. 360 sq. (B. P.)

Zurich Letters is the name of an English publication of the Parker Society. On the accession of queen Mary, more than a thousand of the Reformers sought refuge on the Continent, and many of them settled in Zurich. On the return of the Zurich exiles to England, at the accession of Elizabeth, in 1558, they naturally maintained a correspondence with the minister and magistrates of Zurich, who had so kindly welcomed them and given them shelter. A portion of these letters have been published, and show the opinion of that time on subjects which afterwards produced such agitation. To these letters is added a letter of later date, written in 1590, by queen Elizabeth to the thirteen Swiss cantons; also a few letters from Peter Martyr, Bullinger, and Gualter, in reply to some of the English Reformers before mentioned.

Zwickau Prophets, a local sect of fanatic Lutherans (A.D. 1521), who believed themselves to be the subjects of immediate inspiration. The leaders of the party were Nicholas Storch (q. v.), a weaver of Zwickau, Mark Thomas, of the same trade and place, Mark Stübner, a former student at Wittenberg, and Thomas Münzer, Lutheran pastor of Zwickau, subsequently the rebel chief of the Anabaptist rebellion. These fanatics rejected the Bible, considered human learning a hindrance to religion, and predicted the overthrow of the existing governments to make way for the millennial reign of the saints (themselves). Storch declared that the angel Gabriel had appeared to him in a vision, saying to him, "Thou shalt sit on my throne;" and in anticipation of the new kingdom the prophets chose from the number of their followers twelve apostles and seventy evangelists. They drew after them a great many of the laboring classes and tradespeople; but when open sedition broke out, the magistrates drove the leaders out of Zwickau. See ABECKDARIANS; ANABAPTISTS.

Zwinger, Johann, a son of Theodor, and grandson of the younger Buxtorf, was born Aug. 26, 1634, became professor of the Old Test. at Basle in 1675, and of the New Test. in 1685. He died of apoplexy, while engaged in lecturing to his students, in 1696. He was a rigid predestinarian, a correspondent of Megarius, the pupil of Gomar, and an opponent of Copernicus, concerning whose system he waged a literary war with the Basle mathematician, Peter Mezerlin.

Zwinger, Johann Rudolf, a son of Johann, was born Sept. 12, 1660, and died Nov. 18, 1708, and was antistes to the Basle Church and theological professor. He wrote dissertations and sermons, and also a book on the conversion of the Jews, entitled Der Trost Israel's (1706).

Zwinger, Theodor, a Swiss theologian, was born Nov. 21, 1597, at Basle. He was a strict Calvinist, and defended the doctrine of predestination in a disputation at Heidelberg. In 1630 he was made antistes to the Church of Basle, to which position was attached a professorship of theology. The breaking of bread instead of the use of the host in the sacrament was introduced at Basle under his administration, respecting which event he published a report in his work on the Lord's Supper (1655). Of other works by his pen we mention a Commentary on Romans (1655). Both these works were published soon after his death, which occurred Dec. 27, 1654. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zwinglianism. See ZWINGLI; ZWINGLIANS.

Zwinglians, a name given to the early Swiss Protestants from their leader Zwingli (q. v.). It is also used as a controversial designation of those who hold Zwingli's view respecting the mere memorial character of the eucharist. The theology of Zwingli is of interest as having influenced the English Puritans to a considerable extent, until Zwingli was overshadowed by Calvin during the reign of queen Elizabeth. Zwingli's innovations respecting the ministerial office began, like those of Luther, with the principle that every one, in virtue of the priesthood common to all Christians, is at liberty to preach, preaching being the chief function of the ministry. The irregularities of the Anabaptists, however, compelled him to have recourse to some form of mission from the Church. He lays down the necessity of a call to the ministry, notices three modes of election named in the Scripture, and states that it is proper for the election to rest with the body of the faithful, advised by learned men (Eccles. ii, 52-54). But he rejected all notion of priesthood or holy orders. The Basle Confession places the election in the ministers and church deputies, and mentions imposition of hands. The Helvetic Confession decrees that ministers be called by an ecclesiastical and lawful election, either by the Church or its deputies. It adheres strictly to the Zwinglian principle that all ministers have one and the same power and function; but it departs from this principle in assigning them some power of governing, and in vesting in them some power of excommunication. Zwingli considered the exercise of the power of the keys to be nothing more than the general preaching of the gospel. His magisterial excommunication was only an external, not a spiritual sentence. The Helvetic Confession gives the same account of the power of the keys, and the excommunication which it restores to the ministers still belongs, therefore, only to the forum externum, not to the forum conscientiae.

Zwingli's doctrine of the sacraments is peculiar. He holds that they are mere signs of initiation or of pledging of continuance. They confer no grace; they do not free the conscience; they are not even pledges of grace. Every spiritual efficacy which has been attributed to them is denied. Baptism does not make sons of God, but those who are sons already receive a token of their sonship. It does not take away sin. The baptism of Christ and his apostles was the same as the baptism of John. The eucharist is regarded in the same way.

The liturgical forms of Zwingli and his followers were constructed on the basis of the doctrines held. The form of baptism in Zwingli's Works (ii, 98) has a prayer for the infant that God would give him the light of faith, that he may be incorporated into Christ, buried with him, etc. This refers all to a faith to be given to the child as he grows up to a capacity of faith. The form carefully avoids, either in prayer or declaration, any mention of remission of sins or of regeneration. The Liturgia Tigurina has the same prayer, and reads the same gospel from St. Mark. It adds the Creed, recited to the sureties as the belief in which the child is to be brought up, and the minister addresses the sureties: "We will bring unto the Saviour this child as far as it lieth in our power; that is, through baptism we will receive him in his Church, and give him the earnest of the covenant and of the people of God." The form of administration of the eucharist in the liturgy is the same as that in Zwingli's Works (ii, 563), and is adapted to the doctrine of sacraments already stated.

Theoretically, Zwingli did not view the community in its two capacities, civil and ecclesiastical, and recognise as belonging to it two independent jurisdictions, temporal and spiritual; the community to him was a Church, and nothing else. His magistrates were Church officers, deriving their authority equally with the ministry from the body of the faithful, and distinguished from them only by the character of the work which a division of labor assigned to each. Practically, however, the result was that the sovereignty in spiritual as well as in temporal matters was vested in the civic authorities of each community.

The system of Zwingli was in some measure modified by Bullinger, who introduced something approaching to a recognition of a clergy and of efficacy in sacraments; and, again, the influence of the Geneva ministers added to the Zurich doctrine of the Lord's Supper something of that Calvinistic teaching regarding receiving the body and blood of Christ, which corresponds to the present accepted belief. It was Swiss theology, so modified by Bullinger, that found advocates in England. Hooper was a faithful follower of Bullinger. Peter Martyr, à Lasco, Dryander, and Ochino were on the same side, and with them acted most of the party of the Marian exiles (see ZÜRICH LETTERS), who had been received with great hospitality at Zurich. Hoadley's doctrine of the Lord's Supper is not distinguishable from Zwingli's. See Zwingli's Works, by Gualter (1544-45), especially the treatises Expositio Fidei Christianæ, De Vera et Falso Religione, Ecclesiastes, Archætes; also Basle Confession (1536), Helvetic Confession (1566), In Sylloge Confessio (Oxford, 1827), and Liturgia Tigurina (Engl. transl. Lond. 1698). See also EUCHARIST; REAL PRESENCE; SACRAMENT; TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

ZYTO, FERDINAND FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian, and formerly professor of theology at Berne, who died May 10, 1874, at Rheinfelden, is the author of, Ein freies Wort über die gegenwärtigen Verhältnisse der evangelisch-reformirten Kirche und ihrer Diener im Kanton Bern (Berne, 1831):—Des praktischen Theologen Gesinnung in dieser Zeit (ibid. 1834):—*Die evangelisch-reformirte Kirche u. ihre Fortbildung im XIX. ADDENDA.

A.

Abbot, EZRA, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Unitarian scholar, was born at Jackson, Me., April 18, 1819. He studied at Phillips Academy, Exeter, N.H.; graduated from Bowdoin College in 1840, taught for about five years at East Machias, Me.; removed to Cambridge, Mass., in 1847; in 1856 became assistant librarian of Harvard University, and in 1872 professor of New-Test. criticism, a position which he retained until his death, March 21, 1884. In 1856 Dr. Abbot edited Andrew Norton's posthumous Translation of the Gospels, and in 1856 Norton's Statement of the Reasons for not Believing the Doctrines of Trinitarians. In 1864 he published his Literature of the Doctrine of Future Life, in which he gave a list of more than five thousand works on that subject. In 1865 he edited Lawson's Church of the First Three Centuries, and in 1866 Orme's Memoir of the Controversy on the Three Heavenly Witnesses. In 1860 he edited and revised Hudson's Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament. He was one of the writers for the American edition of Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and his additions to the bibliography of that work are exceedingly valuable. He gave substantial aid to the Rev. Dr. Noyes in his Translation of the New Testament, which was published in 1869. His work on The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel: External Evidences, brought out in 1880, is well-known to European and American scholars. Among his last labors was the assistance which he gave to Dr. C. R. Gregory, of Leipzig, in the preparation of his Prolegomena to Tischendorf's last critical edition of the Greek Test. Dr. Abbot was also a voluminous contributor to the periodical literature of the day, in Europe and America. He was a member of the American Bible Revision Committee. In the special department of Biblical literature he stood among the foremost scholars of the present day, and in textual criticism he was probably superior to any other in America. He was a man of singular modesty and disinterestedness, and was endowed with an almost unlimited capacity for work, possessing withal the qualities of thoroughness and accuracy, and in all his studies was more anxious to learn the truth than to establish any foregone conclusion.

Abeken, HEINRICH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Osnabrück, Aug. 19, 1809. He studied at Berlin, was appointed in 1834 chaplain to the Prussian ambassador at Rome, and in 1841 at London, where he was also actively engaged in the founding of the bishopric at Jerusalem. In 1842 he accompanied professor Lepsius to Egypt and Ethiopia, and in 1848 was appointed member of the Prussian ministry for foreign affairs. During the Franco-Prussian war, in 1870-71, he accompanied prince (then count) Bismarck to France, and died Aug. 8, 1872. He is known by his biography of Bunsen in Unsere Zeit, vol. v (Leipzig, 1861), and by his Babylon und Jerusalem (Berlin, 1853), written against the countess Ida Hahn-Hahn, who had embraced Roman Catholicism. (B. P.)

estant Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia in 1822, being the son of the Rev. James Abercrombie. After a liberal education in his native city, he graduated from the General Theological Seminary in New York city in 1843, was ordained the same year, and took charge of a church at Rahway, N.J. He was successively rector of the Church of the Intercession, in New York city (1843-50); St. John's, Clifton, S. I.; Christ Church, Hartford, Conn.; St. Paul's, Rahway, N. J., and St. Matthew's, Jersey City, where he died, Dec. 7, 1884. He was practically the founder of Christ Church Hospital in that city, and of the Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society. See The Church Almanac, 1886, p. 102.

Abernethy (or Abernethie), JOHN, D.D., a Scotch prelate, studied at the University of Edinburgh, was laureated in 1587, and became reader in 1588. He was a member of the Assemblies in 1601, 1602, 1608, and 1616; signed a protest against introducing episcopacy in 1606; was chosen constant moderator of the Presbytery; solicited the appointment to the archbishopric of Glasgow in 1615; was a member of the Court of High Commission in 1616; made bishop of Caithness the same year, and demitted Sept. 15, 1635, deposed in 1638, but was permitted to minister in any place. He died April 24, 1639, aged about seventy-two years. He published, Christian and Heavenly Treatise concerning Physick for the Soul (1615);—Two Letters to King James VI (1620);—The Duty and Dignity of a Christian (Lond. eod.). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 480.

Ablon, a little village on the Seine, about thirteen miles from Paris, is noted in the history of French Protestantism as the place where the reformed worship was first held after the concession by the edict of Nantes, May 2, 1598, in consequence of the opposition to that liberty in Paris by the Romanists. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Acworth, JAMES, LL.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Chatham, Aug. 1, 1798. He studied in the Baptist College at Bristol, graduated from the University of Glasgow, settled as co-pastor at Leeds in 1823, and the next year became sole pastor. In 1835 he was chosen president of Horton College, Bradford, a position which he held with great efficiency until 1863. He died Oct. 13 of the same year. Dr. Acworth was active in all the public religious associations of his day, and was the author of several addresses, sermons, etc. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1884, p. 29.

Adam, a Scotch bishop, was witness to a charter by William Bisset to William de Newbigging. He was bishop of Galloway in 1359. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 274.

Adam, Johannes, a Jesuit, was born at Limoges in 1608. He made himself known by his controversial writings against the Huguenots and Jansenists. For forty years he preached at Paris, Poitiers, Sedan, Bordeaux, and other cities, making proselytes wherever he could. His work, Calvin Défait par Soy-mesme et par les Armes de St. Augustin (1650), elicited a rejoinder from the famous Jansenist, cardinal Noris. Against the un-Catholic Heures de Port-Royal of Maistre de Sacy, Adam published, in 1651, the Ileures Catholiques. When Innocent X condemned Jansenism, Adam published Le Tombeau du Jansénisme (1654):—La Conduite des Fidèles par les Regles de la Foi (1656). During the session of the Reformed synod held at Laudun in 1659, he converted the Calvinist Cottibi, who, in the year following, joined the Church of Rome. When the Jesuits erected a college at Sedan, he became its rector, and published, in 1671, Le Triomphe de la Ste. Eucharistie ou la Présence Réelle contre le Ministre Claude. He died at Bordeaux, May 12, 1684. See R. Bauer in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Adam, Scotus (also called ADAMUS ANGLICUS), a Premonstratensian of the 12th century, was born in Scotland. About the year 1150 he entered the monastery of St. Andrew in Scotland, and in order to become better fitted for asceticism he spent some time at the monastery in Premontre, in the diocese of Laon. Having returned to Scotland, he was made abbot and bishop of Casa Candida (Witherne), in Galloway. The time of his death cannot exactly be given. He wrote, Liber de Ordine, Habitu et Professione Præmonstratensium (14 sermons):—De Tripartito Tabernaculo (part 8):—De Triplici Genere Contemplationis. These works were printed in 1578. An enlarged edition, containing besides forty-seven sermons and two books, entitled Soliloquia de Instructione Animæ, was published by Godefr. Ghiselbertus, at Antwerp, in 1659. A complete edition of his works is given by Migne, in Patrol. Lat. cxviii. See Schenid, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Adams, Eliaba, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Williamstown, Vt., July 29, 1815. He studied at Newbury Seminary for some time, and spent three years at Norwich University; was licensed to preach in 1835; in 1838 was ordained deacon, and elder in 1840. Of the forty years spent in the ministry in the New Hampshire Conference, eleven were given to district work, eighteen to stations, and three to the agency of the conference seminary, of which he was a trustee from the beginning. His labors were everywhere acceptable and successful, and three times he was a member of general conferences. He was a man of one work, and as a preacher was strictly evangelical. He died in Concord, N. H., Aug. 15, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 91.

Adams, George F., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Dorchester, Mass., Oct. 3, 1802. He removed to Ohio with his father's family in 1805, was baptized at the age of ten, and licensed to preach at twenty. He graduated from Columbian College, Washington, D. C., in 1829, having been ordained at the Navy-Yard Baptist Church of that place, April 22, 1827. After teaching for several years, he became the pastor of a church at Fredericksburg, Va.; in 1835 removed to Baltimore, and, in January, 1836, became pastor of the Calvert Street Church. After serving as general missionary of his denomination in Maryland, he took charge of the Second Church, Baltimore, in 1848; in 1860 went to Hampton, Va., as pastor, and on the breaking-out of the civil war was, for a short time, a chaplain in the Confederate army. For about three years (1862-65) he acted a second time as state missionary in Maryland. After teaching a year or two, he returned to Hampton, and was pastor nine years (1867-76), and then returned to Baltimore, where he was city missionary for a few months, and died there, April 16, 1877. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Jasper, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated from Brown University in 1815; spent two years in Andover Theological Seminary; was tutor in Brown University in 1818 and 1819; was ordained deacon Sept. 2, 1819, and presbyter Aug. 4, 1820. He was professor of mathematics in Brown University from 1819 to 1824; president of Charleston College, S. C., from 1824 to 1826; of Geneva College, N. Y., from 1826 to 1828; of Charleston College again from 1828 to 1836; chaplain and professor of ethics at U. S. Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., from 1838 to 1840, and died at Pendleton, S. C., Oct. 25, 1841. See Gen. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 39.

Adams, Mrs. Sarah Flower, an English poetess, daughter of Benjamin Flower, a Liberal editor and author, was born at Harlow, Essex, Feb. 22, 1805, and in 1834 married William B. Adams, an engineer and writer. She died Aug. 13, 1849. Mrs. Adams published a dramatic poem, entitled Viria Perpetua (1841), and a catechism with hymns, entitled The Flock at the Fountain (1845). She was a member of the Unitarian congregation of William Johnson Fox, to whose volume of Hymns and Anthems (1840) she contributed thirteen pieces, the most noted of which is "Nearer my God to thee." In later years she is said to have become a Baptist. Her sister, Eliza Flower, set some of Sarah's songs to music, and herself wrote a number of poems.

Adams, Seymour Webster, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Vernon, Oneida Co., N. Y., Aug. 1, 1815. He was converted at seventeen years of age; graduated from Hamilton College and Theological Seminary; was ordained in 1843, and served as pastor in his native place for two years, and thereafter in Cleveland, O., until his death, Sept. 27, 1864. He wrote a memoir of his father-in-law, Dr. N. Kendrick, and his own Life was edited by J. P. Bishop (1866). See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Adams, Thomas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Brookfield, Mass., Feb. 7, 1792. He studied at Leicester Academy, graduated from Dartmouth College in 1814, and then studied theology with Rev. Dr. Thomas Snell, of West Brookfield. He was ordained pastor in Vassalborough, Me., Aug. 26, 1818, and remained there until April 1, 1834. In 1835 he was agent for a temperance society. The following year he was installed pastor at Waterville, and remained nearly two years. The five subsequent years he was editor of the Temperance Gazette; and from 1843 to 1846 was agent of the Tract Society. The next year he was acting-pastor at Hampden, O.; and until 1856 he sustained the same relation to the Church at Thompson. From 1856 to 1860 he was the Ohio agent of the Congregational Board of Publication; in 1863 acting-pastor in Pittston, Me.; and from 1864 to 1870 filled the same position in Vassalborough. After this he resided, without charge, at Winslow, where he died, Feb. 4, 1881. Several of his sermons have been published. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 17.

Adeloga, saint, virgin, and abbess of the 8th century, was the daughter of Charles Martel, by Kuehilda. She was of singular beauty, so that she was greatly sought in marriage, but she constantly refused, having given her heart to a heavenly spouse. Her father, exasperated, treated her with studied brutality and public insult. She sought comfort in the advice of her director, his chaplain, and they were both expelled from the palace. Adeloga and the priest journeyed till they came to a wild and desert place, Kitzingen, in the present margrave of Anspach, and there they built a convent. To her came virgins, the priest gave her the veil, made her abbess, enjoining her to adopt the rule of St. Benedict and St. Scholastica. He attended to the temporal affairs of the convent till he died. In after-years Charles Martel was reconciled to his daughter, endowed her monastery with lands, and visited her. St. Adeloga has a place in the Benedictine martyrology, and those of Ferrarius, Menardus, etc. There is an ancient, apparently authentic, life, by an anonymous writer, published by Rollandus. See Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, Feb. 4, ii, 42.

Adhem, one of the most ancient Mohammedan Quietists, who is said to have obtained in one of his visions the high privilege of having his name written by an angel among those who love God. Among his extravagant expressions are the following: "Hell is preferable with the will of God to heaven without it." "I would rather go to hell doing the will of God than go to heaven disobeying him." Mohammedan mystics often resort to such statements to show their high regard for the deity.

Ægidius A LESSINIA (also DE LESSINIS), a Dominican, who flourished about 1278, was a contemporary with Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. He took an active part in the controversies against Averroism, and wrote many philosophical, theological, and chronological works, of which only a few fragments are extant. He also wrote De Usuris, which is generally quoted in the editions of the works of Thomas Aquinas as Opusculum 73. B. Haréau, in his La Philosophie Scolastique (Paris, 1850), i, 248, quotes a few passages from his De Unitate Formæ, in which he defends the Thomistic doctrine of the unity of the forma substantialis. See Bach, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ægidius DE PRÆSENTATIONE, a Portuguese scholastic, was born at Castel Branco in 1539, and died in 1626, professor of theology at Coimbra and provincial of the Portuguese Augustinian-Eremites. Besides the writings in praise of his order (Primas Augustinianæ [Cologne, 1627] and Apologia seu Defensorium Ordinis S. Aug.), he wrote, Disputationes ad Priores V Quæstiones 1, 2 S. Thomas (Coimbra, 1609, 1615, 8 vols.)—De Voluntario et Involuntario (2 vols.)—Philosophia Naturalis et Supernaturalis—De Immac. Concept. B. M. V. (ibid. 1617, book 4). See Ossinger, Bibl. August. 856; Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Agathias, a Byzantine historian, was born at Myrina, in Æolia, about 536 or 537 A.D. He resided at Alexandria, and after 554 at Constantinople, where he practiced law, but whether he was a Christian or a heathen is uncertain. He died between 582 and 594. He wrote a valuable history of the eastern Roman empire, from 553 to 559, which was published in Greek by Vulcanus at Leyden (1594). The best edition is that of Niebuhr, in the Corpus Script. Byzant.

Agricola, IGNATIUS, a Jesuit, was born at Zusamaltheim, in the bishopric of Augsburg, July 31, 1661. In 1677 he entered the Society of Jesus, was for a long time professor at the Jesuit gymnasium at Munich, and died Jan. 23, 1729. He wrote Historia Provincial Societatis Jesu Germaniæ Superioris (Augsburg, 1727-29, 2 vols.), reaching down to 1600, and continued to 1640 by Flott and Khopf. See Baader, Gelehrtes Bayern; Sattler, Geschichte der marienischen Congregation in Bayern, 1864, p. 279; Schlösser, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alton, JOHN, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, studied at the Edinburgh University, was licensed in 1819, presented to the living at Dolphinton in 1824, and died at Essex, May 15, 1862. He was the author of Owen's Objections to Christianity Refuted (1824);—Life and Times of Alexander Henderson (1836);—Clerical Ethics (1842);—Letter on Imprisonments in Naples (1851);—Lands of the Messiah, Mohammed, and the Pope (1852);—The Drying up of the Euphrates, etc. (1853);—Appeal in Behalf of Jerusalem and the Holy Land (1854);—St. Paul and his Localities (1856);—Manual of Domestic Economy (1857), and other works. See Fæsti Eccles. Scotici, i, 221.

Akers, PETER, D.D., a veteran Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Campbell County, Va., Sept. 1, 1790. He was reared in the Presbyterian Church, studied at the high-schools in Virginia and North Carolina, taught school and practiced law a few years, editing likewise a weekly journal; was converted in 1821, and the same year joined the Methodist Church; began to preach, and was admitted to the Kentucky Conference, in which and in the Illinois (1832) and the Minnesota conferences (1857) he occupied prominent appointments, with great efficiency, until 1858, when he became superannuated, and retained that relation until his death, at Jacksonville, Ill., Feb. 21, 1886. He twice (1833 and 1851) served as president of M'Kenzie College, and was often a member of the General Conference. He was a powerful preacher and a genial Christian. He published an elaborate work on Biblical Chronology (Cincinnati, O., 1855, 8vo). See (N. Y.) Christian Advocate, Aug. 5, 1886.

Albrecht, son of Casimir, margrave of Culmbach, was born March 28, 1522. He entered into the confederacy formed by Maurice, elector of Saxony, and other princes, against the emperor Charles V, and committed many excesses in the war, burning towns and levying heavy contributions wherever he marched. Subsequently a league headed by Maurice himself was formed against him, and in 1553 a great battle was fought at Sivershausen, in which Maurice was slain and Albrecht wounded. He was afterwards put under the ban of the empire, and deprived of his possession. While suffering exile he composed the hymn Was mein Gott will, gescheh' allzeit (Engl. transl. in the Monthly Religious Magazine [1864], xxxi, p. 80, "Whatever God will, let that be done"), and died as a penitent and believing Christian, Jan. 8, 1557, at Pforzheim, in the house of his brother-in-law, the margrave Charles II, of Baden. See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, i, 339 sq. (B. P.)

Albright, JACOB, the founder of the Evangelical Association, was born near Pottstown, Pa., May 1, 1753. His parents were members of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, and in youth he was received as a member into its communion. About 1790 he was converted, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. In October, 1796, he commenced his work as an itinerant minister, preaching to the Germans in Pennsylvania and Virginia in a stirring, practical manner. In 1800 he organized the persons who had been intrusted to his care into classes or societies. The first three of these were formed in the counties of Bucks, Berks, and Northampton, in the state of Pennsylvania. Soon afterwards other classes were formed. His first colleague after this organization was John Walter, his second was Abraham Lieaser. A council was held Nov. 3, 1803, at which these three and fourteen others of the society were present. Albright was recognised as their spiritual father, and his two associates, with the assent of the others, solemnly ordained him an elder, adopting the Holy Scriptures as their articles of faith and practice. At the first conference, held in November, 1807, in Lebanon County, Pa., Jacob Albright was elected bishop. From the time of this conference session his health failed rapidly. On his way home from Singletown he became so weak that he was compelled to stop at the house of Mr. George Becker, in Lebanon County. He died May 18, 1808. The immediate fruit of his labors was the conversion of three hundred souls. His public prayers and sermons were powerful, penetrating, and convincing. See Yearke, Albright and his Co-laborers (Cleveland, O., 1883).

Albro, JOHN ADAMS, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1800. He graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827, and was ordained Nov. 21 of the same year pastor at Chelmsford, Mass.; in 1833 he became pastor at Fitchburg; in 1835 of First Church, Cambridge. He was without charge at Cambridge from 1865 until his death at West Roxbury, Dec. 20, 1866. See Trien. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 73.

Alden, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., a noted educator and author, was born at Cairo, N. Y., Jan. 4, 1807. He graduated from Union College in 1828, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1830; was tutor two years in the College of New Jersey; ordained over the Congregational Church in Williamstown, Mass., July 8, 1834; professor in the college there from 1835 to 1852; and in Lafayette College, Pa., thereafter until 1857, when he was elected its president; from 1863 to 1865 preached as stated supply at Boiling Spring, N. J.; from 1867 to 1880 was principal of the New York State Normal School at Albany, and died in the city of New York, Aug. 30, 1886. He wrote chiefly for the young, especially in the department of Sunday-school literature, and in the religious journals.

Alexander, Robert, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Tennessee, Aug. 7, 1811. He was converted at the age of seventeen; the next year was licensed to exhort, and the following year joined the Tennessee Conference; in 1833 was transferred to the Mississippi Conference; in 1836 was appointed missionary to Texas, and labored zealously and successfully in that field in various capacities until near the time of his death, which occurred in 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 119.

Alexander, Stephen, LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1806. He graduated from Union College in 1824, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1832, when he became a tutor in Princeton College, and, in 1834, professor of mathematics, astronomy, and mechanical philosophy, and was connected with the college for upwards of fifty years. Professor Alexander, in 1860, went to the coast of Labrador, at the head of a government astronomical expedition, to observe the eclipse of July 18. In 1869 he was at the head of an expedition to the Rocky Mountains to observe the solar eclipse of that year. He was the author of numerous papers on astronomy and mathematics, which attracted much attention in this country and in Europe. He was one of the founders of the National Academy of Science, a member of the American Philosophical Association, of the Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, of which he was president. He was a devout Christian, and an elder in the Presbyterian Church. His old age passed away in the quiet study of the stars, his favorite pursuit. He died at Princeton, N. J., June 26, 1883. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Alumni, 1884, p. 16; Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. s. v. (W. P. S.)

Alexander, William Lindsay, D.D., an eminent English Independent minister, was born at Leith, near Edinburgh, Aug. 24, 1808. He graduated while young from the High School of Edinburgh and the University of St. Andrews, and in 1828 was appointed classical tutor in the Lancashire College, then located at Blackburn, but subsequently removed to Manchester. He had expected to study medicine, but having been religiously educated, he officiated in a small chapel in Wales, whither he had retired for his health, and subsequently in Newington Chapel, Liverpool. After a course of study at the German universities, he accepted the pastorate of the North-College Church, Edinburgh, in 1835. In 1854 he was appointed professor of theology in the Scottish Theological Hall, in 1861 examiner in philosophy at St. Andrew's University, but resigned these positions at the close of 1882. He died Dec. 20, 1883. Dr. Alexander was noted no less as a preacher than as a scholar. He was a member of the Old-Test. company of the Bible Revision Committee, and the author of numerous Biblical and theological works, the principal of which are the Congregational Lectures for 1840 (new ed. 1853):—Anglo-Catholicism not Apostolic (1843):—Christ and Christianity (1854):—Life of Dr. Wardlaw (1856):—Christian Thought and Work (1862):—St. Paul at Athens, and many articles in the reviews and cyclopædias, besides editing the third edition of Kitto's Cyclopædia. See (Lond.) Cong. Yearbook, 1886, p. 146; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Alfonso, Pedro, formerly rabbi Moses of Huesca, in Aragon, was born in 1062. At the age of forty-four he was baptized in the cathedral of his native city, on St. Peter's day, and in honor of the saint and his godfather, the king Alfonso, he took the name of Pedro Alfonso. He was, besides being physician to the king, Alfonso VI, a very learned and fine writer of the mediæval Church, highly praised by all Spanish writers. He wrote a defence of Christianity, and a refutation of Jewish incredulities, in the form of a dialogue between Moses and Pedro Alfonso, under the title of, Dialogi in quibus Impia Judæorum Opiniones Credentissimis tam Naturalis quam Cælestis Philosophia Argumentis Confutantur, etc. (Cologne, 1586), a work spoken of in high terms, and which has since been in great use in Spain. He also wrote a Disciplina Clericalis, a very popular book, which was translated into French in the 13th century. The date of Alfonso's death is not known. The Disciplina Clericalis was edited by F. W. V. Schmidt (Berlin, 1827). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 86; Kalkar, Israel und die Kirche, p. 22; Bartolucci, Bibl. Rubb. iv, 69; Antonii *Bibl. Alison, Francis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lac, County Donegal, Ireland, in 1705. He came to America when about thirty years of age, and engaged in teaching. In May, 1737, he was ordained pastor at New London, Pa., and in 1749 took charge of the Philadelphia Academy, afterwards the University of Pennsylvania, of which he was vice-provost and professor of moral philosophy, at the same time serving as assistant minister of the First Presbyterian Church. He died Nov. 28, 1779. Dr. Alison was a prominent actor in the public enterprises of his time. See Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. s. v.

Allen, A. C., D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Iredale County, N. C., March 18, 1818. He was converted in early life; was educated at Emory and Henry College; joined the North Carolina Conference in 1842; was ordained deacon in 1844, and elder in 1846. He filled some of the best appointments in the conference. In 1852 he located and moved to Mississippi, where he accepted the presidency of a female college at Okolona, remaining there until the war, when he entered the Confederate army as chaplain. In 1864 he joined the Memphis Conference, wherein he served one term as presiding elder. In 1870 he was transferred to the North Mississippi Conference, in which he served in a like capacity. He was transferred to the North Texas Conference in 1874, where he served three charges. The year 1877-78 he was president of a college in the city of Dallas. He was a delegate to the general conferences of 1870 and 1874. His death occurred at Fort Worth, Jan. 17, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 203.

Allen, Robert Welch, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Shelby County, Ky., March 25, 1817. He graduated from Wabash College, Ind., in 1839. From thence he entered Princeton Seminary, where he remained two years, when failing health compelled him to leave. He was ordained by the Crawfordsville Presbytery, and served three years as stated supply of several churches, when he was installed pastor of Jefferson and Frankford churches, and remained in that charge for nine years. He next became pastor of the Pisgah Church, near Lexington, Ky., which he served with great acceptance until 1857, when he accepted a call to the Church of Jacksonville, Ill. This pastorate he held for over eleven years, afterwards he served as missionary, and supplied the Church of St. Charles, Mo. At the end of two years he returned to Jacksonville, and supplied the churches of Union and Murrayville until a new church was organized called Unity, over which he was installed pastor, and which relation he continued during life. He died at Jacksonville, Ill., July 29, 1882. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 39. (W. P. S.)

Alline, HENRY, a remarkable character in the religious history of the last century, was born in Rhode Island in 1748. In 1760 he went to Nova Scotia and settled at Newport. Six years after he commenced preaching without ordination, although, in 1779, he received the imposition of hands at Cornwallis as an itinerant preacher. He preached in Nova Scotia from 1776 to 1784, then went to the United States, where he died at the residence of Rev. David McClure, Northampton, N. H., Feb. 2 of the latter year. He travelled throughout the provinces, preaching with remarkable fervor and power, assailing all denominations, causing divisions in the churches, and making many converts. Alline rejected the doctrine of creation, denied that man possessed a material body before the fall, and affirmed that all souls were actually created at the beginning of the world and sinned in Eden. He also denied the resurrection of the elemental body. He had a keenly metaphysical mind and a love of speculation. Some of his writings were published, now very rare, viz., Miles on Some of the most Important and Disputed Points of Divinity Cast into the Treasury (Halifax, N. S., 1781);—Sermons (1782-83);—The Anti-Traditionists (1783);—Life and Journals (Boston, 1806, 12mo). Of the first-mentioned work it has been said, "In its statement of doctrine it is a confused medley, almost resembling a sick man's dreams, and yet it is varied with the most impassioned and eloquent appeals, when he touches upon some of the grander or more tender topics of religion." His autobiography is a book of thrilling interest. Alline had an agreeable manner and a natural eloquence. He never left the Congregational ranks, in which he was brought up. He was indifferent as to the mode of baptism, and cared little for the ordinance at all. Some of his followers joined the Baptists, but the majority united with the Free-will or Free Christian Baptists. See his Life and Journals; Morgan, Biblioth. Canad. s. v.; Smith, Hist. of Methodism in East British America, vol. i; Bill, Hist. of the Baptists of the Maritime Provinces (St. Johns, 1881), p. 13-18.

Altenburg, a Benedictine abbey, in Lower Austria, was founded by Hildeburg, countess of Buige. In 1144 a number of monks settled there from St. Lambrecht, in Styria. Till 1878 this abbey had forty-five abbots, the first of whom was Gottfried. Altenburg was several times destroyed by fire, twice by the Hussites, and suffered greatly from the peasants' war, and from the Swedes, Russians, and French. The famous abbot was the thirty-eighth, Maurus Boxler, who greatly promoted the spiritual as well as material interests of the abbey. His clergy were educated at the universities of Vienna and Salzburg. Under the forty-fifth abbot, Honorius Burger, who died in 1878, the seventh centenary of this institution was celebrated in 1844. Burger also wrote the history of his abbey, and published the documents concerning the same in Fontes Rerum Austriacarum, Diplom. et Acta, xxi (Vindob. 1865). Besides Marian, Gesch. der österr. Kleriker (Vienna, 1787), see Burger's History (ibid. 1862); Wolfgruber, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Altieri, LUIGI, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Rome, July 17, 1805, of a noble family. He began his career under the immediate eye of Gregory XVI., and lodged in the Vatican as private chamberlain to the pope. His next step was to the secretaryship of the Congregation of Studies, whence he was promoted to the nunciature at Vienna, and consecrated by Gregory himself archbishop of Ephesus, July 17, 1886. He was created cardinal Dec. 14, 1840, and published April 23, 1845. During the twenty years of his cardinal's life he occupied some of the most laborious and important posts, as chamberlain of the holy Roman Church, archpriest of the patriarchal basilica of St. John Lateran, lord chancellor of the Roman University, and bishop of the suburbicarian see of Albano, about fourteen miles from Rome. While (1867) receiving the oaths and distributing the diplomas to the students of the university, a hasty messenger arrived announcing the scourge of cholera desolating his diocese. Without a moment's hesitation he broke up the meeting, summoned a notary, made his will, and rode hastily to the stricken town of Albano. He at once assumed control of the municipal as well as religious government of his see, seconded by the Papal Zouaves, and the cholera was at length brought under control. But Altieri was seized himself with the disease, and died Aug. 11, 1867. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1876, p. 103.

Ambrose Podobjedow, a Russian ecclesiastic, was born Nov. 30, 1742, in the government of Vladimir. He was educated at the Troiz monastery and took holy orders in 1768. Having been elevated to the bishopric of Sjewsk, he took charge, in 1785, of the Kasan eparchy; was in 1794 elected member of the Holy Synod, and in 1799 made archbishop of St. Petersburg, Esthonia, and Finland. In the year following he received the arch-episcopal see of Novgorod, with the appointment as metropolitan, and died May 21 (June 2), 1818. He wrote an ascetical work, in three vols. (Moscow, 1810), and A Guide to the Reading of the Holy Scriptures (new ed. ibid. 1840). His most important work, however, is his Russian Church history, Istoria Rossijskoj Ierarchij (ibid. 1807-15, 6 vols.; 2d ed. 1827). (B. P.)

Ammon, FRIEDRICH WILHELM PHILIP VON, a German theologian, son of Christoph (q. v.), was born Feb. 7, 1791, at Erlangen, where he also studied theology; as well as at Jena. In 1813 he was appointed pastor at Bittenheim, near Bamberg, and in 1820 became archdeacon at Erlangen, where he finally died pastor, doctor, and professor of theology, Sept. 19, 1855. He wrote, Geiler von Kaisersberg's Leben, Lehren und Predigten (Erlangen, 1826);—Denkmal zur dritten Säcularfeier der augsbürger Confession (ibid. 1829);—Evangelisches Jubelfestbuch zur dritten Säcularfeier der augsbürger Confession (ibid. 1881);—Gallerie der denkwürdigsten Personen, welche im XVI., XVII. und XVIII. Jahrhunderte von der evangelischen zur katholischen Kirche übergetreten sind (ibid. 1833). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 24; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 578, 755, 909, 916; ii, 833. (B. P.)

Ammonian Sections are those numerical divisions of the text of the Greek Testament which were introduced by Ammonius of Alexandria into his Diatessaron, or harmony of the four gospels, and were retained in the margin of many of the early copies of the gospels as being useful for comparing the parallel accounts. See NEW TESTAMENT.

Anastasy, BRATANOWSKY, one of the most famous pulpit orators of Russia, was born in 1761, in the neighborhood of Kiev. He studied at the theological school in Perejaslaw, became in 1790 a monk, was appointed in 1797 bishop of White Russia, in 1801 archbishop, and in 1805 member of the Holy Synod. He died in 1816, archbishop of Astrachan. He published a collection of religious discourses, in four vols. (St. Petersburg, 1796; Moscow, 1799-1807);—Tractatus de Concilio Dispositionibus Formandis (Moscow, 1806). (B. P.)

Ancellon, Charles, a French Protestant lawyer, and writer in behalf of political liberty, son of David, was born at Metz, Jan. 28 or 29, 1659. He began his studies there, but prosecuted them at Hanau, and afterwards at Marburg, Geneva, and Paris. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes he represented his co-religionists in their efforts to obtain redress from the government. He retired to Berlin, where he was treated with marked favor, and died there, July 5, 1715. He is the author of a number of historical and political works, for which see Hofer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anderson, Alexander, LL.D., a Scotch Baptist minister and educator, was born at Peterhead, Aberdeen County, in September, 1808. He studied at St. Andrew's University, was ordained pastor at Boyndie in 1830, joined the Free Church party in 1843, in 1845 was settled over a church in Old Aberdeen, but in 1847 resigned his charge on account of a change of views on the subject of baptism, and took charge of the Chantry House School, in Aberdeen, to which he joined the pastoral care of a Baptist congregation in George Street Hall, which eventually united with that in Crown Terrace. He died at Aboyne, Oct. 25, 1884. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1886, p. 101.

Anderson, David, D.D., an English prelate, was born in London, Feb. 10, 1814. He studied at Edinburgh Academy, and graduated from Exeter Hall, Oxford, in 1836. In 1841 he was made vice-principal of St. Bee's College, Cumberland; in 1848 incumbent of All-Saints' Church, Derby; in 1849 was consecrated the first bishop of St. Rupert's Land, but resigned that see on being appointed vicar of Clifton in 1864; in 1866 he was made chancellor of St. Paul's Cathedral, and died in London, Nov. 5, 1885. He was the author of, Notes on the Flood:—Net in the Bay:—five Charges, and some Ordination Sermons.

Anderson, Thomas D., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 30, 1819. He removed in early life to Washington, his father holding an office under the government. In 1838 he graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1841 from the Newton Theological Institution. In 1842 he was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church at Salem, Mass., in 1848 he became pastor of the First Baptist Church at Roxbury, and in 1862 of the First Baptist Church in New York city. He achieved distinction and success in the difficult field in which he was called to labor. During nearly all his ministry he was officially connected with the American Baptist Missionary Society, the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, and, while in New York, with the American Tract Society. For four years he acted as president of the Rutgers Female College, in New York city. Other important positions in benevolent and educational institutions he also filled. In the summer of 1878 he resigned his charge in New York, and not long after became pastor of the South Church, in Boston, where he died, Dec. 19, 1883. Dr. Anderson published only a few occasional discourses. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v. (J.C.S.)

Andreas, Antonio, a Spanish Minorite of the 14th century, was one of the most prominent pupils of Duns Scotus, whose method he also adopted. The skill with which he made the more difficult principles of Duns Scotus more simple and intelligible acquired for him, by his students, the surname of Doctor Dulcissimus. He died about 1320. See Antonio, Biblioth. Hispan. ii, 97; Cave, Hist. Lit. append. 12; Stockl, Geschichte der Philosophie des Mittelalters, ii, 875; Grammer, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Angeli, Filippo dk, an Italian canonist, was born at Canterano, near Subiaco, Feb. 10, 1824. He studied philosophy and theology at Rome, and after having received holy orders in 1846, practiced law. When quite young he was made professor of canon law at Rome. In 1871 he resigned his position, and died

March 5, 1881. Pope Leo XIII, who appreciated his great talents as a teacher and expounder of canon law, made him canon of Maria Maggiore. He wrote Prælectiones Juris Canonici ad Methodum Decretalium Gregorii Exactæ (Rome, 1877-80, 3 vols.). See Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Angerville (or Angarvill, alias Bury), RICHARD dk, an English prelate of the 14th century, son of sir Richard Angerville, was born at Bury, Suffolk, and educated at Oxford, where he attained to great eminence in learning; was governor to king Edward III while a prince, and the latter afterwards advanced him to be his cofferer, treasurer of his wardrobe, dean of Wells, bishop of Durham (1333), chancellor, and lord treasurer of England (1334). He was noted for his charities, bestowing on the poor every week eight quarters of wheat baked, and other benefactions. He was a great lover of books, confessing himself "extatico quodam librorum amore potenter abreptum," and he had more books than all the bishops of England in that age put together, which library he bequeathed to the University of Oxford. The most eminent foreigners were his friends, and the most learned Englishmen were his chaplains until his death, April 14, 1345. He wrote Philibiblos. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 166.

Anquetil (Duperron), ABRAHAM HYACINTHE, a French Orientalist, brother of Louis, was born at Paris, Dec. 7, 1731. He studied theology at his native place, Auxerre, and Amersfoort, and with the subvention of his government he went, in 1755, to India, to study Sanskrit and Zend there. At Surat he succeeded in obtaining the help of some Parsee priests, who dictated to him in the neo-Persian language the contents of their books written in Zend and Pehlevi. Having returned, in 1762, to Paris, he was appointed interpreter of Oriental languages at the royal library, and published a translation of the Zend-Avesta (Paris, 1771). In 1778 he published, at Amsterdam, the Legislation Orientale, which was followed by the publication of Recherches Historiques et Géographiques sur l'Inde (Berlin and Paris, 1787, 2 vols.). He also published a Latin translation of a Persian extract from the Upanishads, or the theologico-philosophical treatises of the Vedar. He died at Paris, Jan. 17, 1805. (B. P.)

Anselm, a name common to several archbishops of MILAN, of whom we name the following:

1. ANSELM BILIUS (814-822), who was exiled with other bishops on account of the part he took in the conspiracy of Bernard. He was, however, restored again, and crowned, in 821, king Lothar, at Monza.

2. ANSELM CAPRA (823-897), who crowned, in 888, Berengarius, at Pavia, as king of Italy.

3. ANSELM OF RAUDE (1086-1093), was a faithful adherent of the pope and opponent of Henry IV, and crowned his rebellious son Conrad in 1093.

4. ANSELM VALVASOR (1097-1101), second successor to the former, and also a papal adherent. In 1098 he held a large synod, went to the Holy Land, but returned in 1099. The second time he took the cross to join the crusades, but died at Constantinople.

5. ANSELM OF PUSTERLA (1123-1135), refused to accept the pallium from the hands of Honorius II. He crowned, in 1128, Conrad, the rival of Lothair, in consequence of which he was put under the ban by the pope, together with Conrad. When Anacletus II was elected antipope, Anselm sided with him, and accepted the pallium from the hands of his legate. The legitimate pope replied with an interdict, which only increased the confusion, since Anselm indicted ecclesiastical punishment upon faithful adherents of the pope. At last the people of Milan expelled Anselm, in 1133, and the council held at Pisa in 1135 confirmed the act of the people of Milan. While on his way to the antipope, Anselm was taken prisoner, and died at Rome, Aug. 24, 1136. See Ughelli, Italia Sacra, vol. iv.; Scherer, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Anspach, FREDERICK RKNHARDT, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in January, 1815, in Potter Township, Centre Co., Pa. He studied at Mifflinburg Academy, graduating from Pennsylvania College in 1839; subsequently pursued the theological course at Gettysburg, and was licensed to preach in 1841, when he became pastor of the Barren Hill and Whitemarsh charge, Montgomery County; from 1850 to 1854 he was pastor in Hagerstown, Md., and remained there until 1857. He was interested in the founding of the Hagerstown Female Seminary. About this time he became co-editor and proprietor of The Lutheran Observer. From 1857 to 1861 his residence was in Baltimore; and subsequently, owing to failing health, he retired from active work and resided principally in Anne Arundel County. He died in Baltimore, Sept. 16, 1867. Among his published works are the following: translations from the German of Heavenly Balm, etc., by Caspar Schwenkfeld (1853);—The Sepulchres of our Departed (1854);—The Sons of the Sires (1855);—a lecture on Spiritualism (cod.);—The Two Pilgrims: The Israelite and the Christian (1857), etc. See Pennsylvania College Book, 1882, p. 204; Lutheran Observer, Sept. 27, 1867.

Anstice, JOSEPH, an English poet, was born at Madeley Wood, Shropshire, in 1808; educated at Westminster and Oxford; in 1830 became professor of classical literature in King's College, London, and died at Torquay, Feb. 29, 1836. Among his productions were a select number of Hymns (anonymously published in 1836), several of which are quite popular.

Antioch, COUNCILS OF. In addition to those noticed in vol. i, councils were also held at this place in 340, at which the Arian Gregory of Cappadocia was elected to the see of Alexandria; in 360, at which the Arian Miletus of Sebastia was elected patriarch of Antioch; in 391, at which Flavianus anathematized the Massilians; and in 417, at which Pelagius was again condemned.

Antliff, WILLIAM, D.D., a prominent minister of the English Primitive Methodist Conference, was born in 1813. In his seventeenth year he began to preach. He held nearly all the positions of honor it was in the power of his denomination to bestow. From 1862 to 1867 he was Connectional Editor, and at the request of the conference he wrote an excellent biography of Hugh Bourne. He was twice president of the conference. For some time he was principal of the Sunderland Institute. He died in December, 1884. See Christian Guardian, Dec. 17, 1884.

Antonius, a Christian poet of the 3d century, is the author of Carmen Adversus Gentes, which consists of two parts, the first treating of the vanity of heathenism, the second of the truth of Christianity. The first edition of this poem was published by Muratori, in his Anecdota, vol. i (Milan, 1697), and in Opera S. Paulini (Verona, 1736), where it is erroneously ascribed to Paulinus of Nola. Other editions are given in Gallandi, Biblioth. vol. iii; Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. v. See Schmid, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Antonus A MATRE DEI, a name common to two Carmelites.

1. The first lived about the beginning of the 16th century at Alcalá, and is the author of Collegii Complutensis Discalceatorum Fratrum Ordinis B. Mariæ de Monte Carmeli Disputationes, I. In Octo Libros Physicorum Aristotelis; II. In Duos Libros de Generatione et Conceptione seu de Ortu et Interitu; III. In Tres Libros Aristotelis de Anima. See Hurter, Nomenclator, i, 697; Peters, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v.

2. He lived in the second half of the 17th century, and was professor of theology in the college of his order at Salamanca. He is the author of Praludia Iagogica ad Sacrorum Bibliorum Intelligentiam, etc. (Leyden, 1669). See Kaulen, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Apelt, ERNST FRIEDRICH, a German philosopher, was born March 3, 1812, at Reichenau, near Zittau. He studied at Jena and Leipzig; commenced his lectures at Jena in 1839; was, in 1840, professor of philosophy, and died Oct. 27, 1859. He published, Metaphysik (Leipzig, 1857);—Die Religionsphilosophie (ibid. 1860);—Die Epochen der Geschichte der Menschheit (Jena, 1845-46, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1852);—Wie muss das Glaubensbekenntnis beschaffen sein, das zur Vereinigung aller Konfessionen führen soll? (ibid. 1846). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 36. (B. P.)

Appearances of OUR LORD to his Disciples after the Resurrection. Professor Gardiner has given a "synopsis of the events, so far as the points of difficulty extend," that relate to Mary Magdalene and the other women, with a view to accommodating the statement in Mark xvi, 9 (that he appeared first to her); and his scheme, if practicable, would be a desirable solution. It is as follows (Harmony of the Gospels in Greek, p. 253):

"The resurrection itself occurred at or before the earliest dawn of the first day of the week. The women, coming to the sepulchre, find the stone rolled away and the body gone. They are amazed and perplexed. Mary Magdalene alone runs to tell Peter and John. The other women remain, enter the tomb, see the angels, are charged by them to announce the resurrection to the disciples, and depart on their errand. Meantime Peter and John run very rapidly to the sepulchre. They enter the tomb and are astonished at the orderly arrangement of the grave-clothes, and then return to the city. Mary follows to the tomb, unable quite to keep pace with them, and so falling behind. She remains standing at the entrance after they have gone, and, looking in, sees the angels. Then, turning about, she sees Jesus himself, and receives his charge for the disciples. This was our Lord's first appearance after his resurrection (Mark xvi, 9).

"To return to the women who were on their way from the sepulchre to the disciples. They went in haste, yet more slowly than Peter and John. There were many of them, and, being in a state of great agitation and alarm, they appear to have become separated and to have entered the city by different gates. One party of them, in their astonishment and fear, say nothing to any one; the others run to the disciples and announce all that they had seen, viz. the vision of the angels.

"At this time, before any report had come in of the appearance of our Lord himself, the two disciples set out for Emmaus.

"Soon after, Mary Magdalene comes in, announcing that she had actually seen the risen Lord.

"While these things are happening, the first-mentioned party of the women are stopped on the way by the appearance of the Lord himself, and they also receive a charge to his disciples."

The proper test of this scheme is to tabulate it, allowing a reasonable interval for each incident. It must be borne in mind that all the parties were more or less in haste; and as the entire breadth of the city is but little more than a mile, and the sepulchre was very near the city, fifteen or twenty minutes is sufficient time for any person, under the circumstances, to have passed from any probable point within the city to the sepulchre. Reckoning, therefore, from any fixed point, say four o'clock, the record, on that theory, would stand about as follows:

	A.M.
Resurrection.....	4:00
The women set out together.....	4:10
They arrive at the sepulchre.....	4:30
Mary sets out to return.....	4:35
The other women set out to return.....	4:45
Peter and John set out for the sepulchre, on the return of Mary.....	4:50
They reach the sepulchre.....	5:00
Some of the other women reach the city, and report.....	5:00
Peter and John leave after inspecting the tomb.....	5:10
Mary arrives the second time.....	5:15
She sees Jesus.....	5:20
The other party of women see Jesus, but do not report.....	5:30
Mary arrives and announces her news.....	5:40

If we can believe that it took any of the women three quarters of an hour to go part of the way back to the city, when it is especially said that "they fled in haste," "departed quickly," under an urgent message, which "they ran" to deliver, we may accept the above scheme, but not otherwise. It should, moreover, be observed that the supposition of a division of their company, and a delay in consequence, are unwarranted by the sacred narratives, which invariably speak of them all together, except Mary. The statement in Mark xvi, 8, that "they said nothing to any man," evidently means "no person whom they met on the way." We are not at liberty to refer the report alluded to by the disciples on the way to Emmaus (Luke xxiv, 22-24) to a single division of the women, for the same evangelist (ver. 10) distinctly includes Mary among those who made it.

The true solution of this problem lies not in any forced harmony of the events, but in a just apprehension of the language of the several evangelists. Matthew mentions in general terms the appearance to the women, including Mary; Mark speaks only of the appearance to Mary as the representative of the whole company of women; Luke (as Paul in 1 Cor. xv, 4-8) does not recognise any appearance to the women at all; John gives the details of the appearance to Mary, but makes no allusion to the other women.

Appelbe, WILLIAM PARKER, LL.D., an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Bandon, Nov. 19, 1807. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, with a view to the established Episcopal ministry, but on the completion of his course decided to enter the Methodist itinerancy. He was received by the Conference in 1834, and appointed to the Londonderry Circuit. He labored on the most important circuits in the Conference, and was chosen to nearly all the principal offices in the connection, having been twice elected president of the Conference. During the last nine years of his life, in addition to his circuit work, he filled the important office of theological tutor in the college at Belfast, a position for which his learning, culture, and sympathies eminently qualified him. He died at Belfast, June 22, 1882. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 89.

Appuhn, AUGUST WILHELM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 4, 1804. In 1834 he was appointed pastor at Attenhausen, and in 1852 cathedral-preacher and member of consistory at Magdeburg. He retired from the ministry in 1871, and died at Wernigerode, June 6, 1882. He published, Mose, der Knecht Gottes (Magdeburg, 1845):—Festpredigten (ibid. 1857): Entwürfe zu Predigten an den Fasten und Festzeiten (ibid. 1876). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 37. (B. P.)

Araujo, a name common to some theologians of the Society of Jesus:

1. ALPHONSO (or ILDEFONSO DE PEÑAFIEL), was born at Riobambo, in Peru (now Ecuador), in 1594. He joined his order in 1610, was professor of theology and philosophy at Cusco and Lima, and died at Guancavelica, Nov. 18, 1657. He wrote, Cursus Integri Philosophici (Leyden, 1658-70, 4 vols.):—Theologia Scholastica Naturalis, etc. (ibid. 1666, 2 vols.).

2. JOSEPH, was born at Oporto, in Portugal, Oct. 10, 1696. In 1712 he joined his order, was professor at Coimbra, Oporto, and Lisbon, and died in 1759. He wrote Cursus Theologicus (Lisbon, 1734-37, 2 vols.). See Bauer, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Arbues, PEDRO, a Spanish inquisitor, was born at Epila, in Aragon, in 1442. He studied at Huesca and Bologna, and was, in 1471, professor of moral philosophy at the latter place. In 1478 he was made doctor of theology and in 1474 canon of Saragossa. After having returned to his native place, he joined, in 1476, the order of the Augustinians, and in the following year received holy orders. As a preacher he attracted large crowds, and as an instructor of the young clergy was very successful. In 1484 he was appointed, together with the Dominican, Caspar Juglar, inquisitor of Aragon. This appointment was made by the grand-inquisitor Torquemada. With cruel fanaticism Arbues executed the orders of his chief, and many Jews and Moors were delivered to the stake. Among the relatives of his many sacrifices a conspiracy was effected and murderers were hired to kill all members of the inquisition. In the night of Sept. 14th, 1485, Arbues, while kneeling at the altar, received a deadly blow, and died on the 17th of that month. His murderers, together with many of the conspirators, had to pay the penalty of their deed. In the Romish Church Arbues is celebrated as a martyr. Pope Alexander VII pronounced him blessed in 1661, while Pius IX canonized him in 1867. The famous Kaulbach painted, in 1871, a picture, on which Arbues is represented as condemning heretics to death. See Zirngiebl, Peter Arbues und die spanische Inquisition (8d ed. Munich, 1872). (B. P.)

Arevalo, RODRIGUES SANCHEZ DE, a Spanish bishop, was born at St. Maria de Niera, in the diocese of Segovia, in 1404. He studied law at Salamanca, and the kings, John II and Henry IV of Castile, whose secretary he was, made use of his talents on several occasions. When, in 1456, he was sent to Rome to bring to pope Calixtus III the congratulations of his monarch, he was made bishop of Oviedo. Under Paul II he occupied the episcopal see of Zamora, next of Calahorra, and finally that of Palencia. He died Oct. 4, 1470. Most of his works are still in MS. in the Vatican Library; only three have been published, Speculum Vitæ Humanæ (Rome, 1468):—Historia Hispanica, giving the history from the earliest times to the year 1469 (ibid. 1470):—De Monarchia Orbis et de Origine et Differencia Principatus Imperialis et Regalis (ibid. 1521). See Biog. Générale, xliii, 249 sq.; Hamberger, Zurverlässige Nachrichten, iv, 800 sq.; Stansnik, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Arius (usually pronounced A'rius, but strictly Arius, Ἀρειος, meaning warrior), the famous heresiarch, was born about A.D. 256 in North Africa (Cyrenaica, Lybia, or Egypt), but nothing is known of his early life or circumstances. He is said to have been educated by Lucian, a presbyter in Antioch, and ordained deacon by Peter of Alexandria and elder by Achilles, Peter's successor, who placed him (A.D. 313) in charge of Baucalis, one of the great churches of Alexandria. On the death of this bishop he came near being elected to the see, such was his popularity, but was defeated by Alexander, through envy of whom (as Theodoret asserts, Hist. Eccles. i, 2) he began, about A.D. 318, a controversy respecting the nature of Christ, which ultimately involved the whole of Christendom. See ARIANISM. Arius had previously fallen under censure for connection with the schism of Meletius, but in some way had been restored to favor. He was now excommunicated for heresy by a council held at Alexandria in 321, and his views formally condemned by the Council of Nicea in 325. Constantine banished him to Illyria, but in 331 he recalled him through the intercession of his sister, Constantia, and Eusebius of Nicomedia. Athanasius, however, refused to recognise the heretic. In 336 Athanasius himself was banished to Treves, and Arius, after a personal interview with the emperor, was about to be received in full honor at Alexandria, when he suddenly died of a disease of the bowels, apparently a violent attack of dysentery, which his enemies attributed to the visitation of God and his friends to the effect of poison. His views are but the outcropping of the earlier errors of Cerinthus and the Gnostics, now put into a definite shape by the virtual denial of the divinity of our Lord. Arius was evidently a man of much acuteness, but little depth of intellect, and of a controversial turn. No charge of immorality was ever alleged against him. He is said to have been tall in person, easy and eloquent in manner, but austere in habits. The representation of him in the recent romance, entitled Arius the Lybian (New York, 1883), is lively but somewhat too favorable.

Armistead, Jesse H., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was educated at Hampden-Sidney College and the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia. He was licensed to preach in 1826, when he is thought to have been twenty-eight years of age. His first fields of labor were at Cartersville and the Brick Church at Fluviana; in 1828 he became pastor at Buckingham Courthouse, and in 1842 at Cumberland. He died at Woodville, Va., May 30, 1869. He was eminently useful, and his ministry was blessed with powerful revivals. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Arma, Hiram Phelps, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Windsor, Conn., June 1, 1799. He studied at Phillips Academy, Andover; graduated from Yale College in 1824, and from Yale Divinity School in 1828; was ordained June 30, 1830, pastor at Hebron, where he remained until Oct. 10, 1832; in February, 1833, became pastor at Walcotville; in 1836 of the First Church, Norwich, of which he remained pastor emeritus from the time of his resignation, Feb. 20, 1878. He died at Norwich, April 6, 1882. From 1866 he was a member of the corporation of Yale College. Besides several published sermons, he was the author of a pamphlet, Notes of the Congregational Churches in New London County, Conn., from 1836 to 1869. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 17.

Arnold of Bonneval, a Benedictine writer of the 12th century, was, in 1144, appointed abbot of Bonneval, in the diocese of Chartres. Like his predecessors he had to undergo many trials. His appeal to pope Lucius II was of no avail, and he went to Rome a second time, where he succeeded, in 1154, in receiving the permission of pope Hadrian IV to resign. He died at Marmoutiers, where he had retired. Arnold enjoyed the friendship of St. Bernard, who, on his death-bed, sent a letter full of expressions of love for Arnold. After St. Bernard's death the monks of Clairvaux requested Arnold to continue the life of the saint, which William of Thierry had commenced to write. Thus the Vita Secunda S. Bernardi (Migne, Pat. Lat. clxxxv, 287 sq.), which is erroneously ascribed to a Cistercian Arnold (comp. Oudin, Script. Eccles. ii, 1293), originated. Arnold also wrote a speculative treatise on the Hexameron:—Homilies on the 132d Psalm:—a book entitled De Donis Spiritus S.:—De Septem Verbis Domini in Cruce:—Meditationes, and De Cardinalibus Operibus Christi. It is remarkable that the latter work, which was dedicated to pope Hadrian IV, was regarded for a long time as a work of St. Cyprian, and was published by Pamelius in his edition of Cyprian (Amsterdam, 1668). Arnold's works are published by Migne, Pat. Lat. clxxxix (1513). See Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Arnold, Albert Nicholas, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cranston, R. I., Feb. 12, 1814. He graduated from Brown University in 1838, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1841; was ordained pastor at Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 14, 1841; in 1843 appointed a missionary to Greece, and stationed successively at Athens and in the island of Corfu. For eleven years he was engaged in his missionary work, and then returned to the United States. For two years he was a professor at Newton, for seven years pastor of the Church at Westborough, Mass., for five years professor in the Hamilton Theological Institution, and for four years professor in the Chicago Theological Seminary. In 1878 he returned to his early home, near Providence, R. I., where he died, Oct. 11, 1883. See Rhode Island Biog. Encyclop. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Arnold, John Motte, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Acra, Greene Co., N. Y., Oct. 15, 1824. He was converted early in life, and in 1848 joined the Michigan Conference, in which he was successively pastor at Port Huron, St. Clair, Flint, Corunna, presiding elder of Owasso District, pastor at Dexter, Woodward Avenue, in Detroit, and Walnut Street, in the same city. In 1863 he was placed in charge of the Detroit Methodist Book Depository, and later of the Michigan Christian Advocate. He died suddenly in Detroit, Dec. 5, 1884. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1885, p. 331.

Arnot, Robert, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1769; presented to the living of Ceres in 1770; elected presbytery clerk in 1777; resigned in 1792; was appointed professor of divinity in the new college of St. Andrews in 1799; minister of Kingsbarns in 1800, but opposed on account of already holding one important office; the General Assembly of 1800 approved of the double appointment. He died July 2, 1808, aged sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotice, ii, 444, 478.

Arnepeck, Veit, a Bavarian historian, was born about the year 1440 at Landshut. He studied at Amberg and Vienna, was for some time pastor of St. Martin's, in his native city, and died about the year 1505. He is the author of, Chronicon Austriacum to the year 1488 (reprinted by Pez, Script. rer. Austr. i, 1165):—Liber de Gestis Episcoporum Frisingensium. (reprinted by Deutinger, in Beiträge zur Geschichte des Erzbisthums München-Freisingen, vol. iii):—Chronicon Bavariae, 539-1495 (reprinted by Pez, Theaurus, iii, 2, 19 sq.). See Aretin, Literarisches Handbuch für die bayer'sche Geschichte, i, 154; Pertz, Archiv, i, 487; iv, 553; Deutsche Biographie, i, 596; Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Arras (in France), COUNCIL OF (Concilium Atrebatense, from the Atrebatii, who were the original inhabitants of that region), was held in the year 1025, chiefly upon the subject of the holy communion, against certain heretics who had come from Italy. Seventeen chapters were published.—Landon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Arthur, William, D.D., a Baptist minister, father of the recent president of the United States, was born in County Antrim, Ireland, being by descent Scotch-Irish, and was a graduate of Belfast College. In his eighteenth year he came to America, and subsequently entered the Baptist ministry. For about eight years he was pastor of the Calvary Church, New York city; afterwards of several churches in Vermont, and then of churches in the state of New York, among them those in Schenectady, Lansingburg, West Troy, and Newtonville. In the last-named place he died, in October, 1875. He is spoken of as "an author of extensive learning, and a minister of great usefulness and piety." See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1291. (J. C. S.)

Articles, Irish. The articles of religion of the Protestant Church of Ireland, numbering one hundred and four, were probably drawn up by archbishop Usber, and adopted by the Irish Episcopal Church in 1615. They are in striking agreement with the Westminster Confession, and may be found in Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, i, 662; comp. iii, 526. They were ignored, however, by the Irish convocation of 1635, and the thirty-nine articles of the English Church have ever since been the standard of the Irish Church also.

Aschbach, Joseph, a Roman Catholic historian of Germany, was born in 1801 at Höchst. He studied at Heidelberg, was in 1823 professor of the gymnasium in Frankfurt-on-the-Main, in 1842 professor of history at Bonn, and in 1854 at Vienna. He died, April 25, 1882. He is best known as the editor of Allgemeines Kirchenlexikon (1846-50, 4 vols.), to which he contributed largely. (B. P.)

Assamese Version. Assam is a British province, now forming part of the eastern frontier of India. The original language of the Assamese nation was the Ahom, a branch of the Siamese family of languages. When the people adopted the religion of Bengal in the middle of the 17th century, they also gradually habituated themselves to the use of its language, till at length the ancient Ahom tongue became extinct. During the lapse of years the language now spoken in Assam has contracted several peculiarities of its own, distinguishing it from the Bengalee, so that in printing the Scriptures it was found impracticable to use the Bengalee characters, and a new font of type had to be cast for that purpose. In 1815 the first two gospels were printed at Serampore, while the whole New Test. was finished at press in 1819, with the title The New Testament Translated from the Original into the Assam Language by the Serampore Missionaries. In 1822 the Pentateuch left the press, and the printing of the entire Old Test. was subsequently completed. The annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1863 stated that "preparations are being made for revision;" but how far the work has progressed we are unable to state. For the study of the language, see Brown, Grammatical Notices on the Assamese Language (Sibsagar, 1848). (B. P.)

Asseburg, ROSAMUNDE JULIANE VON, a German visionary, was born in November, 1672, at Eigenstedt, near Magdeburg. According to her own statement, she had visions at different times. When seven years of age she saw the Saviour, who told her of his sufferings and the future of his kingdom. The news concerning the visionary soon reached Magdeburg, and Pfeiffer, a young theologian of Lauenburg, sought the opportunity of becoming acquainted with Fräulein Asseburg. Pfeiffer wrote to Petersen concerning the visionary, and the latter, after some correspondence, in company with his wife paid a visit to her. As the result of his visit he published Species facti von dem adeligen Fräulein Rosamunda Juliana von Asseburg, with an appendix (1691). This was intended as an address to the most prominent theologians, in order to ascertain whether they accepted the revelations of Rosamunde as divine inspirations or not. Some assented, others violently opposed. Spener, whose opinion was asked, was too cautious to commit himself in any way. Meanwhile Fräulein Asseburg's name became known in France, England, and Denmark. The consistory, however, at the instance of the preachers of Lüneburg, who accused Petersen because he allowed the visionary to stay at his house, took the matter into consideration, and in accordance with a decision of the theological faculty at Helmstädt, deposed Petersen, in 1692, from his office, and banished him from the country. With this verdict, an opinion was publicly pronounced upon Fräulein Asseburg, who accompanied her friend first to Wolfenbüttel, then to Magdeburg. From Magdeburg she went to Berlin, where she lived in the house of a countess. In 1708 she saw once more her friend Petersen at Berlin, but after this she rapidly lost her prestige, and sank into oblivion. Not even the date of her death is known. The famous Leibnitz defended her moral and religious character, and as to her visions he compared her to Brigitta, Hildegard, and Melchthildis, who were regarded as saints among the more faithful of the Middle Ages. See Petersen, Autobiography (2d ed. 1719); Bertram, Reformations- und Kirchenhistorie Lüneburgs (Braunschweig, 60d.); Planck, Geschichte der protest. Theologie von der Konkordienformel an bis in die Mitte des 18. Jahrhunderts (Göttingen, 1831), p. 248 sq.; Barthold, Die Erweckten im protestantischen Deutschland, in Raumer's Histor. Taschenbuch (1852); Dibelius, in Herzog-Plitt's Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Assemani, is the Italian form of the name of a learned Maronite family; namely, GIUSEPPE SIMONE, the head of it, STEFANO EVODIO, and GIUSEPPE LUIGI (in Lat. Aloysius, born about 1710), two of his nephews, and his grandnephew SIMONE, who was born March 14, 1749, at Tripoli. He was educated in the Maronite College at Rome, and after completing his studies spent twelve years as a missionary in his native country, and then went to Padua as teacher of Oriental languages, where he died, April 7, 1821. He wrote a famous work On the Civilization, Literature, and Manners of the Arabs (Padua, 1787). See Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Athune, JAMES, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of a commissary of Orkney, was born at Kirkwall in 1613; took his degree of M.A. at the Edinburgh University in 1636; studied divinity at Oxford in 1637; was chaplain to the marquis of Hamilton in 1638; presented by the king to the living of Birsay in 1642; deposed in 1649, and for taking part with the marquis of Montrose in 1650 he was excommunicated. He fled to Holland in 1653, afterwards returned to Edinburgh, and lived privately till 1660. Parliament granted him £100 for his sufferings. On visiting London he was collated by Brian Walton, bishop of Winchester, to the living of Winniffrith; was appointed minister at Elgin in 1677; elected bishop of Moray the same year; consecrated in 1679; transferred to the see of Galloway in 1680, and died Nov. 15, 1687. He made a bold stand in Parliament, in 1686, against rescinding the penal statutes respecting popery. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 392-452, 778.

Atkinson, JOHN MAYO PLEASANT, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mansfield, Va., Jan. 10, 1817. He graduated from Hampden-Sidney College in 1835, and from the Virginia Union Theological Seminary; was ordained as an evangelist, and became a stated supply of the Church in Houston, Texas; was afterwards installed pastor at Warrenton and Salem, Va. In 1850 he was installed pastor of Bridge Street Church, Georgetown, D. C. In 1857 he was elected president of Hampden-Sidney College, and continued in that position until near the date of his death, Aug. 25, 1883. His life was full of good deeds, generous impulses, and Christian sacrifice. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Alumni, 1884, p. 26. (W. P. S.)

Attigny, COUNCIL OF (additional), held in May, 870, at which Charles the Bold brought his son Carloman to judgment, and Hincmar of Laon was compelled to submit to royal and ecclesiastical authority. See Landon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Atwater, LYMAN HOTCHKISS, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born at Cedar Hill (now in New Haven), Conn., Feb. 23, 1813. He graduated from Yale College in 1831, spent the ensuing year at the head of the classical department of Mount Hope Institute, Baltimore, Md., and then entered Yale Divinity School. At the end of the first year he was appointed tutor of mathematics in Yale College, where he remained two years, continuing his theological studies. He was licensed to preach in 1834, and became pastor of the First Church in Fairfield, Conn., where he remained twenty years. In 1854 he was appointed professor of intellectual and moral philosophy in Princeton College, which position he substantially held until the close of his life, Feb. 17, 1883. In 1861 he was appointed to the lectureship extraordinary in Princeton Theological Seminary, which office he held for five years. He was a member of the joint committee on the subject of the reunion of the old and new school branches of the Presbyterian Church. He was acting president of Princeton College from the retirement of Dr. McLean to the inauguration of Dr. McCosh. He was a voluminous writer, especially for the reviews, and became editor of the Princeton Review, which position he held until it was united with the Presbyterian Review. His contributions greatly exceeded those of any other man, beginning, in 1840, with his well-known essay on The Power of Contrary Choice. Many of his articles have been republished in this country and in Europe. He was held in the highest esteem by his colleagues, and was very popular with the students. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Alumni, 1883, p. 8; Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. s. v. (W. P. S.)

Auber, Miss HARRIET, an English poetess, was born in London, Jan. 20, 1778. She lived a long but retired life, and died at Hoddesdon, Hertshire, Jan. 20, 1862. Of her poetry only a single volume was published, entitled The Spirit of the Psalms (anonymously, 1829), containing some selected pieces, but much original matter of great value, which has been largely adopted in modern hymnals.

Auburn Declaration, a popular designation of the "Excising Act," passed in that city (N. Y.) against the churches in the western part of the state as non-Presbyterian, for failing to come up to the higher Calvinistic theology assumed in the document. It has been practically a dead-letter. For its text, see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, ii, 777.

Aufsess, JOSEF BERNHARD VON, dean of Bamberg and Würzburg, was born March 28, 1671, at Mengersdorf, in Franconia. He was baptized in the Lutheran Church, but through the influence of his uncle, Carl Sigismund, dean of Bamberg and Würzburg, he was brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. From 1688 to 1690 he was educated at the seminary in Würzburg, was in 1695 dean of Bamberg, and in 1714 he received besides the deanery of Würzburg. In 1723 he was also appointed provost of St. Stephen at Bamberg. He died April 2, 1738. He founded the famous seminary at Bamberg. See Archiv für Geschichte von Oberfranken, vol. i in 1838; vol. x in 1866; Reputation in Sachen der katholischen Barone von Aufsess (Bamberg, 1739); Gutenäcker, Gesch. des Freiherrn v. aufsessischen Studienseminars (ibid. 1866); Weber, Das Aufsessische Seminar (ibid. 1880); Wittmann, in *Wetzer u. Augustine, Sister. See LISAUUX.

Aurelian (fully LUCIUS DOMITIUS VALERIANUS AURELIANUS), Roman emperor, was born about A.D. 212, at Sirmium, in Pannonia, or, according to some, in Dacia or Mœsia, of very humble parentage. He gradually rose as a soldier under Claudius, whom he succeeded in August, 270, by the proclamation of the legions. He reigned until March, 275, with great military vigor, subduing Zenobia and the other Oriental powers. His civil administration, however, was harsh, and he is said to have been a persecutor of the Christians. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

Austin, THOMAS RALPH, LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in London, June 16, 1810. He graduated from Oxford, was ordained in England, and then came to America, but in 1833 returned and studied medicine. Once more coming to America, he settled in Indiana. During the late civil war he was commissioned as a surgeon in the army. At its close he preached at Terre Haute and Jeffersonville, and was fifteen years rector of St. James's Church, Vincennes, where he died, Feb. 6, 1884.

Autun Inscription. One of the most remarkable Christian epigraphs was found in 1839 in the cemetery St. Pierre l'Estrier, near Autun, where the Christians, during the persecutions, used to hold divine service. The plate, consisting of eight pieces, contains a metric inscription in Greek. It originally was attached to a wall or a tomb. According to Garucci (with additions and corrections placed within brackets) the inscription reads thus:

Ἰχθύς οὐρανίου θεῶν γένος, ἥτορ σμυνῷ
Χρῆς, λαβὼν πηγῇ ἄμβροτον ἐν βροτοῖς.
Θεοσεσίων ὑδάτι [ω]ν. τὴν σὴν, φίλε, Σάλας ψυχ[ῆ]ν Υδάτιν ὑνάοις πλουτοδότου σοφίης.

"The heavenly Ichthys' divine race, a pure heart Keep, having received among mortals the immortal fount
Of divine waters. Refresh, O friend, thy soul
With the ever-flowing water of riches-giving wisdom.
The honey-sweet ment of the saluts' Saviour receive,
Eat with hunger, the Ichthys holding in the hands.
With the Ichthys satisfy then, I long, my Lord Saviour.
Sweet rest to the mother, I entreat thee, light of the dead!

Aschandios, O dearest father to my heart,
With the best mother and my brethren,
In the peace of Ichthys remember thy Pectorios!"

It is not improbable that the first part, containing six verses, belongs to another author, as may be seen from the language of that part in opposition to that of the other. According to the character of the writing, the epigraph belongs to the 4th, if not to the 5th, century. For the meaning of Ichthys, see that article. The first two lines are a clear testimony of the divinity of Christ. Pohl suggests that the first six lines contain an ancient liturgical formula from the time of Irenæus, which perhaps was used at the celebration of the eucharist. The rest contains a prayer of Pectorios for the soul of his deceased mother, and a petition that she, in connection with the father and brethren, may remember the living son. See Le Blant, *Inscr. Avancinos, NICHOLAS, a Jesuit, was born at Tyrol in 1612. At the age of fifteen he joined the order at Graz. For about ten years he lectured on ethics and scholastic theology at Vienna, was then appointed rector of the colleges of Passau, Vienna, and Graz, and in 1676 he was made provincial of the order in Austria and visitor of Bohemia. He died Dec. 6, 1686. His main work is Vita et Doctrina Jesu Christi ex Quatuor Evangelistis Collecta (Vienna, 1665), which has repeatedly been reprinted (best edition by Westhoff, 1844), and translated into German by Feichtenleine (Augsburg, 1820), Wittmann (ibid. 1822; 2d ed. 1834), by a Catholic priest (Munich, 1850; 3d ed. 1860), by Zollner (Regensburg, 1867), Dötsch (ibid. 1871), Ecker (Freiburg, 1877), also into Polish. Aveling, THOMAS WILLIAM BAXTER, D.D., an English Dissenting minister, was born at Castletown, Isle of Man, May 11, 1815. He was educated by a kind guardian, joined the Independent Church at Wisbeck when sixteen years of age, at nineteen began to preach in the neighborhood, graduated from Highbury College in 1838, entered upon his ministry the same year at Kingsland, near London, and continued there until his death, July 3, 1884. Dr. Aveling was for many years the honorable secretary of the Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reedham, travelled in Italy, Egypt, and Syria, visited America more than once, was chairman of the Congregational Board in 1873, and in 1874 of the Congregational Union. He published, Naaman: — The New Year's Party: — The Irish Scholar: — Voices on Many Waters: — Memorials of the Clayton Family: — besides addresses and poems, and for five years edited the Jewish Herald. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1885, p. 176.

Avery, BENJAMIN, LL.D., an English Presbyterian, and an accomplished scholar, was educated for the ministry in England and Holland. He was chosen assistant pastor at the Bartholomew Close Church, under Thomas Freke, afterwards under John Munckley. He died at an advanced age, July 23, 1764. In 1713 he published a Sermon on Mic. vi, 5, preached on Nov. 4 of that year. He took part in the Dimenting Synod at Salter's Hall in 1719, and took sides with the non-subscribing ministers. He was a warm friend to religious liberty and to the advancement of learning. He resigned the ministry in 1720, was chosen secretary of deputies from the three denominations in 1732, began to practice medicine, was one of the physicians of Guy's Hospital, and one of the writers in the Occasional Paper published in 1716. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 381-383.

Ayrault, WALTER, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Geneva, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1822. He graduated from Hobart College in 1840, was ordained deacon in 1846, and presbyter in 1847; settled at Hagerstown, Md., in 1853; at Canandaigua, N. Y., in 1856; at Genesee in 1862, at Oxford in 1865, and in 1875 became chaplain in Hobart College, where he died, Oct. 19, 1882.

Azaria, ARISTACKS, an Armenian Catholic general-abbot and archbishop, was born at Constantinople, July 18, 1782. At the age of fifteen he went to Rome to be educated there at the College of the Propaganda. When the French entered Rome, in 1798, he had to leave the city. At Venice and Trieste he was kindly received by the Mechitarists, whom he joined March 25, 1801, exchanging his name Joseph for Aristacks. In 1802 he made his vows, and in 1803 he received holy orders. The peace of Presburg connected Trieste with the kingdom of Illyria, and the new government persecuted the Mechitarists as Austrian subjects and confiscated their property. At last, in 1810, the congregation was permitted to settle in Vienna with the injunction to take care entirely of itself. In 1816 Azaria was made vartabed, i. e. doctor, by the general-abbot Adeodat. He then went to Rome, and from thence to Constantinople, where he labored in behalf of his Church. In 1821 he returned home again. In 1822 he went again to Rome, was appointed assistant to Adeodat, and succeeded him after his death, in 1825, as general-vicar and superior, and in 1826 as general-abbot. In 1827 Leo XII appointed him archbishop of Caesarea. Under his guidance his congregation was soon in a flourishing state. He founded schools and propagated Armenian literature, to which he also contributed. He died at Vienna, May 6, 1854. See Hurter, Aus dem Leben des hochw. Herrn Aristakes Azaria (Vienna, 1855); Brunner, Wiener Kirchenzeitung, 1855, No. 91; Hergenroether, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Aspilcueta, MARTIN, a canonist of the 16th century, was born Dec. 13, 1498. He studied at Alcalá and Toulouse, and commenced his lectures in 1520 at Cahors. For fourteen years he lectured at Salamanca with such success that king John III de Portugal called him, in 1544, to the newly founded university at Coimbra, where he remained sixteen years. He defended the Toledan archbishop Bartholomeo de Carranga-Miranda before the tribunal of the inquisition at Valladolid, and afterwards at Rome, in 1557, where he also died, June 21, 1586. His Consilia et Responsa were published (Lugd. 1594, 2 vols.); his other works (ibid. 1595, 3 vols.). See Scherer, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

B.

Bachmann, PAUL, a German controversialist, was born at Chemnitz about 1466. He joined the Cistercians, and was abbot of Altenzelle from 1522 to 1585. In connection with Cochläus, Emaer, Peter Forst, and Augustin von Alvelde, he opposed the Lutheran Reformation in Saxony. He tried to reform monastic life, but could not prevent many of his co-religionists from going over to the Church of the Reformation. He wrote against Luther, but was answered in a satire, written after the manner of the Epistol. Obscur. Virorum, entitled Mors et Sepultura Doctrinae Lutheranae, reprinted in Strobel, Opuscula Quaedam Satirica et Ludica Tempore Reform. Scripta (1784), Fasc. i, 49 sq. See Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Bachus, JOHN CHURCH, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wetherfield, Conn., Sept. 5, 1810. He studied at Albany Academy, spent two years at Columbia College, and graduated from Yale College in 1830; studied law one year, and theology one year at New Haven, joining the Congregational Church there in the meantime; spent part of a year at Andover Theological Seminary; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835; was licensed to preach the same year, and ordained the next, serving meanwhile as assistant secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions. On Sept. 16, 1836, he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Baltimore, Md., and remained there until his death, April 9, 1884, having been pastor emeritus from October, 1875. His talents were of a high order, and few had greater influence in the Church. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1885, p. 21.

Bacon (de Bacocone, or Bachone), FRANCISCO, a Spanish theologian, was born at Gerona, or at Peralda, in Catalonia. He joined the Carmelites of his native country, studied at Paris, where he also lectured on theology. He is known by the name of doctor sublimis. He also became provincial of his order in Catalonia, and died at the monastery of Camprodon, Aug. 8, 1872. He wrote, Commentarius super Sentent. I, 4:—Repertorium Prædicatorum. See Schmidt, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Baird, GEORGE, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Inveravon in 1762; licensed to preach in 1786; presented to the living of Dunkeld in 1787, and took his M.A. degree the same year; was transferred to the New Greyfriars' Church, Edinburgh, in 1792; transferred to the New North Church in 1798; held in conjunction the principalship of the university in 1799; was transferred to the High Church in 1801, and died Jan. 14, 1840. At his suggestion the General Assembly, in 1824, formed a committee for extending education and religious instruction, especially in the Highlands and islands of Scotland. He devoted much time and money to this work, and travelled seven thousand miles in furtherance of the benevolent scheme. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 30, 69, 71; ii, 785, 786.

Baker, Sir Henry Williams, an English clergyman and poet, was born in London, May 21, 1821, being the son of a baronet. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1844; was ordained deacon the same year, presbyter in 1846, became vicar of Monkland, Herefordshire, in 1851, and died there, Feb. 11, 1877. Besides writing some essays, he was one of the editors of Hymns Ancient and Modern (Lond. 1861, 1868, 1874), which contains several of his own composition.

Baker, William Mumford, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington, D. C., June 5, 1825. He joined the Church at sixteen, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1846, and after studying theology with his father one year, and in Princeton Seminary another year, he was licensed to preach in 1848; became stated supply at Batesville, Ark., in 1849; evangelist at Little Rock in 1850; served as pastor at Austin, Tex., for fifteen years, with some interruption during the war; at Zanesville, O., from 1866 to 1872, afterwards in Boston, Mass., and finally in Philadelphia, Pa., from November, 1881, to February, 1883. He died at South Boston, Mass., Aug. 20 of the last-named year. Dr. Baker was well known by his numerous publications, among which were, Inward, a Chronicle of Secession:—The New Timothy:—The Virginians in Texas:—His Majesty Myself. His last pulpit labors were in the Presbyterian Church, South Boston. Although, in addition to his numerous books, he contributed largely to journals and magazines, he always made his literary labors incidental and subordinate to his pastoral duties. He was a man of brilliant mind and untiring energy. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1884, p. 35.

Ballandre, PIERRE SIMON, a French mystical philosopher, was born at Lyons, Aug. 4, 1776; became a printer and proprietor of the Bulletin, in that city, and died in Paris, Aug. 7, 1847. He wrote a number of religious and other works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Bambridge, CHRISTOPHER. See BAINBRIDGE.

Bannister, HENRY, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister and educator, was born at Conway, Mass., Oct. 5, 1812. He united with the Church at the age of sixteen, studied at Cazenovia Seminary, N. Y., graduated from Wesleyan University, Conn., in 1836, taught one year at Lowville, N. Y., studied two years at Auburn Theological Seminary, teaching one year meanwhile at Cazenovia; in 1840 became principal of Fairfield Academy; in 1843 of Cazenovia Seminary; in 1856 professor of exegetical theology at Garret Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill., and died there, April 15, 1883. In 1869 he took a trip abroad. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1864, 1868, and 1872. He was licensed to preach in 1838, in 1842 joined the Oneida Conference, and in 1857 was transferred to the Wisconsin Conference. He was an able divine, a fine scholar, and an excellent teacher. Besides numerous contributions to the periodical press, he prepared the part on Isaiah for Whedon's Commentary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 322; Alumni Record of West. Univ. 1882, p. 10, 544.

Baptism, HERETICAL, i. e. when administered by heretics, has been generally held, at least in the Roman Church, ever since the Donatist schism, to be valid; so likewise if performed by women, heathen, or even in sport, but not if self-administered (Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.). See BAPTISM, LAY.

Bär (Lat. Berus, i. q. Bacher), LUDWIG, a Swiss humanist and theologian, was born at Basle towards the end of the 15th century. He studied at his native place and at Paris. In the latter city he was promoted to the doctorate of theology. In 1513 he was appointed professor of theology at his native place, and soon attracted many students. At the beginning of the Reformation, he sided, in connection with Erasmus, with that movement. But when the intentions of the leaders became more and more known, he stood up for his Church, and, as one of the leaders of the theological faculty, opposed (Ecolampadius and PELLICAN. When, however, in 1529 the evangelical party had gained the victory and the Church of Rome was declared to be abolished at Basle, Bär, in connection with Erasmus, Glarean, and other professors and canons, left Basle and settled at Breisgau. He died at the last-named place, April 14, 1554. He wrote, De Christiana ad Mortem Præparatione Liber:—Paulinorum Expositio:—Quæstio, an Tempore Pestis Fugere Liceat. See Herzog, Athenæ Rauricæ (Basle, 1778); Vischer, Geschichte der Universität Basel von der Gründung 1460 bis zur Reformation 1529 (ibid. 1860); Fiala, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Barbier, JOSUÉ, a French pervert, was born at Die about 1578. He was pastor of the Protestant congregations at Quint, St. Marcellin, and Livron (1603-1615), but was bribed by the bishop of Valence to turn Romanist, and after entering the royal service as advocate at Grenoble, wrote several abusive books against his former co-religionists, for which see Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Barrows, COMFORT E., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Attleborough, Mass., Dec. 11, 1831. He graduated from Brown University in 1858, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1861; was ordained Dec. 25 of the same year pastor at South Danvers (now Peabody), Mass., and in 1865 became pastor of the First Church at Newport, R. I. He died there, Dec. 26, 1883. Besides articles for reviews and papers, Dr. Barrows published several sermons and addresses. See R. I. Biog. Encyclop. p. 531. (J. C. S.)

Barry, JOHN, a Roman Catholic prelate, was made administrator of the diocese of Savannah, and on Aug. 2, 1857, consecrated bishop. Florida was at this time made a vicariate, and the diocese of Savannah embraced only Georgia. He labored earnestly and zealously in his capacity of bishop, as he had in that of a priest, but his health was broken down. Going to Europe to recruit, he was prostrated in Paris, and died there, Nov. 19, 1859, aged fifty. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Catholic Church in the U. S. p. 533.

Basil of JERUSALEM, a Jacobite patriarch in the 9th century, is the author of Epistola Synodica de SS. Imaginibus ad Theophilum. Ed. Gr. Lat. Combesii Manipulus Orig. Rerumque Constantinopolitan (Paris, 1664), an epistle addressed to the emperor Theophilus, on account of his severe edict against the image-worshippers. See Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, ii, 363; Peters, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bastida, FERNANDO, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Salamanca in 1572. He joined his order in 1588, and went to Rome as procurator of Molina. Here he defended the doctrine of predestination as held by his order. Having returned to Spain, he was obliged to leave his order on account of some defect which debarred a candidate from becoming a member, but which was not known at the time of his entrance. Up to his death he was canon and professor primarius at the University of Valladolid. See Meyer, Historia Congreg. de Auxiliis; Schneemann, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bathurst, WILLIAM HILEY, an English clergyman and poet, was born near Bristol, Aug. 28, 1796. He graduated from Christ Church College, Oxford; was ordained in 1819; in 1820 became rector of Barwick-in-Elmet, Yorkshire, resigned in 1852, and in 1863 retired to his estate at Sydney Park, Gloucestershire, where he died in 1877. Besides An Essay on Human Knowledge (1827) and a Translation of Virgil's Georgics (1849), he published two volumes of poems, entitled respectively Psalms and Hymns for Public and Private Use (Lond. 1831, 1842) and Metrical Thoughts in Verse (1849), from the former of which several pieces have been quite popular, especially the hymns beginning "Oh for a faith that will not shrink," and "Oh for that flame of living fire."

Bayle, MARC ANTOINE, a French religious author, was born at Marseilles in 1825, and died in 1877. He wrote, Vie de Saint Vincent Ferrier (Marseilles, 1856):—Vie de Saint Philippe de Neri (ibid. 1859):—Musillon (1867):—Oraison Funèbre du R. P. Lacordaire (1862):—Homilies sur les Évangiles (Tournay, 1865, 2 vols.). He also translated Döllinger's work, Christenthum und Kirche in der Zeit der Grundlegung, and took an active part in the publication of the Conseiller Catholique and L'Ami de la Religion. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Bayley, JAMES ROOSEVELT, D.D., a distinguished Roman Catholic prelate, was born in New York city, Aug. 23, 1814. He graduated from Washington (now Trinity) College, Hartford, Conn., in 1835, and studied theology under Dr. Samuel Jarvis at Middletown; was ordained a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church; preached at Harlem, N. Y., and afterwards at Hagerstown, Md. He went to Rome, entered the Roman Catholic Church in 1842, studied theology in the Sulpician Seminary at Paris, and was raised to the priesthood in New York by archbishop Hughes, March 2, 1844. He was engaged thereafter in teaching and pastoral duties in New York city, and in filling the position of secretary to archbishop Hughes. On Oct. 30, 1853, he was consecrated first bishop of Newark, N. J., and on Oct. 12, 1872, he received the pallium of the archbishopric of Baltimore. He took part in the three provincial councils of New York, in the second plenary council of Baltimore, and in the œcumenical council of the Vatican. He also visited Rome in 1862 for the canonization of the Japanese martyrs, and in 1867 for the centenary of the apostles. In 1877 he went to Europe for the Vichy waters, but, receiving no benefit, returned to America, and got as far as Newark, where he died, Oct. 3, 1877. Archbishop Bayley wrote, Sketch of the History of the Catholic Church on the Island of New York (N. Y. 1853; new ed. 1869):—Memoirs of Simon G. Brute, First Bishop of Vincennes (1860):—Pastorals for the People. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1878, p. 38.

Beatty, Charles Clinton, D.D., LL.D., a venerable Presbyterian minister, was born near Princeton, N. J., Jan. 4, 1800. He joined the Church there in 1817, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1818, and from the Theological Seminary at the same place in 1822. After serving as an evangelist in Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky, he was ordained pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Steubenville, O., in 1823. In 1829 he founded a female seminary in that town, to which he devoted his chief attention thereafter until 1879. In 1837 he resigned his position as pastor, but continued to act as stated supply in adjacent churches for several years thereafter. He died at Steubenville, Oct. 30, 1882. He possessed rare executive ability, and was enabled to amass a large fortune, of which he gave liberally to various causes of benevolence. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 10.

Beatty, William Trimble, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born of Scotch-Irish parentage, in Fairfield County, O., June 1, 1833. He joined the Church at the age of seventeen, graduated from Miami University in 1857, spent one year at the Danville Seminary, Ky., and finished his theological studies at the Western Seminary, Alleghany City, Pa. He was licensed to preach in 1859, and ordained pastor at Greencastle in 1861. Two years afterwards he became pastor at New Brunswick, N. J., and in 1867 at Shady Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., where he continued until 1880, and then resigned on account of ill-health. He died at Minneapolis, Minn., April 10, 1882. He was an excellent preacher, and active as secretary of his presbytery and of several literary institutions. See Nevin, Presb. Encyclop. s. v.

Bebenburg, LUDOLF VON, a German prelate, who died in 1363, descended from a noble family in Franconia. He studied canon law at Bologna. In the controversy between Ludwig the Bavarian and the popes John XXII, Benedict XII, and Clement VI, Bebenburg sided with the emperor. In 1338 he was canon of Mayence, Würzburg, and Bamberg, and from 1352 to 1363 bishop of the latter place. He wrote, De Zelo Religionis Antiquorum Principum Germanorum (Basle, 1497; reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, xv, Cologne, 1622):—Tractatus de Juribus Regni et Imperii Romanorum (Strasbourg, 1508, etc.):—Dictamen Rhymaticum Querulosum de Moderni Cursibus et Defectibus Regni ac Imperii Romani (ed. by Peter, Würzburg, 1841, and by Böhmer, Geschichtsquellen des 14. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart, 1843, 497 sq.). See Schreiber, Die politischen und religiösen Ideen unter Ludwig des Bayern (Munich, 1858); Riezler, Die litterarischen Widersacher der Päpste zur Zeit Ludwig des Bayern (Leipzig, 1874); Mejer, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. (2d. ed.), s. v.; Wittmann, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bec, ABBEY OF, a celebrated French Benedictine monastery, belonging to the congregation of St. Maur, situated at the confluence of the Bec and the Rille, nine leagues from Rouen, was founded about 1034, by St. Herluin, its first abbot, near the present site. It became famous as a seat of learning under Lanfranc, then prior, afterwards archbishop, of Canterbury, and was eventually exempted from episcopal jurisdiction, but is now in ruins. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Beccarelli, GIUSEPPE, a Milanese spiritualist, a follower of Molinos (q. v.), and an active promoter of the education of youth, was seized by the Inquisition in 1708, and after recantation in 1710, at Venice, was condemned to the galleys.

Beckedorff, GEORG PHILIPP LUDOLF VON, a pedagogue, statesman, and author, of Germany, was born April 14, 1778, at Hanover. At first he studied theology at Jena, and afterwards medicine at Göttingen, where he was also promoted in 1799 as M.D. In 1810 he accepted a call as tutor of the electoral prince of Hesse, and in 1811 he went to Ballenstedt as tutor of the prince of Anhalt-Bernburg. When, in 1818, the union between the Reformed and Lutheran Church was decreed, his mind was greatly occupied with questions concerning the Church, and at that time he already regarded the Catholic Church as the historical development of the Apostolic Church. To this time belongs his Zur Kircheneinigung (Halle, 1814), and Briefwechsel zwischen zwei Geistlichen bei Gelegenheit der Versuche zur Kircheneinigung (Leipzig, 1818). In 1819 he was called into the Prussian ministry for worship and instruction, but his joining the Church of Rome, in 1827, resulted in his discharge from office. When Frederick William IV ascended the throne in 1840, he did justice to Beckedorff by appointing him to some high position, on which occasion he published his An gottesfürchtige protestantische Christen. Worte den Friedens und der Wiederveröhnung (Weissenburg, 1840). Besides, he wrote, Das Verhältnis von Haus und Staat und Kirche zu einander, etc. (Berlin, 1849):—Offenbarung und Vernunft (Ratisbon, 1858). He also founded some charitable institutions, and died Feb. 27, 1858, at Grünhof, in Pomerania. See Rosenthal, Convertitenbilder, i, 466-475; Clarus, Simon oder Heimkehr und Wanderungen eines christlichen Forschers (Schaffhausen, 1862), ii, 371-380; Zuchold, *Bibl. Beckmann, OTTO, canon and "professor eloquentiæ" at Wittenberg, was a friend of Luther and Melancthon, although he did not join them in the work of Reformation. "Alitur nescio quid monstri," he writes to Spalatin, Feb. 24, 1519, speaking at the same time of the exciting sermon in which Luther had openly attacked the power of the pope (Löcher, Vollständige Reform. Acta (Leipzig, 1729), iii, 90 sq. In 1525 he was pastor at Warburg, his native place, where he wrote his Preceptio Dominica contra Inopios et Seditiosos Lutheranorum Errores (Cologne, 1528):—Comment. super Orationem Dominicam et Symbolum Apostolorum (ibid. eod.). In the year 1528 he held an open colloquy with a certain Hecker, at Münster, defending the primacy of the pope. He died provost of St. Egidius, at Münster. See Driver, *Bibl. Belfast Society is noted in the history of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland for its having intensely agitated the Church for many years upon the question of subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith. It had its origin with Rev. John Abernethy, jr., who became minister at Antrim in 1703. He was a diligent student, and soon drew around him as associates Rev. William Taylor, of Randalstown, Rev. Alexander Brown, of Donegore, and Rev. James Kirkpatrick, of Templepatrick—all young men of much promise. They were soon joined by Rev. Thomas Orr, of Comber, Rev. Alexander Colville, of Dromore, licentiates and theological students, and a few laymen of Belfast. The object of the organization was theological improvement. They first gave their organization the name of Belfast Society in 1705. "At their meetings, generally held monthly, each member preached in succession; chapters out of the Old and New Testaments, previously agreed upon, were read in the original languages, and their difficulties discussed; reviews and analyses of books read by the members since the previous meeting were given; and dissertations were read on important theological topics, specially on those questions which were then attracting the attention of divines elsewhere, and becoming the subjects of controversy." Their sermons treated of "the nature and Scriptural terms of the unity of the Christian Church, the nature and mischief of schism, the rights of conscience and of private judgment, the sole dominion of Christ in his own kingdom, the nature, power, and effects of excommunication, and other subjects of that kind." Through Mr. Abernethy the latitudinarian notions on the inferiority of dogmatic belief and the nature of religious liberty, which had obtained currency on the Continent and in England, were introduced into the Belfast Society, and thus into Ireland. This society held and diligently promulgated their ideas, principal of which are the following: error is innocent when not wilful; that every man's persuasion of what is true and right is the sole rule of his faith and conduct; "that the Church has no right to require candidates for the ministry to subscribe to a confession of faith prepared by any man or body of men, and that such a required subscription is a violation of the right of private judgment, and inconsistent with Christian liberty and true Protestantism." There is much evidence which leads one to believe that this society was guilty of the heresy of Arianism; such was the prevalent impression at that time. Such views, held by some of the most learned of the Church, soon caused widespread alarm. The question of subscription became the topic of the day. The controversy was taken to the press, and over fifty pamphlets were published by the members of the society and their opponents. In 1721 the General Synod met at Belfast, when the orthodox Calvinists attempted to enforce subscription. A law to that effect was passed by the synod, to which all conformed except the members of the Belfast Society; after which time the Belfast Society was principally known by the appellation of non-subscribers. The synod, however, did not now expel, but passed pacific resolutions. The controversy still continued with unabated fury. The non-subscribers formed a presbytery (the Presbytery of Antrim). The subscribers refused communion with the non-subscribers. Finally, in 1726, the synod expelled the non-subscribers, some of whom established independent churches, others lost their following, and ceased from the ministry; thus a most unfortunate quarrel was settled, and the Belfast Society passed out of existence. In August, 1727, the Belfast Society published a very valuable work; though partial and one-sided, it contains an elaborate defence of their peculiar views. It contains compilations from original documents, and reports of the synod's debates, which are nowhere else preserved: A Narrative of the Proceedings of Seven General Synods of the Northern Presbyterians in Ireland, with Relation to their Differences in Judgment and Practice, from the Year 1720 to 1726, in which they Issued in a Synodical Breach. See Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Bell, George, a Calvinistic Methodist, who was the first of John Wesley's followers to make a division in the Methodist societies, was a local preacher in Southwark, a man of heated imagination, who said he possessed a miraculous discernment of spirits. His doctrinal sentiments were high Antinomianism, mixed with enthusiasm. He first separated from the Foundry Society, with the Rev. Thomas Maxfield, in February, 1763, and was a member of his church in Princes Street, Moorfields, but soon afterwards set up as preacher himself, and took one of Mr. Wesley's preaching places, situated in Baker's Court, near Gray's Inn Lane, London. There he had many followers, and preached there many years. Bell's fanaticism obliged Mr. Wesley to expel him from the Foundry Society. He afterwards prophesied the destruction of the world on a certain day, against which Mr. Wesley preached, as great fear was created by the prophecy. The failure did not disconcert Bell, who continued his wild enthusiasm. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 418-419.

Bell, I. G., a pioneer Presbyterian minister, was born in Augusta County, Va., in 1788. He served in the war of 1812, and entered the ministry in 1827 in Tennessee, but afterwards devoted himself to missionary work in the West, especially in Iowa, where he raised up numerous churches. He died May 20, 1868. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Benkert, Franz Georg, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Nordheim, Sept. 25, 1790, studied at Würzburg, and received holy orders in 1816. In 1823 he took the degree as doctor of theology by presenting his dissertation, De Duplici Missa Catechumenorum et Fidelium. In 1832 he was appointed regent of the clerical seminary, and in 1838 succeeded the famous Möhler as cathedral-dean of Würzburg. He died May 20, 1859. In 1822 he commenced the publication of the Religionsfreund, a periodical for systematic theology, literature, and contemporaneous history. For practical theology he founded Athanasia in 1827. In 1840 he resigned his connection with these two periodicals to devote himself entirely to the history of Franconia, and published as the result of his studies several interesting treatises in the Archiv des historischen Vereins von Unterfranken. See Stamminger, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bennie, ARCHIBALD, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born Nov. 1, 1797. He graduated from the Glasgow University, where he obtained three prizes; was licensed to preach in 1820, and appointed assistant and successor at the Free Chapel of Ease, Glasgow, in 1823; promoted to the third charge at Stirling in 1824; presented to the living at Lady Yester's Chapel, Edinburgh, in 1835; appointed a chaplain in ordinary to the queen of England and a dean of the Chapel Royal in 1841, and died at Dunoon, Sept. 21, 1846. He published five sermons from 1825 to 1839:—A Letter to Patrick Arkley, Advocate, Edinburgh (1846):—Discourses, with a Memoir (1847); and he edited, for two years (1836-37), The Edinburgh Christian Instructor. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 64; ii, 34.

Bentivoglio, CORNELIO, an Italian prelate, was born at Ferrara in 1668. Pope Clement XI made him chaplain, afterwards titular archbishop of Carthage, and legate at the French court. His zeal against the Jansenists gained for him the favor of Louis XIV, but when the latter died he was recalled. In 1719 he was made cardinal, and in 1720 legatus a latere for Ravenna and the Romagna. Under Benedict XIII he was appointed by the king of Spain, in 1726, as his representative at the papal curia. He died in 1782. See Kaulen, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Beresford, MARCUS GERVAIS, D.D., an Irish Protestant prelate, was born in 1801. He was educated at Richmond School, Yorkshire, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was made bachelor of arts in 1824; appointed rector of Kildallen in 1825, afterwards vicar of Drung and Lara, also vicar-general of Kilmore, and archdeacon of Armagh. In 1854 he was consecrated bishop of Kilmore, Elpin, and Ardlagh, and in 1863 translated to the see of Armagh, and made primate of Ireland. He died Dec. 26, 1885.

Bernard de Botono. See BERNARD OF BOLOGNA (1).

Bernard of Constance, who died March 15, 1088, was teacher at the cathedral-school of Constance. He wrote De Damnatione Schismaticorum. See Usseermann, Prodrom, ii, 188 sq.; Giesebrecht, Geschichte der deutschen Kaiserzeit (4th ed.), iii, 1034 sq.; Lutolf, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bernard of Pavia, a canonist, and bishop of Pavia about 1198, is the author of Breviarium Extravagantium, i. e. Decretorum et Canonum Extra Decretorum Corpus Vagantium. (B. P.)

Bernard of Pomerania was a Spanish monk, whom pope Paschal II had appointed bishop of that country. In 1122 he undertook, accompanied by his chaplain and an interpreter, to preach the gospel to the Pomeranians. But the Pomeranians would not recognise him because he was dressed like a hermit. When, however, Bernard was about to cut down the jule-tree, the tutelary deity of the inhabitants of the city of Julin, the Pomeranians drove him out of their country. In company with his chaplain and interpreter, Bernard retired to Bamberg and induced bishop Otto to undertake the conversion of the Pomeranians, but in a more pompous manner. See Andreæ, Abbat. S. Michael prope Bamberg, Vita S. Ottonis, Episc. Bamberg, in Ludwig, Scriptor. Rerum Episc. Bamberg, i, 464; Alzog, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bernard of Waging, a Benedictine, was born about 1400, studied at Salzburg and Vienna, and joined the Benedictines at Tegernsee in 1446. On account of his piety and learning he was appointed prior of the convent at Tegernsee; hence he is generally called prior Tegernseensis. He now labored for the benefit of his monastery, and for his clergy he wrote, Confessionale:—Speculum Mortis:—Consolatorium Tribunalium:—Remediarium Pusillanimitatis:—De Cogno-scendo Deum:—De Sentimentis Spiritualibus, etc. For the monks at Wiblingen he wrote, in 1456, Contra Esam Carnium; for those at St. Ulrich, in Augsburg, De Materia Eucharistica and Contra Vitium Propriet. In 1461 he assisted bishop John of Aich in the reformation of the Pergen monastery, and prepared for the clergy, Preparat. ad Missam; Formula Communis; and Speculum Pastorum. With the cardinal Nicolaus of Cusa, with whom he was intimately connected, he also assisted in reforming the monasteries at Georgenberg and Sonnenburg in 1554, and whose work, De Docta Ignorantia, he defended against the attacks of the Carthusian prior, Vincent of Axbach. He died Aug. 2, 1472. See Pez, Bibl. Ascet. tom. vii, præf. n. 10; Braunmüller, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Beyer, HARTMANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Sept. 30,

1516. He studied at Wittenberg under Luther and Melancthon. In 1545 he was called to his native place as preacher. At that time Calvinism flourished at Frankfort, and yet Beyer at last succeeded in founding a Lutheran Church in 1554. Not only against the Calvinists, but also against the Roman Catholics, Beyer showed his dislike. His sermons, comprising forty-nine volumes, are still preserved in the city library at Frankfort. He died Aug. 11, 1577. See Steis, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Bialobrzeński, MARTIN, bishop of Kamieniec, was born in 1522, and died in 1586 at his episcopal see, which he had occupied since 1577. He was one of the most talented pulpit orators and writers of Poland. The rights of his Church he defended everywhere, especially against heretics. Thus he opposed, in behalf of his chapter, at the Diet of Proszowice, the confederation of 1575 de pace inter dissidentes in religione tenenda, and pointed out its danger for Church and State. Against "the errors of his time" he wrote a catechism (Cracow, 1567). He also wrote against the Socinians Orthodoxa Confessio de Uno Deo (ibid. 1579), and likewise published Postilla Orthodoxa (ibid. 1581, 1838). See Hutowski, Homiletyka, p. 395 sq.; Letowski, Katalog Biskupow, etc., ii, 23; Mecherzynski, Hist. Wymowy, p. 82; Nowodworski, Encyclop. Kościelna, s. v.; Lüdike, in Wetzler u. Bickersteth, ROBERT, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Acton, Suffolk, Aug. 24, 1816. He graduated from Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1841; became curate of Sapcote the same year; of St. Giles's, Reading, in 1843; at the parish church of Clapham in 1845; incumbent of St. John's, in the same place, the same year; rector of St. Giles-in-the-Fields in 1851, canon residentiary of Salisbury in 1854, and bishop of Ripon in 1856, in which office he died, April 15, 1884. He published, Bible Landmarks (1850):—Lent Lectures (1851), besides sermons and charges.

Bigelow, Andrew, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Boylston, Mass., Dec. 13, 1809. He graduated from Amherst College in 1838; studied theology with his half-brother, Rev. Jonathan Bigelow, of Rochester; was ordained pastor at South Dartmouth, Mass., in 1841; in 1847 became pastor at West Needham (now Wellesley); in 1853 at Westhampton; in 1855 at Medfield; in 1866 acting-pastor at Boylston; in 1874 at Southboro'; after 1875 he was without charge, and died Sept. 23, 1882. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 19.

Bigelow, John F., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Paxton, Mass., April 25, 1818. He studied two years at Paxton University, and graduated from Columbia College, N. Y.; studied theology first in New York, and completed his education in Berlin, Germany. Soon after his return he became pastor at Bristol, R. I.; subsequently at Middleborough, Mass.; Keesville, N. Y.; and established a church at St. Albans, Vt. In 1872 he became associated with his brother in conducting the Athenæum Seminary, Brooklyn, N. Y. He died June 20, 1884. Dr. Bigelow was an eloquent preacher, and a man of scholarly attainments. See The Christian at Work, June 26, 1884. (J. C. S.)

Billick, EBERHARD, one of the most famous Roman Catholic theologians of the 16th century, was born at Bilk, near Düsseldorf, and died in the year 1557. He belonged to the Carmelite order, and was professor at Cologne. When it was intended to call Butzer to Cologne, he opposed this movement by publishing his Judicium Deputatorum Universitatis et Secundarii Cleri Coloniensis (1543). In 1545 he published another polemical work against Protestantism, which was propagated at Cologne, under the title, Judicii Universitatis et Cleri Coloniensis Adversus Calumnias Philippi Melancthonis, Martini Bucerii, etc. In 1546 he was present at the Ratisbon colloquy. Pope Paul IV honored him with the title of bishop of Cyrene. See Hartzheim, BIRD, MILTON, D.D., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born Oct. 23, 1807, in Barren County, Ky. In 1830 he was ordained an evangelist, and the next year visited Western Pennsylvania as a missionary; for some time was pastor of the Waynesburg congregation, and for several years at Pleasant Hill, Washington Co. In 1840 he became professor of moral and intellectual philosophy and natural theology in Madison College, but resigned in 1842. Meanwhile he assumed control of the Union Evangelist. For a time he also served as pastor at Uniontown, where he began, in 1845, the publication of the Theological Medium, afterwards the Medium and Quarterly. Besides he preached extensively in Pennsylvania, and his influence became very great. In 1847 he removed to Jeffersonville, Ind., and while residing there took charge of the Book Concern in Louisville, where, in July, 1850, he commenced the publication of the Watchman and Evangelist. In 1855 he became pastor at Princeton, Ky. For some time, also, he was nominally president of the old Cumberland College. In 1858 he became editor of the St. Louis Observer. When the Civil War began he removed to Jeffersonville, Ind. He was several times moderator of the General Assembly. In 1864 he returned as pastor to Caldwell County, Ky. He died July 26, 1871. He published Doctrines of Grace (1856). See Dr. Beard's Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 339.

Blake, MORTIMER, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Pittston, Me., Jan. 10, 1813. He graduated from Amherst College in 1835; was principal of Franklin Academy, Mass., for three years, while studying theology with Rev. Elam Smally, D.D.; taught in Hopkins Academy, Hadley, one year; was ordained pastor at Mansfield in 1839; installed over Winslow Church, Taunton, in 1855, and died there, Dec. 22, 1884. He published several sermons and addresses. See Cong. Year-book, 1886, p. 20.

Blakeney, RICHARD PAUL, D.D., LL.D., an Anglican divine, was born at Roscommon, Ireland, June 2, 1820. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, taking a first-class place in theology in 1843; became curate of St. Paul's, Nottingham, the same year; vicar at Ison-Green, Nottinghamshire, in 1844; at Christ Church, Cloughton, Birkenhead, in 1852; at Bridlington, Yorkshire, in 1874; canon of Fenton, in York Cathedral, in 1882; and died Jan. 1, 1885. He wrote largely on the Catholic controversy, and was the author of, Manual of the Romish Controversy (1851 and often); —Hist. and Interpretation of Common Prayer (1865 and since); —besides two very popular Catechisms.

Blakesley, JOSEPH WILLIAM, an English divine, was born in London in 1808. He graduated in 1831 at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was afterwards fellow and tutor; in 1845 became vicar of Ware; in 1863 canon in Canterbury Cathedral; in 1872 dean of Lincoln; and died April 18, 1885. Besides several ecclesiastical honorary positions, he was a member of the Bible Revision Committee, and author of, A Life of Aristotle (1839); —Herodotus, in the Bibliotheca Classica (1854); —Four Months in Algeria (1859), and other works.

Blanchard, AMOS, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1807. He graduated from Yale College in 1826, studied theology for one year in Andover Seminary, and was ordained Dec. 25, 1829. He was tutor in Yale College in 1828 and 1829, studying in the theological department there at the same time. He became pastor of the First Church, Lowell, Mass., in 1829; of Kirk Street Church, in the same city, in 1845, and died there, Jan. 14, 1870. See Trien. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 85.

Blanckart, NIKOLAUS, a Carmelite, was a native of Utrecht, and joined his order at Cologne. In 1546

he held a public disputation on the doctrine of purgatory, and was made licentiate of theology; in 1551 he was appointed professor of theology and dean of the theological faculty at Cologne. In the same year he also went to Trent to attend the council there. He died in 1555 at Cologne. He wrote against Calvin, Judicium Johannis Calvini de Sanctorum Reliquiis Collatum cum Orthodoxorum S. Ecclesie Catholica Patrum Sententia, etc. (Cologne, 1551). He also prepared a translation of the Bible in Low German, which was published in 1548. See Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Blarer (von Wartensee), JACOB CHRISTOPH, a Swiss prelate, was born May 11, 1542. He studied at Freiburg, in Breisgau, and was in 1575 elected prince-bishop of Basle. When Blarer entered upon his duties, he found that Protestantism had greatly advanced in his diocese. But by his perseverance and energy he at last succeeded in restoring the bishopric of Basle. He died April 18, 1608. See Vautre, Jacques-Christophe Blarer de Wartensee, in the Revue de la Suisse Catholique, x, 65-82; Burckhardt, Die Gegenreformation in den ehemaligen Vogteien Zwingen, Pfaffen und Birsack des Bisthums Basel (Basle, 1855); Vautre, Histoire du Collège de Porrentruy (Porrentruy, 1866); Fiala, in *Wetzer u. Böckhn, PLACIDUS, a German Benedictine, was born in 1690 at Munich, joined his order in 1706, and took holy orders in 1713. Having received, in 1715, the degree of doctor utriusque juris, he went to Rome. In 1721 he returned, and was appointed professor of canon law at Salzburg. In 1733 he took the chair of Biblical exegesis. He died Feb. 9, 1752. His main work is Commentarius in Jus Canonicum Universum (Paris, 1776). See Seidelmayer, Hist. Univ. Salzburg, p. 405; Ziegelbauer, Hist. Rei Litt. O. S. B. iii, 484, 485; Mittermüller, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Böhm, JOHANN, a German religious fanatic, known under the name "der Pauker von Niklashausen," came before the public in the name of the mother of God, at whose direction he commenced preaching. He was especially severe against the clergy, whom he charged with avarice and other vices. The people, poor as well as rich, flocked from all parts, till at last bishop Rudolf of Würzburg made him a prisoner, and ordered him to be burned, July 19, 1476. Bosco, JOHANNES, a famous Scotist, was born at Antwerp in 1613. For some time he occupied the cathedra Scoti at the University of Louvain. His main work is Theologia Sacramentalis, Scholastica et Moralis ad Mentem Doctoris Subtilis (Louvain and Antwerp, 1665-85, 6 vols. fol.). After his death some smaller treatises of his were published at Antwerp, with the title, Theologia Spiritualis (1686, 2 vols. fol.). See

Scheeben, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Boström, CHRISTOFFER JAKOB, a Swedish philosopher, was born at Pitea, Jan. 1, 1797. He studied at Upsala, where he also commenced his lectures in 1827, which he continued till 1863, when he retired from his professorship. He died March 22, 1866. Boström was the most independent thinker of Sweden, and founded a philosophical school, the influence of which has essentially prevented the propagation of materialistic and pessimistic teachings in Sweden. (B. P.)

Botzheim, JOHANN VON, a Swiss theologian, was born in 1480 at Botzheim, near Schlettstadt. He studied at Heidelberg, and having completed his studies in Italy, where he was made doctor of canon law, he was appointed after his return, in 1512, dean of Constance. In 1518 he became acquainted with some of Luther's writings, and became greatly attached to Luther and his cause. In 1520 he wrote to Luther, encouraging him in his work; but he soon turned his back upon him. In 1527 he was obliged to leave the place, and went to Freiburg, where he died in 1535. He was on very good terms with Erasmus, and it was mainly his influence which led Erasmus to write the Catalogus Elucubratorum. See Döllinger, Reformation, i, 519; Walchner, Johann von Botzheim und seine Freunde (Schaffhausen, 1836); Hartmann, in Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, iii, 208; Göpfert, in Wetzer u. Bouelle, STEPHEN, D.D., a Presbyterian minister of Huguenot descent, was born in Cumberland County, Pa., in 1770. He was educated at Dickinson College, and studied theology under Dr. David Rice, of Kentucky. He was licensed in 1796; in 1798 went to Abingdon, Va.; from 1804 he was pastor at Sinking Springs and Green Springs, also teaching and occasionally making missionary tours into Indiana. In 1837 he removed to Missouri, and died at Paris, Ill., in December, 1840. He was widely influential. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Bouhours, DOMINIQUE, a learned French Jesuit, was born at Paris in 1628. At the age of sixteen he joined his order, studied under the care of the Jesuits, and died May 27, 1702. Besides a number of works pertaining to belles-lettres, he wrote, Vie de S. Ignace (Paris, 1679); — Vie de S. François Xavier (ibid. 1682); — Pensées Chrétiennes pour les Jour du Mois; — Maximes Chrétiennes. In connection with the Jesuits Tellier and Bernier he translated the New Test. from the Latin into French, which was published in 1697; latest edition in 1859. See *Biog. Boulainvilliers, HENRI, count of, a French philosopher, was born at St. Saire, in Normandy, Oct. 11, 1658, and died Jan. 23, 1722. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Mohammed, and a fierce opponent of Christianity. He wrote Refutation des Erreurs de B. de Spinoza (Brussels, 1731). See Tennemann, Geschichte der Philosophie, x, 486; Ersch u. Gruber, Encyklop. s. v.; Hefele, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Boulanger, NICOLAS ANTOINE, who belonged to the French encyclopædists, was born in 1722, and died in 1759. He was an opponent of Christianity and of all revelation, and wrote, L'Antiquité Dévoilée par ses Usages (Amsterdam, 1766; Germ. transl. Greifswald, 1769); — Dissertation sur Elie et Enoch (1765). To him is also ascribed the authorship of Examen Critique de la Vie et des Œuvres de St. Paul (London, 1770), as well as of Le Christianisme Dévoilé et l'Histoire Critique de la Vie de Jesus Christ, ou Analyse Raisonnée des Évangiles (eod.), which were probably written by his friend Holbach. His works were collected (Paris, 1791, 10 vols.; 1792, 8 vols.; Amsterdam, 1794, 6 vols.).

Bower, EDWIN REA, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., Sept. 5, 1826. He joined the Church when eighteen years of age, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1851, spent one year in teaching, graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1855, acting one year also as tutor in his alma mater; was ordained pastor at Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., in 1855; installed over the Second Church, Springfield, O., in 1861; elected professor of theology in Lincoln University, Pa., in 1867, and died in that office, April 7, 1883. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1884, p. 40.

Boyd, ARCHIBALD, D.D., an Anglican divine, was born at Londonderry, Ireland, in 1803. After passing through the diocesan college of that city, he graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1823; became curate of the cathedral at Derry in 1827; of Christ Church, Cheltenham, in 1842; canon of Gloucester cathedral in 1857, vicar of Paddington in 1859, and dean of Exeter in 1867, a position in which he died, July 11, 1883. He was the author of several works on ecclesiastical and religious topics.

Boynton, CHARLES BRANDON, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Stockbridge, Mass., June 12, 1806. After spending one year (1827) at Williams College, and some years in business and legal practice, he studied theology with Rev. Dr. Woodbridge, of Spencertown, N. Y.; was ordained associate pastor at Housatonic, Mass., in 1840, and installed there in 1842; acting pastor at Lansingburg, N. Y., in 1845; at Vine Street, Cincinnati, O., in 1846; pastor at South Church, Pittsfield, Mass., in 1856; again at Cincinnati in 1857; at Washington, D. C., in 1865, at the same time acting as chaplain of the House of Representatives; a third term in Cincinnati, from 1873 to 1877, and finally without charge there until his death, April 27, 1883. He published several books of travel and history. See Cong. Year-book, 1884, p. 20.

Braman, MILTON PALMER, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at New Rowley (now Georgetown), Mass., Aug. 6, 1799. He graduated from Harvard College in 1819, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1824; was pastor at Danvers from 1826 until 1863, and thereafter resided successively at Brighton and Auburndale until his death, April 10, 1882. He published several sermons and addresses. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 20.

Brassicarius, JOHANN ALEXANDER, an opponent of the reformation, belonged to a family of Constance, originally named Kohler Köl, which, however, took the Latin name of Brassicarius in the 15th century. In 1493 a certain Johannes Köl, called Brassicarius, was promoted at Tübingen; he was Melancthon's teacher, and is probably the father of Johann Alexander, who was professor at Ingolstadt in 1523. At first Alexander belonged to the secret adherents of Luther, but his patristic studies made him soon a decided opponent of the Reformation. In 1524 he was called to Vienna, where he died, Nov. 27, 1539. See Döllinger, Reformation, i, 525 sq.; Hefele, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Braun, PLACIDUS, a Benedictine, was born in 1756 at Peuting, in Upper Bavaria. In 1775 he entered the monastery of St. Ulrich, at Augsburg, and, having charge of the library, published Notitia Hist. Litt. de Libris ab Artis Typogr. Inventione, etc. (Aug.-Vind. 1788-89), and Notitia Hist. Litt. de Codicibus MSS. in Bibl. Monasterii Exstantibus (1791-96, 6 vols.). In 1808 he was made member of the Bavarian Academy of Sciences, and edited Codex Diplom. Monasterii S. Ulrici (in the Mon. Boica, tom. xxii, xxiii), and collected the Codex Episcopatus Augustani. He also published a history of the bishops of Augsburg, in four volumes

(Augsburg, 1813-15). He died Oct. 23, 1829. See Lindner, Schriftsteller des Bened. Ordens in Bayern seit 1750 (Regensburg, 1880), ii, 124; Streber, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bremer, FRIEDRICH, a Roman Catholic theologian of Bavaria, was born at Bamberg, Jan. 10, 1784. In 1807 he took holy orders, and in 1808 received the degree of doctor of theology. In 1813 he was appointed sub-director of the clerical seminary at Bamberg, and in 1820 its director, at the same time occupying the chair of dogmatics at the lyceum there. In 1821 he became a member of the newly founded chapter, in 1844 its dean, and died Aug. 20, 1846. He wrote, Versuch einer historisch-philosophischen Darstellung der Offenbarung (1810);—Katholische Dogmatik (1815-17, and often, 3 vols.);—Geschichtliche Darstellung der Verrichtung und Auspendung der Sacramente (1818-24, 3 vols.);—Das Gericht, etc. (1829). See Thiem, in the Twelfth Annual Report of the Historical Society at Bamberg, 1849, p. 14, 21; Jäck, Zweites Pantheon (Bamberg, 1843), p. 12, 13; Wittmann, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Brillmacher, PETER MICHAEL, a Jesuit, was born at Cologne in 1542, and studied at Paris under Maldonatus. For six years he was rector at Speyer, and in 1588 went to Münster, where he founded the college of the Jesuits, whose rector he was for eight years. He died Aug. 25, 1595, leaving, De Communionis sub Altera Tantum Specie (Cologne, 1582);—De Eucharistie Sacramento Dialogi V (1580-84);—Christiana et Solida Detectio Errorum Joannis a Münster (1591). Bristol, DANIEL WHELOCK, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., Dec. 15, 1812. He joined the Church in 1833, was licensed the following year, and entered the Oneida (afterwards Central) Conference, in which he continued until his death, at Syracuse, Nov. 2, 1883, having filled the most important positions and been several times a delegate to the General Conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 320.

Bronson, MILES, D.D., a Baptist missionary, was born at Norway, N. Y., July 20, 1812. He studied at the Hamilton (N. Y.) Literary and Theological Institution, was ordained at Whitesborough, and appointed missionary April 29, 1836. He reached Sadiya, Assam, in July, 1837, where he remained until his removal to Jaipur in the spring of 1838. He did good service also at Nowgong. In 1857 he visited his native land, but in 1860 went back to the East, where he again carried on his work at Nowgong for nine years, and then made another short visit to the United States. In July, 1874, he removed to Gowahiti, and was at that station for several years. Returning once more to his native land, he died, Nov. 10, 1883. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 141. (J. C. S.)

Brooke, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born and reared within the bounds of the old Baltimore Conference. He was educated at Dickinson College, and entered the Baltimore Conference while yet in his youth. In 1873 he was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1876 to the East Ohio. His last work was that of presiding elder of the Canton District. He died at Winchester, Va., Sept. 25, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 329.

Brown, Andrew, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Biggar, Aug. 22, 1763. He became tutor in the Cranston family; was licensed to preach in 1786; ordained in 1787 minister to the Presbyterian congregation at Halifax, Nova Scotia; admitted minister at Lochmaben, Scotland, in 1795; transferred to New Greyfriars, Edinburgh, in 1799; promoted to the Old Church in 1800; appointed professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the university in 1801, which he held in conjunction; elected moderator of the General Assembly in 1813, and died Feb. 19, 1834. He was characterized by eloquent composition, unobtrusive manners, and kindly feelings. He published a series of sermons, and the Life of Alexander Christison. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 12, 71, 360, 642.

Brown, John, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city, May 19, 1791. He graduated from Columbia College in 1811, was ordained deacon in 1812, and was rector of St. George's Church, Newburgh, from 1815 until his death, Aug. 15, 1884.

Brown, Mrs. Phœbe Hinsdale (her maiden name), a poetess, was born at Canaan, N. Y., May 1, 1773. She had no early education; married a painter of Ellington, Conn.; lived a humble and painful, but Christian life, and died at Marshall, Ill., Oct. 10, 1861. Among her hymns the most noted is "I love to steal awhile away," written in 1818, and included with others in Nettleton's Village Hymns (1824). She also wrote for the newspapers, and was the author of several tracts and a series of tales, entitled The Tree and its Fruits (N. Y. 1836). See (N. Y.) Independent, Jan. 6, 1881.

Brown, Samuel Gilman, D.D., LL.D., a Congregational divine, was born at North Yarmouth, Me., Jan. 4, 1813. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1831, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1837; was principal of Ellington (Conn.) High-school in 1832 and 1833, and of Abbot Academy, Andover, from 1835 to 1838; spent two years thereafter in Europe; became professor at Dartmouth College in 1840, president of Hamilton College in 1867, instructor at Dartmouth College in 1881, at Bowdoin College in 1883, and died, Nov. 4, 1885, at Utica, N. Y. He had been ordained in 1852, but was without charge. He was the author of numerous works of a popular character, chiefly biographies and addresses. See Cong. Year-book, 1886, p. 20.

Brown, William Lawrence, D.D., a Scotch clergyman (son of the professor of divinity and Church history at St. Andrews), was born at Utrecht, where his father was then minister, Jan. 7, 1755. He graduated from the University of St. Andrews in 1772; was licensed to preach in 1777, ordained for the English congregation at Utrecht, and appointed professor of moral philosophy at the Utrecht University in 1788. Being threatened by the revolutionary army of France, he fled to England; was elected minister at Greyfriars' Church, Aberdeen, in 1795, and promoted to be principal of Marischal College, which he held in conjunction; was appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to the king in 1800, dean of the Order of the Thistle in 1803, resigned the living at Greyfriars in 1828, and died May 11, 1830. He was a man of great talents and gifts; with warmth of temper, he was open, sincere, and generous, exercising unbounded liberality. He published, An Essay on the Folly of Scepticism (Lond. 1788);—Oratio de Religionis et Philosophiæ Societate et Concordia Maxime Salutari (Utrecht, eod.);—Oratione Imaginations in Vite Institutione Regenda (ibid. 1790);—Essay on the Natural Equality of Man (Edinburgh, 1793);—seven single sermons (Lond. eod.);—Speech in the General Assembly on the Settlement at Kingsbairns of the Rev. Dr. Arnot (Edinburgh, 1800);—Letters to the Rev. Principal Hill (Aberdeen, 1801);—Sermons (Edinburgh, 1803);—A Letter to Principal Hill (1807);—Philemon; or, The Progress of Virtue, a poem (1809, 2 vols.);—An Attempt towards a New Historical and Political Explanation of the Revelation (1812);—An Essay on the Existence of a Supreme Creator (Aberdeen, 1816, 2 vols., for which was adjudged Bennett's prize of £1250);—A Comparative View of Christianity (Edinburgh, 1826, 2 vols.). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 475-476.

Brunner, KARL, a Swiss theologian and architect, was born at Hemberg, in the Toggenburg, in 1831.

He studied at Zurich and Tübingen. At the latter university he became a zealous disciple of the then prevailing "Tübingen school," to which he remained faithful until his death, although throughout his life he maintained friendly intercourse with men of all parties. His first ministerial duty was at Kappel, where he served as vicar. In 1856 he was elected pastor of Henau, and in 1858 of Bühler, in Appenzell. His zeal for the schools drew him away from his clerical work, and in 1864 he was called to the cantonal school of Appenzell, at Trogen, and in 1867 invited to become rector of the gymnasium at Biel. In 1873 the government of Aargau invited him to take charge of its rich archives, a task to which he devoted the remainder of his life, without, however, attaining the great object—the complete organization of the archives of the illustrious "gau" of the Aar. He died Jan. 26, 1881. (B. P.)

Brunson, ALFRED, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Danbury, Conn., Feb. 9, 1793. He was educated in the common-schools and trained as a shoemaker; converted July 3, 1809, while living with an uncle at Carlisle, Pa., and licensed to exhort. Returning to Connecticut the same year, he settled at Bridgeport and began to hold religious services. In 1812 he removed to Ohio, and entered the army under general Harrison. He was licensed to preach in 1815, and in 1818 formed a large circuit in Huron County, O. In 1820 he became connected with the Pittsburgh Conference, formed that year. Here he labored and studied law until 1836. In July, 1836, he removed to Prairie du Chien, Wis., to labor in behalf of the Indians. In 1839 he relinquished his ministerial labors on account of ill-health, was admitted to the bar, and practiced for ten years, during which period he filled several secular offices. He resumed pastoral work in 1850, and served several important charges, including Prairie du Chien district. In 1862 he was commissioned chaplain of the Thirty-first Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, but resigned on account of failing health one year later. He remained on the superannuated list until 1869, when he again became effective. He travelled until the fall of 1872, when he was superannuated for the last time. He was four times elected a member of the General Conference, and closed his remarkable career at Prairie du Chien, Aug. 3, 1882. He was a frequent contributor to the secular and religious journals, and especially to the Methodist Quarterly Review. He published his autobiography, in two volumes, entitled The Western Pioneer, and also a Key to the Apocalypse. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 308.

Brua, ANTON, a Bohemian prelate, was born at Mglitz, in Moravia, Feb. 13, 1518. He studied at Prague, where he also received holy orders. In the war against the Turks, 1542-45, he was Austrian chaplain. In 1558 the emperor, Ferdinand I, made him bishop of Vienna, and in 1562 he was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Prague. He also attended the council at Trent. He died Aug. 28, 1580. See Oesterreichische Vierteljahrsschrift für Katholische Theologie (Vienna, 1874), where his biography is given; Borowy, in Wetzzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Büchsenbüsch, LUDWIG JACOB THEODOR, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born March 20, 1814. In 1846 he entered upon his first ministerial duties, and in 1853 was appointed superintendent of the Lützelstein diocese in Alsace. In 1859 he was removed to Weyer, the centre of his diocese, where he labored for twenty-three years, zealously defending the sacred rights of evangelical faith. He died July 6, 1882. (B. P.)

Bugbee, LUCIUS H., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Gowanda, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1830. He was converted in boyhood, licensed as an exhorter at eighteen, graduated from Genesee College in 1853 and Amherst College in 1854, became teacher in Cooperstown Academy in 1855, joined the Upper Iowa Conference in 1857, and was appointed president of its university; in 1860 was transferred to the Rock River Conference, and served several important stations; in 1865 became president of the Female College, Evans-ton, Ill.; in 1868 of that in Cincinnati; in 1875 of Allegheny College; being then transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, in which, in 1882, he was appointed to Monongahela city, but his health failed, and he died at Geneva, N. Y., July 28, 1883. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1884, p. 323; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Bulfinch, STEPHEN GREENLEAF, D.D., a Unitarian minister and poet, was born in Boston, Mass., June 18, 1809. He graduated from Columbia College, Washington, D. C., in 1826, and from the Harvard Divinity School in 1830; served chiefly as pastor at Augusta, Me., for the next seven years; afterwards preached and taught at Pittsburgh, Pa., and in Washington, D. C.; in 1845 became pastor at Nashua, N. H.; in 1852 at Dorchester, Mass.; and died at Cambridge, Oct. 12, 1870. He published several prose works, as well as Poems (Charleston, S. C., 1804). See Duyckinck, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit. ii, 345.

Burigny, JEAN LÉVESQUE, a French historian, was born at Rheims in 1692, and died at Paris, Oct. 8, 1785. He wrote, Traité de l'Autorité du Pape (1720, 4 vols.); — Histoire de la Philosophie Païenne (1724, 1754, 2 vols.); — Vie de Grotius (Amsterdam, 1750, 1754, 2 vols.); — Vie d'Érasme (1757, 2 vols.); — Vie du Cardinal Duperron (1768). See Quérard, La France Littéraire, s. v.; Dacier, Éloge de Burigny (Paris, 1788); Walkenaer, Recueil de Notices Historiques (ibid. 1850), p. 286; Biog. Général, vii, 840; Gams, in Wetzzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Burleigh, WILLIAM HENRY, a reformer and poet, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Feb. 2, 1812. He early became a temperance and anti-slavery lecturer; removed to Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1837, where he published the Christian Witness, and afterwards the Temperance Banner; in 1843 to Hartford, Conn., as editor of the Christian Freeman, soon known as the Charter Oak; in 1849 to Albany, N. Y., as editor of the Prohibitionist; in 1855 to New York city as harbor-master, and subsequently as one of the port-wardens. He died at Brooklyn, March 18, 1871. He was the author of Poems (Philadelphia, 1841; enlarged, with biography by his wife, New York, 1871). See Duyckinck, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit. ii, 859.

Burns, JOHN, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in 1807. He was an honored member of the Muskingum Conference, and was one of the best known of his denomination in Ohio; a strong preacher, had good executive ability, and wherever he was stationed the Church prospered. For some years he was chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary. He died at Cadiz, Sept. 12, 1883. See The Methodist Recorder, Sept. 22, 1883.

Bussus. See BUSKE.

Byrom, JOHN, an English poet, was born at Kersall, near Manchester, in 1691. After studying at Merchant-Taylors School in London, he graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1711, became a fellow there, travelled in France, next gave lessons in stenography in London, and at length settled upon his native estate, and died there, Sept. 28, 1763. He was of a mystical turn, and besides various miscellaneous essays and pieces, he published Hymns and Sacred Poems (1739; reprinted 1773, 1814, and in his collected poems, 1857), some of which are quite popular.

C.

Caldwell, JAMES, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Kilmarnock, Scotland, in the spring of 1809. He was educated at Glasgow University; ordained in 1837; preached at Biggar, Greenock, and Stockton-on-the-Tees (Eng.); came to America in 1851; was acting pastor successively at Kent, Conn., Sheffield, Mass., Beardstown, Ill., Post Mills, in Thetford, Vt., and without charge at Barnard and Post Mills until his death, April 9, 1885. See Cong. Year-book, 1886, p. 21.

Calinich, Hermann Julius Robert, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, doctor of philosophy and theology, was born in 1834, at Niederfriedersdorf, Saxony. In 1860 he was teacher at the gymnasium in Dresden, in 1863 deacon, afterwards pastor of St. Jacobus, at Chemnitz, and since 1872 pastor primarius of St. Jacobus at Hamburg. He died at Wiesbaden, Jan. 13, 1888. He wrote, Luther und die Augsburgische Confession (Leipzig, 1861):—Kampf und Untergang des Melanchthonismus, etc. (ibid. 1866):—Wie Sachsen orthodox-lutherisch wurde (ibid. eod.):—Zwei sächsische Kanzler (ibid. 1868):—Der Papst und das ökumenische Concil (ibid. eod.):—Der Naumburger Fürstentag (ibid. 1870):—*De Conventu Anno MDLXXIV. Calvinus, Justus, a Roman Catholic controversialist, was born about the year 1570, at Xanten, in Cleve. He was the son of a Calvinistic preacher. He studied at Heidelberg under the famous Junius, went to Rome, where he made the acquaintance of Bellarmine and Baronius, whose works he now studied. After his return to Germany, he joined the Church of Rome. When or where he died is not known. He published at Mayence in 1691, Pro Sacrosancta Catholica Romana Ecclesia Apologia:—Epistolarum Catholicarum Liber Unus:—De Latitudine Ecclesiæ Dei, et Moderata Coarctatione Hæreticorum. The first two works were also published in a second edition at Heidelberg in 1756. His main work is Præscriptionum Adversus Hæreticos Perpetuarum ex SS. Orthodoxis Potissimum Patribus Tractatus IV (Mayence, 1602; 2d ed. 1756). See Röss, Conversionenbilder, iii, 537-620; Kobler, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cambuslang, Walter, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the see of Dunblane in 1862, and signed as witness the fourteen years' truce between Scotland and England, executed at Edinburgh, July 20, 1869. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 176.

Cameron, Andrew, D.D., a Scotch divine and editor, was born at Edinburgh in 1822, and educated in the university there. He early became connected with the press, first as a reporter, and, in 1845, as the projector of the Christian Treasurer, later of the Free Church Magazine, and other periodicals. He eventually became pastor at Maryton, Fifeshire, and in 1870 at St. Kilda, Melbourne, where he died in 1877.

Campbell, John McLeod, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Kilninner, born May 4, 1800, was presented to the living at Row in 1825, and ordained; deposed in May, 1831, for teaching universal atonement and pardon, also that assurance is necessary to salvation. He continued teaching these doctrines to his followers, first at Kilninner, and afterwards in a chapel at Glasgow until 1859. He died at Roseneath, Feb. 27, 1872. His publications were, Sermons (1831, 2 vols.):—Notes of Sermons:—Speech at the Bar of the Synod (eod.):—Letters on Keeping a Conscience Void of Offence (1834):—Christ the Bread of Life (Edinburgh, 1851):—Atonement (1854):—Nature of the Atonement (1856):—Thoughts on Revelation (1862). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 371; Campbell, Memorials (Lond. 1877).

Campbell, William Graham, D.D., an Irish Wesleyan preacher, was born near Sligo in 1805. He was converted in 1822, and soon began preaching, his first regular appointment being the Killeshandren Circuit in 1831, and he spent twenty-five years of great power in the general work. He died Feb. 24, 1885. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1885, p. 35.

XII.—34

Campeggio. We notice two other members of this family.

1. ALESSANDRO, son of Lorenzo, was born at Bologna in 1504. He was educated by the most learned men of Italy, and appointed, in 1526, by pope Clement VII, as his father's successor in the bishopric of Bologna. The ninth and tenth sessions of the Tridentine Council were held at his palace. Pope Julius III made him cardinal in 1551. He died Sept. 20, 1554.

2. CAMILLO, inquisitor of Ferrara, and bishop of Nepi-Sutri, who died in 1569, is the author of De Primatu Romani Pontificis contra M. Flacium Illyricum (reprinted by Rocaberti, in Bibl. Magn. Pontif. vol. vii). See Gams-Kreutzwald, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Camus, Étienne, a French Jansenist and prelate, was born Nov. 16, 1632. In 1660 he was already a doctor of the Sorbonne, but his unchristian walk brought on him the disfavor of Mazarin, and he was banished. Prince Conti, governor of Languedoc, however, received him, and brought him under the influence of the Jansenistic bishop, Pavillon of Alet. Louis XIV made him, in 1671, archbishop of Grenoble. In 1686 pope Innocent XI made him cardinal, and he was present, in 1700, at the conclave held at Rome for the election of Clement XI. He died in 1707. He founded a clerical seminary at Grenoble. Caribbean MYTHOLOGY. Like all uncivilized nations, this people had but superficial conceptions of the creation of the world, the population of the earth, and of a life beyond. They believed that heaven was from eternity; it encircled an earth more beautiful and better than the present one. The latter was originally soft and at rest. A stranger, Louguo, gave it form and motion, and put fishes into the sea. The origin of terrestrial animals was not known, but human beings sprang from the navel of Louguo, who first inhabited the earth, then died, was raised to life again, and withdrew to that better heavenly world. Men became worse and worse, and because they did not make any sacrifices to the gods the latter sent a great flood, by which all men save a few were destroyed. The first men lived very long, some of them being changed into stars and made immortal for their good works. After the flood they lived in poverty and want. The Caribs, however, expected a happier existence in that upper world—better houses, more food, more women, no work, no sickness, but an unbroken life of pleasure. They worshipped the sun and moon, and on the occurrence of earthquakes they fasted for a number of days. Very seldom did they make sacrifices, for they took it for granted that the gods have no need of human service.

Carrasco, Antonio, a leading Spanish Protestant preacher, was born in Malaga, Jan. 19, 1843. He was converted in youth, and was imprisoned for Bible reading, but released in 1863 at the remonstrance of the Evangelical Alliance. After studying at Geneva, Switzerland, he returned to Spain in 1868, and zealously engaged in the publication of the true gospel there, becoming pastor of the Free Church in Madrid. On his way home from a visit to America he was drowned by the sinking of the steamer Ville du Harre, Nov. 22, 1878. See Report of the Evangelical Alliance, 1874, p. 764.

Carroll, John, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Church in Canada, was born on the Bay of Fundy, Aug. 8, 1809. In 1818 his parents went to Toronto, where he was converted. In 1827 he entered the itinerant ranks, in which he occupied prominent stations in Canada, London, Toronto, Kingston, Ottawa, and elsewhere. He died in Toronto, Canada, Dec. 13, 1884. For nearly thirty years he was chairman of the districts in which his appointments were located. He was a most faithful and laborious pastor. Besides the history of his early years, called My Boy Life, he published several small volumes, a number of pamphlets and magazine articles, especially Case and his Contemporaries (Toronto, 1867, 5 vols.). See Christian Guardian, Dec. 17, 1884.

Cashmerian Version OF THE SCRIPTURES. Of late the work of translation into this dialect has again been resumed, for the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1884 states that the Rev. T. R. Wade, formerly of Trinagar, now of Amritsar, has completed the translation of the New Test., on which he has been engaged for six years, and in the annual report of the same society for 1885 we read that the New Test. has been published. (B. P.)

Caswell, EDWARD, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Yateby, in Hampshire, July 15, 1814. He was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, ordained presbyter in 1839, in 1840 became curate of Stratford-under-Castle, in 1847 joined the Roman Catholic Church, and died Jan. 2, 1878. Besides several prose works, he published metrical translations of many mediæval hymns, entitled Lyra Catholica (1848), and other poetical effusions, collected in Hymns and Poems (1878).

Catholic Emancipation, an enactment to relieve Roman Catholics of the civil and religious disabilities imposed by the laws passed in the time, chiefly, of Elizabeth. These forbade a Catholic priest receiving a neophyte into the Church in England under penalty of death; Jesuits forfeited life by appearing in the country; no man could plead at law or become a schoolmaster, or hold any office, especially in Ireland, without taking the oaths of supremacy and against transubstantiation. All this was abolished by the act of parliament of April 23, 1829, since which time Catholics and Protestants have enjoyed equal protection and liberty before the law.

Cawood, JOHN, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Matlock, Derbyshire, March 18, 1775. He graduated from St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in 1801; became curate at Ribbesford, Dowles, and Bewdley, and died Nov. 7, 1872. Besides several prose works, he published occasional hymns, a number of which were inserted in Cotterill's collection, and the one beginning "Hark, what mean those holy voices," has become especially popular.

Chandler, George Clinton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Chester, Vt., March 19, 1807. He was baptized in 1825, and licensed to preach in 1831; graduated from Madison University in 1835, and from Newton Theological Institution in 1838; preached as a missionary among the Indians, and at Terre Haute, Ind.; became pastor at Indianapolis in 1839, president of Franklin College in 1843, in 1850 of the new Baptist college in Oregon, but soon resumed missionary work; became pastor at Dallas in 1874, and died there in November of the same year. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Chandler, John, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Witley, in Surrey, June 16, 1806. He graduated from Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1827; became vicar of Witley in 1837, afterwards rural dean, and died at Putney, July 1, 1876. Besides some prose productions, he published translations called Hymns of the Primitive Church (1837), of which several have been inserted in most hymnals.

Channing, WILLIAM HENRY, a Unitarian divine, nephew of Dr. William E. Channing, was born in Boston, May 25, 1810. He graduated from Harvard College in 1829, and from Cambridge Divinity School in 1833; was ordained in 1839; successively served independent congregations at Meadville (Pa.), New York city, Cincinnati, O., Nashua, N. H., Boston, Mass., Rochester, N. Y., and Liverpool, Eng., and finally resided without charge in London until his death, Dec. 24, 1884. He edited various journals, wrote frequently for the reviews, and was the author of several sermons and memoirs, particularly of his uncle (1848, 3 vols.).

Chaplin, CHARLES CRAWFORD, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Danville, Va., Sept. 22, 1831. He was converted in 1853, spent two years in Richmond College, became pastor at Danville in 1856, at Owensborough, Ky., in 1870, at Paducah in 1873, and died at Brentana, Texas, Nov. 2, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Clinch, JOSEPH H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born Jan. 30, 1806. He served as rector of St. Matthew's Church, South Boston, was secretary of the Diocesan Convention, and died July 5, 1884.

Close, FRANCIS, D.D., an Anglican divine, was born near Alton, Hampshire, in 1797. He graduated from St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1820; became curate of the Lawford Church, near Rugby; in 1822 of Wellesden and Kingsbury, Middlesex; in 1824 at Cheltenham, in 1856 dean of Carlisle, and died Dec. 18, 1882.

Closs, WILLIAM, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Botetourt County, Va., in 1809. He entered the Virginia Conference in 1833, and was identified with the North Carolina Conference from its organization. He spent nearly fifty years in the itinerant ministry, twenty-eight of them as presiding elder; and was many times a delegate to the General Conference. His ability as a debater was unsurpassed. He died in Enfield, N. C., July 8, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 109.

Coan, Titus, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Killingworth, Conn., Feb. 1, 1801. He joined the Presbyterian Church at Riga, N. Y., in 1828; studied privately, graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1833, was ordained the same year a missionary to Patagonia, in 1835 went to Hawaii, where he labored with great success at Hilo until his death, Dec. 1, 1882. Besides some tracts, essays, etc., he published Adventures in Patagonia (1880):—Life in Hawaii (1882). See Cong. Year-book, 1884, p. 21.

Cochran, William Porter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Millerstown, Pa., Nov. 10, 1803. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1824, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained an evangelist in 1829, became stated supply at Columbus, Mo., the same year, at Palmyra in 1834, at Big Creek in 1841, pastor there in 1867, preached in various churches in 1861, was pastor at Millerstown in 1867, and evangelist from 1869 until his death near West Ely, Mo., Dec. 25, 1884. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1885, p. 14.

Cooker, Benjamin Franklin, D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal divine, was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1821. He was brought up as a Wesleyan, converted in early life, and at eighteen became a local preacher. He was educated at King James's Grammar-school for one of the learned professions, but after spending several years in business in England, and from 1850 several more in Australia, he came to America in 1856, settled at Adrian, Mich., and the next year joined the Detroit Conference, being sent to Palmyra; the following year was stationed at Adrian, afterwards at Ypsilanti, Ann Arbor, and Adrian; and in 1869 was appointed professor of philosophy in Michigan University, a position which he retained until his death, April 8, 1883. He was a fine scholar and a brilliant writer. He was the author of Christianity and Greek Philosophy:—Theistic Conception of the World:—Student's Hand-book of Philosophy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 315.

Coggeshall, Samuel D., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lynn, Mass., Feb. 18, 1811. He was converted in early life, and immediately began to preach; was admitted in 1832 into the New England Conference, in which and (after 1840) in the Providence (now the New England Southern) Conference he occupied important positions until his death, Oct. 30, 1885. By private studies he acquired a good degree of scholarship, and was well known as a writer, especially on historical subjects, in the periodicals of his denomination. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1886, p. 90.

Coit, Thomas Winthrop, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal divine, was born at New London, Conn., June 28, 1803. He was the author of, Theological commonplace Book (1832, 1857):—Remarks on Norton's Statement of Reasons, etc. (1838):—Bible in Paragraphs (1834; an abridgment of Townsend's Chronological Bible, which he also edited in full, 1837):—Puritanism (1844), besides frequent contributions to the journals of his denomination.

Colleges, AMERICAN. The methods of organization and instruction adopted in these institutions naturally grew out of those pursued in the educational establishments of the mother country, especially the great universities of Oxford and Cambridge, in which the colleges proper are subordinate or detailed schools. See UNIVERSITIES, EUROPEAN. In a few, chiefly the older and better-endowed colleges of the Eastern and Middle States, the original academic foundation has gradually expanded into a fully-developed university, and in many of the newer institutions the entire curriculum has been laid out for future completion; hence the use of the title "university" has been not altogether inappropriate, although few American educational incorporations cover the entire field of liberal arts and learned professions. In one instance, the University of the State of New York, the European idea has been substantially adopted, but without any local apparatus of buildings, teachers, or personal instruction. Special schools of technical training are generally relied upon to supplement the literary course in the departments of law, medicine, theology, engineering, etc. See THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. In many of the newer colleges of America, and in a few of the older ones, ladies are now admitted to the full privileges and honors of study and graduation, and there are numerous institutions, often styled "Female Colleges," in which women exclusively have nearly equal literary advantages, besides the ornamental branches more appropriate to their sphere. The honorary degrees (A.B., etc.) are in America sometimes conferred by schools which in reality are little above the rank of ordinary "academies." See EDUCATION.

The following tables are compiled from the Report of the (U. S.) Commissioner of Education for 1883-84 (the latest return). Detailed information on nearly all the colleges may be found in Kiddle and Schem's Cyclopedia of Education, under the title of each.

Collier, WILLIAM, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born at Hagerstown, Md., March 11, 1808. He was converted at the age of fourteen, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and became a local preacher. In 1828 he united with the Methodist Protestant Church, in 1829 was admitted into the Maryland Conference, in 1851 transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1853 to the Muskingum Conference, in all which he took prominent positions, being several times president. He held a superannuated relation from 1863 to 1869, and again from 1874 until his death, July 12, 1884. He was a powerful preacher. See Methodist Recorder, Sept. 20, 1884.

Conceptualism, a term used to designate that form of speculative philosophy which does not deny the reality of objective existences, but still holds them to be certain only as results of subjective perception or cognition. It was substantially that of Abelard, Peter the Lombard, and Albert the Great. See NOMINALISM and REALISM. It has recently been revived in a modified form by Kant, Lotze, and others.

Concursus Divinus, a term used in scholastic philosophy to designate the coincidence between the divine agency, as a final cause, and natural agencies, as the efficient cause of events and processes. It was elaborated by Thomas Aquinas, and a similar distinction may be traced in the discussions on the human will and scientific evolution.

Condit, ROBERT WOODRUFF, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Stillwater, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1796. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1814, was licensed in 1818, and after preaching in various parts of Virginia, settled as pastor at Montgomery, N. Y., from December, 1820, to April, 1830, and at Oswego, from April, 1831, until his death, Feb. 11, 1871. He was an excellent preacher, and active in all ecclesiastical work. See Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 241; Nevins, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Coombe, PENNEL, a noted Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Smyrna, Del., Aug. 5, 1811. He was converted in 1829; received a good English education; filled a vacancy as preacher at Elkington, Md., in 1834, and the next year was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference, in which he occupied important positions, as preacher, presiding elder, and agent for various Church enterprises, and especially in the temperance cause, until his death, near Philadelphia, Jan. 31, 1884. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1884, p. 81.

Cooper, J. T., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Dover, Del., March 16, 1806. He was converted when about twenty-three years old, entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1834, and in it occupied important stations until the failure of his health, in 1851, after which he labored occasionally, chiefly in the Wilmington Conference, until his death, April 12, 1884. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1885, p. 84.

Coppin (Copyn, or Copping), JOHN, a layman (some say a minister) of Bury St. Edmunds, Eng., was imprisoned in 1570 for holding public religious services, and hanged, June 5, 1583, as a disseminator of heretical books. See Dexter, Congregationalism, p. 210.

Cotterill, THOMAS, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Cannock, Staffordshire, Dec. 4, 1779. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; ordained in 1806; labored in the ministry successively at Tutbury, Lane End, in the Staffordshire potteries, and at St. Paul's, Sheffield (1817), until his death, Dec. 29, 1823. Besides a book of family prayers, he published (aided by James Montgomery) a Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1819), among which the version of Psa. ciii, beginning "O bless the Lord, my soul," has become especially popular. Mrs. M. J. Cotterill's hymn, "O thou who hast at thy command, The hearts of all men in thy hand," is from the same collection.

Cotton, NATHANIEL, an English physician and poet, was born in 1707. He studied medicine at Leyden under Boerhave; established an asylum for lunatics first at Dunstable, Bedfordshire, and afterwards at St. Albans, and died Aug. 2, 1788. Besides two medical books, he published Visions in Verse (1751, and since). His works, both in verse and prose, were edited by his son (1791, 2 vols.).

Cowley, ABRAHAM, an English poet, was born in London in 1618, and educated at Westminster School, and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1648 he was compelled to retire to Oxford on account of his royalistic sentiments, and afterwards left England for ten years, and spent the rest of his life in studious retirement. He died at Chertsey, July 28, 1667. Besides some scientific and philosophical treatises, he published many poems, which, however, are now little valued.

Craik, JAMES, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Alexandria, Va., in 1806. He graduated from the Transylvania University; practiced law at Kanawha, W. Va.; was ordained in 1839; was rector five years at Weston, and thereafter of Christ Church, Louisville, Ky., until his death, June 9, 1882. He was president of the General Convention in 1865, 1868, 1871, and 1874, and for many years a member of the standing committee of the diocese of Kentucky.

Crane, WILLIAM CAREY, D.D., LL.D., a Baptist minister and educator, was born at Richmond, Va., March 17, 1816. He graduated from Columbian College, D. C.; was converted in 1832, and ordained in 1838; was pastor successively at Montgomery, Ala., Columbus, Vicksburg, and Yazoo City, Miss., from 1839 to 1851; in 1863 president of Baylor University, Texas, and died Feb. 26, 1885. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Cretenet, JACQUES, a noted French ecclesiastic, was born at Champlitte (Franche Comté) in 1604. He studied surgery at Lyons, and devoted himself to the relief of the victims of the memorable plague in that city. After the death of his wife, who had brought him a large property, he entered the clerical state, and founded the order of Josephists, devoted to missions and education, which met with much opposition, the head himself being excommunicated by the archbishop of Lyons. Cretenet died at Montheel, Sept. 1, 1666. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, & v.

Crossman, SAMUEL, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Bradley, Suffolk, in 1824; became prebendary of the first stall at Bristol in 1667, dean in 1683, and died Feb. 4, 1684. Besides Sermons, he published The Young Man's Meditations (1664, 1668), which contains several popular hymns.

Cruelty TO ANIMALS is a subject which has lately attracted much public attention from moralists and legislators. The principle upon which owners are restrained from exercising unnecessary severity in the treatment of their beasts is not, as often imagined, because brutes have any moral rights in themselves, but because society requires to be protected from exhibitions of cruelty, inasmuch as these not only outrage the feelings of humane spectators, but also tend to generate ferocity in the individuals who practice such excess, and thus render them dangerous to their fellow-beings. On this ground Christianity, as soon as it succeeded in gaining control of public sentiment in the Roman empire, abolished the atrocious customs of the amphitheatre, not even allowing beasts to contend with each other in mortal combat for the amusement of the populace; and the same benign influence has nearly banished the bull-fight, the cock-pit, and pigeon-shooting, as sports, from Christendom. Wanton infliction of suffering is at variance with the fundamental law of the Gospel, and invariably reacts with injury upon its perpetrator. Even criminals are not to be executed with needless severity, nor with prolonged or aggravated misery. Pain may be, often must be, inflicted, and that of intense character, but never unnecessarily nor for the gratification of revenge, malice, or barbarity. The heavenly Father himself, like the wise surgeon, cuts keenly and cauterizes sorely, but only for the good of the sufferer. So the human lord of creation has a right to take the life of inferior creatures when this is subservient to his own or others' important advantage, but he is not authorized to superadd torture. The modern laws passed in most Christian countries to prevent cruelty to animals have this principle for their only legitimate foundation. Hence they should be judiciously administered, so as not rashly to interfere with the proper rights of ownership, nor subject parties to vexatious interference. The practice of vivisection for scientific and medical purposes has especially been, in our judgment, unduly restrained by some of the enactments in certain states as well as in Great Britain. The valuable information to be acquired by this means alone should not be lost for squeamish regard to nervous individuals, who are not compelled nor expected to witness such operations. Provided no unnecessary amount of pain is caused the animal, nor any aggravating circumstances introduced into the operation, these experiments should be fostered by the statute law, rather than repressed. They ought doubtless to be placed under regulation, but not prohibited. They should, of course, be performed in private, and by scientific practitioners. When carried on properly they are a means of mercy and not an act of inhumanity.

CURRAN, RICHARD AUGUSTUS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mifflintown, Pa., July 15, 1808. He graduated from Washington College in 1834, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837; was licensed the same year, and became stated supply at various churches in New Jersey, Ohio, and Georgia until 1842, after which he was pastor of several churches successively, in Pennsylvania chiefly, teaching occasionally at the same time until 1875, when he retired to Indiana. He died there, March 26, 1883. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1884, p. 22.

Currey, GEORGE, D.D., an English divine, was born in London, April 7, 1816, and educated at Charterhouse School and St. John's College, Cambridge, graduating in 1838. He became a fellow of the latter in 1839, in 1840 a lecturer, in 1844 a tutor, in 1845 Whitehall preacher, in 1849 preacher at the Charterhouse, and in 1871 its master. He died Feb. 7, 1882.

He was also a professor in Auburn Theological Seminary from 1821 to 1826. See Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. s. v.

Disembodied State OF THE SOUL AFTER DEATH. In our almost total ignorance of the essential nature, whether of matter or spirit, and of the bond of union between them in the human constitution, we are able to predicate very little with certainty respecting the condition of the soul after its separation from the body. Neither science nor revelation affords us much positive information on the subject. After all the long and earnest inquiries of Christian as well as pagan philosophers a few general points only have been definitely ascertained. They may, in fact, be summed up in the two following propositions. See PSYCHOLOGY.

1. The Soul Preserves its Consciousness after Death.—The continuity of its intellectual and emotional powers is indeed essential to its identity, if not to its very existence, for we can form no conception of a disembodied spirit where these are absent. The so-called "soul-sleep" is a contradiction in terms, for literal sleep is a state of the body rather than of the mind, or, at least, a status of the latter superinduced by a certain condition of the former. In like manner all the analogies based upon temporary unconsciousness by reason of accidents or disease during life are false and self-confuted, since the very relation of corporeity upon which they are hypothecated is absent in the premises. It is scientifically certain that all such comatose or insensible states are merely the result of injury or inaction on the part of the brain and other nervous centres, and are produced by purely physical causes; hence, if they prove anything at all in the case, they would argue a total and final cessation of all consciousness at death—in other words, the mortality of the soul equally with that of the body. If the spirit really survives the dissolution of the flesh—and this is conceded by those who maintain the theory in question—then it must continue to possess and exercise its faculties, or else drop into a state which is tantamount to non-existence. A disembodied soul is difficult enough for us to apprehend in any supposition without this superadded notion of inanition of thought. It is as nearly as possible analogous to a mere point, but this, if devoid of properties or functions, is a sheer non-entity. Moreover, a restoration to consciousness by means and in consequence of a reunion with the body would be a recreation and a total destruction of the idea of identity. See RESURRECTION.

Accordingly, the uniform testimony of Scripture is clear as to the continued exercise of all its essential powers by the soul after death. Whatever else the parable of Lazarus and Dives may or may not mean, it certainly includes this, and the frequent, nay customary, use of such expressions as "being with Christ," etc., must imply, at least, as much as this. That the penitent thief and the apostle Paul expected to fall into absolute unconsciousness is abhorrent to common-sense and opposed to the plain tenor of their language. There could be no joy in such an anticipation, and there can be no comfort in it to modern believers. It is as unscriptural as it is irrational. See SOUL-SLEEP.

2. The Disembodied Soul Ceases to Hold its Present Relations to Earth and Sense.—This follows necessarily from the absence of the body, through which alone it maintains these relations. The supposition of the development or continuance of spiritual senses, or some occult faculty by which it discerns outward objects, is a sheer fancy destitute of logical or scientific support. A great deal of vague phraseology and equally indefinite imaginings is often indulged in by Christians on this point. Swedenborg carried his speculations so far as to invent a whole new world of post-mundane wonders, and to people it with the creations of his fertile fancy. Sober theology should be wary of such extravagance. The figurative expressions of Scripture must not be pressed into the service of visionary conceptions. Nothing can be more certain than the total suspension of all communication with the external or physical universe by the disruption of the tie between the body and the spirit at death, and prior to its resumption at the resurrection. How far a disembodied spirit may be able to hold intercourse with another is a pure matter of conjecture, upon which experience affords no information. That God, and perhaps angelic beings, have direct access to the mind in that state is a reasonable supposition, but it must be purely by internal and spiritual influences, which leave no trace of means or method upon the consciousness—as, in fact, they do not in the embodied state (John iii, 8). They can be detected only by their character and tendency (1 John iv, 1). The joys of the righteous and the misery of the wicked will doubtless be intensified by the absence of all distracting influences in the disembodied state, and will result chiefly, perhaps wholly, from the recollections and combinations of their former habits and associations of thought and feeling, just as in the state of final beatification or perdition they will be mainly due to similar causes. The soul will continue its usual state fixed by the absence of probation and external influences. Nor will it pursue the hallucinations of dreams, which are the effect of a suspension of the rational and perceptive faculties during sleep in a corporeal state, but will have the full consciousness of its position as to guilt or innocence, and the clear apprehension of its final award. A practical lesson, this, of the importance of cultivating those moral faculties and spiritual aspirations upon which the happiness of a rational and accountable creature must everlastingly depend! See INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Dobell, JOHN, an English hymnist, born in 1757, was a pious layman of moderate education, who died at Poole, Dorsetshire, in May, 1840, leaving, besides two volumes on Baptism (1807) and Humanity (1812), a New Selection of Hymns (Lond. 1812, 8vo, and later), containing several of his own.

Dodge, RICHARD VARICK, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Kaskaskia, Ill., Aug. 4, 1821. He graduated from Yale College in 1840, spent one year studying law, graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1844, served as pastor or stated supply at various places in Indiana, Illinois, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and California, spent several years in foreign travel, became pastor at San Diego, Cal., in 1879, and died there, Feb. 26, 1885. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1885, p. 43.

Dorrien, PATRICK, D.D., an Irish Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Downpatrick, County Down, March 29, 1814. He entered Maynooth College in 1833, was ordained in 1837, was curate at Belfast until 1847, parish priest of Loughlin Island until 1860, when he became bishop of Gabala in partibus, coadjutor of the see of Down and Connor in 1865, sole bishop in the same year, and died Nov. 3, 1885. He published some sermons and charges. See Brady, Episc. Succession, i, 275; ii, 863.

Drummond, WILLIAM, the first Scottish poet who wrote well in English, was born at Hawthornden, Dec. 13, 1585. He graduated from Edinburgh University in 1605, studied law at Bruges, in France, settled upon his native estate in 1609, spent several years (1625-30) abroad, but was so affected by the execution of Charles I that he died, Dec. 4, 1649. Besides some political productions, he published numerous poems (a few religious), which have been issued collectively (1711, 1832, 1838, 1857). See Life, by Masson (Lond. 1873).

Du Bois, JOHN CLARKSON, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, born Dec. 13, 1829, was rector of St. John's Church, Fredericksted, Santa Cruz, and died at Antigua, Nov. 27, 1884.

Duff, ARCHIBALD, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in the Gallowgate, Aberdeen, in 1810, and educated in Marischal College, then one of the two universities of that city. Visiting Canada on a commercial commission, he earnestly engaged in religious labor, and on his return to Scotland, in 1836, entered Glasgow Theological Academy. In 1841 he was ordained pastor at Fraserburg; in 1845 joined the seceding Scotch Church, accepting the pastorship of the newly-formed Ebenezer Chapel; in 1848 became pastor at Hawick; in 1856 entered the service of the Colonial Missionary Society, laboring first at Comanville, Canada, and after 1862 at Sherbrooke. In 1880 he resigned his charge, and, returning to England, died at Putney, Nov. 19, 1883. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1884, p. 288.

Dunwoody, JAMES, a veteran minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Screven County, Ga., May 4, 1790. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1810, was licensed to preach in 1816, was admitted to the Carolina Conference in 1818, and labored earnestly in hard fields until 1870, when he took a superannuated relation, which he sustained until his death, July 31, 1884. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1884, p. 129.

Dutton, WARREN BACKUS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, graduated from Yale College in 1829, studied at the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia, became assistant pastor in Farmville, Va., in 1838, pastor at Charlestown in 1841, devoted 1866-67 to recruiting his health, labored from 1868 to 1870 at Harper's Ferry, and afterwards resided at Charlestown until his death, Sept. 5, 1874, at the age of seventy years. See Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. s. v.

He graduated from Middlebury College in 1824, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827; was pastor of the Second Church, Newton, Mass., from 1828 to 1858, thereafter at Malden, N. Y., and finally resided without charge at Brooklyn, until his death, March 28, 1885.

Gilder, JOHN LEONARD, a noted Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Aug. 8, 1816. He was early converted, licensed to preach in 1829, and in the same year joined the Philadelphia Conference, in which and in the New York East Conference he occupied important positions, including several years occupied in teaching, until his sudden death, July 8, 1883. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1884, p. 92.

Gleason, ANSON, a noted Congregational minister, often designated as "father Gleason," was born at Manchester, Conn., May 2, 1797. He was a missionary to various tribes of Indians from 1823 to 1835, in which latter year he was ordained, general missionary from 1848 to 1851, then again to the Indians until 1861, and thereafter city missionary successively in Rochester, Utica, and Brooklyn, until his death, Feb. 24, 1885. Cong. Year-book, 1886, p. 25.

Goode, WILLIAM, M.A., an English writer, was born at Buckingham, April 2, 1762. He entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1780, became curate of Abbots-Langley, Hertfordshire, in 1784, curate of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, London, in 1786, rector in 1796, and died April 16, 1816. He was the author of a New Version of the Psalms in Metre (1811, 1816):—The Scripture Names of Christ (1822, 6 vols.). See Memoir, by his son (Lond. 1828).

Gordon, SAMUEL R., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Somerset County, Md. He graduated from the General Theological Seminary (N. Y.) in 1843, served as assistant at St. Paul's, Baltimore, rector of St. Luke's, Queen Anne's County, of St. Paul's, Kent County, of St. Thomas's, Prince George County, in 1853, and died there, Aug. 19, 1883, aged seventy years.

Gowan, ANTHONY T., D.D., a Scotch Independent minister, was born in 1811 at Whitehaven, Cumberland. He was educated at the Glasgow University, became pastor at Blackhills, near Aberdeen, afterwards at Dalkeith, and finally colleague of Dr. Alexander in the Theological Hall at Edinburgh. He died Dec. 16, 1884. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1886, p. 169.

Grahame, JAMES, a Scottish poet, was born April 22, 1765, at Glasgow. He graduated from the university there in 1784, was bred to the law, but took orders in the English Church, and became curate first at Ship-ton, Gloucestershire, and then at Sedgfield, near Durham, and died Sept. 14, 1811. His poetry, all in blank verse, is religious; the principal pieces are, The Sabbath:—The Birds of Scotland:—British Georgics. See English Cyclop. s. v.

Grant, Sir ROBERT, an English poet, was born in 1795, graduated from Cambridge in 1806, studied law, entered Parliament in 1826, became governor of Bombay in 1834, and died at Dapoorie, India, July 9, 1838. Besides some volumes on India, he wrote twelve sacred lyrics, which were published by his brother, Lord Glenelg, under the title of Sacred Poems (1839), and are so excellent that several of them appear in most modern hymnals.

Grier, ISAAC, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Jersey Shore, Pa., Jan. 7, 1806. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1828, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1833, became stated supply at Shamokin and Washington, Pa., the same year; the next year pastor at the latter place until 1852, at Buffalo in 1854, and so continued until his death at Mifflinburg, June 24, 1884. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1885, p. 19.

Pictorial Bibles. The value and interest added to books of almost all sorts by graphic illustrations has not escaped the attention of editors of the Holy Scriptures. In the Middle Ages this was effected by illuminating copies by hand. See ILLUMINATION, ART OF. Since the invention of printing and the discovery of engraving, a similar effect has been more cheaply produced by designs on wood, metal, or stone, either etched or in relief. The romantic scenes of Bible history have been so often reproduced in paint and pencil, and the remains and scenes of Bible lands are so rich in apt and important elucidations of ancient customs and institutions, that a just idea of Oriental life and manners can hardly be conveyed without some such aid to the eye. Accordingly both fancy and fact have been put into requisition for this purpose, and multitudes of volumes have appeared expressly aimed at this result. One of the earliest is the Poor Man's Bible. See BIBLIA PAUPERUM. The most noted is that of Hans Holbein (q. v.). In modern times artists and authors have vied with each other, and publishers have been lavish in their endeavors to enrich and beautify the sacred pages with pictorial additions, representing not only the realities of antiquarian research, but also the conceptions of creative genius. Much of this is of little real help to the student, and some of it has really misled readers by imaginary notions and false analogies. But a real gain has been effected by most of the delineations borrowed from books of travel and exploration. These have been also incorporated in a compact and convenient form in the best Bible dictionaries now so widely circulated. One of the most popular and really serviceable of all the pictorial Bibles is that edited by the late Dr. John Kitto (q. v.). More expensive and elaborate ones have been issued by several English and American houses, which are an ornament to the household and an heirloom to the family.

Pike, GUSTAVE DORMAN, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Topsfield, Mass., Aug. 6, 1831. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1858, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1861, became co-pastor at Nashua, N. Sem.* 1881, p. 112; Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. s. v.

Reading of the Bible. The regular and constant perusal of the Holy Scriptures is so delightful a privilege of Christians that it is spontaneously adopted by the converted heart, and the book has such a charm both for the young and the old, the scholar and the unlearned, as to be a perpetual theme of study for every intelligent mind. It is also enjoined as a religious duty, as well in the volume itself (Deut. vi, 7; John v, 39), as in the prescriptive rules of most ecclesiastical bodies. The public use of the Bible was practiced by the Jews and by the early Christians, and has been continued among all Protestant bodies. See LESSONS. Especial officers were detailed in the early Church for the more general diffusion of this work. See READER. In the Roman Catholic Church, however, and to some extent in the Greek, the promiscuous perusal of the Scriptures, in the vernacular, has been prohibited. See BIBLE, USE OF, BY THE LAITY. Much of the modern so-called "Bible-reading" is rather a mode of sermonizing, or a casual stringing together of disconnected texts on some fanciful principle.

Reding, Joseph, a pioneer Baptist minister, was born in Fauquier County, Va., about 1750. He was baptized in 1771; began to preach immediately; labored successfully in South Carolina and Kentucky, and died in December, 1815. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

He died June 19, 1888. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. a. v.

Smith, ALBERT PATTERSON, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New Hampshire in 1809. He graduated from the General Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1842, served at Camden, N. J., then as rector of St. Peter's Church, Cazenovia, for thirty-three years, until his death, March 14, 1882.

Society FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE, an important religious association of the Church of England, founded in 1698, designed to support charity-schools in England and Wales, and to circulate annotated Bibles, tracts, and books, chiefly in the British dominions. It has published many valuable works of a popular religious character. It is distinct from, but somewhat akin with, the Religious Tract Society, which was instituted in 1799, and which has a wider field. It is supported by endowment, contributions, and sales, and has an annual income of about half a million dollars.

Sophia (Saint), CHURCH (or MOSQUE) OF, the most notable edifice in Constantinople, built by the emperor Constantine, A.D. 330, and so named in honor of the divine wisdom (Σοφία). It was one of the first Christian churches permitted after the persecution by Diocletian. Thirteen years afterwards it was enlarged by Constantius, son of Constantine; was burned in 404, rebuilt in 415 by Theodosius II; burned a second time in 532, and in 538 was reconstructed from the foundation by Justinian, and dedicated on Christmas eve, 549. In 1453, when the Turks entered the city, the people gathered together in this church, but they were seized and massacred, the building being saved from destruction by Mohammed II, who conceived the idea of transforming it into a mosque. The whole aspect, both internally and externally, was entirely changed to accommodate the new worship; the pictures and mosaics were covered over, the altar rebuilt in the corner towards Mecca, a minaret was added at one corner, and the form of the church was changed to that of a crescent. Since then other buildings have been added to the original, a sacristy and baptistery being the most prominent. Among the sacred curiosities found in the crypt are, according to tradition, the block of red marble used as the cradle of our Saviour, the cup used by Mary in washing Jesus, both from Bethlehem; also the "sweating column," "shining stone," and "cold window," visited by Moslem pilgrims as miraculous. The original form of the church was that of a cross enclosed in a square, whose sides measure two hundred and forty-five feet; including the portico, two hundred and sixty-nine feet. Having been enlarged and rebuilt several times, the original form has been lost, and now the exterior of this edifice is singularly heavy. Uncouth and disproportionate in appearance, even the effect of its unusual dimensions is destroyed by its lack of symmetry, it presenting an irregular mass of cupolas, half-domes, shelving roofs, and stunted minarets. Even the great dome, rising in the centre, so celebrated for its architectural beauty, looks low and flat, and from the outside produces nothing of the effect which was its purpose. The west side forms the entrance. The first vestibule was called in ancient times the narthex. The gallery for the women runs around three sides, supported by many magnificent columns borrowed from ancient buildings. The chief object of beauty is the dome, called the "aerial dome," on account of its exceeding light weight, consisting of pumice-stone bricks from Rhodes. It rises to the height of one hundred and eighty feet, resting on four massive arches. In the corners of this dome are four seraphim in mosaic, and on the arches can still be traced the sketches of madonnas and saints. Most of the ornamentation has been replaced by gigantic specimens of Turkish caligraphy, quotations from the Koran, on circular tablets. On the top of the cupola the verse "God is the light of the heavens and the earth" is illuminated during the festivals. Like all mosques

Toby, THOMAS W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was for several years a missionary to China, afterwards pastor in North Carolina, professor in various literary institutions, pastor at Union Springs, then at Camden, Ala., and finally principal of the Collegiate Institute at Eufala, among the Creek nation. He died at Lake Weir, Fla., in February, 1885, aged sixty-five years.

Trench, RICHARD CHENEVIX, D.D., a prelate of the Irish Church, was born in Ireland, Sept. 9, 1807. He was educated at Harrow and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and took his degree in 1829. He was shortly afterwards ordained as curate to Hugh James Rose of Hadleigh. At this time Trench joined the High-Church party, without having the smallest leaning Romewards. He had a tolerance for, though not intellectual sympathy with, the broad school. While holding a small incumbency in Hampshire, Trench became acquainted with the Rev. Dr. (afterwards bishop) Wilberforce, whose curate he became. In 1845 Wilberforce was made dean of Westminster, and Trench became rector of Ippenstoke, a small village near Winchester, joining to his work there, as soon as Wilberforce became bishop, that of examining chaplain, and soon after that of theological professor at King's College. In 1856 Trench was made dean of Westminster, a position which he held to the end of 1863. On Jan. 1, 1864, he was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. He resigned his office in 1885, and died March 28, 1886. As a writer, Trench is known beyond the confines of his own country. He was poet, philologist, and theologian. Of his many writings the best known are, On the Authorized Version of the New Testament (N. Y. 1858):—Synonyms of the New Testament (8th ed. revised, Lond. 1876):—Exposition of the Sermon on the Mount, etc. (3d ed. 1869):—Studies in the Gospels (1870):—The Star of the Wise Men (1850):—Commentary on the Epistles to the Seven Churches in Asia, Rec. ii, iii (1864):—Notes on the Parables of Our Lord (1871):—Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord (ed.)—On the Lessons in Proverbs (1865):—Lectures on Mediæval Church History (1878):—Sermons Preached before the University of Cambridge (1866):—Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey (1861):—The Hulsean Lectures for 1845 and 1846 (1860):—Sermons Preached for the Most Part in Ireland (1878):—Sacred Latin Poetry (1864):—English, Past and Present (7th ed. 1871):—A Select Glossary of English Words (1872):—On the Study of Words (1868):—Brief Thoughts and Meditations on Passages of Holy Scriptures (1884). Trench was also a member of the English Company for the Revision of the New Test. (B. P.)

Wesleyan Methodist Connection of AMERICA. This society grew out of a separation from the Methodist Episcopal Church, on account of the connection of that body with slavery, and the arbitrary character of its government. The withdrawal of Revs. O. Scott, J. Horton, L. R. Sunderland, Luther Lee, and Lucius C. Matlack, in the latter part of 1842, and the establishment of a religious paper known as the True Wesleyan, are regarded as the commencement of the movement which led to the Wesleyan organization. A call, signed by all of the above-named persons except L. C. Matlack, was issued in the True Wesleyan, and otherwise circulated, for a Wesleyan anti-slavery convention, to be held at Andover, Mass., commencing Feb. 1, 1843; and fifty-two delegates from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New Hampshire, responded to the call. In this convention a large number of resolutions were presented and adopted, setting forth the principles which had guided them in their separation from the mother church. Provisions were also made in this convention for another general convention to be held in Utica, N. Y., May 31 following, for the purpose of effecting the permanent organization of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection. One hundred and fifty-three delegates responded to the last-named call, representing New York, Michigan, Connecticut, Vermont, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

At this latter convention a discipline was formulated, and among the principles set forth for the government of the Church the following were some of the most prominent:

1. Opposition to slavery.
2. No affiliation with secret, oath-bound societies.
3. Plainness in apparel and manner of living.
4. Equal representation of ministers and laymen in the government of the Church.

Six annual conferences were established, viz.; New England, Champlain, New York, Miami, Alleghany, and Michigan, and the youthful denomination started upon its heaven-appointed mission. The first general conference was held in Cleveland, O., commencing Oct. 2, 1844.

Like all other reformatory bodies, this society was born in the midst of the most bitter persecution; and, viewed from a human standpoint, under the most unfavorable circumstances. Their opposition to the institution of American slavery at a time when the masses of the people either believed it to be right, or as a matter of policy apologized for it, made them a target for all kinds of abuse, and the opportunity was not neglected by the people. A single illustration in this connection will be sufficient. On one occasion, while Rev. Luther Lee was speaking against slavery, he was treated to a solution of whiskey and lampblack, which was thrown over him, and not only marred his personal appearance, but ruined his suit of clothes. He continued his address, however, and that meeting proved to be one of the best for the cause that was ever held.

The growth of the denomination was very encouraging notwithstanding these unfavorable surroundings; and within ten years the membership in the various conferences aggregated more than ten thousand. They were not of the popular and aristocratic class, neither were they altogether poor and unlearned. Among the membership were men and women of remarkable intellectual ability, who were instrumental in the hands of God in building up and establishing the educational interests of the Connection, until they were not behind other denominations of equal size in this particular.

Early in the history of the society the propriety of establishing an institution of learning was urged upon the people, and efforts were made in this direction at Leoni, Jackson Co., Mich., and also at Wheaton, Ill., but the matter finally took a more definite form in the location of a denominational college at Adrian, Mich. The citizens of Adrian donated largely towards the enterprise with the understanding and agreement that, if within five years the Wesleyans should erect buildings and secure property, free from debt, amounting to $100,000, the school should become the property of the denomination. Much more than the required sum was raised in the given time, and the terms having been complied with, an unquestionable title was secured. A competent faculty was placed in charge of the college, and astonishing success attended the enterprise from the beginning. Students flocked in from all parts of the country, and many were compelled to find rooms in private residences near the college, all of the desirable rooms in the two large buildings erected for that purpose being occupied.

After the war of the rebellion had closed and peace had been declared, leaving the nation free from the curse of human bondage, some of the leading men in the Connection, believing that the mission of the denomination was ended, conceived the idea of uniting all non-Episcopal Methodist churches into one body, and combined their efforts with others in effecting the proposed combination. A convention was held in the city of Cleveland, O., June 21, 1865, where committees were appointed and steps taken looking towards such a union of churches. Provisions were also made for another convention, which met in Cincinnati, May 9, 1866, and at this convention the basis of the union was decided upon and the foundation laid. The expectations of the Wesleyan leaders were not met, however, from the fact that the denomination, as a whole, were not satisfied with the terms of the union, and also from their general disagreement with the proposition that the mission of their Church was ended. When the reformatory principles adopted by the Wesleyans were presented for the consideration of the convention, they were entirely ignored, and secret societies were eulogized instead of being reformed. Finding that the union was not a success, most of the Wesleyan leaders in the movement withdrew and united with other religious communions, and a number of local churches followed their example. These may be properly termed the "dark days" of the Connection, and when the "smoke of battle" had cleared away, it was found that somewhat serious injuries had been sustained. Not the least of these was the transfer of Adrian College to the control of another denomination. In the midst of the exciting scenes connected with the union movement a majority of the trustees were prevailed upon to make the transfer, though not in harmony with the wishes, and without the consent, of the denomination. Committees have been appointed by the General Conference to look after the legality of the transfer, and to consider the feasibility of taking legal steps for the recovery of the college. Notwithstanding the tidal wave of adversity that had swept over the Connection, those who remained true and stood by their "colors" were not disheartened. Other men as noble as the first—and of greater value to the Connection, because of the fact that they remained true to principles through the struggle that tried men's souls—took the helm, and succeeded in steering the vessel through the breakers to the calm sea of renewed prosperity. The troubles of the conflict only intensified the zeal of the tried and true, and the result was a general revival all through the Connection, and a healthful growth has been realized since that time both in membership and finances.

A large and commodious publishing house has been erected in the city of Syracuse, N. Y., which is the headquarters of the denomination, where the principal part of the business of the Connection is transacted. Rev. D. S. Kinney is connectional agent, and not only has charge of the business transacted at the office, but visits the various annual conferences, and looks after the denominational interests in connection therewith. Rev. N. Wardner is editor of the Wesleyan Methodist, the official organ of the denomination, and of the Bible Standard, a monthly magazine devoted to the doctrine and experience of Scriptural holiness, both of which are published at the publishing house in Syracuse, and receive a liberal patronage from the people. He is also editor of The Children's Banner, and Good Words, papers devoted to Sunday-school interests. The publishing interests of the Connection, including building, printing machinery, etc., are valued at about $50,000, to which additions are constantly made, and all is free from debt.

Two seminaries are now the property of the Connection, one located at Waseja, Dodge Co., Minn., with professor E. G. Paine as principal, and the other at Houghton, Alleghany Co., N. Y., with professor A. R. Dodd as principal. Both of these schools are in a prosperous condition, and an honor to the Connection. Added to these is a theological seminary, in connection with Wheaton College, Ill., under the care of Rev. L. N. Stratton, D.D., as president, where a goodly number of young men are in course of education each year for the Christian ministry.

There are at this date (September, 1886), twenty-one conferences in the denomination, aggregating about five hundred ministers and twenty thousand members. Officers of the General Conference are, president, Rev. N. Wardner, Syracuse, N. Y., and secretary, Rev. E. W. Bruce, of the same place, who are the joint authors of this article.

Westgate, GEORGE LEWIS, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Fall River, Mass., April 12, 1844. He graduated from Wesleyan University, Conn., in 1865; studied two years in Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., and in 1867 joined the Providence Conference, in which and afterwards (1874) in the New York

East Conference he occupied important stations until his election, in 1880, as professor of social science in his alma mater, a position which he retained until his death, June 28, 1885. See Alumni Record of Wesleyan University, 1883, p. 212; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1886, p. 83.

He died May 7, 1885.

Wilson, John Glasgow, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Maury County, Tenn., in 1826. He was piously reared in the Presbyterian Church, graduated from Nashville University at the age of sixteen, and licensed to preach at twenty-four; served for twenty years as president of Huntsville Female College and Warren College, Ky.; in 1876 became pastor of St. John's Church, St. Louis; in 1880 presiding elder, and died Aug. 5, 1884. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1884, p. 142.

Wilson, Samuel B., D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in South Carolina about 1782, studied in the usual schools of the day, was pastor for thirty-seven years, and subsequently professor in the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia, at length emeritus until his death, in August, 1869. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Wilson, Samuel Jennings, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister and educator, was born near Washington, Pa., July 19, 1828. He graduated from Washington College in 1852, and from the Western Theological Seminary in 1855, was licensed to preach the same year, served two years as teacher in the seminary, in 1857 became professor there, and continued in office until his death, Aug. 17, 1883. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Winkler, Edward Theodore, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Savannah, Ga., Nov. 13, 1823. He graduated from Brown University in 1843, and studied in the Newton Theological Institution; in 1845 was assistant editor of the Christian Quarterly, and supplied the pulpit at Columbus, Ga., for six months; in 1846 became pastor at Albany, and subsequently at Gallisonville; in 1852 secretary of the Southern Baptist Publication Society; in 1854 pastor at Charleston, S. C.; in 1872 at Marion, in 1874 editor of the Alabama Baptist, and died Nov. 10, 1883. He wrote several denominational works. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Witherspoon, Andrew, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Leith, Scotland, May 16, 1808, and emigrated to America with his parents when nine years old. He was converted at sixteen, licensed to preach in 1832, and next year admitted into the Troy Conference, in which he held prominent appointments until his superannuation, in 1877, when he removed to Kansas, and died there, Feb. 9, 1885. He was a member of six general conferences. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1885, p. 95.

Worlds, PLURALITY OF. The question whether other globes besides the earth are inhabited is one of great interest both to the student of nature and to the theologian. There are two classes of arguments that may be brought to bear upon its solution.

1. Probabilities from Analogy.—From the fact that our own globe is populated, it has naturally been inferred that the stellar bodies are so likewise. Else why do they exist? Surely, it is contended, they cannot have been formed merely for the delectation of the comparatively few denizens of this relatively insignificant orb. But are we sure of that? If man be the only intelligent creature, it is inconsistent neither with reason nor with Scripture to suppose that the whole visible creation was intended for his express benefit and behoof. Moreover, the presumption from analogy almost wholly breaks down if extended to its legitimate results in this question. If the other celestial spheres are inhabited, it is doubtless with rational and moral beings like ourselves, for mere unaccountable animals would be a sorry outcome of so vast creative power and skill. In that case they are free of will, and some of them, at least, have probably fallen, like men and angels. Has a Redeemer been provided for them also? It would seem not, from the silence of revelation on the subject, or rather from the implications of soteriology. It is hazardous to aver that Christ has died for other worlds than our own, or that he will ever do so. Here is apparently an incongruity which clogs the hypothesis of other planetary bodies being inhabited.

2. Evidence of Science.—This is really a problem within the domain of physics, and should be decided by an appeal to known facts. These are neither few nor indistinct. The moon, which is our nearest and most familiar neighbor, is pronounced by the latest observers to be utterly uninhabitable. She has neither atmosphere nor water, at least not on the hemisphere which is constantly presented towards us. But she has enormously deep craters, which speak of fearful convulsions upon her surface, and her face appears to be entirely destitute of all possibilities even of vegetation. In fact, an ordinary-sized farm, or even a considerable dwelling, had it existed there, would probably have been detected by the powerful telescopes which have scanned and even photographed the lunar landscape.

Turning now to Venus, our nearest fellow-planet, we find her not much more favorably situated. She has so wide a variation of temperature at different seasons of the year, owing to the great obliquity of her ecliptic, as must be fatal to all animal or vegetable existence. Mercury, the sole other planet within our orbit, is even worse off, being so near the sun that no life could possibly endure the terrific heat. Mars, our first outside neighbor, is circumstanced most like ourselves; but the close observation, for which he affords peculiar facilities, have failed to discover any positive indications of habitability. Of the remaining members of our own planetary system, Jupiter and Saturn may perhaps have a temperature capable of supporting life, but the different colored moons of the former and the singular electric zone of the latter, besides their exceedingly low density, imply a difference of constitution incompatible with the conditions known upon our own globe. The improbability of their being inhabited is increased by the revelations of the spectrum, which discloses a composition of each materially different from the other and from the earth's. As for the asteroids, which occupy the place of a lost intermediate sphere, they seem to have consisted of terribly explosive materials, fragments of which frequently fall to us in the form of meteorolites, and furnish compounds not found in terrestrial bodies. The more distant planets are too intensely cold to admit of life in any form.

The only remaining member of our planetary family is the central orb, the sun itself. If its body is coequal with its luminous disk, the surface must be too rare to sustain beings of anything more than ethereal weight; and whether this be the real body of the sun, or whether the interior sphere, glimpses of which are obtained through the so-called "spots," and which only appear dark by contrast with the vivid incandescence of the atmosphere, still the fiery ardor of the surface must be such as to preclude all life of which we can form any conception.

The fixed stars are but the central suns of other systems, and are evidently of a like nature with our own. Their planets, if they have any, are a matter of pure conjecture. Comets and nebulae are too flimsy in their structure to form a habitable abode for creatures of any sort; they seem, indeed, to be but fire-mist or electric vapor. We have thus exhausted the range of space, and find no home except earth at all suitable or possible for a creature having the least resemblance to man. To suppose a being capable of existing under the abnormal and intolerable conditions of vitality such as we have ascertained is as gratuitous as it is preposterous. We cannot, it is true, limit the power and resources of the Almighty, but we are forced by the facts in the case, and by the invariable analogies of all life with which we are acquainted, to deny its existence upon the other celestial bodies. Nor is there the slightest evidence that any of the globes except our own has ever been inhabited, or is likely to be so in the future. See Proctor, Other Worlds than Ours (Lond. 1870).

Wylie, WILLIAM, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Pa., July 10, 1776. He studied at various schools; became pastor of Upper and Lower Sandy and Fairfield Church, Ky., in 1802; in 1805 of Rehoboth and Round Hill; in 1810 preached at Uniontown, Pa.; in 1823 became pastor at Wheeling, Va.; in 1830 at Newark, O., where he continued twenty years, and died at Wheeling, May 9, 1853. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Y.

Yale, ELIHU, F.R.S., was born at New Haven, Conn., April 5, 1648, but removed to England with his parents at ten years of age, and never returned to America. In 1678 he went to the East Indies, became governor of Madras, amassed a fortune, and returned to England, where he died (in London), July 22, 1721. He gave above $2000 in books and money to found a college at his birthplace, which therefore took his name.

Yantia, JOHN LAPSLEY, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lancaster, Ky., Sept. 14, 1804. He studied privately, was licensed to preach in 1829, became pastor at Stanford and Lancaster in 1830, removed to Saline County, Mo., in 1833, and thereafter labored alternately as teacher and pastor in various places, especially Danville, Ky., where he died, May 28, 1882. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclop. s. v.

Yong (or Younge), JOHN, D.D., an English prelate, born at Cheapside, London, England, became master in Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, rector of St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate, prebend of Westminster (1572), and at last bishop of Rochester (1578). He was a faithful preacher, and queen Elizabeth deferred much to his judgment in Church matters. Better bishoprics were offered to him, but as often declined. He died April 10, 1605. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 357.

Young, NICHOLAS DOMINIC, a Roman Catholic missionary, was born near Washington, Md., June 11, 1793. He studied with the English Dominicans at Bornhem, Belgium, and became a member of their order in 1810. In December, 1817, he was ordained priest by bishop Flaget, at Bardstown, Ky., and in 1822 became superior of the Convent of St. Joseph, Perry County, O. He was provincial of his order from September, 1832, to May, 1857. In 1851 he established a house of his order at Washington. He died in that city, Nov. 28, 1878. See (N. Y.) Catholic Annual, 1882, p. 55.

Z.

Zschokke, JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL, a German writer, was born at Magdeburg, March 22, 1771. He was erratic in his early youth, but studied at the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and although proficient in philosophy, history, and mathematics, was refused a position as professor on account of his opposition to the government. Leaving Prussia, therefore, he travelled through Germany and France, and settled in Switzerland as a teacher, but the French revolution compelled him to take refuge in Aarau, where he played an active part in those times. He died there, Jan. 22, 1848. His later productions were chiefly poetical and historical, many of them novels. His best known is Stunden der Andacht (1806; twice transl. in English, Meditations on Death); but, as might be expected from his career, it is neither profound nor inspiring. His collected works were published at Aarau (1825, 40 vols. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

FURTHER ADDENDA.

A.

Abbott, Amos, a Congregational minister, was born in Wilton, N. H., June 2, 1812. He was educated at Phillips Academy and Andover; was a missionary of the A. B. C. F. H., in 1869-74; but graduated from the Philadelphia Homœopathic College in 1871; was resident at Steele City, Neb., 1874, but practiced his profession and was also home missionary at Alexandria in 1876-77; at Fairfield, 1877-78, and the Otsego Reservation, 1878-79; and without charge at Ryde, on the Isle of Wight, from 1887 until his death, April 24, 1889. He was the author of an arithmetic that was used in the mission schools for forty years. He also wrote, *Pilgrimages:—Cholera:—Index to the New Testament:—Logic:—Vicarious Punishment:—Diseases of Women:—*and translated several works, among them a Natural Philosophy.

Alken, Charles Augustus, a Presbyterian minister and educator, was born at Manchester, Vt., Oct. 30, 1827. After graduating from Dartmouth College in 1846, and Andover Theological Seminary in 1853, having spent some time in Germany studying, he was pastor of the Congregational Church at Yarmouth, Me., 1854-59; professor of Latin in Dartmouth College, 1859-66; in Princeton, 1866-69; president of Union College, 1869-71; professor of ethics and apologetics in Princeton Theological Seminary, 1871-82; professor of Oriental and Old-Testament literature at the same place, from 1882 until his death, Feb. 14, 1892. He translated Zöckler's Commentary on Proverbs (in Schaff's ed. of Lange), and has contributed to various periodicals. He was one of the American revisers of the Old Testament.

Allibone, Samuel Austin, a bibliographical author, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., April 17, 1816. In early life he engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was book editor and corresponding secretary of the American Sunday-School Union, 1867-73, and again in 1877-79. In 1879 he became librarian of the Lenox Library, New York city. He died at Luzerne, Switzerland, Sept. 23, 1889. He was the author of A Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors, 3 vols., containing 46,499 authors. See Appletons' Cyclopædia of American Biography.

Allon, Henry, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Welton, near Hull, Oct. 13, 1818, and entered Cheshunt College as a student in 1839, where his course was abbreviated by his accepting the assistant pastorate of Union Chapel, Islington, in 1843; at the end of the year he became pastor, his principal having died, and he served this church in that capacity until his death, April 16, 1892. From 1866 to 1886 he was editor of the British Quarterly Review. He was also the author of *The Life of Rev. James Shearman:—The Congregational Psalmist Hymnal:—*two volumes of sermons, besides other works. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1893.

Andrews, Israel Ward, D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Danbury, Conn., Jan. 8, 1815; attended Amherst College in 1833-34; was teacher at Danbury, Conn., 1834-35; graduated from Williams College in 1837; was teacher in Lee, Mass., 1837-38; tutor and professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Marietta College, Ohio, 1839-55; ordained in May, 1868; was a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M. from 1867, and director of the A. H. M. S. from 1864 to 1879. He died at Hartford, April 18, 1888. Dr. Andrews wrote quite a number of pamphlets, and a Manual of the Constitution (1874, p. 374; revised edition, 1887).

Andrus, Reuben, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister and educator, was born in Rutland, N. Y., Jan. 29, 1824. In 1850 he became principal of the preparatory department of Illinois Wesleyan University, and in 1851 professor of mathematics in the same institution. He had joined the Illinois Conference in 1850, and in 1852 began his active pastorate; in 1854 became president of the Illinois Conference Female College, but in 1856 he returned to the pastorate. From 1872 to 1875 he was president of Indiana Asbury University, serving in the pastorate until his death, Jan. 17, 1887. See Minutes of Annual Conferences (Fall), 1887, p. 862.

Arms, William, a Congregational minister, was born in Fairfield, Vt., May 18, 1802; graduated from Amherst College in 1830, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1833; was missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. to Patagonia in 1833-34; Borneo, Batavia, and Singapore, 1835-38; graduated M.D. from Dartmouth College in 1839, and practiced medicine until his death, June 21, 1889.

Atkinson, George Henry, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Newburyport, Mass., May 10, 1819; graduated from Dartmouth College in 1843, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1846; was pastor at Oregon City in 1848-62; at Portland, 1863-72; general missionary of the American Home Missionary Society, 1872-80; and superintendent of the same for Oregon and Washington from 1880 until his death, Feb. 25, 1889.

Atwater, Edward Elias, a Congregational minister, was born in New Haven, Conn., May 28, 1816; graduated from Yale College in 1836, and from the Theological Seminary in 1840; was a pastor until 1870; and thereafter engaged in literary pursuits until his death at Hawthorne, Fla., Dec. 2, 1887. His published works are, Genealogical Register (1851):—The Sacred Tabernacle of the Hebrews (1875):—History of the Colony of New Haven (1881):—History of the City of New Haven (1887).

Atwood, Edward Sumner, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Taunton, Mass., June 4, 1833. He graduated from Brown University in 1852; from Andover Theological Seminary in 1856; the same year was ordained pastor at Grantville, Mass.; in 1864 became the colleague of Brown Emerson, D.D., in the South Church, Salem, and after his death its sole pastor. He was a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M. from 1878, and member of its prudential committee from 1886. He was the first president of the Essex Congregational Club. He died May 13, 1888.

Ayres, ROWLAND, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Granby, Mass., May 1, 1817. He graduated from Amherst College in 1841; studied one year at Andover and one at Princeton; became pastor of the Church at Hadley, Mass., in 1848, where he served until 1883, and remained pastor emeritus until his death, Jan. 31, 1891. He was a member of the Hadley School Committee twenty-three years; representative to the General Court in 1882; a trustee of Hopkins Academy and president of the board. He was the author of The History of the Hopkins Fund, and several pamphlets. See (Am.) Cong. Year-book, 1892.

B.

Barnard, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS PORTER, S.T.D., LL.D., L.H.D., an Episcopalian educator, was born in Sheffield, Mass., May 5, 1809. Graduating from Yale College in 1828, he became tutor there in 1830; a teacher in asylums for the deaf and dumb, 1831-37; professor in the University of Alabama, 1837-54; professor in the University of Mississippi, 1854-56; president of the same, 1856-58; chancellor, 1858-61. He was in charge of the chart printing of the U. S. Coast Survey, 1863-64. In May, 1864, he became president of Columbia College, which position he held until his death, April 27, 1889. He belonged to many scientific societies, and published many technical and educational works. See Appletons' Cyclop. of Amer. Biography.

Barnum, SAMUEL WEEK, a Congregational minister and author, was born at North Salem, N. Y., June 4, 1820. He graduated at Yale College in 1841, and the Theological Seminary in 1844; served as pastor at Granby, Conn.; Feeding Hills, Chesterfield, and Phillipston, Mass.; Bethany, Conn.; retired in 1863 for the purpose of devoting himself to authorship, and died Nov. 18, 1891. He was the author of Romanism as It Is, a book which had a very large sale;—A Vocabulary of English Rhymes;—and also had charge of the pronunciation marking of Webster's International Dictionary. See (Am.) Cong. Year-book, 1892.

Barrows, Elijah Porter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Mansfield, Conn., Jan. 5, 1805; graduated from Yale College in 1826; was principal of the Hartford Grammar School, 1826-31; ordained evangelist at Simsbury, Conn., in 1832; pastor of the Dey Street Presbyterian Church, New York, 1835-37; professor of sacred literature in Western Reserve College, Hudson, O., 1837-52; professor of sacred literature in Andover Theological Seminary, 1852-66; without charge at Middletown, Conn., 1867-69; instructor in Union Theological Seminary, 1869-70; at Oberlin, 1871; professor of Old Testament literature and Biblical theology, Oberlin Theological Seminary, 1872-80, and without charge there until his death, Oct. 29, 1888. He wrote, View of Slavery (1836);—The Thornton Family (1837);—Memoir of David H. Clark (ed.) (1837);—Life of E. Judson (1852);—Companion to the Bible (1867);—Sacred Geography.

Barrows, William, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at New Braintree, Mass., Sept. 19, 1815; graduated from Amherst College in 1840, and spent one year in Union Theological Seminary; served as pastor at Norton, Mass.; Grantville; Old South Church, Reading; in 1869 became secretary of the Congregational Sunday-school and Publishing Society; in 1873 of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society; in 1887 financial agent of Whitman College, and died Sept. 9, 1891. He was the author of The Church and Her Children;—Purgatory; Doctrinally, Practically, and Historically Opened;—Oregon; the Struggle for Possession;—The United States of Yesterday and To-morrow, and several pamphlets. See (Am.) Cong. Year-book, 1892.

Bayliss, JEREMIAH H., D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Wednesbury, England, Dec. 20, 1835. In 1857 he joined the Genesee Conference. He was a pastor in various conferences until 1884, when he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate, which office he held until his death, Aug. 14, 1889. See Minutes of Annual Conferences (Fall), 1889, p. 383.

Beaudry, LOUIS N., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Highgate, Vt., in 1834, of Roman Catholic parents. Largely through the influence of Joseph Cook he was led to embrace Protestantism, and devoted his life to the service of his French Canadian countrymen, serving as missionary among them at Albany (N. Y.), Montreal, Quebec, Worcester (Mass.), and Chicago (Ill.). During the civil war he served as chaplain in the United States Army. He died at Chicago, Jan. 8, 1892. He was author of The Spiritual Struggles of a Roman Catholic, an autobiography. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences (Fall), 1892.

Beecher, HENRY WARD, an eminent Congregational minister, was born in Litchfield, Conn., June 24, 1813. Graduating from Amherst College in 1834, he then studied theology at Lane Seminary, of which his father was president. He married in 1837, and settled as a Presbyterian minister in Lawrenceburg, Ind. In 1839 he removed to Indianapolis, and in 1847 accepted the call to become pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, where he remained until his death, March 8, 1887. After 1859 his sermons were published weekly. During his theological course in 1831 he was editor of the Cincinnati Journal, a religious weekly. While pastor at Indianapolis he edited the Farmer and Gardener. He was one of the founders, and for twenty years an editorial contributor, of the N. Y. Independent. In the summer of 1874 Theodore Tilton, formerly his associate in the editorship of that journal, charged him with criminal commerce with Mrs. Tilton. A committee of the Plymouth Church reported the charges to be without foundation; but Mr. Tilton brought a suit against Mr. Beecher, placing his damages at $100,000. The trial lasted six months. The jury failed to agree—three standing for the plaintiff and nine for the defendant. Mr. Beecher was prominent as a public speaker. In April, 1865, he delivered an address at Fort Sumter on the anniversary of its fall. In 1878 he was elected chaplain of the Thirteenth Regiment, N. G. S. N. Y. He delivered the first three annual courses of lectures in the Yale Divinity School, "Lyman Beecher Lecture-ship." He was very prolific as a writer, and a list of his works will be found in Appletons' Cyclopædia of American Biography. See also the Congregational Year-book, 1888, p. 19.

Bennett, Charles Wesley, D.D., an educator, was born at East Bethany, N. Y., July 18, 1828. Graduating from Wesleyan University in 1852, he taught until 1862, when he entered the Methodist ministry. In 1864 he became principal of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y.; in 1866-69 studied at the University of Berlin; in 1871 became professor of history and logic in Syracuse University, and in 1885 professor of historical theology in Garrett Biblical Institute. He died April 17, 1891. He was for a time art editor of the Ladies' Repository, and was the author of Christian Archaeology.

Bennett, William Wallace, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was admitted to the Virginia Conference in 1842, and graduated from the University of Virginia in 1850. In 1862 he became a chaplain in the Confederate army, and in 1866 editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate. In 1877 he was elected president of Randolph Macon College, which position he held until 1886. He died July 6, 1887. He was a member of every General Conference of his church since 1858, and delegate to the Ecumenical Conference of 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1887, p. 105.

Bird, FREDERIC MEYER, D.D., a Presbyterian and eventually an Episcopalian minister, was born in Philadelphia, June 28, 1838; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1857, and Union Theological Seminary in 1860; became a Lutheran minister in the same year; an army chaplain in 1862-63; and entered the Episcopal ministry in 1868. He became professor at Lehigh University in 1881, teaching psychology, Christian evidences, and rhetoric. He died in 1890. He gave special attention to the study of hymnology, and his library on the subject, numbering about 4000 volumes, is now in Union Theological Seminary. He edited, Charles Wesley as Seen in his Finer and Less Familiar Hymns (1867):—with Dr. B. M. Smucker, the Lutheran Pennsylvania ministerium Hymns (1865), now used as the Lutheran General Council Church-book:—and with bishop Odenheimer, Songs of the Spirit (1871). He also wrote most of the hymnological articles in the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia, and most of the American matter in Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology.

Blackwell, JOHN DAVENPORT, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Fauquier County, Va., June 17, 1822. He graduated from Dickinson College, and joined the Virginia Conference in 1846, in which he served as pastor or presiding elder until his death, June 26, 1887. He was a member of four General conferences, and delegate to the Centennial Conference of Methodism held in Baltimore in 1884, before which he read a paper entitled An Essay on the Mission of Methodism. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1887, p. 108.

Bledsoe, ALBERT TAYLOR, D.D., a minister and educator, was born in Frankfort, Ky., Nov. 9, 1809. He graduated from the U. S. Military Academy at West Point in 1830, and served in the army until August, 1832. In 1833-34 he was adjunct professor of mathematics and teacher of French at Kenyon, and in 1835-36 professor of mathematics at Miami. Having studied theology, he was ordained a clergyman in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and preached until 1838. In that year he began the practice of law at Springfield, Ill., and continued to practice there and at Washington, D. C., until 1848. From 1848 to 1854 he was professor of mathematics and astronomy in the University of Mississippi; from 1854 to 1861 professor of mathematics in the University of Virginia. In 1861 he entered the Confederate service as colonel, but was soon made chief of the War Bureau and acting assistant secretary of war. In 1863 he went to England to collect material for his work on the Constitution. He next settled in Baltimore, and became editor of the Southern Review. In 1868 he became principal of the Louisa School, Baltimore, and in 1871 was ordained a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He died at Alexandria, Va., Dec. 8, 1877. He published, An Examination of Edwards on the Will (1845):—A Theodicy, or Vindication of the Divine Glory (1853):—Is Davis a Traitor? or, Was Secession a Constitutional Right Previous to the War of 1861 (1866):—Philosophy of Mathematics (1866). See Appletons' Cyclop. of Amer. Biography.

Bliss, ISAAC GROUT, an American missionary, was born in West Springfield, Mass., July 5, 1822. He graduated from Amherst College in 1844; studied at Andover and Yale Theological seminaries, and was ordained as a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. in 1847. He was married and sailed for Turkey in September of that year, and was stationed at Erzurum. Unintermitting labor broke his health, and in 1852 he returned to this country. He occupied the pastorate first at Southbridge, Mass., and afterwards at Boylston, having severed his connection with the Board. In 1858 he went to Constantinople as agent of the American Bible Society in the Levant, and in 1866 returned to America to raise funds for the erection of the Bible House. He came to New York again in 1870 for consultation in regard to the publication of the Arabic Bible. McAll, ROBERT WHITAKER, D.D., F.L.S., a Congregational minister, was born at Macclesfield, Cheshire, England, Dec. 17, 1821. He first studied architecture, but afterwards turned his attention to theology, and became a pastor in 1847, in which relation he continued until 1871, when he went to Paris with his wife for the purpose of viewing the scenes of the Franco-Prussian war. While he was standing on a street corner and distributing tracts to the passers-by, a man stepped from the throng and said: "Sir, I perceive you are a clergyman; if any one like you is ready to come over here and teach us a gospel, not of superstition, priestcraft, and bondage, but of simplicity, liberty, and charity, there are many of us ready to hear; but we have done with priests." Mr. McAll and his wife considered this a divine call, and accordingly rented a room in Belleville, and on Jan. 17, 1872, held the first meeting; twenty-eight were present. Mr. McAll could not speak French readily, but he could say, "God loves you," and "I love you," and that won them. The work has grown from this humble beginning until, in 1889, there were 126 stations and 27 missionaries, employed not only in Paris, but in the provinces. The income of the mission is from private donations and legacies, and has amounted to £17,408 12s. 3½d. The mission is administered on a very economical plan, spending for the year £16,480 16s. 10½d. Meetings to the number of 14,083 were held for adults, and 5320 for children. The aggregate attendance of adults was 919,925; of children, 235,927; 26,181 visits were made, and 500,807 Bibles, Testaments, tracts, etc., circulated. There is also a medical mission and two dispensaries. Each station has a small free lending library. Dr. McAll died May 11, 1893. The work is now carried on by his widow. There is an office of the mission at Room 21, No. 1710 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. See Bonar, White Fields of France (N. Y. 1879); Missionary Review of the World, Aug., Dec., 1889; July, 1890; (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1890, 1894.

McAuley, "Jerry," an evangelist, was born in Ireland in 1839. His father came to this country to escape arrest. Jerry never received any schooling, and when nineteen years old was committed to Sing Sing state-prison for fifteen years on the charge of robbery. He was educated at St. Mary's Academy and St. Vincent's College, in Pennsylvania, then went to the American College at Rome, and from there to the Jesuit University at Innsbruck. He returned to America in 1875, and became professor of theology in St. Vincent's College, and in 1880 prefect. In 1885 he was elected abbot of the Order of St. Benedict, with headquarters at Newark. He died Dec. 31, 1890.

Zunz, LEOPOLD PHINEAS, a Hebrew scholar, was born at Detmold, Germany, Aug. 10, 1794. He was educated at the University of Berlin, and became rabbi of a synagogue there in 1820. After two years he organized a society for Jewish culture. One of its members was Heine. The society, however, soon broke up. In 1824-32 Zunz was director of the new Jewish Congregational School; in 1825-35 he edited the Spener'sche Zeitung; in 1835-39 was rabbi again at Prague; in 1839-50 director of the Normal Seminary in Berlin. He died March 21, 1886. His life was one of literary activity, and his works were many.

THE END.
